freely, would raise the total to two shillings a day per household, a dreamy sum, which for the majority of the population is for such a purpose hopelessly out of reach. Of course, in practice a compromise is adopted; the bread-winner is fairly fed, though even he has not half his 'scientific supply' of meat, and is tempted to make up with alcohol; and the wife and children drag out anæmic lives on insufficient food." Now, we all know only too well how painfully true this statement is; but is it not the strongest possible proof that there is something radically wrong in our social economy? Is it not true that every working-man creates more wealth than is required to feed and clothe substantially both himself and his family? Is it not also true that ultimately all wealth is derived from land and labour? And do not these simple facts drive us irresistibly to the conclusion that some form of land nationalisation, or something which shall in a measure practically answer the same purpose, must eventually be brought about? Mr. Bradlaugh put the question in a nutshell, when he said that at the time when our Imperial taxation was about five millions, the land bore more than two; but that now our taxes have reached 85 millions, the land bears but one—instead of nearly $\frac{2}{3}$, only $\frac{1}{3}$. The nationalisation of the land pure and simple may be too much to expect from this present generation; but, if all wealth is ultimately derived from land and labour, and taxes must be raised, should not the land (which was not created by the work of man) bear, as it once did, a larger share of our national burdens?—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE WORD "CUSS."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It seems to me your correspondent from Colorado Springs is himself in error in stating that the word "cuss," when employed in the sense of a "rough cuss" or a "mean cuss," is a corruption of the word "curse." There is certainly a word "cuss" which is derived from "curse," as he points out, but it is an entirely different word, and is simply a slang synonym for its original, "curse;" whereas, "cuss," used in the above sense, seems, without doubt, to be a curtailment of "customer," as stated by the reviewer of "Skeat's Dictionary." For my part, and I think most Americans will agree with me, I never understood it as in any way connected with the word "curse." During several years of life beyond the Mississippi, as well as in other parts of America, I have often heard it used, but always, it appears to me, as a synonym for "customer," for a man was as likely to say a "rough customer," as a "rough cuss."—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I ask with diffidence for authority for a phrase now so commonly in men's mouths,—“The Church of England as by law established.” Can any one lay his hand on a statute which has established “The Church of England;” or is the phrase a part of, and only a part of, a perfectly correct phrase, “The Liturgy of the Church of England, as by law established”? Certainly we can lay our hand on the statute of Charles II. which established our Liturgy, in the popular sense of that word. But when, and by whom, was the Church of England Established?—I am, Sir, &c.,

AN ENGLISH HOME.

DEEP in a hazy hollow of the down
The brick-built Court in mellow squareness stood,
Where feathery beeches fringed the hanging wood,
And sighing cedars spread a carpet brown.

Out of the elms the clamorous tree-folk sent
A breezy welcome, while the roses made
Their vesper offering, and the creeper laid
His flaming hands about the pediment.

O happy souls, most fatherly denied
The cares that fret, not quicken: drawn to know

The healing hands that hang upon the Cross,
And through pure agonies of love and loss
Wrought into sorrow for a world of woe,
And from a prosperous baseness purified.

THE SKYLARKS.

IN AN EAST-END BIRD MARKET.

Oh, the sky, the sky, the open sky,
For the home of a song-bird's heart !
And why, why, why, why
Do they stifle here in the mart ?
Cages of agony, rows on rows,
Torture that only a wild thing knows ;
Is it nothing to you to see
That head thrust out through the hopeless wire,
And the tiny life, and the mad desire
To be free, to be free, to be free ?
Oh, the sky, the sky, the blue, wide sky,
For the beat of a song-bird's wings !
And why, why, why, why ?—
Is the only song it sings.

Great, sad eyes, with a frightened stare,
Look through the wildering darkness there,
The surge, the crowd, and the cry,
Fluttering wild wings beat and bleed,
And it will not peck at the golden seed,
And the water is almost dry ;
And straight and close are the cramping bars,
From the dawn of mist to the chill of stars,—
And yet it must sing or die !
Will its marred, hoarse voice in the city street
Make any heart of you glad ?
It will only beat with its wings, and beat,
It will only sing you mad.

Better to lie like this one dead,
Ruffled plumage on breast and head,
Poor little feathers for ever furled,
And only a song gone out of the world !

Where the grasses wave like an emerald sea
And the poppies nod in the corn,
Where the fields are wide and the wind blows free,
This joy of the spring was born,
Whose passionate music loud and loud,
In the hush and the rose of morn
Was a voice that fell from the sailing cloud
Midway to the blue above,—
A thing whose meaning was joy and love,
Whose life was one exquisite outpouring
Of a sweet, surpassing note ;—
And all you have done is to break its wing,
And to blast God's breath in its throat !

If it does not go to your hearts to see
The helpless pity of those bruised wings,
The tireless effort with which it clings
To the strain and the will to be free,
I know not how I shall set in words
The meaning of God in this,
For the loveliest thing in this world of his
Are the ways and the songs of birds !

And the sky, the sky, the wide, free sky,
For the home of the song-bird's heart !
And why, why, why, why
Do they stifle here in the mart ? RENNELL RODD.

ART.

MASON'S "HARVEST MOON."

THE etching which Mr. Robert Macbeth (one of the most recently elected Associates of the Royal Academy) has executed of the late George Mason's well-known picture entitled "The Harvest Moon," is one of those which merits more than a passing word of praise. A reproduction such as this, which adds individuality of artistic expression to accuracy of drawing and perfect sympathy with the original work, is as rare as the picture it reproduces is beautiful, and it is no exaggeration to say that of purely idyllic nineteenth-century art, Mr. Mason's "Harvest Moon" is one of the finest examples. There is a trace of Italian feeling in Mason's pictures, from which those of Walker are free ; but both gain much of their beauty from the classic feeling which marks the actions and the form of the figures, and both join to this antique grace, a tender, half-regretful fondness for the earth and its labourers, such as no Greek could have felt, or would have wished to feel. Mr. Macbeth was peculiarly fitted for the task he has accomplished, and his work (of very large scale for an etching) is thoroughly successful. This artist is one whose own pictures have been almost entirely concerned with peasant life, and he is probably the one English artist living whose sympathy with Walker, Pinwell, and Mason, has not degenerated into a feeble copying of their most superficial characteristics. His peasants, on the contrary, have rather erred on the side of over-robustness, and sometimes the angles of the women and the biceps of the men have been rather over-developed. His peculiarly manly method of work and thought has come most happily to the interpretation of Mason's gentle, almost over-refined, picture, and has lent an element of strength to the etching which nearly supplies the want of the colour, on which so much of the beauty of the original painting depended. It is no drawback to the merit of this reproduction, that Mr. Macbeth has done his work with the free interpretation of an artist, rather than the semi-mechanical fidelity of an engraver. The etching is, in short, a good bit of English Art, worthily done from a worthy original.

PROFESSOR GREEN'S PROLEGOMENA TO ETHICS.*

[SECOND NOTICE.]

WE have already fully expressed our objections to Mr. Green's analysis of "free-will," and it cannot, of course, be otherwise than that his treatment of this question should in some degree affect his whole doctrine of moral action. Allowing, however, for this difference of analysis, we are in hearty sympathy with his views on the subject of the "moral ideal," expressed in the latter part of the volume before us, and forming its most characteristic and important feature. These views involve a repudiation of Hedonism, as incapable of being reconciled with the observed facts of human nature ; a rejection of John Mill's Utilitarianism, as inconsistent and without rational basis, when once Hedonism is rejected ; and a careful analysis of those springs of moral action which Hedonism and Utilitarianism fail to explain, showing that they imply an ideal of self other than it is at present, arising from the divine principle that dwells within us,—a recognition of capabilities of something greater, pointing one does not see exactly whither, though one does see that it is in the direction of something higher than one's present self,—capabilities never fully realised in this life, but consciously brought nearer to realisation, and more clearly understood, in proportion as the will attaches itself to their fulfilment. And this process of fulfilment of moral capabilities is continued throughout the life of the race, a fact which has important bearing on the moral ideal in the individual. According to Kant's maxim, "Treat humanity as an end," the ultimate aim of moral action is not merely the nearer approach towards individual perfection as such, but, conjointly with this, the advancement of the moral life of mankind. The "good-will" is the only true good, and the moral aim is the securing of the "good-will," or, in other words, of devotion to the moral ideal in self, and in others regarded as continuing our own personality and representing the continued approach on the part of mankind towards the full satisfaction of their moral capabilities. This full satisfaction is the only true happiness, but it does not consist in pleasure, and it is never attained to by man in his present state.

There is a passage in the epilogue to Romola which, the editor tells us, the author intended to have quoted, and which may be reproduced here, as giving the key-note to Mr. Green's doctrine of the moral ideal :—"We can only have the highest happiness, such as goes along with being a great man, by having wide thoughts, and much feeling for the rest of the world, as well as ourselves; and this sort of happiness often brings so much pain with it, that we can only tell it from pain by its being what we would choose before everything else, because our souls see it is good." The fullest explanation given as to what "the good" consists in is that it is the realising the capacity for moral perfection, which we feel that we possess within us; and, so far as we can see, Mr. Green holds "morally good" to be really an ultimate conception, though acquired, no doubt, on occasion of our observation of our own capacities, for this is inevitable. Morality is the science of right action, and how we can act rightly can only be discovered in the course of our observation as to how we are capable of acting at all. But of this notion of morally right, or of what he means by aiming at the "unconditional good," he gives no other explanation beyond saying that it is the object of the "good-will," except the one we have referred to above, which defines it in terms of our moral capacities, these capacities themselves being only conceived from our observation of goodness in actions as we now perform them. The definition is, then, a hysteron proteron, and morally good is the ultimate idea. Let us hear Mr. Green's own words on the subject:—

"In virtue of [the divine] principle in him, man has definite capabilities, the realisation of which, since in it alone he can satisfy himself, forms his true good. They are not realised, however, in any life that can be observed, or in any life that has been, or is, or (as it would seem) that can be lived by man as we know him; and for this reason, we cannot say with any accuracy what those capabilities are. Yet, because the essence of man's spiritual endowment is the consciousness of having it, the idea of his having such capabilities, and of a possible better state of himself consisting in their further realisation, is a moving influence in him. It has been the parent of the institutions and usages, of the social judgments and aspirations, through which human life has been so far bettered; through which man has so far realised his capabilities and marked out the path that he must follow in their further realisation, and his goodness is proportionate to his habitual responsiveness to the idea of there being such a true good, in the various forms of recognised duty and beneficent work in which that idea has so far taken shape among men."

And this idea of the "morally good"—undefinable and pointing to an aim quite outside our experience, and to a fulfilment of our highest capacities never attainable in this world—takes here on earth, and with reference to human nature as it is, the form of an unconditional law, or a "categorical imperative":—

"In relation to a nature such as ours, having other impulses than those which draw to the ideal, this ideal becomes, in Kant's language, an imperative, and a categorical imperative. It will command something to be done universally and unconditionally, irrespectively of whether there is in any one at any time an inclination to do it."

And whither does all this point? Here is the sense of a capacity in human nature for higher things and a deeper happiness than is possible under present conditions, the consciousness that the individual cannot attain to that happiness on earth—nay, that mankind can never attain to it—and at the same time an aspiration to approach nearer to it, the sense of a law, of a command, bidding man put aside this or that pleasure which he can enjoy, in order to strive to get nearer to a happiness which here he cannot enjoy, to encourage a yearning he cannot here satisfy. Truly, to one who is led to take a teleological view of human nature by the facts of the case, all this points irresistibly to some other state, in which the capacity for what is great shall be filled; and the hope for such a state we are led to encourage, both from our sense of the need of it and from the warning voice that bids us act in compliance with noble aspirations, trusting and feeling that it will be best for us so to do, while we are conscious of all the while that these aspirations, if they are not whisperings from above, are delusions, and that following them will, if there be no future state, lead not to the satisfaction of our nature, but to failure and disappointment. This conclusion, which seems to us the inevitable complement of Mr. Green's principles, he does not lay stress upon, but, so far as we can see, he accepts it in the following passage:—

"Further, although any other capacity may be of a kind which, having done its work in contributing to the attainment of such a state of being, passes away in the process of its attainment, as the capacities of myriads of animals, their function fulfilled, pass away every hour; yet a capacity consisting in a self-conscious personality cannot be supposed to pass away. It partakes of the nature of the eternal. It is not itself a series in time; for the series of time exists for it. We cannot believe in there being a real fulfilment of such a capacity in an end which should involve its extinction, because the conviction of there being an end in which our capacities are fulfilled is founded on our self-conscious personality,—on the idea of an absolute value in a spirit which we ourselves are. And for the same reason, we cannot believe that the capacities of men can be really fulfilled in a state of things in which any rational man should be treated merely as a means, and not in himself an end. On the whole, our conclusion must be that, great as are the difficulties which beset the idea of human development when applied to the facts of life, we do not escape them, but empty the idea of all meaning, if we suppose the end of the development to be one in which persons—agents who are ends to themselves—are extinguished."

We may here make a criticism which will naturally lead us to Mr. Green's treatment of utilitarianism, of which we have now to speak. Our criticism is that he does not seem consistently to bear in mind, in the fourth chapter of his fourth book, in which his own theory is compared with the utilitarian, what he had previously said in the passage quoted by us above, as to the impossibility of human capacity being ever realised by man as we know him. In p. 403, he allows that the utilitarian theory, if explained as placing its aim not in the greatest sum of pleasures, but in enjoyable existence, is true as far as it goes, and quarrels with it only for its indefiniteness. The moral aim, as advocated by him, consisting in the full realisation of our capacities, yields, he says, the most enjoyable existence, and would, therefore, practically coincide, as an aim, with the utilitarian theory, as thus expressed. This seems to us quite out of harmony with his conception, above explained, of goodness as a constant effort in the direction of realising our capacities, with the certainty that they never will be realised "in any life that can be observed, or in any life that has been, or is, or can be lived by man as we know him." The utilitarian mode of procedure, in its most approved form, is to take the measure of what capacity for happiness is capable of realisation in mankind, and to work with a view to that; Mr. Green's theory of the moral ideal bids us follow impulses which will lead us finally we know not whither, but of which we do know that if the goal to which they lead is ever attained, it will not be by man as he now exists, or in any life which he can lead as he is at present constituted. These are surely not only theoretically and in analysis, but practically and in their effects, aims in strong mutual contrast. And this remark supplies, as it seems to us, a link which is missing in the very able criticism which the author makes on Mill's attempt to preserve the utilitarian aim, after having relinquished the hedonistic doctrine of motives. This criticism we proceed to quote:—

"It is noticeable that if the Utilitarian doctrine of the chief good as criterion—the doctrine that the greatest possible sum of pleasures is the end by reference to which the value of actions is to be tested—is dissociated from the Hedonistic doctrine of motives, though it may be cleared from liability to bad practical effects, it has also lost what has been, in fact, its chief claim on the acceptance of ordinary men. The process of its acceptance has been commonly this. Because there is pleasure in all satisfaction of desire, men have come to think that the object of desire is always some pleasure; that every good is a pleasure. From this, the inference is natural enough that a greatest possible sum of pleasures is a greatest possible good But once drop the notion that pleasure is the sole thing desired, and the question arises why it should be deemed the sole thing desirable, so that the value of all which men do or which concerns them is to be measured simply by its tendency to produce pleasure. We suppose ourselves now to be arguing with men who admit the possibility of disinterested motives, and who value character according as it is habitually actuated by them. Why, we ask such persons, do you take that to be the one thing ultimately desirable which you not only admit to be not the sole thing desired, but which you admit is not desired in those actions which you esteem the most?"

Mill's answer to this criticism as it stands would, it appears to us, be as follows:—Granting the utilitarian aim to be that in reference to which actions are good or bad, the disinterested virtues are higher, because in the long-run they bring greater happiness to mankind, so that the desire for these virtues is still a part of the desire for happiness, using the word "happiness" in the sense of enjoyable consciousness. Thus the fact that these virtues are by some immediately desired is no exception to the rule that what is ultimately desired is the happiness of mankind, and the utilitarian will, therefore, not deny that they are desirable, as well as desired. The really critical point—the missing link, as we have said—consists in this consideration,—that the motive of disinterested action is not (as a fact perceived by close self-scrutiny) simply and purely the wish for general human happiness, but is conjointly an impulse in the direction of fulfilling the highest human capacity, and that it is, as a part of this fulfilment, which has been already spoken of at some length, and not for its own sake, that the general happiness of mankind is desired; but the aim thus implied finds no fulfilment on earth, so that the whole procedure of the disinterested man is an Utopian scheme, so far as utilitarianism gives any object for his action. Mr. Green seems to us to afford the materials for this further step in the criticism, but to be shy of using them. The essence of his theory is the incompleteness of this life as the sphere of moral action, or as fully explaining its nature, and yet this seems the part of it which he is least ready to lay stress upon.

Finally, and in closing the book, we are led to remark upon it, in general, that it is a very unusual work, both as to its excellencies and defects. Full though it is of thought, and of the truest analysis of parts of our moral nature, there are few points on which a satisfactory conclusion is reached and consistently adhered to. We think that the writer's obscurity of style and deficiency in the power or, perhaps, the will to summarise his views clearly, arises in part from the influence which such writers as Fichte and Hegel have evidently had on his mind. An able and careful student of German philosophy once said to the present writer, "The Germans always write round and round a subject, but can't go straight at it;" and we find the same fault, in some degree, with Professor Green. At times, one is tempted to throw the volume aside, wearied by what seems the needlessly cumbersome and involved mode he has of conveying comparatively simple truths; but then attention is suddenly arrested by some passage or clause showing original power of a very high order, and suggesting food for reflection as only a deep thinker can suggest it. We must allow, then, that it is the work of a mind of great power, although difficult to read in a measure far exceeding what is rendered necessary by the views of the writer, and the subjects of which he treats.

THE LORD-ADVOCATES OF SCOTLAND.*

ALTHOUGH there is a slight flavour of the political pamphlet about the two volumes in which Mr. George Omond, an Edinburgh advocate, has traced the history of the most venerable and important politico-legal office in Scotland, they form a valuable work. One word as to Mr. Omond's style, and for a special reason. Mr. John Morley has somewhere said that all English publicists are, as stylists, disciples either of Macaulay or of Mill. How far this was true when Mr. Morley wrote, how little it may be true now, seeing that fashion in style changes almost as rapidly as fashion in dress, and that the literary model of ten years ago is the butt of every undergraduate's contempt to-day, are questions which, although interesting in themselves, we are not now concerned to answer. But there is no doubt as to the enormous influence Macaulay, when at the height of his literary fame, had in making—perhaps still more in marring—the styles of young men of a literary turn, and who were in the stage of pliancy when the volumes of his History appeared. Nowhere was his influence greater than in Scotland. His old connection with it as Member for Edinburgh made him the idol of the Scotch youth, who regarded him, moreover, as, in spite of his birth and education, a Scotchman of the Gladstonian or "every fibre" type. Every lad at college who dreamed of living by journalism, every ambitious young advocate who thought to emulate Jeffrey, and find his way to political power, the leadership of the Scotch Bar, or a seat on the Bench, by making his first impression in the great Reviews, imitated Macaulay, while Macaulay was the rage. Thus, the style of the greatest of the Scotch literary masters except Carlyle—and even yet Macaulay is preferred to Carlyle in Scotland, by all but a thoughtful minority—is very noticeable in the Essays and Reviews of the late Henry Hill Lancaster, apparently the last of the Edinburgh advocates that have aimed at attaining a high literary as well as legal reputation, and who died on the threshold of what promised to be a prosperous, if not also brilliant career. Mr. Omond is, we take it, an advocate of much younger standing than Mr. Lancaster, yet "ancient founts of inspiration well through all his fancy yet," and to almost a ludicrous extent. Could Macaulay himself have read these volumes, he would have exclaimed, in what Carlyle described as his "plain Norse" manner, "Macaulay, or the Devil!" We have here imitations of the old and familiar snippety sentences of the History. Such are, "In 1587 the King came of age. Parliament met in July." Or "Morton had been beheaded. Murray had been murdered. Bothwell had died in exile." Here again is a slice—rather under-done, it must be allowed—off the Macaulay joint, by way of a description of the official changes in Scotland that came in the wake of the Restoration,—“Sir Thomas Hope's place was filled by the fierce and haughty Fletcher; the unscrupulous and wily Primrose succeeded Johnston of Warriston as Lord Clerk Register; and instead of Leslie, there was seen the savage face of Dalziel, unshaven since the death of Charles I.” When the brilliant, but not “superstitiously scrupulous” Henry Dundas makes his first appearance in London society, it is described by Mr. Omond in a passage which recalls the famous essay on Warren Hastings:—“The memoirs and letters of that time are so graphic that we seem to enter at will the charmed circle, and to see the candles shining on the fine clothes of the men and the towering head-dresses of the ladies. The whole scene is depicted by the industrious writers of the day. Mrs. Montague's dinners, where the hostess, though nearly sixty, displayed to her guests the vivacity of half her years; the drawing-room, with the picture of Pulteney over the chimney-piece; Mrs. Thrale, entering with her husband, and little thinking that a time would come, when, by an act of folly, she should forfeit the esteem of all her friends; the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire drinking in the words of Johnson; Garrick and Horace Walpole telling anecdotes or giving riddles; Frances Burney and her father standing with Reynolds in the background, watching the scene with interest.” The ridg of Macaulay here is unmistakeable. But there is a difference between Macaulay's pictures and Mr. Omond's, a difference very nearly as marked as that between Samuel Johnson's “brandy for heroes” and the innocent claret-cup of the present day.

Partisanship and style apart, this work must be considered a very important addition to the historical literature of Scotland. Mr. Omond's method is a good one, and he has adhered to it steadily from the beginning to the end of his two volumes. His original purpose was not to give complete biographies of the fifty-two more or less eminent men who have fulfilled the duties of Lord (originally King's) Advocate, from Sir John Ross, of Montgrenan, who was appointed about 1480 by James III., and fought for his unfortunate master at the battle of Sauchieburn, to Francis Jeffrey, whom some of us can still remember. It is rather, in his own words, “To trace the history of an office the holders of which have enjoyed peculiar opportunities of influencing the course of politics and the development of the law in Scotland during a period of about four hundred years, and to describe the various arrangements which, since the Union, have been made for the management of Scottish affairs.” But incidentally Mr. Omond tells all that one really wishes to know of the personal and family history of the various Scotch Lord-Advocates. His book is, in effect, a collection of portraits of “Scotch worthies;” nor does he fail to depict the manners of the times in which they lived. Some of the ablest of Scotchmen have filled the office of Lord-Advocate,—Spens, the disciple and protector of Knox; Thomas Hamilton, alias “Tam o' the Cowgate,” the first “Lord,” as distinguished from “King's” Advocate, who made the first James his easy tool, and as President of the Court of Session, Secretary for Scotland, and Earl of Haddington, was really dictator of his country; Sir Thomas Hope, who stood between Charles I. and the Covenanters, with whom he sympathised; the “bloody,” but also able and literary Mackenzie; the Dalrymples; Duncan Forbes of Culloden, one of the deepest drinkers and most sagacious politicians of a troubled time; Henry Erskine, wit, poor man's friend, and Liberal before his time; Henry Dundas, who, as Lord-Advocate, and still more as Viscount Melville, repeated the dictatorial success of “Tam o' the Cowgate,” helping thereby to make Scotland the preserve of Liberalism it now is; and finally, Francis Jeffrey. A book about Scotchmen would, it seems, be incomplete which did not contain anecdotes about the drinking customs of their country. So Mr. Omond refreshes the memory with a good number of such stories. We are told once again how, on the day of the funeral of Duncan Forbes's mother, “a number of mourners assembled at Culloden. By an old Scottish custom, which is only now dying out, the party drank freely in the house. Duncan was entrusted with the task of attending to the guests, and did so with such hospitality that when the funeral procession reached the grave, it was found that the coffin had been forgotten.” Mr. Omond also revives the convivial pranks of Pitt, and Dundas, and Thurlow; tells how, returning from Addiscombe to Dundas's house at Wimbledon, they rode through the turnpike gate between Tooting and Streatham without paying toll, and were fired at by the keeper of the gate as being robbers, or, as it is put in the Rolliad,—

* The Lord-Advocates of Scotland, from the Close of the Fifteenth Century to the Passing of the Reform Bill. By George W. T. Omond, Advocate. 2 vols. Edinburgh: David Douglas. 1883.

"How, as he wandered darkling o'er the plain,
His reason drown'd in Jenkinson's champagne,
A rustic's hand,—but righteous fate withstood,—
Had shed a Premier's for a robber's blood."

But in respect of the major and the minor morals alike, the Scotch Lord-Advocates seem to have been men of their time and their country. They were scarcely ever worse than either; many of them, such as Hope, Erskine, Forbes (in his serious and sober days), and Jeffrey, were better. No Lord-Advocate, no Scotch lawyer, except the brutal Braxfield, has a worse reputation than Sir George Mackenzie, the terror and persecutor of the Covenanters in the days of Charles II., the oppressor of the people by advocating whose rights he first attained popularity and power. Yet he was not worse or more cruel than his brother-apostates South of the Tweed, and stood stoutly by the Stuart cause when it was clearly seen to be a falling one. The process of the selection of Lord-Advocates in the past, although it, perhaps, can hardly be called natural, seems, on the whole, to have been a fair one; the best men got ultimately to the official top. When a brilliant pleader or an able politician was not forthcoming, the most industrious plodder at the bar had his innings, like Craigie, who was Lord-Advocate at the time of the rebellion of 1745, and appears, although a dull man that detested politics, to have shown both sense and courage, although he had as his military colleague in opposing the Pretender, Sir John Cope, who does not appear to have had too much of either. The Scotch Lord-Advocates have, in nine cases out of ten, been representative Scotchmen, and hence their power.

The evolution of the duties and power of the Lord-Advocate as traced by Mr. Omond cannot be said to have been altogether regular. The original King's Advocate seems to have been a lawyer of experience and capacity, whose duty it was to recover in the Courts fines and forfeitures for the King. Then he obtained Privy Council dignity, became recognised as the Public Prosecutor, and even sat on the Bench before which it was his business to plead. It may be said to have been the Restoration and the Union of 1707, between them abolishing the Scotch Privy Council and making a separate Scotch Department an uncertainty, from being a fixture of politics, that raised the Lord-Advocate to be the politico-legal functionary or virtual Minister for Scotland he now is. The Scotch Secretaryship of State was not finally abolished till 1746. Walpole, then Premier, suspected the Duke of Roxburghe, the holder of the office at that time, of clandestinely opposing his policy so far as that concerned Scotland, and got rid of him. Duncan Forbes, who was then Lord-Advocate, was much pleased, and in one of his letters, from which Mr. Omond quotes, wrote these notable words:—"For some time, at least, we shall not be troubled with that nuisance which we long have complained of,—a Scots Secretary, either at full length or in miniature. If any one Scotsman has absolute power, we are in the same slavery as ever, whether that person be a fair man or a black man, a peer or a commoner, six foot or five foot high; and the dependence of his country will be on that man, and not on those that made him." The most powerful of the Lord-Advocates after the abolition of the Scotch Secretaryship was Henry Dundas. He had the whole patronage of Scotland in his hands. But political reform and the reduction of the number of Scotch posts conferred by patronage have prevented any Lord-Advocate since Dundas obtaining a position of such personal power. Altogether, therefore, the history of the Lord-Advocateship must be allowed to be one of ups and downs; and as the Local Government Board Bill of last Session showed, a modification of its functions is threatened. We have said Mr. Omond's work has the flavour of a pamphlet, for he distinctly leads up to the conclusion that the re-creation of a Scotch Political Department is desirable. "The establishment of such a Department," he says (Vol. II., pp. 334-335), "would not 'degrade,' as is sometimes maintained, 'the ancient office of Lord-Advocate.' The holder of the office would still enjoy the high political influence possessed by his predecessors from time immemorial, although he lost that sole control of Scottish affairs which by mere accident passed into the hands of the Lord-Advocate, during the period which followed the abolition of the office of Secretary of State for Scotland." Upon the question here raised and raised in Parliament last Session, we here express no opinion, but it may be safely said that the Scotch Lord-Advocate of the future, however his nominal position may be modified, will be the leader of the Scotch Commons, and in a much truer and larger sense than was even Dundas, provided always that he is in himself strong, and is willing or can afford to throw himself unreservedly into a political career. His professional training must, it is obvious, give him advantages possessed neither by the ordinary Scotch Peer nor by the ordinary Scotch Member of Parliament, and the relieving him of the relics of Scotch patronage would simply render his power purer and more constitutional.

THE WENTWORTH PAPERS.*

It may be doubted whether, on principles of the highest literary morality, the publication of such a volume as the present is altogether defensible. It is quite certain that the horror of the person to whom these letters were addressed, if he could have learnt that they would be lying on our drawing-room tables a century and a half after his death, would only have been excelled by that of the writers,—his mother, wife, brother, or children in most cases. It is quite certain that, if he had dreamed of such a possibility, he would have consigned them remorselessly to the flames, with all their unconscious self-portraiture, and their intimate, often delicate, and sometimes discreditable details of the private lives of his nearest relations. However, the volume is before us; and, whether or not this ransacking of dead men's and women's secrets is wholly justifiable, we must admit that in this case it has yielded much amusing gossip, and has brought on the stage interesting figures and faces that have long passed into the background of oblivion.

Lord Baby—for so the recipient of these letters was styled when the volume opens—was grand-nephew of Lucy Hutchinson, as well as of the Great Earl of Strafford. Of the latter he relates that he "left it as a maxim to our family that an Englishman can't have too many friends, and that people in power should not disoblige the least groom, since no man can tell how things may turn, 'For,' said he, at the time of his trial, 'Lord! how many do I see whom I thought most insignificant, who now sit the heaviest upon me.'" In the course of the correspondence, we find his brother picking up for his use in Whitefriars scarce pamphlets referring to the Earl, and offering to supply him with a copy of Strafford's character, as drawn by Clarendon in his newly-published History, and his trial, as related by Rushworth. In 1711 he was created Earl of Strafford; and though he was Envoy at the Court of Berlin, and afterwards Ambassador at the Hague during several eventful years, he is now chiefly remembered as one of the Plenipotentiaries at the negotiations which led to the Peace of Utrecht. After the unexpected death of Queen Anne had brought back the Whigs to power, his position became very precarious, and in a few months he was recalled. Thenceforward he took little part in politics, except by occasional correspondence with the King over the water, and was chiefly occupied until his death in 1739 with building Wentworth Castle, and with the not very intellectual pursuits of a country gentleman. This was but a tame ending for a life which had opened with brilliant promise. Our hero seems to have been intended for a military career, and attracted the favourable notice of William III. and Marlborough; but in spite of his evident preference for a life of action, he gradually drifted into diplomacy, for which he does not seem to have possessed any special aptitudes. Swift wrote of him that he had some life and spirit, but was infinitely proud, and "wholly illiterate," and elsewhere that he "can't spell." Yet, though he opposed the appointment of Prior as a co-Plenipotentiary at the Utrecht negotiations, he could write of him that "he has an excellent knack of writing pleasant things, and tells a story in verse the most agreeable that ever I knew." He certainly shows a greater appreciation of literature than the contemporary Duke of Bedford, who writes thus to him of a greater than Prior:—

"I am sorry the circumstances of Mr. Pope's affairs will not permit him to come to see me this summer. Your Lordship will be so kind as to assure him that whenever he does me the favour, nobody shall be more welcome. His expression of the honour he has for your Lordship, and the value he puts upon your favour, give me a greater esteem for him, and a greater opinion of his judgment, than all his other writings besides. I do not know anything he has published that I have not got. I am a subscriber already for his translation of Homer's Odyssey. If there be anything else that he is going to publish, I shall be very glad to be a subscriber to it."

But whatever Lord Strafford's defects, and however little he may have deserved of posterity by his not very brilliant public career, he certainly seems to have won and retained the strong affection of his near relations and his intimate friends. The volume opens with a series of letters from his mother, who had been present as bedchamber-woman to the Queen of James II. at the birth of the Old Pretender, and who spent her later years in the society of her numerous pets—'Pag' and 'Fubs,' and so forth—in somewhat full-blooded gossip, in promoting the matrimonial and other interests of her son, whom she constantly characterises as the best of children, and in the various modes of killing time which the manners of the age placed at the disposal of a woman of high birth and scanty education. This lady, who stands out like a Kneller from the canvas, is, as a rule, but little interested in politics, though her reading of Baker's Chronicle—her favourite historical work, as it was that of her contemporary, Sir Roger de Coverley—occasionally suggests a fear of the recurrence of the Civil War. But she prefers her pets to politics. Sometimes she tells of their droll tricks or their sagacity, sometimes of the destination of a brood of puppies. She is disconsolate at the death of 'Fubs,' a special favourite, and we must let her express her sorrow in her own spelling, which has an individuality of its own:—

"I have a moste dismall story to tell you, God forgiv me for it. I cannot help being more then I ought concerned. I shall never lov anything of that kynde quarter soe well again. I had rether lost a hundred pd., nay all the rest of my doms I would have given to have saved poor, charming Fubs, never poor wretch had a harder death. As it leved soe it dyed, full of lov, leening its head in my bosom, never offered to snap at any body in its horrid torter, but nussle its head to us and loock earnestly upon me and Sue, whose cryed for three days as if it had been for a childe or husband. . . . Sure of all its kynd thear never was such a one nor never can be, soe many good qualletys, soe much sene and good nature and cleenly and not one falt; but few human creaturs had more sene then that had. I could write a quier of paper in her commendations. I have buiried her in this garden, and thear is a stoan layd at her head. I leiv all news and the discription of the Princ his buirying to your brother."

For a considerable time she is occupied in looking out for a town house for her son; but her opinion of the building of the Queen-Anne period is not so high as that of the dwellers in Bedford Park, and, with the Great Storm fresh in her mind, she looks back with regret to the more solid fabrics of an earlier age. Her affection for her son likewise makes her an inveterate match-maker, and she is continually and obtrusively on the look-out for a bride at once beautiful, wealthy, and high-born. But Lord Strafford at last very wisely chose a wife for himself, and the union appears to have been a singularly happy one. Her letters show Lady Strafford to have been clever and vivacious, devoted to her lord and to their children, passionately fond of show and parade, and tinged with the sensuous worldliness of a somewhat unreflective and self-centred age. Her letters are full of what she calls "chitter-chatter," by no means free from coarseness, but, as a rule, without much malice or bitterness. Here is a specimen of the gossip which was sent to an Ambassador by his Countess in England's "Angustan age":—

"Next to you, I believe Lady Wentworth loves me better then any of her children. I own I believe sister Betty in her self wou'd be very good-humour'd, but my sister Arundell governs her as won wou'd a child, and she is with her every day, and they get some little od body or others to play at cards, and such a dirty place sure no body ever went into, and they eat jelly and drink Chockolet from morning tell night. . . . I went last week to see our picktures, and I like them worse then ever I did, for he has made a Dwarf of you and a Giant of me, and he has not tooched the dressing of them sence you went. I made Capt. Powell scold at him to meud them, for they are nethere of them like. He is so ingaged with the Marlborough daughters that he minds no body else. . . . Lady Rawstorn has desired to see all Lady Wentworth's dumb creatures, so I have contrived that the monkey, the parat, and the five doggs shall be all shute up in a chare together, and Lady W. in anothers to see they are not run away with. If you don't think this letter long enough the next shall be longer, for you can't be more diverted with reading them than I am with writing 'em, for even talking to you in this way is more pleasing to me then all the conversation in the world besides. I fear some part of this you'll hardly read, for I have speelt it abominably, but you must take it for better for worse as you have done me, and to [so] my dearest soul adieu yours for ever. . . . I have been all this day in search of a Ballet made of Lord Treasurer and Mrs. Oglethorp, but could not get it to send to you."

During Lord Strafford's absence on the Continent, his brother, Peter Wentworth, equerry successively to Prince George of Denmark, Queen Anne, and George I., sent him the political and Parliamentary news of the day; and his letters naturally form the most important contribution to history, as it is commonly understood, that is contained in the volume before us.

His close attendance on the Queen enabled him to give minute particulars of her failing health, which bring home to the reader on how precarious a thread hung the fortunes of the Ring which ruled England in her later years. Peter is not a very attractive character, or a very lively correspondent. An unfortunate addiction to the bottle rather interfered with his success in life, and, it may be feared, shortened his days on what he called "this terestable Glob." At one time, observing that "nobody was so much minded as Members at Court," he was anxious to get into Parliament, and his motives for wishing to serve his country are set forth with commendable frankness. He thought also that public business might enable him to keep his resolution "never to be concerned in liquor again;" but his brother made no sign, and he never obtained the wished-for opportunity of repairing his broken fortunes at the public expense.

More entertaining than the news-letters of this courtly ne'er-do-well are those of the children of Lord and Lady Strafford, with specimens of some of which we must close. Their only son, Lord Wentworth, writes on a variety of subjects, from the "old dormouse" and the latest Court scandal to Colley Cibber and Foubert the riding-master. But his favourite theme is evidently none of these. At the age of eleven he writes (we preserve what two or three years before he had characterised as his "one spilling") :—

"We had a very handsome supper, viz, at the upper end cold chikens, next to that a dish of cake parch'd almonds sapp biscuits [sic], next to that a dish of tarts and chees cakes, next to that a great custerd, and next to that another dish of biscuits parch'd almonds and preserved apricocks, and next a quarter of lamb."

Shortly after, his mother writes, "L. Anne Hervey . . . invited my love and I yesterday to a fatt Pig and two Partridg, which my Jewell eate very well of." In the following year, he describes one "extream good dinner," including "a soop and a pig, and a green goose, and a veal popeats Artichoks and chaw;" followed a few weeks later by "a very good dinner," consisting of "three macerell, beans and bacon and boyl'd chickens, and then we had four little plates pigeons, one rabbits [sic], in an other gosberry tart and sparrow graze and no desert." The "fatt piggs" and "beans and bacon" appear to have soon lost their charm, for at the close of the volume we find him writing thus critically to his father, who had just entertained the Duke of Hamilton :—

"As for the dinner, I am sure his Grace never eat a better or a more genteel one; the only thing which I question being well done was the soup, which generally women-cooks dress sadly, but my mother says Mr. Tod understands cookery as well as his wife, so perhaps on such an occasion he might help her. I dare say the Duke was mightily pleased with his entertainment, but I wonder how poor Lord Clydsdale could keep his eyes open so long, for I conclude he did not drink punch as long as the Duke did."

In pleasing contrast to the precocious criticisms of this boy-epicure is this note from his sister, at the age of eight :—

"I told Lady Hariote that you said, as soon as she could speak, you would send her A compliment, and she said thank you Pappa. I also told Lady Lucy, and she desired me to give her duty to you, and says she would have writ, but her nurse would not let her. Lady Hariote desires you to bring her a Baby [doll]. Pray give my duty to Mamma, and tell her that Lady Lucy's head is much better."

It will be seen that Mr. Cartwright has not consulted the interests exclusively of those who care for "the dignity of history." His selections from the Wentworth correspondence are well chosen, well edited, well printed, and well indexed.

PROFESSOR BURROWS' LIFE OF HAWKE.*

EDWARD HAWKE, the subject of this memoir, was born rather more than a century and a half ago, and during his lifetime was a good servant to his country. No separate biography of this naval hero has hitherto appeared, and the Chichele Professor of Modern History at Oxford has been induced to write one,—first, because he was asked to do so by one of Hawke's descendants, secondly, because he believes that Hawke himself was "a great man, who by no fault of his own has been accidentally placed in the pages of history far below his proper level." If this belief be well founded, Hawke's ill-fortune has followed him beyond the grave, for Professor Burrows is unequal to the task of exacting compensation for the accidents which he deplores. But it seems to us that this belief is not well-founded. Of the sign-post popularity which Nelson, Wellington, and the Marquis of Granby enjoyed, Hawke had quite his share. His one good saying, at Quiberon, has been quoted almost ad nauseam. He received the thanks of Parliament and a pension for his services. He was made a Peer and First Lord of the Admiralty, and never lost the firm friendship of his Sovereign. Mr. Burrows is not satisfied with these marks of recognition paid to his hero's merits, and while studiously proclaiming that "not a word should be said to diminish Rodney's well-earned fame," does his level-best (it is, sooth to say, not much) to prove that the manoeuvre known as "breaking the enemy's line," was due to Hawke rather than to the conqueror of De Grasse. Yet Hawke's battles were fought, as his biographer admits, against fleets whose flight left the ships that were attacking them no time to form in line of battle. It did not require the genius of a Nelson to act as Hawke did. For he simply gave chase to the flying enemy, and got into action as best he could with the first of their ships he came up with. Whether he would have broken that enemy's line, had it been formed to fight him, or turned it, as was done at Trafalgar and the Nile, there is nothing to show. It is certain that he did not invent a new system of naval tactics, or teach such a system to his captains. In Rodney's celebrated action off Dominica, his successful onset was the result of a lucky inspiration suggested by accident, and not part of a preconceived plan, and the attempt which Professor Burrows makes to show that Hawke transmitted any portion of a knowledge which he probably did not possess to his chief captains, Howe and Rodney, must be regarded as a failure. He is not more successful in his laudatory sketch of Hawke's powers as a naval administrator. The "King's Captain," as Hawke was called, was vividly impressed, while on active service, by the wretched management of his superiors. The few letters that are quoted in this book are filled for the most part with complaints about the shocking system of impressment, the badness of the sailors' beer, the absence of light vessels, and similar grievances. But when this "Captain" became in his turn First Lord of the Admiralty, there is no indication that he effected or even attempted any measure of reform; and "Junius" (Mr. Burrows notwithstanding) expressed, no doubt, the general sense of the community, when he sarcastically asserted that the country was so highly indebted to Sir Edward Hawke, that no expense should be spared to secure to him an honourable and affluent retreat.

Mr. Burrows has much, too much indeed by much, to say of Walpole and the war, and he hammers away at a question that we thought had ceased to be discussed, except in junior debating societies, with remarkable energy. But there is nothing surprising in this. The Professor is known for the strength of his political opinions, and he is here "with his bears," as the saying is. In him, as in Virgil's Turnus,—

"Saevit amor ferri et scelerati insania belli."

So he waxes irately eloquent in condemning a policy which in all probability saved England from a second Stuart Restoration. Be this as it may, we cannot follow Professor Burrows into those extraneous dissertations which, in their original capacity of padding to the Quarterly, have hardly attracted so much attention as their author apparently deems that they deserve. And it is needless to say that, whatever else their merits may be, they serve no useful purpose in the way of setting Hawke upon the pedestal from which he has been "accidentally" displaced.

But the plain truth is, that apart from holding up the Admiral as a héros incompris, Mr. Burrows has little or nothing to tell us about the conqueror of De Conflans. His memoir lacks all the qualities in which a good biography should be dressed, and his efforts to make bricks without straw would be amusing, if they were not so tedious. Take his treatment of Hawke's wife, for instance. He admits that he knows nothing whatever about her. But finding her once upon a time at Plymouth, when her husband's victorious fleet was putting in there, his imagination goes off at score. Hawke simply writes to Admiral Chambers, on this occasion, "My wife, who is now here, joins with me in compliments to you." "Who is now here," writes Mr. Burrows, gushingly; "it was a proud moment for her. She had come to meet her victorious husband, had shared in the raptures of the population at the arrival of the French prizes, and this time, at any rate, found his merits recognised by the title she was to share." "It is to be regretted," he adds with a sigh, "that nothing should be found beyond this trifling notice concerning one who must have well performed her part in the training of a national hero." We know no more about Lady Hawke than

Mr. Burrows does, so it might be impertinent to ask him if Nelson's wife had much to do with his training; but as it is with Lady Hawke, so it is with her husband in this book. We find guesses galore as to what "must have been;" of what was, hardly an inkling. More of this when we come to the inscription on Hawke's tomb, which his biographer quotes in "faith, nothing wavering."

As a seaman, Hawke rates high. When not hampered by military colleagues and councils of war, he could sink French ships as well as Rodney could. But to compare him with Nelson, and, by all that is wonderful, with Wellington, is to do his reputation no service. He was a thoroughly trustworthy captain, and a kind, indefatigable man. He was singularly anxious about the state of his crews, and the quality of the victuals supplied to them. Of these, indeed, he was always complaining, and his relations with Pitt grew strained by reason of those complaints. The "Great Commoner" and the hero of Quiberon had little in common, so far as their idiosyncracies went. The former saw obstacles through an inverted optic glass, with the latter it was the opposite. Pitt was not alarmed, as some of his colleagues were, by what seemed to them the vapouring gasconades of Wolfe, and he was particularly partial to Boscawen, "who never made difficulties." Hawke was always making difficulties. His letters, as we have said, are crammed with complaints about bad beer, bad seamen, and inefficient ships. Pitt chafed at this. He had no panacea for ills like these, any more than he had for his own gout or Newcastle's timidity. The war, once begun, must and should go on; and no "Plymouth beer," no "men dropping down with scurvy," were to be urged as excuses for ill-success. The following anecdote, quoted by Mr. Burrows for what it is worth, is true in the spirit, if not in the letter:—

"There was a question about sending Hawke to sea, to keep watch over M. de Conflans; it was November; the weather was stormy, and dangerous for a fleet. Mr. Pitt, in bed with the gout, was obliged to receive those who had business with him in a room where there were two beds, and where there was no fire, for he could not bear one. The Duke of Newcastle [the Prime Minister in name], who was a very chilly person, came to see him on the subject of this fleet, which he was most unwilling to send to sea. He had scarcely entered the room, when he cried out, shivering all over with cold, 'How is this? No fire?'—'No,' said Mr. Pitt, 'when I have the gout, I cannot bear one.'—The Duke, finding himself obliged to put up with it, took a seat by the bedside of the invalid, wrapped up in his cloak, and began the conversation. But, unable to stand the cold for any length of time, he said, 'Pray allow me to protect myself from the cold in that bed you have by your side;' and without taking off his cloak, he buried himself in Lady Esther Pitt's bed, and continued the conversation. The Duke was strongly opposed to risking the fleet in the November gales; Mr. Pitt was absolutely resolved that it should put to sea, and both argued the matter with much warmth.—'I am positively determined the fleet shall sail,' said Pitt, accompanying his words with the most lively gesticulations.—'It is impossible, it will perish,' exclaimed the Duke, making a thousand contortions.—Sir Charles Frederick, of the 'Ordnance,' coming in at the moment, found them in this ridiculous position, and had infinite trouble in keeping his countenance, when he discovered the two Ministers deliberating on a matter of such great importance in a situation so novel and extraordinary. The fleet nevertheless put to sea; and Mr. Pitt was right, for Admiral Hawke defeated M. de Conflans, and it was the most decisive victory the English gained over France during that war."

If we can say but little in praise of the "matter" of this memoir, we can say still less in praise of its "form." The narrative is "as dull as a great thaw," for Mr. Burrows is destitute of that graphic power which alone can shed a transitory interest over the details of fighting that has long been buried fifty fathoms deep beneath the waters of oblivion. His style is often ludicrously turgid, as when he speaks of Anson—the habitually taciturn Anson—"hinting his doubts whether the exigencies of time and space could be chained to the axletrees of Pitt's fiery car." His syntax is shaky, even for an Oxford Professor, and much disfigured by the vulgar Gallicism which inserts an unnecessary conjunction before the relative. His metaphors are mixed, as when he speaks of Fox's "want of character hanging like a weight of lead about his neck." His political sentiments are orthodoxically roccoco, as may be inferred from his description of Rosbach, fought on the 5th of November, as "a Protestant victory on a Protestant day." His book, in fact, if we may borrow an expression from Swift, stamps him "as a mediocrity in literature." Yet—and here we must beg the reader to look at the use which Mr. Burrows has made of the inscription on the tombs of Lord and Lady Hawke—the time will come, no doubt, when a neat little tablet in the precincts of All Souls' College, Oxford, will proclaim to passers-by that the writer of the book here noticed was Historiae Professor atque Scriptor cum accuratissimus tum locupletissimus. So be it!

JULIAN TREVOR.*

WE have read this novel with great attention, not only because it is a first attempt, but because in the first volume we found promise of an unusually attractive sketch of modern society. Mr. Tristram is evidently an appreciative student of Disraeli, whom, nevertheless, he takes every opportunity of sneering at, and half the book is full of not far-off echoes of Coningsby and Vivian Grey. At the outset, all points to a political novel, and a well-written political novel is one of the rarest and most enjoyable of literary productions. But fiction of this kind is high game for a beginner to fly at, and the author's untried wings do not long sustain him in the lofty regions of Cabinet intrigue, whence, early in the second volume, he comes down with a distinct thud to a very common-place world indeed. From this point the book must be pronounced a decided failure. It sinks into a dull story, with hardly any plot, a mere succession of trivial incidents, marking no development of character, interspersed with prolix and uninteresting dialogues between personages who are neither individuals nor types. Julian Trevor himself is one of the sorriest heroes we have met with in fiction. The account given of him by his tutor—a strange being, who has done or can do everything, but who throughout the three volumes does nothing but deliver himself from time to time of didactic rapidities—raises expectations of eminence of some sort; but almost at the outset of his career he is guilty of an ignoble deception, and he ends as the incredibly silly dupe of a female fortune-hunter. One cannot help feeling that the only stirring incident in the book—a shipwreck in the Adriatic, described tamely enough in the third volume—would have been improved, had the hero gone to the bottom with the Austrian steamer on which he was a passenger. The rôle of heroine is distributed among a couple of deceitful girls, the monotony of whose intense egotism is unrelieved by a single good trait, and a termagant fine-lady, who smashes plates and mirrors, and indulges in swearing. With the exception of Mark Turner, a kind of muscular Christian, mercilessly jilted by one of the deceitful part-heroines, and two other personages whom we shall presently mention, Mr. Tristram's creations are mere lay figures, though intended probably to be incarnations of different aspects of the almost savage selfishness which forms so prominent and repulsive a feature of modern plutocracy. Of this particular vice a realistic presentment might be profitable enough to nineteenth-century readers, if effected with the vividness and literary skill, even though with the crudeness, of Zola, tempered with a due regard for the exigencies of art. But a novel is neither an essay nor a treatise; its main object ought to be to please, though the improvement of manners and morals may well be a subsidiary aim. A mere moral pathology cast in the form of a story is neither instructive nor interesting. The essence of the novel as an artistic creation is action, action tending towards, though not necessarily accomplishing, the mitigation or removal of pain or evil. Human life is a continual struggle with destructive agencies, and, on the whole, a successful one. The novel should be a picture of some phase of that struggle, not merely a description, however true or vivid, or even picturesque, of the agencies, physical or moral, that act and react upon human society. Powerful in many respects as are the productions of the contemporary realistic school of novelists, they are monotonous and uninteresting, because they lack the element of combat; and no picture of human life, destitute of that element which may be presented in an infinite variety of ways, can excite either interest or admiration. The characters seem effortless, vice simply overwhelms them, and they sink into various abysses of moral degradation without an attempt being made at resistance. Nor is the struggle—the successful struggle—on the whole with vicious tendencies, without which human society could not continue to exist, indicated by any contrast of conduct making, to use Matthew Arnold's language, for good. Vanity Fair were unreadable, if merely a record of Becky Sharpe's selfishness. Major Dobbin is not in himself an interesting character, but his history forms part of the under-current of resistance to Becky's theory of life, in which the real action and interest of the story are centred, perhaps after a somewhat over-subtle fashion. In the volumes before us, Mark Turner is but a feeble Dobbin, and practically they portray, most often crudely, if not coarsely, but occasionally with a certain epigrammatic humour, merely some ignoble aspects of the selfishness of the day, without touching upon the struggles which, in the end, more or less redress the balance.

We turn gladly to the performance of the more agreeable portion of our task. Whatever may be the case with the poet, the novelist is commonly made, as well as born, and Mr. Tristram's first volume shows that what he chiefly needs is experience, together with the reflection and self-restraint it brings. What may be termed the political half of the novel is principally occupied with the fortunes of the hero's father, and it is not too much to say that the interest of the story ends with his death. Sir George Trevor comes of a "good" family, the founder of which was a traitor, while his descendants were cowards, drunkards, or—the collocation is the author's—unwavering Tories. His immediate predecessor was a cynic, who found the climate of England "damnable," the women who lived in it chilly, and the men fools. Sir George enters Parliament, shows himself to be a fluent debater, and finally becomes President of the Local Government Board—that petite porte of the Cabinet—on the accession to office of the most powerful of recent Conservative Governments. At this juncture, unluckily, he begins to be assailed by scruples about the purity of his colleagues' political faith, and upon the introduction of a Reform Bill thinks it necessary to resign, in order to prove the reality of his convictions. No sooner, however, is the sacrifice accomplished than the full extent of it becomes apparent, and the martyr comprehends with dismay the ruin of his political life. His wife, whose chief ambition is the impossible one, in these days, of leading a political salon, is disgusted with what appears to her to be an act of unmitigated folly; but more energetic and less shame-faced than her spouse, she rushes at once to the Premier, whose identity is hardly attempted to be concealed under the somewhat irreverent designation of the Earl of Slitherington, and with the aid of an opportune tear falling on the Earl's hand, which was "resting on a copy of Balzac's Contes Drolatiques," persuades him to write to her husband. The letter is really an admirable one, and might well have been written by the author of Vivian Grey. There is sarcasm—impertinence, indeed—in every line of it, yet not a single phrase that could have been excepted to. "You are eight-and-forty," the Earl tells his hasty colleague; "you will, perhaps, live to eighty, and you have no taste for hock. Think of living thirty-two years of bucolic idleness!" Then, as to the Reform measure, he continues, the Liberals must not have the monopoly of reform. They reform "only that they may reform; but we, that we may conserve." Herein lies the very essence of "regenerate Conservatism." Of course, Trevor yields, but not until his wife reveals a great secret to him, which was simply that in resigning his post he was under the influence, not of a scruple, but of a crotchet. In how many of us is conscience little better than a bundle of crotchets. From that moment Sir George is an unhappy man; his biographer himself seems to despise him, and the reader hardly misses him when he is somewhat contemptuously removed from the scene, in the middle of the second volume.

We cannot say that in the Earl of Slitherington we find a generous or even an altogether just portrayal of one who, if not a great statesman, was assuredly one of the most striking and original figures that have crossed the stage of English politics. He was far from being the Mephistophelian cynic the counsellor of Julian Trevor is represented as being, nor is the taunt implied in the designation bestowed upon him justifiable. Politics he made his profession and his amusement as well. He liked the game for the game's sake at least as much as for any profit, or honour, or even power, he got out of it. Perhaps Mr. Tristram is right in supposing the main object of his life was to be a personage, rather than to establish any particular policy. "There are many people in the world," the Earl of Slitherington tells Julian, "whose motives are disinterested,—that is, they become so." The remark, like many others coming from the same source in these volumes, is a shrewd one. No doubt, the author of Vivian Grey became politically less selfish as he grew more successful. Many personal traits of the Earl remind one of the recent revelations of Lord Ronald Gower concerning the real Earl,—his delight in a certain gorgeousness, saved from vulgarity by its sincerity only; his love of sesquipedalian words, in such strange contrast with the epigrammatic dexterity of language he could display when he chose; his peculiar influence over young men. We miss, however, the slightly adulatory courtesy to women for which he was famous, and which they appear to have appreciated. Other personages of note than the late Conservative chief will be easily recognised under the thin disguise thrown over them in these volumes. We have no space to comment upon these portraits, which are drawn with considerable vigour and no little humour. For writing of this kind Mr. Tristram shows great aptitude. He has caught the twang of political society, with which he is evidently familiar, and he possesses a fluent and agreeable style. There is no reason why he should not aspire to a place in literature akin to that achieved by the master whom he flatters only by imitation.

A GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF BOOK-PLATES.*

"In France alone," says the author of this book, "has the history of the book-plate, from its origin to the present time, been adequately investigated." "And in France," he adds, "the rage for collecting ex-libris has expanded to a full maturity; while in Britain, such collectors are as yet a puny folk, little more esteemed than the juvenile hoarders of postage-stamps." We hope Mr. Warren means to draw no invidious distinction between "collectors" and "hoarders," for if it is permissible to read as much geography into or out of a postage-stamp as he clearly thinks it is to read biography into or out of an ex-libris or book-plate, the "juveniles" would have a good deal to say for themselves. One may smile or sneer at "collectors" and "hoarders" alike, but they stand or fall together. As a matter of fact, they stand, and these gentle enthusiasts may toil in their vocation contentedly. An old Greek hexameter defends them both. To insolent sneer and haughty smile, both may reply,—

"Μη νεμέσα βασιῶσι χάρις βασιῶσιν δπηδαί."

And the moralist—but we are going too fast, as well as too far, and the indignant reader may fairly say, 'Never mind the moralist! What is a book-plate?' Mr. Warren shall tell him:—

"Having," he says, "selected a volume from one of those mysterious receptacles of drift literature which stand at booksellers' doors, with the intimation, 'All in this box, threepence,' on a dirty piece of cardboard poised on a ragged fragment of stick, the book-hunter at home will presently inspect his new acquisition. The book is opened, and displays, pasted inside the cover, a paper label. It reads, in a plain border, 'William Downing, his book, 1744.' Now, in England we call such a ticket as this William Downing's book-plate, as abroad it would be called his ex-libris. In either case, the meaning is that this special volume was in 1744 William Downing's property, and no other man's; that the book was one from among his books, an item in his library, a unit in his collection. The convenience of such a label of proprietorship, printed or engraved, led to its adoption soon after the appearance of printed books. Books have been lost, borrowed, or stolen ever since type began, and a mere manuscript name is inconspicuous and easily effaced. 'But why make a collection of such tickets as that?' Well, if all book-plates were as plain as William Downing's—and Lord Macaulay's was plainer, for he did not add the date—there would be no answering that question."

But between the simplicity of "Thomas Babington Macaulay" and the elaborate ornamentation of the Pirckheimer library plate, which faces Mr. Warren's title-page, and was designed, but not engraved, by Albert Dürer, there is obviously room for an infinite variety of book-plates. Heraldry, as was natural, was first called into requisition as a ready mode of declaring the proprietorship of a book; and "upon heraldry was soon engrafted a mass of extraneous ornamentation, usually, however, supposed in some degree to be connected with the central escutcheon." We must, however, refer the reader to the book itself—which we may here take the opportunity of saying is admirably printed and illustrated—for all that concerns this portion of the subject. A verbal description of the quaint designs of the playful book-plate inventor, apart from the designs themselves, would be intolerably tedious and scarcely intelligible. It is sufficient to say, perhaps, that on the whole they remind us of General Craufurd, who, when his men took to wearing their busbies aslant, began the general order in which he forbade the practice, "All men have fancy, few taste."

Book-plates, however, allow a man to show other qualities as well as taste or fancy. Where there is room for a motto, there is room for anything, and there is obviously room for a motto on a book-plate. Here the owner can show his liberality—"Sibi et Amicis," is the motto on the Albert Dürer book-plate which we have referred to; or his niggardliness, as in, "Go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves;" or his strong good-sense, as in the Spaniard's, "Libros y amigos, pogos y bonos." But the best subject for a book-plate motto is the borrower, and the most amusing chapter in this book is the one headed "Mottoes Directed against Borrowers":—

"Next to an umbrella," says Mr. Warren, "there is no item of personal property concerning the appropriation of which such lax ideas of morality are current as a book. If you neglect to return a horse, a great-coat, or a pocket-handkerchief, some social stigma will probably attach to you, should the depredation become generally known. In the case of the book-borrowers, there is no such Nemesis. They flourish like green bay trees, and command universal respect. The broken sets which they have caused give them no twinge of conscience. The gaps, which they have left in innocent homes, break not their sleep at nights. Their tables groan with a holocaust of odd volumes, filled with any one's ex-libris but their own."

"The ex-libris," he goes on to say, with sententious gravity, "is the mature art of book preservation; and to engrave thereon some fulmination against the borrower is a virtuous and commendable proceeding." From the specimens he gives of these fulminations we select two. The first is a Latin sapphic stanza, and if it lacks the Latinity of Horace, it does not lack the venom which the Venesian could show, at a pinch:—

"Si quis hunc librum rapiat scelestus,
Atque furtivis manibus prehendat,
Pergat ad tetras Acherontis undas,
Non rediturus."

The second is terse, neat, and to the point, and the best, perhaps, of the batch:—"The ungodly borroweth and payeth not again." But if this chapter is the most amusing in the book, the next, headed "Book-Plates of Historic Interest," is by far the most instructive. Yet we imagine that the process by which Mr. Warren makes it so is not quite legitimate. How can one gather from the book-plate of Matthew Prior, Esq., that this was the "thin, hollow-looking man," who used to pace round the park with Swift to make himself fat, while the Doctor walked for the opposite reason,—namely, to keep himself down. Or how, from that of "Mr. Horatio Walpole," that this was the man who was nearly sure, a priori, to have a book-plate—we grant indeed that he was—and whose appreciation of all that was curious, abnormal, or exaggerated "piled Strawberry Hill from basement to attic with armour, painted glass, miniatures, engravings, chimney-glasses, snuff-boxes, medals, intaglios, rings, a Norman suit of armour, Anne Boleyn's clock, &c." Doubtless, Mr. Warren means that, when we know who Prior and Walpole were, it is interesting to have their book-plates. But he should say so. A book-plate of historic interest, and the book-plate of a person of historic interest, are not convertible terms. There are, however, in these chapters at least two book-plates of distinctly historic interest, that of "William Penn, Esq., Proprietor of Pennsylvania," and that of "Thomas Penn, of Stoke Poges, in the County of Bucks, First" (i.e., chief) "Proprietor of Pennsylvania."

If we ask ourselves now what chance the science of Ex-libris, as Mr. Warren with pardonable enthusiasm calls it, has of being popular in England, we can find no answer. It has one thing in its favour. Fancy book-plates have entirely gone out of fashion. At the present day, men either follow Macaulay's example, or use their crest or coat-of-arms. Mr. Warren declines to notice any book-plates invented since George the Fourth was King. We wonder whether any book-plate has been invented at all since George the Fourth's niece has filled her uncle's throne. It is needless to say that if our conjecture is correct, this gives the science of Ex-libris a good chance. Old china had to be obsolete china, in order to generate a tea-pot "to be lived up to."

We do not seriously advise any one to become a collector of book-plates; but we do most seriously and strenuously advise every genuine lover of books to put this charming volume on his shelves. He will find his account in doing so. If we have spoken rather lightly of ex-libris themselves, we must guard ourselves against seeming to depreciate this guide to them. It is a solid, trustworthy, and conscientious book, and worthy of all commendation.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The Expositor. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Dr. Robertson's article on "The Graphic Element in the Old Testament" is a very interesting contribution to the illustrating of Scripture language, and the elucidating of obscure passages from still remaining Eastern customs. What may be done in this way is well shown by an anecdote told by the writer. He had undertaken a boys' Bible class at Beyrout, and found, as he says, that "the stock material for teaching such a class at home was taken from him." "From a literary point of view, there was nothing to explain." Archdeacon Farrar gives an estimate, on the whole very unfavourable, of "The Exegesis of the Schoolmen," which, as he points out, was vitiated throughout by the system of allegorical interpretation. Dr. Oswald Dykes continues his excellent commentary on the Epistle to Titus. The other articles are "Some Names in Genesis," by the Rev. Edgar C. S. Gibson; "Comfort in Cares," by the Editor; and "The Heavenly Life," by Almoni Peloni.

The Month.—The articles in this number are too short—an average of ten pages for each—and somewhat thin. Much more might, for instance, have been made out of a curious book which Mr. W. F. Dennehy has lighted upon—the biography of Thomas Reynolds, the informer, who betrayed the United Irishmen in 1798; and the great theme of "Westminster Abbey and its Memories" is not adequately treated by Mr. Knowles. We get some interesting facts, and should have been glad of more, in "Some Notes on the French Conscription." Many readers will find the account of Julie Billart, Foundress of the Sisters of Notre Dame, highly interesting. Another "Founder," as some of us think him, gets but scant justice at the hands of the Rev. W. Loughnan. Why does this gentleman accuse Luther of incontinence? He was no more incontinent than St. Peter and the other Apostles who "led about a wife." And what does not Rome itself owe to him? It owes to him the difference between Leo X. and Leo XIII.

The Church Quarterly Review. October. (Spottiswoode and Co.)—The longest and most interesting article in this number is that on "Edward Henry Palmer." This is founded, of course, on Mr. Besant's book, but it appears to be written by one who had a close personal knowledge of his own of the subject of his sketch. He sets himself to correct the impression conveyed by Mr. Besant, and certainly felt by Palmer himself, that the University treated with neglect her most distinguished Orientalist. He does not quite make out that the Heads of Houses were right in preferring Dr. Wright to him; but he does show that, from first to last, he was fairly well treated by the University. It was the University Commissioners who refused to increase his professional stipend, and this at a time when all the world knew his pre-eminence as an Oriental scholar. There is an excellent essay on the "Evidential Value of the Sacraments." There we find, in the very earliest times, a cogent evidence of the still earlier organisation of the religion of which they were the expression. But what does the writer mean when he says that at the birth of Christ "the eloquence of Cicero had scarce been silenced, and the strains of Virgil still charmed the Imperial Court?" Not as many men were then alive who had listened to Cicero as can now remember having heard Daniel O'Connell, and Virgil had been dead fifteen years. The writer on the "Report of the Ecclesiastical Courts Commission" welcomes, we see, the recommendations of the Commissioners with enthusiasm. Another writer slays the slain, in expressing once more the follies of the so-called Anglo-Israelism. Of all the crazes that apparently sane men take up, this is the craziest. Other articles, in a number of unusual interest, are "Pellicia's Polity of the Christian Church," "The Suppression of Convocation" (a contribution to the Church history of the last century), "The Prospects of Religion and Society in France" (a sad, but we fear too true, picture of the feeling now dominant in France), "The New Education Code," and "Faith and Science."

We gladly renew our annual welcome to the year's volume of Aunt Judy's Magazine, edited by H. K. F. Gatty. (Bemrose and Sons.) We hope that it holds, and will continue to hold, its own against all rivals, so thoroughly good is it of its kind. There is a tie of affection and of sympathy in good work between it and its clientèle which distinguishes it from ordinary literary ventures. Its contents are as judiciously varied as ever,—fun and earnest mingled together in just proportion.

The Acharnians of Aristophanes. Translated into English Verse. By Robert Yelverton Tyrrell. (Hodges, Figgis, and Co., Dublin.)—In this volume, which belongs to the "Dublin University Press Series," Professor Tyrrell has essayed the difficult task of giving a literal translation which shall suggest the spirit as well as the letter of the original, and he has achieved, as might, indeed, be expected from so ingenious a scholar, a very considerable success. We are not sure whether Frere's version will not be more attractive to the reader who simply wants to be entertained, and is not careful to inquire whether or no this entertainment is Aristophanic. But it is not more than just to say that "Mitchell, Frere, and Walsh sometimes appear to make the Greek little more than a peg on which to hang poems of their own." On the other hand, Professor Tyrrell is scrupulously faithful. This faithfulness will approve itself differently to different persons. One thing, however, is certain,—scholars will value it highly. For the most part, they will find here what may be called for their purpose, which naturally is to put the original into close-fitting, attractive, English form, an ideal translation of the great Greek comedian. This is a great thing to do; still, we must own that it is not when he is most literal that Professor Tyrrell is most pleasing. Here is a passage from the famous parabasis, in which the poet makes his apology for telling his countrymen the truth:—

"From the time when our poet first made in the playwright's profession a start,
He never was used to come forward to boast of his marvellous art;
But now that malicious detractors are trying a notion to raise
That he slanders his country, and runs the Democracy down in his plays,
He thinks it is best to put in his demurrer at once, as he finds
That you're equally ready to change, and hasty to make up your minds.
He says that he's made you his debtors by teaching you not to be gull'd
By the soft words that foreigners give you, nor into security lull'd
By swallowing doses of bunkum. 'Twas when the whole of the town
Was led by the nose if one spouted the praise of her 'violet crown,'
And the moment a diplomat air'd that expression of mystical might,
'The crown' did the bus'ness; you scarcely could sit on your seats for delight.
If some flatterer said 'land of oil' there was nought you'd refuse him, I ween, Tho' he gave you a title more fit for the praise of a potted sardine.
And that's how he's made you his debtors—by turning the eyes of your mind
To the rights and the wrongs of your subjects. And that is the reason, you'll find,
Why the envoys that come with the tribute so long to behold the brave poet
Who dared to tell Athens the truth when he thought it was right she should know it.
You may judge that the fame of his boldness has pretty well gone round the globe.
By the two questions put by the Shah, when he sought Lacedæmon to probe;
For he first asked, which side of the two the sea with her navy could hold;
And then he ask'd which had the bard who was given so freely to scold;
For the state that had such an adviser, he said, would be stronger by far,
And would certainly bring by his aid to a glorious issue the war."

And here is a charming version of the praises of peace:—

"Saw ye how proud he was? Now he's for jollity—
Witness those feathers, how choice is his fare!
Beautiful playmate of Love and Frivolity, Little we knew, Peace, how lovely you were.
O that some Love-god would but bring me facing you,
Love in the picture, with buds round his brows!
Old as I am, I should ne'er stop embracing you,
Ne'er tire of kissing so buxom a spouse.
Then would I plant, for my mistress's pleasuring,
Many a sweet little vine-sprout a-row,
Rearing beside them, for motherly treasuring,
Shoots of the fig-tree that tenderest blow.
Old as I am, yet no sprout should want overbearing;
Olive-branch laden our farm should abound,
We should not dream of our cruise of oil perishing,
We'd have enough for us all the year round."

Rambles with a Fishing Rod. By E. S. Roscoe. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Now that most people, a few salmon fishermen excepted, have put away their fly-rods, it is pleasant to read such a book as Mr. Roscoe's. He has no miraculous take of fishes to record. On the contrary, even the best basket which he describes might easily be surpassed in a Sutherlandshire trout loch. But he takes his readers to some new and very pleasant places, discourses to them very agreeably of persons and scenery, as well as of sport; tells faithfully of disappointments, as well as successes; and generally shows himself as agreeable a "book companion" as one could expect to find. The general impression left by his experiences is one at which one might arrive without personal knowledge, viz., that the angler who seeks for trout in the streams of Germany or the Tyrol finds only the gleanings in August. So late as that, the angler who wants large baskets must go north. Not only is the season too far advanced in southern countries, but the fish have been sadly thinned, for on the Continent the streams and lakes are utilised as sources of food supply in a way of which we in this island have no experience. Still, though the trout are scarce, there are grayling. And in any case, if the traveller be not a mere catcher of fish, he will get many delights, amongst them being that thorough change of surroundings which one must cross the seas to obtain. One paper is given to Connemara, and another to "Sea-trout Fishing in Scotland." Sea-trout fishing is, indeed, though, as the writer, after a humorous description, remarks, not by any means a contemplative recreation, is an admirable sport,—the more the pity that it is rapidly diminishing. The sea-trout is too eager a creature, and, therefore, too easy a prey. We fear much that, in all accessible places at least, he will almost disappear. The present writer can remember hearing of more than eighty falling in a day to a single rod, and has himself, though but a very indifferent performer with a fly, secured as many as thirty-five, averaging a pound, in six or seven hours. One of the papers, and not the least interesting, is on "Pike-fishing in the Black Forest." Pike-fishing is somewhat unreasonably despised. There are places on the Continent where it could be followed with success; Mr. Roscoe mentions one of them. We fancy that others, e.g., in Holland and Pomerania, could easily be found. The Black Forest "See," in which Mr. Roscoe tried his fortune, is, indeed, hardly first-rate. Thirty pounds seems to be considered a very good, and fifteen to twenty an average take. Two rods seem to have been satisfied with 150 in seven days, one of the fish scaling as much as thirty. (We doubt whether the landlord was not drawing the long-bow, when he said that this fish took three hours to land. The "gamest" pike we ever saw was exactly of this weight, and though hooked with spinning-tackle outside the mouth, was landed in less than half an hour.) A daily average of ten pounds and a fraction is but moderate. We know of a place where an angler would easily treble it. But no tortures would make us reveal the name. We have nothing but praise for the good-nature with which Mr. Roscoe takes the world into his confidence.

William Ewart Gladstone, and his Contemporaries. By Thomas Archer. Vol. IV., 1860-1883. (Blackie and Son.)—Mr. Archer completes in this volume what is practically a history of England during the last fifty years. We have taken occasion to speak of his work while it has been in progress, and we now wish to renew and complete our acknowledgments of its great merit. The difficulties which beset such a task as that which he has now accomplished are very great. Foremost, of course, stands the problem of expressing conviction without becoming a partisan. Mr. Archer has not, indeed, like the Pollio to whom Horace addressed his famous warning, a civil war to relate; but he has to tell of some very fierce struggles, in which the antagonists have not always been content with moral force. And he has to deal with controversies, both political and social, from which the bitterness has by no means passed away. He has his views on these matters, and he does not attempt to conceal the fact that they are such as a biographer of Mr. Gladstone might be expected to have; but he is, as far as we can see, just and candid. Then there is the difficulty, which is in one sense more embarrassing, of keeping due proportion between various events. Most of us have subjects in which we are especially interested, and are disposed to be discontented with the brevity with which they are sometimes of necessity treated. Here, again, Mr. Archer seems to steer skilfully a very perplexing course. A reader will, of course, now and then miss something that he looks for, but he will acknowledge, on the whole, that the book is well managed in this respect. Add to this a very lively and vigorous style, and you have a book which fairly has earned much praise.

Henry Irving, Actor and Manager. By William Archer. (Field and Tuer.)—This is a careful and, we should say, a just criticism of a great actor, of a very different quality from the hurried remarks which have to be put together between the close of a performance and the time when a morning paper goes to press. It is, indeed, one of Mr. Archer's points that the first impression made by Mr. Irving has to be corrected by repeated observation. The justice of the remark that in comedy the acting of Mr. Irving is "in no sense exhilarating," will be generally acknowledged. His restlessness is another peculiarity that is remarked upon; a third is his mannerism of pronunciation. On this point, Mr. Archer remarks, with a witty severity that is not wholly undeserved, "A fatal proclivity to speaking in unknown tongues seems to be connected with the very name of Irving." The want of mimetic power is a defect which is less obvious. Yet we see that there is much truth in the remark that "his greatest triumphs are projections of himself, not reflections of the world around him." But it is a defect which, as Mr. Archer says, has been seen in other great actors.

Eight Years in Japan, 1873-1881. By E. G. Holtham. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Mr. Holtham went out from England to assist in the making of Japanese railways, and he recounts in this volume the experiences of eight years spent in this work, and of occasional holidays which he took from it. We cannot say that we have found it much more interesting than the story of as many years' work in England would have been. The writer certainly does not exaggerate; he seems to regard everything with a truly British composure, and consequently produces an account of the country which is in the strongest contrast to the romantic descriptions which some travellers have given of it. The most interesting and novel part of the volume is that which tells us something about earthquakes:—"The Japanese have a regular earthquake drill, with which they are acquainted from childhood. At the first agitation, they rush out of doors, if their houses are open, as in summer; but if it is the cold season, or their houses are closed for the night, each man, woman, or child of sufficient size to act independently seizes one leaf of the shutters that slide in grooves on the edges of the verandahs, lifts it traywise on to the head, as a protection from falling tiles or debris, and so gaining the nearest open space, lays it down on the ground and sits in the middle of it, to minimise the liability to fall into cracks or rents in the earth's surface. The sudden galvanising into life of a sleeping village is a very funny sight, resembling a pantomime trick in its conception and execution. Resort is also had to bamboo groves, as the interlacing tough roots certainly bind the earth together, so as to render it extremely unlikely that any fissure will open in such a locality for choice."

Specimens of French Literature, from Villon to Hugo. Selected and edited by George Saintsbury. (The Clarendon Press.)—This volume is published as a companion to the editor's "Short History of French Literature," which, indeed, it is intended to illustrate. Hence it is not primarily a collection of the finest things in the French literature, whether verse or prose. Were it that, some of the names that are found in it would probably disappear, and others would be differently represented. But then we should not get the help which we do here actually receive towards getting a comprehensive view of what the literature of the last four centuries has been in France. Some of these writers will be strange to many English readers. Of Villon, for instance, most of us have heard, possibly heard too much, but Roger de Coll  rye and Antoine de Baif will be new acquaintances to most. This is a volume of the greatest interest.

Theory and Practice of Teaching. By the Rev. Edward Thring. (Cambridge University Press.)—It is probable that any one resorting to this volume for actual instruction in the "theory and practice of teaching" will close it with disappointment. Mr. Thring has little or nothing to say to such inquirers. He deals—and in so doing has the precedent of great teachers to support him—with principles rather than with rules. Yet we take it that no patient hearer (if, as we suppose, these chapters were once lectures) or reader will have gone or will go away without profit. Mr. Thring's utterances cannot fail to raise a "noble discontent" in the hearts of those to whom they are addressed, discontent with accepted modes of teaching, and with results which we try to consider satisfactory. As for himself, the writer is profoundly dissatisfied. He compares English school teaching to the perpetual pouring of water on kettles which have their lids, a pouring which can but result in a few drops accidentally getting down the spout. The remedy he proposes is, first to communicate this dissatisfaction to others, and to look for better results to more loving and intelligent working in the future. Mr. Thring's quaint style is sometimes effective, sometimes, we must own, a little tiresome.

POETRY.—Miscellaneous Verses, by Georgiana Farrer. (S. W. Partridge.)—Miss Farrer writes some six or seven thousand verses, to which we can really allow no higher merit than that of good intention. Not the strongest sympathy with her general sentiments can make such verses as the following on "Vivisection" tolerable:—

"Darwin believes man but a beast,
Sprung from a lowly root;
Superior to frogs and apes,
A highly cultured shoot.
Forerunners of a higher race,
But not what Scripture states,
Possessed with an immortal soul,
On minds, like his, it grates.
A sort of eminence there is
To feel above a fly,—
To think a reptile or a fish
Beneath our dignity."

—Theodora, and other Poems. By George F. E. Scott. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Mr. Scott must excuse us, if we remind him that if emperors are "super grammaticam" poets are not. In,—

"O man, who in thy wondrous wisdom,
In very littleness doth limit
God's love with thine—who madly scorneth,"

"who" is in the second person, and requires "dost" and "scornest." We cannot honestly say that verses of the quality of which we give a sample—and, as it seems to us, a fair sample—are worth publishing, whether they are written in extreme youth or extreme old age:—

"DREAMS.
"They told me that I did but dream,"
I heard an old man say,
'And that the world's realities
Mine energies should sway.
The world's realities I found Realities of woe;
Ah! would that I could dream again
The dreams of long ago."

—Poems and Ballads. By Pryce Gwynne. There is a good deal more sound than sense in such verses as the following:—

"SONG TO PSYCHE.
"Go, weary sprite, outspeed the night,
And seek the land of dreams,
Whose cloudy light I lest the sight
Be blinded by its streams,
That wash the walls of magic halls,
Whose forms for ever change;
Though each entrals the glance that falls,
Upon its fabric strange."

NOVELS.—Jack's Cousin Kate. By E. C. Kenyon. (Remington.)—Jack is a medical student. Kate is the daughter of a man who writes three-volume novels under the absurd name of "Tamogen," and of necessity leaves his family unprovided for at his death. Partly to make a living for herself, and partly also to get rid of the addresses of the fervent medical student, Kate takes a situation as lady-help in North Wales. There nearly everybody who is "eligible" falls in love with her, and pours forth his affection in unintelligible Welsh, or in poetical quotations. But before she had reached her journey's end in North Wales she had, like Mrs. Eiloart's heroine, met "her fate" in a railway carriage. This fate is Dr. Daker, who is rather crusty and sarcastic. Fortunately, however, a bank in which he is a shareholder collapses, and, as he elegantly puts it, "swallows up the whole bag of tricks." Daker improves, and as Jack has been at death's door, and has, like Miss Pecksniff's lover, set his heart on Another, there is no reason why Kate and her Doctor should not go together, at the end of the third volume. As a story, Jack's Cousin Kate is common-place; its style is full of crudities. There is a good deal of religious or quasi-religious talk in it, and although there is no reason to doubt its sincerity, it occasionally becomes unctuous, and consequently offensive.—A Fashionable Marriage. By Mrs. Alexander Fraser. (White.)—This is one of the most unwholesome, but fortunately, also, one of the silliest novels we have ever read. Mrs. Alexander Fraser's "society" consists of under-bred ruffians with titles, who look like "Greek Gods," (why are the "Greek Gods" always insulted in fiction of this kind?) drink "tumblers of brandy," or "call lustily for a whisky-and-soda," when they have any special villainy on hand; and vulgar, heartless, mercenary "sirens" or "Faustines," with "white, alabaster arms," and "great, almond-shaped, milk-white-lidded eyes." Mrs. Fraser, indeed, puts a little comedy into her portrait of Bella Grant, who is the chief female villain of her story, and proceeds from poisoning to lunacy, for we find that she reads the Parliamentary debates, and "as Bradlaugh has her entire sympathy, her face is unbecomingly flushed, and her gray eyes gleam with hot partisanship in a hideous cause." But Mrs. Fraser surely carries her courage (shall we term it?) too far, when she introduces into her story living and well-known ladies under the thinnest of disguises, and when she gives names to the parties in the divorce case, which is the last scene but one of her strange history, that at once recall personages that actually figured in a recent cause célèbre.—Dame Durden. By "Rita." (Tinsley Brothers.)—It is enough to say of this novel that it is superior to most of the author's work. There is a good deal of what we can only style strenuousness in it, but it is not unwholesome. The tragic loves of Paul and Lady Maud are told with some power, and although we get rather tired of their foils, Eric and Marjorie, there are very much worse characters in some of "Rita's" other fictions.

BOOKS RECEIVED.—Aspects of Scepticism, by John Fordyce, M.A. (Elliot Stock.)—The Fertilisation of Flowers, by Professor Hermann Müller. Translated and edited by D'Arcy W. SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

"Spectacles can only be perfectly adjusted by those having a thorough knowledge of the anatomy of the eye, combined with optical experience."

WE have the highest Medical Authorities, confirmed by daily experience, that imperfect glasses, together with the haphazard plan of selection generally employed by the mere vendor, is the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." The Rev. Professor W. A. Hale, M.A. Cantab., 2 Minford Gardens, West Kensington Park, writes:—"The Spectacles are perfect, and a most decided boon. I had occasion on Monday to write to Lord —, and took the opportunity to mention your name, and the wonderful power of your Spectacles." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age (82). I can now read the smallest type, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Testimonials from Earl and Countess Lindsay; F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P.; the Venerable Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Rev. Mother Abbess, St. Mary's Abbey, Mill Hill, Hendon; O. J. Alford, Esq., Gas Light and Coke Company, Horseferry Road, Westminster, &c. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.S.S., Oculist Optician, 39 OLD BOND STREET, W. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

M. JULES FERRY, finding the Extremists implacable in their hatred of the Government, has finally declared war on them. He announced at Rouen on Saturday that the Ministry were “about to give battle,” and at Havre, on Sunday, he expanded the idea. There had, he said, been during the Recess an outburst of Intransigence, which called for serious attention. The Extremists do not want Government of any kind; their idea of a Republic is incessant change, and they admit of no method of administration. Their advocates promise everything, practicable or otherwise, and thereupon are elected Deputies. The Government will make no compromise with them, and it behoves every good citizen finally to choose his side. No one can belong to both parties. These energetic words have driven the Extremists quite frantic, and it is arranged that a furious attack shall be made upon M. Ferry when the Session begins, on Tuesday. He relies, of course, upon the support of all Moderates; but it is believed that, rather than resign, he will dissolve. The Senate will, of course, be on his side; and the President, although opposed to him personally, is still more opposed to the Extremists, who insult him every day. In an election on such an issue, it is believed that only the great cities would send up Extremists, and that the majority would return pledged to union and the support of the Government.

The great difficulty in M. Ferry’s way is his foreign policy. His own party in the Chamber dislike the risks the Government is running in Tonquin, and are annoyed at the unpleasantness with England on account of the Shaw affair. It is impossible to ascertain the truth upon the subject, but in Paris it is believed that M. Ferry is personally anxious not to retreat before China, and that he defended in the Cabinet the dispatch of reinforcements to maintain the French position in Madagascar. This is probably true, but M. Ferry has already averted any difficulty with England by the offer of compensation to Mr. Shaw, the occupation of Tamatave can be protracted at little expense, and the road for retreat from Tonquin is always open. With the Chamber disinclined for war, and M. Grévy specially hostile to expeditions, the French Premier is scarcely the man to sacrifice his future to the luxury of being obstinate. If he does, his majority will be very narrow, and his popularity with the Army will disappear, Soldiers drawn together by conscription detest Asiatic service, and the higher officers are well aware that to conquer a tropical delta in the teeth of an empire like China is a very serious undertaking. No General of standing would attempt it with less than 30,000 men, and it is stated that Dr. Harmand has already calculated the cost at £8,000,000 sterling.

The Leeds Conference, on Wednesday, mustered some 2,500 delegates from upwards of five hundred Liberal Associations in different parts of the kingdom, and found, apparently, no difficulty at all in coming to a resolution which was all but unanimous as to the claims of the various measures which are candidates for legislative precedence in the next Session. The chair was taken by Mr. John Morley, who, as every one knows, advocates the passing of a County Franchise Bill in 1884, and a Redistribution of Seats Bill in 1885, if the Lords accept the County Franchise Bill. The Lords, he said, are not a bit more partial to a County Government Bill or to a London Government Bill than they are to a County Franchise Bill, and they will reject or accept any Bill according as they suppose that by so rejecting or accepting it they will increase their chance of getting a majority at the general election, and so hoisting a Conservative Government into power. A resolution in favour of introducing a County Franchise Bill at the commencement of the next Session was carried all but unanimously, but very few delegates voting with Mr. Firth, M.P., for the higher claim of a London Government Bill.

Subsequently, the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, of Birmingham, brought forward the claims of women to the Parliamentary franchise; and in this he was supported by Miss Cobden and by a daughter of Mr. Bright’s,—Mrs. Bright-Clarke, of Street, in Somersetshire. The Conference was favourable to this rider on the resolution, and voted it by a great majority, though not, apparently, till after a good many members had gone away. This is, we hold, a very unpractical gloss adopted into the text of the record of the Conference, and certainly not one on which Liberal statesmen will be agreed. The Conservatives advocate women’s suffrage, because they think, and probably rightly think, that the votes of women at large would be preponderantly Conservative,—and, of course, it would be impossible to abide by the present qualifications, if it be assumed that women of average political capacity should be put on an equality with men of the same capacity. At all events, the adoption of the women’s franchise would confuse everything, raise many more questions than it would be possible to settle, and vastly increase the chance of indefinitely postponing any Reform Bill; and this, no doubt, especially recommends the women’s franchise to the Conservative leaders. We take it, however, that very few of the Leeds delegates were specially instructed to vote for the women’s franchise, and that this was a bit of by-play, on which delegates were at liberty to do much as they pleased.

On Thursday, the Leeds Conference resolved that after passing the extension of household franchise to the counties, a Redistribution Bill should be proposed, “such as would give as nearly as possible an equal value to every vote, and secure a true expression of the will of the nation.” To this resolution there was no real opposition, though a discussion arose on the question of minority representation, in which Mr. F. Seebohm made a good speech, in a sense which we conceive to be very much the same as that which we have adopted in another column. He held that, somehow or other, the minority of the nation ought to get its opinions fairly represented in Parliament; but he did not hold, apparently, that the minority principle, as it is at present embodied in our electoral law, produces the desired result.

Mr. Bright, in the long evening speech in which he reviewed the conversion of the nation to his own creed, illustrated with great power the distorting effect of the minority representation, in the experimental form in which it is at present embodied, on the representation of national convictions. He referred to the case of Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, and Birmingham, all of which have the minority representation, and pointed out that their population is greater by 80,000 than the collective population of 142 boroughs which return 176 Members to Parliament. And then he went on:—“The House of Commons had given three seats to each of the big towns, and the House of Lords said, ‘No, we will invent a plan which will not only not give them three, but which will deprive them of the influence of two.’ So they passed the Minority Clause. When an election occurs, two Members are returned in each of the large cities by which ever party happens to be in the majority, and one Member for each by the minority, making a total of eight against four. Let us now turn to the House of Commons after a great debate and during a critical division, in which an adverse vote must not only change the Government, but must also, in the eye of all the world, change both the home and foreign policy of this country. In such a close division as we had on the passing of the Reform Bill in 1866, or on the Affirmation Bill, or on Irish University Education, and other measures within my recollection, the actual result of a great contested election in these four important boroughs, with nearly two millions of population, is just this, that, whilst other 142 boroughs return 176 Members, they, in effect, return only four Members; that is really all the influence they would have in a great division. Now, I ask you, is not that an astounding fact?" That is unanswerable. Only Mr. Bright made the scandal worse than it actually is. At the present moment, these four great towns are represented by nine Liberals and only three Conservatives, the majority having carried all their Members in Glasgow and Birmingham.

Mr. Henry Fowler delivered a striking speech to his constituents at Wolverhampton on Saturday last. It was a speech nearly two hours in length, delivered to an audience of two thousand persons, who listened to him with eagerness and perfect sympathy throughout. He reviewed "the solid and useful" work of the last Session,—the Corrupt Practices Act, the Bankruptcy Act, the Act for Reducing the National Debt, and the Agricultural Holdings Act,—with some detail; but his explanations of what had been done were so graphic that he did not in any degree weary his audience with this long review; and his reply to the Tory criticisms on the finance of the Session evidently excited the deepest interest. When Mr. Fowler asked why the House of Lords should not be reformed, Wolverhampton cheered him most lustily,—and we wish the Conservative leaders in the Peers would carefully watch the growing signs of public impatience with which their obstructive attitude towards Liberal measures is received. On the question of the policy of the future, Mr. Fowler was most explicit, and carried with him the fullest enthusiasm of his audience. The concession of household franchise to the counties should, he said, be the first work undertaken, and with it must go the necessary redistribution of electoral power. "Under the present working of our Parliamentary system," he said, "we are governed by a minority of the population, a minority of voters, a minority of taxpayers, and a minority of the patriotism and intelligence of the country. We can hold no compromise with this sort of thing."

Mr. Fowler's illustration of the unfairness of the distribution of representative influence in Staffordshire, is remarkable only because it expresses neatly and succinctly what might be easily matched in any populous county of England and Wales:—"In Staffordshire, there are eight boroughs that return thirteen Members to Parliament; four of them return seven, and four others return six. You would think that the four boroughs which return seven Members comprise a majority of the population and a majority of the electors. Let us see. The four boroughs sending seven Members, all told, have a population of under 60,000; the four boroughs returning six Members, all told, have a population of over 500,000 people. But I hear some cautious Conservative say, 'That is a striking contrast, so far as numbers are concerned. But property must be represented, as well as population. Those who pay taxes must have the larger voice in deciding how the taxes are to be spent.' Very well, Sir, without stopping to argue whether 60,000 mouths can consume more than 500,000 mouths,—and the bulk of our taxes are raised upon what the people eat and drink,—let us take the property test. In the four boroughs that return the seven Members, the income from all sources, from trade, from rents, from profits on which they pay income-tax, is £643,000, and the income of the four boroughs that have only six Members is £4,700,000. Comment upon these figures is superfluous." That is good political pemmican. But Mr. Fowler is no indifferent orator, as well as no feeble politician. His comment on the Conservative gathering at Birmingham, which was to be supplied with light, as the advertisements previously informed Birmingham, from "Chinese lanterns," told most happily on his audience. "Chinese lanterns," he said—"apt symbols of the light and leading of Conservative Cabinets"—were to decorate the Conservative assembly, while "the whole was to conclude with a display of fireworks." But they did not only conclude with fireworks, "they commenced with fireworks, and they had nothing but fireworks all the way through." Here Mr. Fowler did the Conservative orators at Birmingham something more than justice. At least, if it was all fireworks, a good deal of the gunpowder was damp and the result a sputtering devoid of brilliancy.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, speaking on Wednesday night at a Conservative dinner at Bridgewater, boasted of Sir Stafford Northcote's triumphal progress through Ulster, but omitted to say that it was essential to that progress that the furious condemnation of the Irish Land Act to which the Tory party in Parliament is deeply pledged, should be altogether ignored, as it certainly was ignored by Sir Stafford Northcote. In fact, the Orangemen welcomed Sir Stafford only on condition that Sir Stafford should not give even the feeblest expression to Lord Salisbury's well known view of the greatest achievement of the present Government. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach also took occasion to attack the expected measure for the redistribution of electoral power in England, and gave no symptom of that inclination towards the equalising of electoral districts to which some of his late colleagues are supposed to lean. On the contrary, he declared warmly against any redistribution of power based chiefly on population, arguing for "a varied franchise and the representation of interests." That is a mysterious phrase, susceptible of any number of different interpretations, but is chiefly remarkable because it indicates that some of the Conservatives mean to take refuge in dark phrases, and to avoid committing themselves to any definite Reform policy of their own.

Some of the Irish Tory papers are trying to raise—on strictly Nationalist grounds—an opposition to General Sankey's appointment to the Chairmanship of the Board of Works. Though General Sankey is admitted to be an Irishman, it is objected that he has been a long time absent from his country;—not quite so long, however, as Marshal MacMahon, who in true Nationalist circles is, nevertheless, regarded as the typical Irishman of the age. General Sankey has been appointed to this office, as we believe, precisely because he possesses the qualifications necessary to make the Irish Public Works Department a powerful engine of the policy of such measures as the Tramways Act. He has learned on the large scale of Mysore and Madras what public works can be attempted with advantage, in a country periodically swept by famine and having deficient communications. His conduct during the famine in his district is said to have shown conclusively that he has, at all events, an Irish heart.

Sir Archibald Alison, who commanded the Highland Brigade at Tel-el-Kebir, received a sword of honour on Thursday from the citizens of Glasgow, and made a very brilliant speech, notable for this,—he entirely exonerated the Egyptian soldiers from the charge of cowardice. He says the Egyptians of the Guard fell back sullenly before the Highlanders, turning whenever they reached a defensible point. "Here, too, I must do justice to the Egyptian soldiers. I never saw men fight more steadily. Retiring up a line of works which we had taken in flank, they rallied at every re-entering angle, at every battery, at every redoubt, and renewed the fight. Four or five times we had to close upon them with the bayonet, and I saw these men fighting hard when their officers were flying." We wish Sir Archibald had told us whether these men were fellaheen or negroes, a point of the highest importance to the future organisation of Egypt. Sir Archibald also denies all stories as to the indiscipline of the English soldiers. He says they stopped in their night march to redress their formation, which had approached too nearly to a crescent, in perfect silence and without confusion. In a fine passage, he described that night march across the sands, in words which show how completely Mrs. Hemans is now forgotten. She used nearly the identical phrases in "The Burial of the Cid":—

"With a silent pace, as the pace of one,
Was the still death-march of the host begun;
With a silent step went the cuirassed bands,
Like a lion's tread o'er the burning sands,—
And they gave no battle-shout."

The London Corporation is evidently alarmed by the refusal of the Treasury to renew the London coal duty now paid to the Metropolitan Board. They think if this is swept away, their own duty on grain, which is as much a necessary of life as fuel, will also be abolished. They, therefore, propose to bring in a

Bill extending their term, although the duty does not expire till 1902, and declare that without it they can protect no more open spaces, and especially cannot make a park for Paddington, or buy the extensive grounds now offered them in Kilburn, in order to make a park for North-West London. They secured Epping Forest, Wanstead Park, Burnham Beeches, Coulsdon Common, and West Ham Park out of the grain duty, and the whole capital value of their lease is now exhausted. The simple answer to their proposal, as to that of the Metropolitan Board, is that all re-grants must wait until London has a Municipality. Till then, they ought not to be so much as considered. That new representative body will devise means for getting money, and will, we venture to say, find "improvement" its grand embarrassment.

Mr. J. D. Dougall, the gunmaker of Bennett Street, gives the Times some curious information as to the eagerness of the wealthy classes for shooting. Thirty-five years ago, he says, the lease of a grouse moor in the Highlands, long let for £80, fell in, and was instantly let for shooting for £1,400, a rise to seventeen and a half times its agricultural value. This was followed by similar cases, till at present he estimates the total of the Highland shootings at £12,000,000 of capital value. Deer "forests" are equally profitable. A Highland estate was described in the Times the other day in terms of unusual eulogy, and was purchased by a buyer who had never seen it, in less than twenty-four hours. Mr. Dougall advised him to let the shootings, and on his agreeing to do so, let them for him at a figure equal to ninety per cent. of the entire agricultural rental. He further offered to buy the shootings for ever at a price equal to two-thirds of the entire purchase-money, the offer, it should be added, being in tens of thousands of pounds. Mr. Dougall is a bold man, to stake so much on the aristocratic character of Parliament. It will be observed that in all these transactions, though a few landlords are greatly enriched, and thereby encouraged to deprive the people of their rights of way over the waste lands, nothing whatever is added to the wealth of the country. The money is as unproductive as if it were lost at cards, as the winners, like the landlords, might also use it well.

The "Arab movement," so greatly feared by the Turks, has spread to Damascus, the great centre of Mussulman thought and propagandism. The inhabitants are greatly discontented with their Turkish Governor, and placards have been posted over the city denouncing the injustice of the Turks, and calling on all Moslem Arabs to resist them. Whole families have been arrested in consequence, and it is said that the alarm among the Turkish authorities is very great. There will be alarm also in Constantinople, where it is well understood that the Arabs wait only for an opportunity to rebel, and perhaps proclaim a new Khalif. That was the secret which made the Sultan, on the threat of despatching a fleet to Smyrna, give up Thessaly. He did not think Smyrna would be bombarded, and did not care if it was; but he knew that the appearance of a hostile Fleet off Syria would break his prestige, and precipitate the Arab rising which some day will break up Turkish rule in Asia. No one can understand the extraordinary intrigues in the Palace at Constantinople who does not remember that the Sultan on this side is never free from fear.

The situation in Zululand is becoming unintelligible. It is reported on all hands that Cetewayo, pressed by his European adviser, Mr. Grant, has surrendered himself to the British Resident, and is again, therefore, a prisoner. It is also asserted that Usibepu, the chief who has proved himself the strongest in the recent conflicts, will be acknowledged by the British as general Chief in Zululand. There is no objection to the latter course, which, indeed, is essential, unless we are to annex; but why should we interfere, either to protect or to arrest Cetewayo? We ought, no doubt, to have restored him nominally to his old position; but as he accepted the terms, why not leave him to fight his battle, and win a throne or lose his life, by himself? It seems as if in Zululand, as in Afghanistan, a true non-interference, carried steadily out to its logical conclusion, was too much for the tempers of the authorities on the spot. They will look on calmly up to a point, but then the wish either to set things right or to moderate the victor gets the better of them. If it is necessary to settle Zululand, let us settle it, in our own way and with a persistent policy; but if it is not, let the Zulus fight it out to the bitter end. What conceivable business is it of ours to arrest Cetewayo?

The English dislike to allow the evidence of accused persons to be heard is evidently dying away, or reducing itself to a fear lest criminals should be tortured by cross-examination. At the annual meeting of the Incorporated Law Society held at Bath, on Wednesday, opinion was unanimous in favour of examining the accused, and a resolution was passed to that effect, with the rider that "examination to credit" must be strictly limited,—that is, that a prisoner's whole previous history must not be brought up against him. The balance of opinion, moreover, seems to be in favour of examination by the Court, rather than by opposing counsel, the Court, it is thought, being more impartial. We feel disinclined to reawake in the Judge the old instinct of getting something out of a witness, and hardly see why, if examination to credit is restricted, and the prisoner left free to give or refuse a reply, he should not be questioned like any other prisoner. Indeed, we are not certain whether restrictions are not all wrong, and whether the simple object of a Court of Justice should not be to arrive at truth, so far as it is ascertainable without torture.

It is stated that Canon Westcott is to succeed to the Canonry of Westminster, which will be vacated by the consecration of Canon Barry to be Bishop of Sydney; and there is a further rumour that Canon Barry's place as Principal of King's College, London, is likely to be filled by the election of the Rev. Henry Wace, now Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and formerly one of the Professors of King's College. The promotion of Canon Westcott to be a Canon of Westminster is a wise step if the exchange of one canonry for another of more importance, can be called promotion. Canon Westcott has done much for English theological criticism, and shown the greatest candour, clearness, learning, and ability in his many writings. Mr. Wace is just the man to exercise a powerful influence in King's College, London. The thoughtfulness of his sermons is great, but their earnestness is even greater; and he has the force of character which most impresses the young and rouses in them the nobler kinds of ambition.

There has been a rumour this week of the intended resignation of the Bishop of London, on the ground of health. We should greatly regret to find that the report is true, for Dr. Jackson has done his work heartily and simply, with a great desire to do justice, and none of the pomp of episcopal ostentation. If it be true, however, and if it should be also true that an eminent prelate of great organising power is to be translated from the West to fill his see, we hope that the opportunity may be seized to raise to the Episcopate the one man of unquestionable genius in the Church whom all Administrations have, for some reason, passed over, we suppose because his views are believed to lean too much towards those of his venerated friend, the late Dr. Pusey. We should hope, however, that no superstition of this kind will prevent the present Government from promoting to the highest offices of the Church a man on whose lips crowds hang with eagerness, not only for their eloquence, but for that indefinable aroma of piety and purity of feeling which fascinates more than any eloquence of speech. It is but bare justice to the Church and the people to place such preachers as Canon Liddon in the post where the acclamation of public admiration would long ago have placed them.

The Committee for raising a memorial to the late Professor Stanley Jevons,—the brilliant logician and economist, whom we lost in the prime of his powers about a year ago,—have determined to establish a Studentship of £100 a year, the holder of which is to devote himself to economic or statistical research; and they propose that the election to this studentship shall be vested in trustees, representatives of University College, London, Owens College, Manchester, and University College, Liverpool. Professor Jevons made his reputation as a great teacher at the first two Colleges, and his personal connection with Liverpool justifies his association with the third, which is, indeed, sure to be soon associated with Owens College in the Victoria University. We earnestly hope that the subscriptions to this memorial will flow in rapidly, and that they will be sufficient to enable the Committee to carry out fully their wise and carefully-matured scheme. Subscriptions may be sent to the Treasurer of the Jevons Memorial Fund, at the Manchester and Salford Bank (Limited).

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE LEEDS CONFERENCE.

THE Leeds Conference proves that the Liberal party in the country knows its own mind, and that it is not only in favour of introducing a Household Franchise Bill for the Counties as the forerunner of an adequate Redistribution Bill, —a course which we long ago recommended as the wisest,—but that it is not willing to run any more risks by putting off to another Session, or even postponing to any secondary place in the coming Session, the taking of the first step. The half-Liberal and the Conservative journals are evidently annoyed by this resolve, for they are well aware that so influential an expression of opinion as that of between two and three thousand Delegates of Liberal Associations cannot but produce a very grave impression on the mind of the Government. We do not wonder at the irritation felt. The truth clearly is that on all the points which most urgently demand remedial legislation,—Parliamentary procedure, county government, and the government of London being the most important,—very different measures might be passed if the counties were already enfranchised, and the Redistribution Bill which must accompany it, were passed, from those which might be passed if the enfranchisement of the counties and the redistribution of seats were still uncertain and problematic. We have no doubt at all that the proceedings of the last Session have deeply impressed the mind of the country. There we have seen the time of Parliament frittered away by Mr. Warton, who represents 1,085 electors, by Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, who represents 1,081, by Mr. A. J. Balfour, who represents 1,081, by Lord Randolph Churchill, who represents 1,060, while some of the weightiest men in Parliament, with twenty or five-and-twenty thousands of constituents behind them, have been compelled to hold their tongues just because these Obstructionists were determined to talk. No wonder that the Liberal Party is determined to make these idlers feel what it is to have a constituency which is itself identified with the business of the country and is determined to see it done, and the only way in which they can be made to feel this adequately is to press on the measures which will make short work of these trivial constituencies, and put a serious sense of responsibility into the Parliamentary acts of even unscrupulous men. Then, again, as to county government, it is not to be denied that there is a serious anomaly in reforming the government of the counties without giving the householders who are most likely to be affected by that reform any opportunity of representing their own views and wishes on the subject. And even as to the Government of London, though we are of course very desirous to see a good London Government Bill passed by the present Parliament, and in the next Session, if a really good one can be so passed, is it not notorious that the Metropolis is the least adequately represented city in the kingdom? and that the enormous power which the City possesses to resist all due municipal reform, would vanish in an instant before any measure which really gave to the population of the metropolis something approaching to its fair weight in the House of Commons? These are, we are convinced, the main considerations which have induced the Liberal party to express so very emphatic a desire to see the first step taken at once towards the next Reform Bill.

At the present moment, we have many of the disadvantages of democracy, without the advantages. The House of Lords can always plead that the counties are entitled to much more weight than they possess in the House of Commons; and that, if the true opinion of the counties could be known, it would be found to agree better with that of the territorial party than with that of the great towns; and this lends a colour of reason to the Lords in their obstruction of Liberal measures which it is most important to clear up, and either to justify or to remove. Therefore, we say that the Leeds Conference has judged wisely in demanding that the great reform to which the Government are pledged shall now take precedence of every other question, and not be left to the risk of a secondary place in the legislative proposals of the next Session. We have seen for many years back that a secondary place in the business of any Session is very likely indeed to mean much the same as no place at all. Further, it is far from impossible that in the present condition of the Irish party, a defeat of the Government which might involve a dissolution might take place on some purely administrative issue, and the whole result of the election of 1880 thus be lost to the party of Reform. For if Parliament were once dissolved without the Government having brought forward the most important of all the political proposals to which they pledged themselves, the Liberal electors would think that they were being trifled with, and would certainly mark their sense of annoyance by a very much diminished interest in the next general election. The Conservatives are fond of the sneer that Reform is brought forward not because the country needs it, but because the exigencies of the Liberal party require it. But why should the exigencies of the Liberal party require it if the country does not earnestly desire it? The county franchise is not at all a popular cry in the present county constituencies. On the contrary, as we saw in Rutland the other day, it appears to be a very unpopular cry. If it were not the sincere and eager desire of the country, both in the great cities and in the huge class of county non-electors, it would be very bad policy in the Liberals to urge this question on the people. But the truth is that the people do most urgently desire it, and desire it for the best of reasons,—because they see that the representatives of the pettiest constituencies are the most disturbing element in the present House of Commons,—because they see that the fond dreams of the House of Lords are more or less excused by their hopes and guesses as to the wishes of the county non-electors,—because they see that no great readjustment of local government of any kind is possible till there is some clear test of popular feeling, not only in towns, but in rural districts. No reasons could be better than these for urging on household franchise in the counties, and that great redistribution of seats which must immediately follow and complete this great reform.

The supposed difficulty as to the separation of the Household Franchise measure from the Redistribution measure on which the Conservatives rely to compel the introduction of a highly complex Bill, upon which they would hope to divide the Liberals themselves, is not in reality a difficulty at all. It is said that the House of Lords will be fully justified in throwing out the County Franchise Bill, unless it is accompanied by a sufficient redistribution of power to give the counties with their enlarged electorates their fair share in the State. But in the first place, it is quite certain that the Lords will find a justification somehow for doing what they want to do, and they would probably find it much more easily in the complete measure than in the preliminary measure. One thing is not denied,—that the country has expressly voted its determination that the counties shall have household suffrage. If the Lords repudiate the reform on which the last general election turned, they will do that of which even the most Conservative of their own members will gravely question the wisdom. The country has not decided on the details of any scheme of redistribution, and it is every way more constitutional to give the House of Lords an opportunity of conceding, with a good grace, what the country has determined on, than it is to handicap that concession with a number of details never sanctioned by the electorate. But further, it is childish to suppose that the Liberals can propose any scheme of redistribution of which the Lords could fairly complain that it does not give enough weight to the population and wealth of the counties. The Liberals would certainly never allow themselves to be “hoist with their own petard,” and that would be the result of their proposing a scheme of redistribution which had any tendency to cheat the county populations of their due.

On the mere question of procedure, Mr. John Morley is obviously quite right in calling it absurd to assume that the passing of a County Franchise Bill necessarily involves an immediate dissolution. On the contrary, it was not found possible to dissolve after passing the Household Franchise Bill of 1867. It was necessary to decide on the boundaries of the new constituencies, and to complete the new Registers, before a dissolution was possible; and so the Session of 1867 was followed by that of 1868, in which the measure of the previous year was completed. That is a final answer to the assertion that the passing of a County Franchise Bill would involve the dissolution of Parliament in its fifth Session. On the contrary, it would imply, and necessarily imply, its continuance to a sixth session at least, and the sixth session is usually, and in general quite rightly, the last. But a sixth session would leave room for the proper discussion of a Redistribution Bill, whether that Bill were—as it probably would be—rejected by the House of Lords and so submitted to the decision of the people, or passed into law. The Leeds Conference has performed a very great political service to the country, and performed it at the right time. When the Cabinet meets, there will be no room for hesitation as to the first work to be done.

THE EVACUATION OF EGYPT.

IT is known that the Government intend to reduce the British garrison in Egypt to 3,000 men, and suspected that even this remainder will in January or February be withdrawn. There is consequently an outburst of writing on the subject, much of it so vague and some of it so absurd that it may be well to state concisely the arguments for and against evacuation. As our readers know, we are earnestly opposed to that grave step; but nothing is ever gained by unjust denunciation.

In the first place, then, the Government are right in reducing the garrison. It is not right to burden the Egyptian Treasury more than can be helped, and the 3,000 men withdrawn will be just as available—so long as we hold Alexandria—at Malta or Gibraltar, as in Egypt itself. The Egyptians, moreover, whether friendly or hostile, are not political idiots, and will no more fire upon the remaining three thousand British soldiers than upon thirty thousand. They know quite enough of European politics to be aware that if they do fire, England must conquer them, or cease to be a Power, and they will run no risk of the kind. Moreover, they would not have any certainty of even momentary success, for the three thousand Englishmen, holding the fortresses as they do, could beat the six thousand newly-disciplined Egyptians, and lay Cairo and Alexandria in ashes besides, without any extraordinary effort. No such risk will be run, and it is, therefore, only the expediency of total evacuation, and not of any reasonable reduction in the garrison, which has to be considered. The Government, it is known, wishes for total evacuation, even if it has not decided upon it; and its arguments run, we apprehend, very much in this way:—“As we do not intend to annex, and indeed stand pledged that this descent shall not involve annexation, evacuation is only a question of time, and the argument for shortening the time is very strong. So long as we stay, the diplomatists of the Continent, who are accustomed to see occupation changed into acquisition—as in Bosnia—will not believe that the British Government is sincere, and will act in all questions in which that Government is concerned upon a misleading fallacy. The French do this already, and it is by no means certain that the Russians do not agree with the French; while all Powers consider England as, to a certain extent, locked up in Egypt. By staying, therefore, we risk complications with these Powers and with the Sultan, which may become serious, and which, as we do not intend to annex, are needless additions to existing difficulties.” Precisely the same argument affects the home position of the Government. The Ministry feels itself suspected by a body of supporters while it stays in Egypt, and as it does not intend to annex, regards this suspicion as a needless source of Parliamentary weakness. Speedy departure is, therefore, expedient; and it is considered safe, for these reasons. The Khedives have always been able to govern Egypt without Europeans, and when we go, Tewfik Khedive will be in a position better, on the whole, than that of any predecessor. Instead of a dangerous army, purely native, and liable to be directed against him by its officers, he will have a Sepoy Army, controlled by officers who cannot mutiny, regularly paid, excellently disciplined, and quite sufficient to deal with local émeutes, either in Cairo or Alexandria. He has excellent English advisers, and every reason to attend to their advice. He can, therefore, go on governing as before the outbreak; and it is better he should, so that he may feel his full responsibilities, and that his subjects may not suspect all future reforms to be the result of foreign pressure. Ceteris paribus, independence is always best, and if the Khedive can walk alone, he should do it; while his capacity to do it can only be tested by experiment, and is likely to be greater now, while the recollection of the British descent is fresh, than later, when it has partially died away.

That is, we conceive, a fair statement of the argument, and it is undeniably strong, though on two points—essential points—it fails to convince ourselves. We admit that annexation, as a consequence of this descent, is out of the question. We might not forfeit our honour, for Europe might give us a new commission; but we should seem to do so, we should be held by every Frenchman and Italian to have done so, and we should set a very dangerous precedent. We also admit that if the Khedive can govern by himself, it is best that he should do so, and that he will never be fairly tested till the Redcoats have disappeared. But we do not believe either that he will govern in such a way as to redeem our pledges to the people, or that he can govern so as to maintain endurable order. The difference between total evacuation and a reduced garrison makes, to Egyptian imaginations, the whole difference in the position. While the British Flag flies over the Citadel of Cairo, even though guarded only by a regiment, the Egyptians consider England, to them the mightiest Power in the world, in possession of Egypt; but the moment that flag is hauled down, they will think she has departed. As they cannot conceive that any Power, once in possession of their grand Valley, would retire voluntarily, they will believe that European complications have produced the withdrawal, and that they are again distant subjects of the Sultan only. The upper classes will recommence the old misgovernment, the villagers will look round for a deliverer from their usurers, the mobs of the cities will prepare to glut their hatred of the European adventurers—greatly intensified of late by blood-feuds—and the Army will expel its European officers. In other words, there will be an attempt at massacre, which the new Army will be either unable or unwilling to put down. Sir Evelyn Wood doubts this, evidently believing that the gentle justice of the European officer has won over the conscripts; and if he is right, the Government may be right so far as the apprehension of massacre is concerned, though they cannot be right in disregarding their own pledges to the people. But we fear he is wrong. No European resident in Cairo or Alexandria doubts that the mobs will attack the European adventurers, if they dare, and to restrain them the only bond will be the regard of the new soldiery for their European leaders. Can we trust that regard? Sir Evelyn Wood says “Yes,” for since the occupation no corporal punishment has been administered in the Egyptian Army; but corporal punishment had been abolished in the Sepoy Army of India before the Mutiny, the Sepoy officers in some of the worst regiments loved and petted the men who murdered them; and they had, moreover, led them for a century to victory, which the Anglo-Egyptian officers have not yet done. The dislike of the Asiatic for the European, which is almost instinctive and has a thousand justifications in his own eyes, is not extinguishable by mere lenity, and the Egyptian Sepoy Army will be no more trustworthy without the visible presence of white soldiers than the equally well-treated Sepoy Army of India would be. The Egyptians, indeed, will be less trustworthy, for the Indian Sepoys are volunteers to a man, free to depart at a month’s notice; while the Egyptian Sepoys are conscripts, often brought to Cairo in chains—they were so brought within the month—and not free to depart till years of service have been fulfilled. We expect, therefore, as the result of evacuation, sanguinary anarchy in Egypt, with all its results, of which one at least is absolutely inevitable. If we do not restore order instantly, finally, and with the strong hand, France or Italy will; and neither Power is, like us, self-denying. We hold evacuation, therefore, under existing circumstances, to be an error of which we shall bitterly repent.

WE really cannot be at the trouble of affecting to doubt that “Disintegration,” the political paper in the Quarterly Review, is by Lord Salisbury himself. If internal evidence is worth anything, he either wrote or dictated it, and was at the time in his best literary form, full of internal scorn, brimming over with flouting epigram, and inclined to say his say as he wanted to say it, without spoiling his work through dread of consequences. “Disintegration” is, consequently, delightful reading. It is not exactly a speech by Coriolanus, for the writer admits that if you could get the opinion of the nation—which, he holds, we never do—that would be the natural arbitrating force; but it is an essay by a brilliant and rather cynical noble, who considers that progress is mainly a phrase, and that “the Wandering Jew was undoubtedly the most remarkable and most consistent devotee of progress that the mind can contemplate;” who does not believe that the changes effected in England during the century are at all necessarily good, and holds that the results of those in Ireland are altogether bad; and who thinks that the mixed Monarchy has been transmuted into Government by the House of Commons, and expects the House to favour disintegration, both in the Empire and in Society. It is the work of a noble who is a bit of a fatalist, and does not think things can be altered; and of one, too, who is by no means a typical Englishman,—who looks abroad for examples, and is very much inclined to believe that things being as they are, American institutions are very much safer than those of his own country. They have a true Second Chamber there which dare act—a curious little aperçu into the writer's mind which should not be forgotten—a President who dare Veto, a Supreme Court which can arrest any legislation infringing the obligation of a contract. And finally, "Disintegration" is the work of a man who to the very depths of his soul hates a Whig, that is, a noble "who for his many sins in past generations is condemned in the present to the political torment of constantly voting against his principles for measures he detests, in order to support a Ministry he distrusts." The denunciation is made more general in form, but it is of Russell and Cavendish, Gower and Campbell, that Lord Salisbury is thinking, when he speaks of men who are born Whigs, and "inherit with their opinions a liability to be compelled to change them" whenever Radicals choose. His contempt for them is unbounded, and is intensified by an evident feeling—peculiar, we suspect, to heads of Houses—that if only the handful of Whigs would join the Tories, the flood-tide of Democracy might be kept out.

It is pleasant to read such things, stated in such a way, as pleasant as eating pickled olives; and we have always maintained that such things should, when they are felt, be said. Everybody does not believe in progress, any more than everybody believes it good to love your enemy, and there must be thousands still who think in their hearts that the object of Constitutions is to restrain the people from frankly governing themselves. Discussion becomes more real when those who think thus speak out, especially when they speak out well, and we are none of us the worse for being compelled to consider now and again whether we are not mistaking general ideas for established truths. For the same reason that we would not abuse those who in restrained language deny a Creator, we would not scold at those who prefer oligarchy as a form of government; and as we can bear to discuss the foundation of tolerance, so we can read without anger an attack on Catholic Emancipation. But the appreciation, we confess, comes only from the intellectual side. As politicians, we can find no good in this paper, and cannot even see clearly what Lord Salisbury thinks he is driving at. He is not going, we suppose, to propose the abolition of the Monarchy in favour of an Elected Magistrate with a veto, or the supersession of the Lords by a strong Senate, or any definite limitation on the power of the House of Commons to overturn a Ministry; and what is it that, failing these things, he would like the English people to do? He does not even hint that we might reverse the Irish legislation of the century, and though he does hint, not obscurely, that he dislikes county self-government in Ireland, he cannot be pouring out his bitter general propositions merely to resist that measure. He must desire something, and what is it? Apparently only that the English people shall be as sensible and moderate as they can, and that "the House of Commons should return to the better spirit of its earlier traditions." Well, we can endorse that prayer, but we feel in endorsing it that it is meaningless, and that Lord Salisbury in writing it either hardly knows what he wants, or conceals his secret wish. That, in fact, is the permanent evil of his position, and of that of all the High Tories, who at heart believe government by the people to be government by the disqualified. They know they cannot resist, and the sense of powerlessness, combined with dislike, gives their minds the sterility so often perceptible in the minds of exiles, who, as a rule, like Lord Salisbury, can denounce, and satirise, and flout, but can suggest no way by which their country may escape from the impasse it has entered.

We have not the patience, at this time of day, to discuss the question whether Ireland has or has not been made less manageable by the legislation of the last hundred years. We do not believe it, for amidst all our assumed or real failures we have achieved one genuine success. We have extinguished the possibility of insurrection. Lord Castlereagh could not affirm that truth more candidly than Mr. Parnell or Mr. Sexton, and it hardly needs any affirmation. If sixty Irreconcilables are returned by Ireland, the Funds will not fall by one-sixteenth, and the Stock of the Bank of Ireland will remain at its present exorbitant price. That is an enormous change in England's favour, and considering what Civil War is, when the war involves a conflict of creeds and races, may be held to outweigh every other loss. But if we grant that Ireland is less manageable, the concession amounts to nothing, for the object of granting Emancipation, legislative equality, and tenant-right was not merely conciliation, but the cleansing of our own consciences of violent wrong. We must have emancipated, and granted suffrages, and stopped the punishment of tenants for making improvements, if we had known beforehand all that was to happen. When the nation had once awoke, it could not keep up Penal Laws merely because they were useful, any more than it could keep up slavery merely because it gave us sugar. Nor is there much more use in considering whether Irish hatred is incurable or otherwise. If it is not, we are taking all the means we can to cure it; and if it is, we must still take the same means, and endure the resulting failure as we best may. It is more profitable, or at least more interesting, to discuss whether, as time goes on, we shall have many Lords Salisbury; men who, with every gift alike of nature and of fortune, are still so utterly alienated in opinion from their countrymen, that their true activity must lie in the region either of criticism, or of denunciation, or of flouts; men in whom culture only deepens scorn, and mental power only lends sting to depreciatory epigrams. It would be a great misfortune if it were so, and all analogy is in favour of the development of such a class. There is a whole Faubourg of such men in France; in Spain, the old nobles all belong to it; and in America, such men—sweetened, though, by some peculiarity in the local atmosphere—are said to exist in entire groups. We see some signs of the phenomenon too, in Germany, though the universal devotion to military service conceals the change in part from the observer. Analogy, however, often fails when applied to England, which is insular in its ways, and for the most part owned by men with few intellectual interests, and we can produce two arguments from "Disintegration" against this fear. These Whigs against whom Lord Salisbury is so savage, these heads of great Houses who so hate and obey Mr. Gladstone that "their solution of their difficulties is a combination of public loyalty with private imprecation," are the very men who ought to withdraw from public life; and whether actuated by love of country, or impelled, as the essayist hints, by greed of office, they are not only always in front, but sometimes in the way. If they sulk, it is not in their tents, but in the Treasury; and if they fall to criticism, it is of men who will not pass their Bills. If there is a Whig in the world, it is Lord Hartington, and he has been something in a Department almost since he was a man. Our Faubourg certainly does not retreat from politics, while our millionaires take little offices in the great establishment. And for a further proof, this lament, this dirge over our degeneracy, this uplifting of the voice as of one who sees a great woe approaching, comes from a man whose first wish is that, amidst this shattered Constitution and these decaying institutions, this Democratic House of Commons, which has departed so far from the purity of old traditions, would just elect him Premier. He would work for that end sixteen hours a day, and endure with a tranquil mind the slow march of the Empire towards disintegration. There is little fear of any general retreat from politics while men in Lord Salisbury's position, and with Lord Salisbury's disgusts, yet feel that life is flavourless unless they are in the race. Rome would not have lost Coriolanus, if Coriolanus could only have breathed in Rome.

M. FERRY'S NEW POSITION.

THE old difficulty of France, the tendency of her parties to form camps as hostile to each other as if they belonged to separate nationalities, is evidently not overcome. The Irreconcilables, or Extreme Left, to whom so much has recently been conceded, have broken away again, and are denouncing a Government of Advanced Liberals in a way which in other times would portend an insurrection in Paris, and perhaps a march of the populace upon the Assembly. Their immediate pretext is the dismissal of General Thibaudin and the apology made to Spain, which they consider concessions to "Orleanist" demands—that is, to the feeling of the upper class—but there is little doubt that these are only pretexts. The revolt began before King Alfonso arrived. The irritation of the Extremists has been increasing for some time, and no concession has even partially soothed it away. The attacks on the Church, the Secular Education Act, the suppression of Jesuit establishments, the purgation of the Bench in the Radical interest, even the appointment of General Thibaudin to the Ministry of War, have made no difference, and they declare M. Jules Ferry, who assents to all these things, to be "no better than a monarchist." The Government, they assert, is a Republic only in name, the march of Democracy is arrested, and radical changes must be made before the present régime can even claim the cordial support of "the people." What they precisely want, we confess ourselves unable, after studying them for years, to define with clearness, nor do we believe that they exactly know themselves. They say they want more equality, the suppression of Established Churches, a progressive income-tax, elective Judges, and the reduction of the Army to a voluntary defensive force; but these immense changes would not content them, without provisions for the prevention of distress of a distinctly Socialist kind. Employment, to begin with, should be found for all. They are, in fact, impatient of authority altogether, and in the judgment of the Cabinet, which, be it remembered, would be considered in England ultra-Radical, their impatience has reached a height at which further concession would be dangerous. M. Ferry, therefore, in two speeches, delivered at Rouen and Havre, has declared war on the Extremists, has repeated the old phrase that "Order must be maintained,"—which in France always conveys a latent threat—has rejected compromise in advance as a "bastard combination," and has called upon the whole country, in tones which almost portend a dissolution, to choose, and choose finally, between the Government and the Extremists. There is no mistaking the meaning of words as grave as these:—"Henceforth, the flags are unfurled, and nobody need deceive himself as to their colours. People must choose between the Governmental policy, which I have just defined as that followed by the Cabinet, with the co-operation of the Chambers, and the Extremist policy. All who care for the future of their country must make their choice. There is no middle course possible; any bastard combination is out of the question, for it would merely have the semblance, the varnish of a regular Government, but at bottom would be Extremist. What serious politician would lend himself to such a policy, or fancy himself master of the citadel after having handed over all the approaches?" The Extremists have accepted the challenge, and the next session will, it is believed, be one of determined battle between the Ministry and the representatives of ultra-Red ideas, infuriated by what they consider an apostasy.

There can be little doubt that M. Ferry will win, but his position will be one of extreme perplexity. In his main ideas, the necessity of advancing slowly, of maintaining order, and of rejecting all outrageous demands, such as the immediate confiscation of all Church property, the appointment of elective Judges, or the dissolution of the Army, the Premier will assuredly be supported by a large majority of the Deputies. France is Left Centre, as a whole, and, in spite of the anti-Clerical wave of opinion which recently passed over her, it is certain that she does not desire radical changes, the suppression of the Church, or any diminution in the means of national defence. She will support any Government which is at once firm and progressive, and will wait patiently for the social reforms, such as some kind of Poor Law, still admitted to be required. If the populace of the cities rise, the peasantry will allow of their suppression by force, and the Army would not permit any attack on the Constitution by open violence. Nor will there be any reluctance to accept M. Ferry as the mouthpiece of the party of order and moderation. He has said some rash things in his time, but he is a convinced Republican, he is entirely without Clerical bias, and he fairly understands the peasantry who send him up to the Chamber. He might, on his domestic policy alone, form a commanding and, perhaps, long-lived party, but still there are serious dangers in his way. He may prove unexpectedly obstinate about the "Forward" Colonial policy, which he inherited from M. Gambetta, which he thinks essential to the declining trade of France, which he has so far defended against the President, who is strongly against expeditions, and which the country at large views with no favour. He has rid himself of the Shaw difficulty by a wise concession, but he has still the conquest of Tonquin and Madagascar on his hands, and it is still doubtful if he will agree to any kind of retreat. It is difficult to believe that he would risk power, of which he is very desirous, and the policy of which he speaks so earnestly, in order to pursue dreamy and dangerous schemes of conquest in Indo-China; but he may feel inclined to do battle at all points, and if he does, his majority will very soon desert him. The people of France are not prepared for war with China, and still less for its necessary cost; and if M. Ferry stands by his foreign policy, he will be suddenly overturned. The peace party and the Extremists will vote together, and the Right cannot vote for M. Jules Ferry. We do not rate this risk high, for M. Ferry will, we believe, obey the Chamber, but still it exists. Then, again, he will have to face the temptation of every man in his position, that of becoming gradually too repressive. Hardly any moderate Minister in France has been able to avoid this danger. The Extremists are very irritating, more irritating than in this country we quite understand; they are fond of threatening violence, and they control the whole body of the distressed in the great cities. They can cause partial or serious émeutes, and though émeutes may be suppressed without difficulty, it is part of the history of France that the Minister who suppresses them thenceforward relies mainly on force, and ultimately falls.

Nevertheless, taking short views, as Sir Cornwall Lewis and Lord Elgin advised, we believe that the Irreconcilables have made a grave mistake, and have solidified the Moderate party for a time. M. Ferry's declarations, which are almost too grave for the occasion, were most cordially received, both at Rouen and Havre; and though the Normans are in some respects separate, they represent, with great accuracy, the feeling of Republican Conservatism. That feeling is greatly intensified by the dislike of Paris, a dislike which never dies among the peasantry, and by the dread of foreign complications arising from the threats of the Irreconcilables. The latter could hardly have chosen more unsafe ground for their pronouncement, or ground upon which they will obtain so little general support. Nor could they have selected a worse time. The Deputies have been for weeks apart from the influences of Paris, have been living more or less among their constituencies, and have felt the force of that desire for quiet which all travellers tell us is just now dominating the French peasantry. Outside the towns, there are no electors anxious for war, or excessive change, or riot in the streets, and M. Ferry will have the full benefit of the desire for tranquillity. The benefit will be all the greater if, as is believed, he is prepared for a dissolution, for the Deputies at such times are as responsive to any general wish as if they had no opinions. Before our next issue, in fact, M. Ferry will have come in contact with actual France; and France, unless we mistake her, has no desire for commotion, and doubts the Premier only because in his foreign policy he is not so desirous of peace with order as in his internal administration.

MR. BRIGHT AT LEEDS.

MR. BRIGHT must, we think, have felt something like amusement, when he found himself actually pleading for moderation against more thorough-going Radicals, and declaring himself unable to accept in any way even the term "Radical" as a description of his own political convictions. We had always supposed that a Radical only means a Liberal who wishes to eradicate, and not merely to lop or trim, the evils with which he is asked to deal; and in that sense we had always heartily accepted for ourselves the epithet "radical," and had even excused our want of sympathy with such expedients as the Ballot, for instance, on the ground that the Ballot affords a mere palliation of an evil, the only Radical cure for which is political courage and political principle. But be the term "Radical" good or bad, it must have been with some amusement that Mr. Bright found himself obliged to discriminate his views from those of the Ultras of his party on the ground that he wishes for moderation, while they wish for something which he regards as extreme. During the last Reform agitation, Mr. Bright was spoken of as the one fire-brand who desired to set the working-class against the educated class; whereas he now appears to think that he is looked upon as retrograde and even benighted in his views, by those who claim for themselves the Radical name. This is a very curious instance of the whirligig of time bringing about its revenges. Nevertheless, we are not surprised to find Mr. Bright looking with a certain wonder, and perhaps even shrinking, at some of the ultra-Liberal proposals of his time, and describing his own feeling as comparatively Conservative in relation to these proposals. It is quite true that what got him the reputation of being an extreme politician was much more the power and passion with which he urged his own views, than the special character of those views; it was the scorn which he poured on his Tory opponents, not the position which he took up, that gave people their impression of his political dangerousness and his revolutionary ardour. He was full of wrath at those who opposed him, and full of contempt for their fears; but on the positive side of his creed he was never disposed to play with fire at all, rather to restrain anxiously all those who showed any such disposition. People inferred, from the passion with which he pleaded what he thought the cause of justice, that he would sweep away much more than he ever desired to sweep away. But in reality, he never wished to sweep away more than the resistance which he encountered. There has been a real Conservatism in all the remedies for popular evils which he has advocated,—a healthy disposition to get rid of grievances without needlessly trampling on the associations of the past. His proposal to abolish the compulsory Church-rate, but to leave the form of a Church-rate untouched for all who like to pay a voluntary Church-rate, was a good example of this. And a still better one is the proposal with which he concluded his Leeds speech,—namely, to let the House of Lords reject a measure once, but not to let it reject the same measure when sent up again from the House of Commons. There is a good deal of difficulty, we think, about that solution of the matter, both on account of its cumbrousness, and on account of its tendency to lower the self-respect and the intellectual calibre of the House of Lords. But no one can deny that it is of the nature of a Conservative remedy, inasmuch as it aims at leaving our political institutions without any superficial alteration, and keeping their external appearance at least just what they are.

The same Conservatism, we think, appears in Mr. Bright's attack on the principle of Minority representation. We entirely agree with him that the mode in which that principle has been applied to the representation of our great towns is extremely inconvenient; and further, that there is real injustice in insulated applications of experiments of this kind, the effect of which is to give a more accurate representation of the particular condition of opinion in the places to which it is applied, but to distort more seriously than ever the expression of the opinion of the country at large. Of course, if you give the party which is in the minority in Liverpool and Manchester a voice in Parliament, though you thereby give a truer idea of the condition of opinion in Liverpool and Manchester, you give a much falsier idea of the condition of opinion in the country at large, because the party which is in the majority in large places is often in the minority in small places, but yet is not in those places accorded any voice at all. Make as accurate a picture as you can of the political wishes of one or two spots on the surface of a country, and at the same time a very rough, inaccurate picture of the vast remainder, and you will find, in all probability, that the accuracy of the representation of the opinions of these few spots has rendered the picture of the whole much less accurate, instead of more so. If you represent both majority and minority in one place, but only the majority in twenty other places, it is almost sure to turn out that by so greatly diminishing the political influence of the majority in the first place, you have also diminished its just and total influence in the country at large. For the chances certainly are that the views which command a great majority in the large cities will be very prevalent also in the twenty smaller constituencies, though they are accorded no voice there at all. If you adopt a rough system of representation, you should adopt it uniformly; if you adopt an accurate system, you should adopt it uniformly. By being rough here and accurate there, you do much more injustice to the total result than you would by keeping to the same principle everywhere. We, therefore, agree with Mr. Bright that the present mode of representing a minority ought either to disappear, or to be universally applied; and as, from its inconvenience and the bad effect it has at by-elections, it certainly cannot be universally applied, it ought to disappear. None the less, we maintain that the object of those who first suggested the clause was a strictly and properly democratic object,—namely, to get a truer representation of actual opinion, and not a less true one. We believe that the same result might be obtained by a scheme which has, we believe, the sanction of Mr. Bright, as it had of Mr. Cobden,—namely, the subdivision of constituencies into wards returning but one Member each, so that the accidents of the distribution of opinion may, as far as possible, be neutralised by the number of the areas in which that opinion is consulted. By that means it is quite certain that the minority of one constituency will be the majority of another quite often enough to get its voice adequately heard,—at least, if it represents an opinion of sufficient reasonableness, earnestness, and force to convince a considerable number of sane and intelligent men. But we do hope, earnestly hope, that if in the next Reform Bill, Mr. Bright's advice is followed as to the discontinuance of the existing minority principle, its place will be taken by the adoption of his other suggestion,—that there should be a great subdivision of the larger constituencies into wards returning only one Member each. Without that safeguard, we might very easily find that the unrepresented minorities of a great portion of the kingdom were in possession of more general intelligence, more honest conviction, and more political shrewdness, than the represented majorities, which had it easily in their power to overbear all opposition.

THE POPULAR VETO IN SWITZERLAND.

CANTON Berne is revising its Constitution. Time was when the Constitution of a Swiss Canton had a semi-sacred character, and remained unaltered for centuries. But that time is past, and, except in the four or five States where the laws are still made by Landesgemeinden, a Constitution rarely outlasts a generation. On the other hand, revisions do not often lead to very profound changes, for local laws, to be valid, must strictly conform to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. The question at present most debated in Berne concerns the Referendum,—the right of the citizens to veto the Acts of their representatives. The history of the usage is both curious and interesting. Introduced nearly half a century ago by the Radical party as a democratic and essentially Swiss measure, and opposed by the Democrats as a dangerous innovation, it has since been adopted by every Canton of the Confederation save two. Swiss Radicals, it may be well to mention, are doctrinaire Jacobins of the French type; and the Democrats, whatever they once were, are now Liberals of the English type. Advocates of Parliamentary Government, they objected to the Referendum as incompatible with the independence of Local Legislatures, and on the ground that the masses, albeit fully competent to choose their representatives, were not always competent to form a correct judgment on matters of detail and complex questions of law and administration. They urged, further, that members, once elected, should be generously treated and allowed a wide discretion, and not degraded into mere mandatories, liable at any moment to have their most carefully conceived and laboriously executed measures vetoed by the people. But their great fear was that the adoption of the Referendum would open the door to all sorts of violent changes, that its tendency would be subversive and destructive, and so impair the influence of the State as to render government impossible and property insecure. A minor, yet still greater evil apprehended by the Democrats, as a consequence of the proposed change, was that the people, weary of perpetual voting, would end by losing all interest in the doings of their representatives and the affairs of the country, and become the tools of designing and unscrupulous politicians. The Radicals contended, on the other hand, that as the people were the source of power, so they were the fountain of wisdom, and that the only way of rendering them the true masters of their destinies was to submit to the general body of the citizens every measure proposed by their representatives. By this means alone could the popular sovereignty be efficiently exercised, and pure democracy, as it prevailed in the Waldstätten, extended to the whole of Switzerland. This view obtained acceptance in Berne, and the obligatory Referendum became a part of the Cantonal Constitution. All projects of law must be submitted to the people, after they have been discussed by the Legislature. In other Cantons, the Referendum is optional; the people are appealed to only when a demand to that effect is made by a certain number of citizens. The question in Berne is not so much whether the Referendum shall be retained or abolished, as whether it shall be obligatory or optional. Its working, except in one or two particulars, has confirmed the provisions of neither party, and so little realised the hopes of the Radicals, that if the system were less popular with the masses they would certainly propose its abolition; while the Democrats, without approving of it in principle, support it as the only check on the authoritative tendencies of their opponents, when the latter are in power, and they generally are in power.

So far as the character of the legislation and the influence of Government are concerned, the effect of the obligatory Referendum has been distinctly unfavourable. The people have come to look upon their Deputies as mere mandatories, charged with the preparation of measures which, until approved by the popular vote, can possess no validity. As a natural consequence, the position of Deputy is less valued and less sought, and the present generation of Deputies are inferior in character and social position, if not in ability, to their predecessors; there is more self-seeking among them, the functionaries they appoint are said to be less zealous, and too often less honest, than those of former Governments; several branches of the Administration, especially the Department of Finance, are less efficiently conducted, and have even been charged with favouritism and corruption. On the other hand, the people have shown unexpected wisdom and moderation, manifesting greater respect for prescription and tradition, and more solicitude for the interests of the country, as distinguished from those of party, than the Parliaments whom they have elected. In Federal, as in Cantonal matters, the electors have over and over again rejected innovations of which their representatives have approved, and they give no countenance whatever to the doctrinaire schemes of Socialist reformers. This is doubtless in part due to the wide diffusion of landed property among the Swiss people; but the fact that the constituencies display greater wisdom and more moderation than their legislators is none the less remarkable. It offers the best justification for the popular veto, and proves that the instincts of the masses, except when they are wild with want, or moved by some sudden gust of passion, are essentially Conservative.

The Radicals are so much disappointed with the working of the Referendum—it has answered so little to their expectations—that if they could they would abolish it utterly. But it has struck its roots so deeply that an open display of hostility would imperil their ascendancy; and though some of the leaders denounce it in set terms, the party wisely abstain from opposing an institution which they are powerless to crush. M. Carteret, the leader of the Geneva Radicals, stigmatises the Referendum as a “legislative phylloxera,” and affirms that although the people are capable of choosing their representatives, they are not capable of controlling their work. This amounts, in effect, to an adoption of the ancient Parliamentary principles of his political opponents. Democrats have equally changed front, and seeing from how many dangers the popular veto has preserved the commonwealth, and that, with votation de liste, it is the sole safeguard against the tyranny of an accidental majority, and the only check on hasty legislation, they have become the warmest friends of the system which they once condemned.

There is some difference of opinion as to whether the Referendum has rendered the electors less disposed to exercise their political rights. As a rule, the citizens who take part in elections do not exceed fifty per cent. of those entitled to vote. But as Switzers are called upon to vote, for something or another, at least a score of times every year, it is no wonder that there are many abstentions, and that when a project of law is offered for their acceptance only those whom it particularly affects give themselves the trouble to make their opinion effective. On important occasions, however, when the general interests of the Canton or the Confederation are at stake, the proportion of Swiss voters who go to the poll is as large as in any other country. The Bernese Radicals complain that Bills are not unfrequently vetoed to which no open opposition has been manifested, and against which no valid reason has been alleged,—and this they ascribe to a perverse tendency on the part of the people to reject measures merely because they emanate from the Government,—a strange theory to be enunciated by a party whose device is, Vox populi, vox Dei. The truth is, that the average Swiss citizen wants to let well alone, and is always indisposed to sanction schemes which he does not understand, or of which he does not see the necessity. On the whole, there can be little doubt that the working of the optional, as distinguished from the obligatory, Referendum has been satisfactory in Switzerland. So far as it is an evil, it is a necessary one; and it might be well if the system were adopted by at least one of Switzerland's neighbours. Nothing would impart so much stability to government in France as bestowing on the people, with all needful safeguards, the right of directly expressing their opinion on the doings of their representatives. If, for instance, the French Constitution forbade the Government to engage in any foreign military expedition whatever without the approval of the people, the Republic would have been spared all its present troubles; for out of Paris, there are probably not 10,000 voters who could be persuaded to approve either of the expedition to Madagascar or the war in Anam.

THE ELECTIONS OF THE FUTURE.

THE next Parliamentary Election will be held subject to the provisions of the “Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883,” which came into operation on the 15th of this month. What place will be the first to illustrate its workings is as yet hidden from the anxious gaze of whips and political associations. But wherever it be, the candidates and their agents are men who will deserve the highest commiseration. The task of conducting an election will be found as difficult as Mr. Tennyson found that of writing in hendecasyllabics, requiring him to be “careful of motion, like the skater on ice that hardly bears him.” But as the accuracy of Mr. Tennyson's ear guided him safely through the mazes of the fantastical and dainty metre, so the candidate who relies on the uprightness of his own conduct, and absolutely repudiates any attempt to win his election by the length of his purse, or of his agent's experience, may see himself successfully through the pitfalls of an election. There is no doubt, however, that to do so he must cast to the winds all notions of conducting his election on the old lines, under the influence of the old ideas, and by the aid of the old instruments. No longer can there be any contest between the rival parties to forestall each other in the acquisition of public-houses for committee-rooms, or in the employment of all the flies, and cabs, and donkey-carts in the town for the conveyance of voters to the poll. Already the candidates' money may not be used in decorating the persons of their supporters with ribbons, or in deafening the ears of their adversaries with brass bands; now, it may no longer be expended in dazzling their eyes with torches. The pomp and panoply of war will soon disappear from election struggles, and their absence may possibly make them even a little dull; but if only the metaphors drawn from war in election speeches would disappear too, on the balance there would, perhaps, be a diminution in dullness. Nor will the loafers of a town be able to look forward to an election as to a harvest of industrious idleness. The crowds of clerks who wrote nothing, and of messengers who never carried messages except from one public-house to another, the watchers who got five shillings a day for looking at the watchers on the other side, the amateur bill-poster who received half-a-crown for putting a bill up and another half-crown for preventing its being torn down by guarding it—from the genial shelter of the nearest beershop, all these attendant shadows will have to disappear. They will not be able to stand the chilling blasts of the new Act.

It is not so much the wider definitions given to corrupt practices, the heavier penalties imposed on those who are guilty of them, and the extension of the classes of persons who can be guilty of them, which are likely to prove the most effective provisions in the Act. They, no doubt, will have their effect. The extension of the offence of “treating” so as to hit all treaters, and not merely the candidate or his agent, and to hit also the person treated, is likely to diminish considerably, if it does not altogether stop the flow of beer and the consumption of beef which used to be such a marked feature of an election. The increase of the penalties for corrupt and illegal practices is also likely to make people shrink more than they have hitherto done from indulging in them. But an increase in the chances of punishment for an offence is more deterrent than an increase in the penalty. The presence of the Director of Public Prosecutions or his assistant at the trial of every election petition, with power, either proprio motu or by direction of the Court, to call witnesses and prosecute there and then any suspected person for an offence under the Act, is likely to cause an Election Court to be regarded as less like a music hall, and more like a Criminal Court, than it has been hitherto. The fear that a man will find himself playing a principal part in a low tragedy, in which the catastrophe consists in being himself hauled off to prison, is more likely to be deterrent than the prospect merely of figuring at the expense of other people as the light walking gentleman in a low comedy.

But stringent provisions against the commission of offences and stringent penalties and methods of detection have failed before, and may fail again. The provisions of the new Act which are likely to cause a real revolution in the conduct of elections are those directly and indirectly aimed at limiting expenses. The schedules to the Act are, as often happens, the most important part of it. When in boroughs, only one election agent, one polling agent in each polling station, and one clerk and one messenger and one committee-room, for every 500 electors may be employed, the candidate cannot, even if he would, corrupt a whole town by bribery disguised under the form of payment for services rendered. When, further, the total expenses are limited to £350, and an additional £30 for every 1,000 electors above 2,000, it is impossible, except in the very smallest boroughs, for mere length of purse to carry the day. Nor can the limit set be easily or safely overpassed, as the candidate has to verify by declaration his agent's statement as to how much his expenses come to, and no payment may be made on their account except through an agent. If any such payments are made, if the maximum is exceeded, the election is void; and if the declaration is false, not only is the election void, but the candidate renders himself liable to seven years' penal servitude for perjury. Nor will it be easy for the candidate's supporters to spend the money he cannot spend himself. Paying for the conveyance of voters to the poll in any way is an illegal payment, and by whomsoever made is an illegal practice, and subjects payer and payee to a fine of £100. Payments for exhibiting bills made to any one who is not a regular advertising agent; payment for committee-rooms in excess of the authorised number, and payment of election expenses except through the election agent, have the same effect. Not only is the individual liable, but he invalidates the election as well. Nor is this all. Lending conveyances usually let for hire to convey voters to the poll, paying for bands, ribbons, torches, and banners, employment of persons in any way connected with the election otherwise than as authorised by the Act, subject the person offending to £100 fine, as for an illegal payment or employment, though the election is not thereby invalidated. No individual, however zealous, would venture to brave the penalty, when any of the other side could thus attack him in perfect safety, without the danger of an election petition and wholesale disclosures. The result is that it is almost impossible for the limits of expenditure laid down by the Act to be exceeded. Instead, therefore, of the next general election causing the waste of several millions of money, it ought hardly to cause the expenditure of as many hundred thousands. Instead of voters being polled at the price of a pound or two pounds per head, they ought to be polled for as many crowns. In the city of Winchester, for example, the ancient capital of England, the senior Member was returned in 1880 by something under a thousand votes, and his returned expenses exceeded £1,600. Under the present Act, they cannot exceed £350, or nearly one-fifth. In the counties, the change will be even greater. The free conveyance of out-voters—that ruinous source of expenditure—is stopped, and the total expenditure ought not to be a quarter of what it has been.

But the greatest and most beneficial result of all is that henceforth the candidate must rely upon his own personal position and energy, or the voluntary services of others, for his success. As canvassers are not included amongst the persons who may be employed for payment, it follows that they are excluded. Neither the candidate nor any one else may employ paid canvassers. Canvassing, therefore, if it is to be done at all, must be done wholly by the voluntary efforts of unpaid canvassers. But if the would-be constituents work for the candidate for nothing, it is quite certain that they will assume a greater share than they have hitherto enjoyed in the selection of candidates, and in the control of their conduct when elected. They will no longer tolerate the Member who goes into Parliament as a supporter of a party against whose leaders he persistently votes, when he has got there, trusting to the fears of "dividing the party" for his acceptance by the party at the next election. It was a black day for the political black-sheep when the Corrupt Practices Act was passed. But the voluntary system has its dangers as well as its benefits. It is probable that every member of the Association which is now formed in every enlightened constituency would become an authorised agent of the candidate. If the Association pays for the preparation of canvass-books, &c., independently of the candidate, it seems that those doing so would be guilty of an illegal practice. If they pay or return their payments through the election agent, they constitute themselves agents; their irregular acts, if by ignorance or zeal they committed any, would affect the election. It is true that a kind of "equity" clause is inserted, which enables the Election Court to disregard a trivial breach of the law by an agent, when the candidate and his election agent are themselves free from guilt, and took all reasonable means to prevent it in others; or even an important breach, when it was due to ignorance or inadvertence. But this clause may too probably rather take effect in making the sword of Justice uncertain in its stroke on the guilty, than in affording a certain shield for the innocent. It is probable, therefore, that the work of party organisations will be confined to getting and keeping the party together in non-election times, and the choice of candidates, rather than to helping candidates by canvassing in an election. The tendency will be, and indeed it ought to be, for candidates to look rather to speeches at public meetings and addresses in the Press, than to any system of canvassing. They will have to rely for winning the seat not on any craftily-organised system of begging or bribing voters, but on the real enthusiasm of the party for the principles they profess, and on their own enthusiasm and power in advocating them.

MATTHEW ARNOLD IN THE UNITED STATES.

WHETHER Mr. Arnold proves or does not prove the subject of intense interest in the United States, we have probably never lent to the United States any man of genius who is more likely at once to excite and to tantalise the intelligent curiosity with which he must be regarded. It is not that the phase of culture which Matthew Arnold represents is at all specially rare in the United States. In Massachusetts at least, Mr. Clough,—Matthew Arnold's intimate friend and brother-poet,—found himself almost more at home than even in the Old Country. And Matthew Arnold himself, who was swift to appreciate the genius of Emerson, to whom indeed one of his own earliest sonnets was written, has shown in all his writings that perfect lucidity and serenity, that desire to gaze wistfully into the future, while discriminating all the beauty of the past, that subtle love of irony, and that freedom from anything like undue deference to authority, which may be said to distinguish especially the highest culture of New England. Nevertheless, we believe that Matthew Arnold will pique and tantalise the curiosity which he must excite as few Englishmen have ever piqued and tantalised it before. For he will present to those who crowd to hear him the singular spectacle of a genius formed entirely by the old world, and richly endowed with the power of writing the most lucid and graphic epitaphs on some of the greatest epochs of the old world,—on the wisdom of Greece,—on the meditative rapture of the East,—on the piety of Roman Stoicism,—on the vision of the Cross,—on mediæval asceticism,—on Goethe's calm, self-centred insight,—on the despair of unbelief,—and on the ardour of revolutionary hope,—who is nevertheless prepared to face the future quite undismayed, and that with no better weapon, as it seems to us, than that of the dignity of manner which the memory of the great past inspires. Emerson at least believed in democracy, believed in the new institutions, believed in the growing power of man. His calm confidence was derived from some transcendental faith in the power of the multiplying millions to manifest more adequately, as they multiplied, the transcendental divinity of his semi-panteistic faith. Matthew Arnold, so far as we can see, has no such superstition. The more numerous are the hosts of the Philistines, the less he hopes from them. They do not dismay him, he is too robust in the triple brass of his culture for that, but he defies them. "Dii me terrent," he says, "et Jupiter hostis." But he has little hope in the masses.

"Not here, O Apollo!
Are haunts meet for thee,
But where Helicon breaks down
In cliffs to the sea," will be his feeling, as he looks at the mighty volume of human energy which will meet him in the United States. Democracy has never inspired him with any enthusiasm, and republican institutions will probably win from him no cry of admiration. Emancipated man, while he remains, as he probably always will remain, for the most part uncultivated man,—man with the instinct of self-preservation and self-assertion still unrefined within him,—elicits no brilliant angury of hope from Matthew Arnold. And yet, while Mr. Arnold has no prophecy inspired by political Utopianism to utter, he obtains nothing from his exquisite insight into the past on which he can rely to mould the world of the future, except only what is, of all things, least likely to mould it, that tradition of antique stateliness and dignity which the past has bequeathed to us. He will praise to the busy Yankees, Sophocles,—

"Whose even-balanced soul,
From first youth tested up to extreme old age,
Business could not make dull, nor passion wild;
Who saw life steadily and saw it whole,
The mellow glory of the Attic Stage,
Singer of sweet Colonus and his child."

He will praise Goethe to them, and tell them that,— — "he pursued a lonely road,

His eyes on Nature's plan;
Neither made man too much a God,
Nor God too much a man."

He will praise Wordsworth, of whom he has told us,—

"He found us when the age had bound
Our souls in its benumbing round;
He spoke and loosed our hearts in tears,
He laid us, as we lay at birth."

On the cool, flowering lap of earth;
Smiles broke from us, and we had ease;
The hills were o'er us, and the breeze
Went o'er the sunlit fields again;
Our foreheads felt the wind and rain,
Our youth return'd, for there was shed
On spirits that had long been dead,
Spirits dried up and closely furi'd,
The freshness of the early world."

But he has no secret for restoring to us the even balance of Sophocles, or the commanding intelligence of Goethe, or the fresh insight of Wordsworth. He can revivify for us the stately humility of the East, and the grand imperiousness of Rome, and the cloistered sanctity of the middle-ages; but he has no spell,—he believes in no spell,—for the reanimation of a past world. Ask him of his hopes, and you find that they consist chiefly in borrowing dignity from the past, without borrowing the creeds on which that dignity was fed. This is the burden of his song:—

"Your creeds are dead, your rites are dead,
Your social order, too!
Where tarries he, the Power who said,— "See, I make all things new?"

And he cannot answer his own question except by vainly invoking joy from unknown and unknowable sources:—

"What still of strength is left, employ,
This end to help attain:
One common wave of thought and joy
Lifting mankind again."

But whence "the common wave of thought and joy" is to flow, he cannot tell us.

Yet, while Mr. Arnold keeps his secret carefully as to the source of this renovating power, it is obvious that, in his poetry at least, and partly, perhaps, also in his criticism, his irony, and the badinage directed against Philistines, Puritans, Parliamentary statesmen, and the "young lions" of the Daily Press, he has not lost hopes of "the common wave of thought and joy" which he invokes. His attitude towards the future is never pessimist, though he is so scornful of the present. The strong vitality in him appears to surge up in the form of vague revolutionary hopes, though he never finds the germs of what he hopes for in the methods and the institutions which he criticises. Still, though while making light of all the actual agencies of his time, he falls back upon the nobler past with a dignified and sometimes a lyrical melancholy, he finds somewhere,—we presume, in the never-failing spring of poetic impulse,—the secret of an unaccountable hope. He prophesies sternly against all he sees, and yet he cannot persuade himself to prophesy anything but good,—however dim,—of the future. This is his tone:—

"This tract which the river of Time
Now flows through with us, is the plain.
Gone is the calm of its earlier shore.
Border'd by cities, and hoarse
With a thousand cries is its stream.
And we on its breast, our minds
Are confused as the cries which we hear,
Changing and shot as the sights which we see.

And we say that repose has fled
For ever the course of the river of Time.
That cities will crowd to its edge,
In a blacker, incessanter line;
That the din will be more on its banks,
Denser the trade on its stream,
Flatter the plain where it flows,
Fiercer the sun overhead.
That never will those on its breast
See an ennobling sight,
Drink of the feeling of quiet again.

But what was before us, we know not,
And we know not what shall succeed.

Haply the river of Time,—
As it grows, as the towns on its marge
Fling their wavering lights
On a wider, statelier stream,—
May acquire, if not the calm
Of its early mountainous shore,
Yet a solemn peace of its own.

And the width of the waters, the hush
Of the grey expanse where he floats,
Freshening its current and spotted with foam
As it draws to the Ocean, may strike
Peace to the soul of the man on its breast,—
As the pale waste widens around him,
As the banks fade dimmer away,
As the stars come out, and the night wind
Brings up the stream
Murmurs and scents of the infinite sea."

That is Matthew Arnold's prevailing tone,—condemnation of all the actual tendencies of his time, hopelessness of its actual forces, but vague hope, nevertheless, of somewhat of which he can give no account. It is so in his religious criticism. While reducing all faith in God to a dim confidence in "the stream of tendency, not ourselves, which makes for righteousness," he yet claims the privilege to speak of that "stream of tendency" in the grand and awful strains of Isaiah, and with the solemn certainty and tenderness of Christ. He explains "the secret of Jesus,"—the secret of the Cross,—as being nothing more than the discovery that if you look beneath your superficial impulses and wishes, you will find a truer life which feeds itself upon the denial of these superficial impulses and wishes. He ridicules as untrue dogma all those explanations of that fact which refer this growth of the spirit, to life in a personal God and saviour. He will admit nothing but the bare fact that by giving the go-by to your strongest desires, a deeper life will be reached, and will be found fruitful in peace and strength. But of the revealed explanation of such peace and strength he will not hear a word. He insists that all the sources of hope which the human race have hitherto discovered are dreamy and baseless, but hope he will have nevertheless, and harps on his "mighty wave of thought and joy lifting mankind again" as if he actually discerned its approach. All that the Republicans of the United States lean upon with confidence, he will probably declare to be a broken reed. But he will bear a radiant countenance all the same, and will not abandon his—must we not call it?—superstitious hope. Therefore we say that he will pique and tantalise the good people whom he has gone to see. They will trace in him at once the buoyant gaze of a seer, and the negative creed on which pessimism is usually founded. They will find in him a wall of poetry which compels him to look with hope on the future, while he despises all the living seeds of that future which he discerns in the present. He undermines for us our best hopes with one breath, and invokes strength and joy with the next. He rejects the deepest religion of the day, the best political institutions of the day, and the clearest social tendencies of the day, yes, rejects them with scorn; and yet Emerson himself could hardly have put on a look of the same buoyancy and radiance as Mr. Arnold, when he turns his face towards the new heavens and the new earth, not of his creed, but of his poetic day-dream.

THE BOYHOOD OF ANTHONY TROLLOPE.

WE hardly know anywhere a bit of biography more puzzling than Anthony Trollope's account of himself during his boyhood, youth, and early manhood. Why was he so utterly misunderstood by everybody with whom he came in contact? That he was so misunderstood he affirms again and again, with a persistency as remarkable as the absence of bitterness with which he describes his torments, alleging that he was always fairly good, that he would have liked other boys had he been allowed, that he tried all he could to be an efficient public servant. That he should have been misunderstood by schoolmasters is nothing wonderful. As a rule, though schoolmasters are very proud of successful pupils, and sometimes believe that they predicted success for them, they do not understand them very well. How should they? They see the boys for very short periods, they talk to them very little, and they inspire by their very presence a sense of constraint, which is fatal to revelations of inner character. This was especially the case in the old days, when punishment was so frequent, for the boy could seldom shake off an awe, like that of the private for the Colonel, which sometimes survived the state of pupillage, and lasted far down into middle life. Schoolmasters can judge of intellectual power, but not of character, unless it is very obvious; and even as regards the former, they are under an almost irresistible temptation to confuse quickness with mental force. A boy's quickness lightens the master's labour so greatly as to create an unconscious gratitude, and it is the boy who perceives, rather than the boy who thinks, who strikes the teacher as being "full of promise." That successive masters, therefore, should have despised Anthony Trollope does not surprise us. They saw before them, doubtless, a heavy lad, very badly dressed, very much shut up in himself, who did not play, and did not learn, and accepted endless floggings with a dogged resolution to endure, but to make no change. Such a demeanour in those days was held to require flogging, and accordingly they flogged—flogged excessively, flogged every day, and often more than once a day—with the usual result of making the victim more dogged than ever, as his only available defence against oppression. But why did the other boys understand nothing of the bright intelligence which had come among them? The cause was not caste feeling, for Anthony's brothers were not shunned as he was, and Anthony himself had many of the qualities which usually secure boy-favour. He was brave, and strong, and enduring; he neglected his lessons diligently; he was flogged often, without whining; he panted for popularity; and he thrashed an opponent so severely that he was sent home to be cured. He ought to have been a hero among his kind, and instead of that he was cut, browbeaten, and bullied, until his life was a burden to him; and he looked back upon his school-days as the unhappiest period of his life. Why? His own explanation is that he was impecunious, badly dressed, and neglectful of his own appearance; but boys have never cared much about those drawbacks, which, again, Trollope probably exaggerated. These could not be the reasons which provoked his own brother to thrash him every day with a thick stick, by way of discipline. Nor could they have influenced his superiors and room-mates at the Post Office so greatly that for seven mortal years he was a kind of pariah in his office; made no friends, found no acquaintances, and was not only despised, but so disliked by his superiors that on his exportation to Ireland, Colonel Maberly, a man of unusual ability, went out of his way to give him a bad character, which might have caused his summary dismissal.

The story would be a strange one, if told of any man who subsequently succeeded, but told of Anthony Trollope it is little less than wonderful. Of the eight or nine hundred men and boys with whom he came in intimate contact, not one liked him, not one admired him, and not one had even a glimmering perception that in the heavy lad were exceptional powers of a rare kind. His very mother—surely a keen observer, if ever one lived, and decidedly kind to him in his clerical days—did not believe in him a bit, agreed to his going to Ireland as the least hopeless thing he could do, and when she promised to try and sell his first novel, one of the cleverest he ever wrote, thought it best not to read it, lest she should think it so bad as to repent her of her promise. The misunderstanding was universal, yet it is to us at least almost impossible to believe that Anthony Trollope, besides being essentially upright, kindly, and affectionate, can ever have been anything but unusually able. His perception, not only of character, but of what any person would do or think in a given set of circumstances, was quite perfect,—was, as we believe, an inheritance from his mother, who painted particular forms of vulgarity as they never were painted before, and must have existed in him at all times; yet no one ever detected it. He had even that rarer gift of creating character, for he described Archdeacon Grantley before he had ever seen any one like him, but the faculty was never suspected. He must have been raconteur from his cradle, yet his mother never guessed it; and his fellow-boys, who value this accomplishment above most others, and always hold it to mark a lad with something in him, considered Trollope a dullard. He was entirely without that sort of mental stutter which so often for a time conceals ability. He thought with unusual clearness, decided with unusual rapidity, and expressed himself with a force which, in later life, drove his superiors frantic. He was, too, not only a man of genius, but a man of energy, ability, and manliness, such as are usually perceived at once. Nothing is more certain about Anthony Trollope than that he could direct, organise, make men go his way, where he had authority, and not their own, unless, indeed, it be an untiring industry, which was a nature in him, and which seemed to invest him with twice the usual length of life. Add ambition, excessive physical activity, and unusual daring, and we have a man whom one would, a priori, hold to be sure of early recognition; yet his family despaired of him, his school-fellows mocked him, his room-mates in the Post Office avoided him, and he was held by his superiors to be one of the Queen's worst bargains. And finally, in a day, as it were, it all dropped off. In Ireland, from the first, his chief took to him, and gave him difficult work; he found friends, he found a wife, and he found such popularity among women, that when he married he had to change his quarters, the exasperation of those left forlorn was so general. What was the cause of it all? Be it remembered that not only did not Trollope suddenly find himself in a higher atmosphere, but that he went to Ireland, where, if anywhere on earth, the dullard is neither popular nor believed in.

We cannot offer a complete explanation, but the story of

Anthony Trollope's life strengthens a suspicion, roused by some other biographies, that there does exist in some men a mental husk or shell out of which they grow, as they grow out of physical weakness or uncouthness. It is not that they conceal their powers, or neglect their powers; but that the powers are, for effective purposes, not there, or rather are grown over with an impervious husk. The germ, of course, must exist, but it may for effective purposes be so crushed as to be temporarily dead. Such men's minds do not simply grow, they break through also. Something has to be taken off or something imparted before the faculties are, in the ordinary sense, faculties at all, powers which can be used at will. What it is that happens in such cases, no one can say; but that it does happen is very certain, though more frequently to women than men; and there is, as is evident from the analogy of sleep, no reason why it should not happen. Indeed, as we write, a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, who is evidently trying to be true, describes it as happening to himself:—"I was born north of the Tweed. Death too soon appeared in my home, and I was cast out on what I found to be a cheerless and callous world. I began to question fate, and wondered why my lot should be so hard. I became fond of solitude. I did not even dream of the future. I could see nothing beyond the cruel present, with its daily, deadening drudgery. But there came a change. I was on my way one clear and sharp winter night to my lonely garret lodging, when I paused on the bridge across which I had to pass. I leaned over the parapet, and was gazing down on the black depths below, when suddenly I experienced a mental change which altered the whole current of my being. I could not account for it nor analyse it then, and cannot do so now; but there it was. A wide vista of hope and possibility was spread out before me. I seemed in an instant to have entered on a new and nobler stage of life. I had suddenly awakened to a perception of the beautiful, although the light was yet dim." Why should not the true explanation of Anthony Trollope's boyhood be that he, the clear-sighted novelist, able man of business, and successful public servant, actually was, till he was twenty-five, for all around him, a disagreeable dullard?

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN ENCAMPMENT BY THE SEA.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

ONE sunny August morning, we set out on a ramble over the pebbly shore of one of the Eastern Counties. Our expedition must have been the outcome of an unusually violent attack of the Englishman's craze for exploring, for nothing surely could have been less suited to stimulate a pedestrian's energies than the view of the monotonous line of flat coast, made up of a belt of shingly beach, with here and there a strip of sand showing, and backed by dwarfed sand-hills and treeless, marshy levels, the whole looking fatiguingly hot in the glare of the morning sun. Just as we were growing heartily weary of the sight of the hot-looking beach and of the sound of our feet crunching through the yielding shingle, a turn round an angle or "ness" of the coast brought us within view of a quite unexpected scene. The beach here is flatter and broader than it has been, and is broken up into a number of tiny terraces. On the higher levels of the shingle the sand is so abundant as to tempt the long, reed-like grass and the hardy sea-holly to stray down the beach, and to entice even the inland bracken to venture a few steps over the pebbles. The beach is sheltered from the westerly land winds by a belt of sand-hills, which here begin to assume larger dimensions, and a little further on harden into something like a low cliff. On a patch of low ground behind the sand-hills is a cluster of small cottages. Further off, on the higher ground above the rudimentary cliff, there stands out boldly, as if conscious of its official dignity, a severely correct-looking Coastguard station; while just beyond this, in pleasing contrast, there peeps out shyly above the dense mass of foliage which encloses it, the high thatched roof of what looks like a goodly country-house. All this, however, forms but the accessories of the picture before us. The central subject is a group of tents and wooden buildings, scattered about the upper levels of the beach among the sand and patches of vigorous green. The white tents gleaming in the sun are of the well-known military pattern. The wooden structures are small, simple in design, and gaily tinted, reminding us strongly of the toy-houses of our early days. This morning, a number of young girls may be seen loitering about the houses. Their hair is down, and in some other respects they seem regardless of the nicer ordinances of society with respect to toilet. At the sight of strangers they back shyly into the doorways, and presently we spy here and there, peering inquiringly over the heads of a group of maidens, the face of a matron rubicund with culinary operations. Interspersed among these dainty tents and chalets are boatmen's houses, which contrast oddly enough with the other buildings, in their highly irregular form, their deep black hue, and their general look of heaviness. Some of these are storehouses for the fishermen's gear. A few, however, may at once be picked out as dwellings, by their trim casements, their smoke-capped chimneys, and their quaint little gardens. These last are small patches of sandy ground, duly fenced in with dwarf palings, where a sickly-looking geranium or two are doing their best to keep up the pretence of a rural cottage. There are no signs of human activity about the fishermen's huts to-day, for the men are away in search of the now rare sole, while the women are in request at the tents and chalets. A certain degree of animation is, however, supplied to this part of the scene by the presence of a respectable company of fowls, which spreads itself over the sandy patches about the buildings, their quiet, reflective step being ever and again exchanged for a mad run, at the blatant summons of some officious leader. They cannot, we reflect, gather much forage on this barren beach, and possibly, to their scantily-fed appetites, the discovery of a stray crumb or two, or even of a sun-parched fish, counts as an occasion for loud exultation. Some way below this populated region of the beach, we observe a line of boats drawn up well above the high-water mark, close to a row of vertical winches. Some of these seem to have just returned from a cruise, for their brown sails hang but half-furled in graceful folds, adding another touch of warm colouring to the beach-picture. Further down, still at the edge of the sea, our eye falls on a line of children, who, arrayed in the most négligé of costumes, appear to be revelling in the amphibious life of tropical islanders.

A queer, motley spectacle, we observe to one another, is this settlement on the beach. It looks like a grotesque attempt to unite the comfort and even the elegance of civilisation with the barrenness of the savage condition. It is the blending of the gaiety of a fête champêtre with the grim seriousness of daily toil in the shadow of poverty and of death. The merry occupants of the tents and dainty huts turn out on inquiry to be visitors from an adjacent town. They appear to have taken up their quarters on the beach for want of the more customary kind of sea-side accommodation. However this be, here they are leading a half-gipsy life, and already catching something of the gipsy look. They evidently take pleasure in their unconventional mode of life, and extract a good deal of merriment out of the little difficulties to which it gives rise. Perhaps (if the evolutionist is right), in their childish glee there are vague recallings of a far-off, free, ancestral life between the amplitudes of earth and sky. But in reality, their reversion to primitive ways is only a very half-hearted affair. As we accept the friendly offer of one of the rubicund matrons and look into her tent, we find elaborate cooking processes carried out cleanly, and even inodourously, by aid of the latest and most improved gas apparatus. In the hut close by which serves as a dwelling-house for the same family (and where space is economised in a manner that suggests the activity of a constructive genius), we note a degree of neatness and prettiness which betrays a mind dependent on tasteful surroundings. It proves, indeed, to be a truly charming interior, with the light stains of the woodwork, the bright colouring of the chintz hangings which divide one tiny apartment from another, and the lustre of bits of china and plate distributed on shelf and bracket. The more solid comforts of life are secured to our settlers by the periodic call of the tradesman from the neighbouring town. So far as we can ascertain, this sea-side colony is the freest of communities. It is open to all comers. Anybody may pitch a tent where he likes, provided he does not come too near the abode of an earlier settler. Or, if he prefer, he may erect a permanent hut, by merely asking the consent of the lord of the manor, and paying a nominal "quit-rent." The result, so far as we can make out, is a society of a distinctly republican cast. Social grades seem to be ignored, there is no "differentiation" as yet of east and west ends, but the doctor's family lives in friendly proximity to that of the thrifty mechanic. Possibly, these fraternal relations are due to the uniting forces of a common sentiment, a passion for the sea. There can be but little entertainment here beyond the delights of bathing and "paddling," and it is pretty safe to assume that everybody comes here in order to get as much sea water and sea air as possible.

We paid a second visit to this encampment on the beach towards the end of a rainy September. It now wore quite another aspect. The white tents have vanished, and the dainty huts look cheerless and deserted, with their closed doors and curtained windows. There is no more rustling of quick, young feet, no more clear treble laughter on the beach. A solitary fisherman is absorbed in the work of repairing his boat. At the door of one of the fishermen's huts stands a slender, middle-aged woman, looking out at us as though puzzled by our appearance. Her husband, she tells us, is dead, and her two sons are off elsewhere, with wives to care for. Through the long winter, when the light-hearted visitors from town are happy in their snug homes, she will be alone in the rude hut on the beach. How will she feel, when there is nothing for the eye but the dull gleam of the sea-foam beyond the driving mist, while the ear is burdened and wearied by the continuous screaming of the wind and hoarse roaring of the breakers? Will her mind then occupy itself in working out its own theory of the worth of life, or will her brain be lulled by the very poverty of her surroundings into such a condition of torpor as precludes thinking? Even the roving bands of fowls seem to-day to share in the prevailing depression, for their cacklings are less hearty, and their movements less spirited. Perhaps they, too, are missing the summer visitors. The chilling gloominess of the scene is completed by the presence of a belated party of excursionists. They consist of a sorry-looking man, apparently a small farmer, his wife, and seven children, close on one another's heels in the matter of age. They move dejectedly along the sea edge, without interest or purpose, as if compelled by some dire necessity. The dismal impression of the whole scene is relieved by one feature, a single bathing-machine, left low down on the beach, which throws itself back, and looks out over the vast, sullen waters in a comical attitude of pugilistic defiance. We half hope the cumbrous vehicle may be allowed to remain where it is through the winter, on the chance of its bringing to the torpid sense of our poor solitary dim provisions of a returning summer, and of fresh outbursts of young merriment upon the beach.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In reference to an article in your paper on the above subject, may I ask if you will kindly allow me to describe a plan now being tested in a North London parish, where, by simple means, about one hundred poor children are provided daily with good and nutritious food? Of course, this is but a minute fraction of the numbers you speak of in London alone who are insufficiently fed; but the scheme, though not yet twelve months in action, is succeeding so well that there seems no reason why it should not spread, and be before long organised in every London district. It is for the relief of the hard-working and honest poor, who themselves pay a part of the expense out of their small earnings. It originated thus:—A "Sister" found that in one parish alone there were 120 children under twelve who had lost one parent, and were thus left untended during working hours. With great energy she applied herself to the work, and with some aid from the clergy of the parish, and the promise from friends of a few subscriptions, was able to open last December a Day Home for the children of widows or widowers whose needs were real and pressing. It is a cheerful house, plainly fitted and furnished, with comfortable rooms, well warmed and lighted, and made gay with pictures; there are toys, too, for the little ones. To it the parents bring the children on their way to work in the morning, often by five or six a.m., and leave them there until evening. During the days those old enough are sent to the Board or other schools, while the very tiny ones are kept warm, fed, and tended in the Home by the motherly woman in charge. At bed-time all are fetched or taken to their homes. This is the bill of fare for the day. Breakfast—Bread, with dripping or treacle, and cocoa, with milk. Dinner—Meat twice a week (roast beef and stewed mutton), lentil soup once, suet pudding once, and on other days milk pudding, such as rice or macaroni, and stewed fruit. Tea—Bread, with dripping or treacle.

It is not luxury, but it seems so to the poor little creatures, who, up to the day of admission, have, perhaps, scarcely seen a comfortably prepared meal. These "widows' children" of North-east London are, at the best of times, only half-fed. To quote from the last report of the Day Homes (by an eye-witness),—"Insufficient earnings, high rent, and in many cases large families, combine to make the mother's efforts produce a very bare subsistence for her little ones, who are left daily, week after week, from eight a.m. till nine p.m., with only dry bread and cold tea (without milk), by way of food." No wonder, as the report continues, "their stunted growth and feebleness of mind and body show how greatly they need nourishment." At the Day Home they have as much as they can eat at every meal, and often a good extra slice of bread and treacle to take home at night.

The delight and wonder of new-comers at such good fare, enjoyed in a warm, bright room, is very touching, while that the Home is duly valued by the poor is proved by the mothers' anxiety to get their children admitted. The report describes how, in a large neighbouring workshop, all the men gave three cheers for the Sister, the promoter of the scheme, on first hearing of it. The cost of the children's food is only 2s. per head for the whole six working days of the week, the Home not being open on Sundays. Towards this amount the parents pay from 1s. to 2s. per week for each child, according to the number sent from one household.

Besides the good feeding, which is already telling, in the improved looks and strength of both boys and girls, there are other advantages in the Day Home,—1, general improvement in moral tone; 2, protection from the bad influences of the streets; 3, the sending of the children regularly to their schools. The Home is non-sectarian and broad in principle, and connected with no one religious body, but free to all who are in need of it, whether Roman Catholics, Wesleyans, or other kinds of Dissenters, as well as to those whose parents attend the parish church.

The Home first opened being full and in good working order by last spring, a second was organised in April, and the boys and girls divided. The second (or girls') house owns a small garden or court, serving as playground, an immense gain. In it is a single tree, a hawthorn, which bore a few flowers last May, to the delight of the children, who had never seen a country hedgerow in spring, nor flowers growing. Both Homes are in Hyde Row, Hoxton, at Nos. 35 and 47. They may be seen any day, the dinner and tea hours, one and five o'clock, being the best times.

If any of your readers should like to see for themselves how the experiment is working, they will be made very welcome there. The Homes are now in need of £70, to help them to clear their way to the end of this (the first) year.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A PHYSIOLOGICAL LABORATORY AT OXFORD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Since the decree was passed in Convocation last June, though by the narrowest majority, sanctioning a very large expenditure for the erection of a Physiological Laboratory, the question of any apparent approval by the University of experiments on living animals has occupied the thoughts of many of us who are anxious on this subject. It is well known in Oxford that the consideration of this side of physiological investigation was not pressed on the attention of the Council, and not until opposition to the decree was offered in the Convocation of June 5th did the matter receive much public attention. Indeed, more than one eminent member of the University, both within the Council and outside, was not even acquainted with the opinion of the Professor of Physiology himself on it.

You will, perhaps, think it not unsuitable that at the beginning of Term some reasons should be expressed in your columns why Convocation should desire that the limits and the degree of vivisectional experiment in its buildings should be strictly defined. It is impossible for us to fold our hands, and say this question should be left exclusively to the judgment of physiologists, if only on account of their divergent judgment. To speak only of the dead, how widely separated were the feelings herein of Rolleston and Claude Bernard! A considerable number of members of Convocation in and near Oxford earnestly desire that the question should be in itself submitted to the judgment of the House, and that a decree should be promulgated which would prohibit (a), painful experiment otherwise than under anæsthetics; (b), experiments on domestic animals altogether.

(a.) Since the discovery of those anæsthetics which cause a dreadful operation to pass like a pleasant dream, we men have used them with a most affectionate solicitude for our ease, even to escape trivial pain, and it seems only fair to extend this protection to other creatures whose nerves of sensation are as acute to suffer as are our own. I need not labour this point, because the best English physiologists have acceded to this merciful provision, and indeed initiated it long before the judgment of the country was formulated in the Act of Parliament. But exceptions to this rule are allowed, and it is denied that in Oxford there should be none. Then the feeling of camaraderie amongst physiologists is strong. Men have not forgotten the experiments on the two dogs at Norwich, in 1874, when those present "did not like" to interfere with M. Magnan's operation. An eminent gentleman complained the other day that it had been necessary to obtain for the public service a foreigner trained in the laboratories of Germany. Was this the physicist who was so intent on his investigation that he could spare no time to think of the suffering of his subject? "In Tiberim defluxit Orontes." He spoke in all innocence of heart, and was surprised that this acknowledgment had excited indignation in the minds of those who heard him; but an apology for such a treatment of a grave subject, or an ignoring it, must necessarily be received in England with impatience.

(b.) As to the exemption of domestic animals. Surely this is a reasonable request. It seems to be a base requital for the affection, for the courage, for the sagacity, for the confidence of a dog, that he should in any place run the risk of such a termination of his life; it is a cruel treatment of a familiar friend. We do not like a prowling dog-stealer. Should we love him more, if we thought that he was decoying the friend of our hearth to hand him over to the custodian of the laboratory? And physiologists of note, whose general kindness of heart in all sincerity I do not wish to call in question, have said that they did not know and did not inquire from whence the subjects of their investigation had been brought. Is it impossible that they will consent to grant this boon?

It was inferred, too, at Southport that those who would restrict vivisection are opponents of the advancement of science: that "they execrate the physiologist as a monster of cruelty," as others "brand the geologist as a blasphemer." Pray, Sir, where are these latter Rip Van Winkles of fanaticism and ignorance to be found? As to physiologists, it is true that occasionally harsh and intemperate language may be used concerning them. This is to be deprecated. But injustice of expression—and a denunciation of any class of men is certain to involve injustice—does not destroy the fact that carelessness about animal suffering in the laboratory has existed to a grievous extent, and has often been excused; or that, as lately in your columns, the question has been dismissed with an airy disdain, as unworthy a philosopher's attention.

If I am not trespassing unduly on your space, I would say one word about the familiar argument that no restriction is needed because Dr. X or Sir A B, gentlemen regarded by all men with esteem, do not think it necessary. This is a form of the old fallacy that there was no appreciable danger of abuse of slavery, because Bishop This or Senator That—kindly and humane men—treated their dependents well, and were too polite to conjecture that in the wide area of the Southern States other standards than theirs of duty and of conscience might exist.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ELECTORAL DISTRICTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Redistribution of representation has come within measurable distance for serious consideration, so, perhaps, the following calculation may be worth suggesting:—If population only is taken as basis, the fair proportions, of a House of 700 Members, will be, England, 520; Scotland, 80; Ireland, 100. If surface space be taken, the fair proportions, in a House of 760 Members, will be, England, 370; Scotland, 190; Ireland, 200. If rental for taxation is taken as basis only, the fair proportions will be, in a House of 582 Members, England, 474; Scotland, 66; Ireland, 42. Again, taking one third on each basis, then, in a House of 680 Members, the fair proportions will be, England, 454; Scotland, 112; Ireland, 114. Such seem to be the only safe data for calculation, unless the cultivable acreage be taken, instead of surface space, in each Kingdom.

National engagements and susceptibilities may make it necessary to take population for proportion, between Kingdoms. Local associations and convenience may make area the proportion, between counties. Wealth and education may fairly guide the apportionment within county districts, according to rental taxation.—I am, Sir, &c.,

W. R. B. H.

[Why does not our correspondent make his calculation in any case for a House of 650 Members? Nothing is less likely, and nothing would be more mischievous, than to increase the numbers of the House. There would be a strong case for diminishing them.—Ed. Spectator.]

"BY LAW ESTABLISHED."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I think it will be found that the above-cited phrase, with others similar, is not properly known to the Constitution, but obtained currency by necessity, in times when civil and religious oaths, subscriptions, privileges, and exclusions prevailed, in order to disable reserves and equivokes on the part of the disaffected. From the days of Henry VIII. to those of George III., there existed parties of insecure allegiance, both to the de facto dynasty and to the order in Church matters recognised by existing law. Such language barred both the Roman and the Puritan. An early instance is that of the rubric of 1 Elizabeth, directing the ornaments of the Church to be those which were by Act of Parliament in the second year of Edward.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE WORD "CUSS."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent, "An American," appears to me to be right as to the definition of the word "cuss." The simplest definition is often the most correct; and we all know the fate of the man who derived "Latakia" from "Laodicea." An example from a modern American author will, I think, help us. One of the heroes in "The Luck of Roaring Camp," speaking of the way in which an infant (the hero of the story) clutched at his finger, observed, "rastled with it, the little cuss." Surely, the vague use of the word "cuss" as an abbreviation for "customer" by Americans is very much like our equally vague use of the word "beggar,"—e.g., "You beggar, what did you do that for?" Of course, I will not attempt to define the use of the very senseless English word; possibly, those who fetch their definitions from afar might ascribe the word to our Protestant origin.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"JULIAN TREVOR."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I shall esteem it a favour if you will give publicity to the few following remarks on a criticism of my novel of "Julian Trevor," which appeared in the Spectator of the 13th instant.

In the first place, I know nothing, I am thankful to say, of political society, though your critic is good enough to remark that I have "caught its twang," and am "evidently familiar" with its features.

Secondly—and I wish this to be clearly understood—the character who figures in my novel as Lord Slitherington is not intended as a portrait of Lord Beaconsfield; nor would it have been considered as such, had I not injudiciously made the Prime Minister of the book suddenly bring about a dissolution of Parliament, by writing an unexpected letter. My critics, on reading this incident, have remembered a letter written under similar conditions by the late Earl of Beaconsfield to the late Duke of Marlborough, and, in remembering it, have straightway abandoned themselves to the guidance of disordered fancies.

Circumstances, as I shall show later on in this very case, can be cited to prove that, if once a person has determined to discover a portrait in some character, he will discover it in any character, sooner than be disappointed; but the few following points of dissimilarity between the Earl of Slitherington of my book and the Earl of Beaconsfield of real life must strike any reader who may care to be impartial.

1. Lord Slitherington is a Sybarite. The most uncandid of his critics could not charge Lord Beaconsfield with this failing.

2. Lord Slitherington is discovered at a great State crisis reading Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques." Lord Beaconsfield could never have been discovered doing this. He did not know French.

3. Lord Slitherington is constantly described as smoking cigars. Lord Beaconsfield never smoked them, though he collected pipes.

4. Lord Slitherington is described with great detail, and in the clearest terms, as an egotist, without a theory other than that all men act from self-interest, and that charlatanism is success. He is Machiavelli as much as Metternich. Lord Beaconsfield has himself somewhere said that "great minds trust to great truths and great talents for their rise, and to nothing else," and he exemplified this maxim in his life. He, in short, entered public life with an idea. He believed that a return to the Toryism of the Georges was the only protection against the danger threatened by the Reform Bill. To this idea it has always been my belief that he owed his success, and not, as my critic obligingly insinuates, to a chance faculty for social cunning.

Lastly, as I go into no society of any kind, am as innocent as a young man of twenty-four can be of any desire to offend any one, and am not in the least desirous of being made defendant in an action for libel, I shall be glad to learn the names of the other "Shapes,"—

"If shapes they may be called that shape have none Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb,"—

who—though they are in one place in the article before me described as being "neither individuals nor types," and in another as "mere lay figures, intended probably to be incarnations of different aspects of almost savage selfishness"—can, notwithstanding, in a third place, be "easily recognised under the thin disguise thrown over them, as personages of note, other than the late Conservative chief."

Personally, I confess that this conundrum is too wonderful for me; I cannot understand it. Will your critic have the courtesy to enlighten me?—I am, Sir, &c.,

WILLIAM OUTRAM TRISTRAM.

17 Colville Mansions, Powis Terrace, W., October 18th.

[If Lord Beaconsfield thought that a return to "the Toryism of the Georges" was "the only protection against the danger threatened by the Reform Bill," he certainly concealed this idea most successfully for some time after he "entered public life," i.e., after he first stood for a seat in Parliament.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE INHERITANCE OF PHYSICAL INJURIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Dr. Bell Taylor, in the Spectator of the 13th, says that physical injuries are inherited. I have not made original observations, but I have studied and abstracted carefully the enormous mass of facts contained in Darwin's "Variations of Animals and Plants under Domestication," and have concluded that, as a general rule, subject, no doubt, to exceptions, externally produced injuries are not inherited, but functionally produced modifications are. Short-sight, produced by straining the eyes, is a good example of the latter.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

"FORTUNE MY FOE."

"Aim not too high, at things beyond thy reach,
Nor give the rein to reckless thought or speech.
Is it not better all thy life to bide
Lord of thyself, than all the earth beside?"

Thus, if high Fortune far from thee take wing,
Why should'st thou envy counsellor or king?
Purple or homespun,—wherefore make ado
What coat may cover, if the heart be true?

Then, if at last thou gather wealth at will,
Thou must shalt honour Him who grants it still;
Since he who best doth poverty endure,
Should prove, when rich, best brother to the poor.

BOOKS.

MR. PERCY GREG ON FAITH AND DOUBT.*

MR. PERCY GREG's speculative books are always worth study, and this certainly not the least of them. They would be improved, perhaps, by a little more sympathy with the points of view that are not the writer's own, for a discussion thrown into the form of dialogue needs something of real dramatic force to give it its fullest life. This dramatic force is given, we think, to the cynic, Lestrangle, though it is made obvious enough that his cynicism is rather superficial, and that he cares much more to demolish those who half agree with him than those who wholly differ from him. Still, Lestrangle and Cleveland are both real men. Not so Sterne and Merton, whose feeble Naturalism and Positivism are ninepins, only set up to be continually knocked down. And the same, to some extent, is true of Vere, the Christian. It is obvious enough, indeed, that the author has far more sympathy with Vere than he has with Sterne and Merton, but his own point of view is too strongly in sympathy with doubt,—we do not mean denial,—to admit of his throwing any strength of intellect into the part assigned to Vere in these discussions. We are told that "Vere was silent" (p. 49), when any man of force in Vere's place would certainly have desired to say something of considerable weight, and might have said something of what seems to us decisive weight. Again, after one of Lestrangle's most vehement outbursts (p. 178), Vere, when at last he feebly interposes, has hardly anything of significance to say. It is, on the whole, the same throughout. Vere does not make himself really felt except against the Secularist and the Positivist. Against Lestrangle and Cleveland, he is a shadow. Still, with all the shortcomings, as they appear to us, due to the central doubt—or suspense of judgment—which inspires the whole book, it is a powerful and instructive book for the doubter to read, and one which may further shake his doubt, though it can hardly sow in him anything like true conviction.

To criticise it with any success within the limits which we must observe, it is of course essential to select one or two single points, and not to attempt a discursive, much less a complete estimate. We prefer to select what seems to us the central idea of the book, the impossibility of certainty, the demonstrability of uncertainty, in matters of religious and apparently also moral faith. Here is part of a discussion on what is called "whole-some falsehood":—

"Cleveland.—There will always be numbers of thoughtful people who cannot practically believe that what is beneficial is false, that what is palpably noxious can be true.

Sterne.—That is turning the matter wrong side out, inverting the relation between truth and profit.

Cleveland.—Possibly; but, if a rare argument, it is a common creed.

'Is it a rare argument?' I asked. 'One finds Christian preachers constantly resting the real force, laying the practical stress of their case on the service Christianity has rendered to mankind, on the impossibility of doing without it.'

Cleveland.—True. But if you put the matter to them clearly, make them see the meaning of their own reasonings, they will repudiate them. Nobody, or hardly anybody, will say 'this must be true, because the belief in it is wholesome;' but multitudes even of thinking men practically think or feel so. Those who can let go a belief they feel to be essential to their own happiness and virtue, are few. Those who would like to see the general decay of a creed they think necessary to keep the multitude in order are perhaps fewer still.

Sterne.—Then are they right? Do you believe that truth can ever do harm?

Cleveland.—Do you deny that falsehood has done infinite good?

Sterne.—Absolutely. I know what you mean; but what good Christianity has accomplished has been due to its comparative truth, not to its absolute falsehood. And it has done enormous harm. Clifford hardly exaggerated its power for evil, strongly as he has stated it.

Cleveland.—Look what decaying Paganism was. Compare the latter state of Pagan Rome with Mediæval Christianity, or again with primitive Protestantism, and you can hardly doubt that, frightful as have been the crimes committed in the name of religion, the balance to its credit is stupendous.

Sterne.—I don't know. Marcus Antoninus was equal to any Christian saint.

Cleveland.—Perhaps; but the Stoics persuaded a few thoughtful men to believe their creed, of whom a very small minority practised it. Christianity persuaded millions to believe and thousands to practise, not perhaps what Christ would have recognised as his teaching, but something far better than the world had known before.

Sterne.—But that was in virtue, as I said, of its comparative truth, not of its absolute falsehood.

Cleveland.—No. The best thing the author of the 'Enigmas of Life' has ever said is that the one falsehood common to all creeds is the very principle of their life, the very basis of their power. They all assume certainly, all affect a Divine origin, and on this point they all lie. But it is precisely this affectation of certainty that gives them their hold on men. Probability may be the guide of life, but it guides because it is not recognised as probability, but taken for certainty. Seriously persuade men that there is one chance in fifty that the sun will not rise to-morrow, and you will—disturb their sleep. Convince them that summer may possibly fail to return, and though you may prove to them that the chances in favour of its advent are a hundred to one, you will produce a visible effect upon the harvest.

Sterne.—Only with fools.

Cleveland.—Perhaps; but on this point most men are fools by instinct. It is just because a vast probability is to us an apparent certainty that we do act on it so confidently. If Christian preachers could make us feel that life is practically, immediately uncertain, uncertain for each of us each hour—if most of us believed, as one or two women I know do seem to believe, that it was doubtful whether going to sleep in health we should live to wake again—the idea would make us seriously uncomfortable, if it did not materially improve our conduct. We run risks, we do not incur certain and heavy sacrifices, on a chance, unless in the spirit of the gambler. No man was ever a martyr for a creed that he thought probably true.

Sterne.—I suppose not.

Cleveland.—And no such creed would ever make converts or control conduct. No man would forego an immediate deeply-desired pleasure, resist a strong present temptation, curb a passion he could certainly and instantly gratify because the chances were three to one that he had a soul, and six to one that his soul would be damned for yielding.

Sterne.—And that is just the weakness of all your theologies. Punishment and reward are alike probabilities to all but the most devout, and therefore they are so ineffective.

Cleveland.—Well, but observe, you say falsehood must be injurious; that religion has benefited mankind in virtue of its truth, not of the attendant fiction. Now, mark; the one thing common to all religions, without which none of them could have gained a hearing, much less held its ground, controlled and governed multitudes, inspired champions and martyrs, is the one thing certainly false. A God is at any rate prima facie probable; Heaven and Hell are almost necessary consequences of immortality, and immortality at least seems to human instinct and human thought very possible. Buddha's teaching of perpetual reincarnations till purification accomplished by trial is rewarded by absorption into the primary Life, strangely as it conflicts with other more popular doctrines, is consistent enough, and certainly no one can say that it may not be true. But Buddha, Moses, Christ, Mahomet, all tell us that they know these things; that they received their information supernaturally, and directly or indirectly from the Deity Himself. As they contradict each other, and every one contradicts every other on some important point, it is plain that in this statement three of the four must have been, and none of us now doubts that all were, mistaken. But, as the Enigmas of Life reminds us, it was this essential untruth, this false allegation, that gave strength to every one of these teachers. It was the falsehood that won a hearing for the truth. Even the peculiar personal character of Christ, his attractive influence, magnetising all who came into contact with Him—exercising over all a power, attractive or repulsive, the strongest ever wielded by man—would not have sufficed to make Him more than a Jewish Rabbi of unusual reasonableness and popularity, whose teaching probably would have been sooner forgotten than that of any other in proportion to its simplicity and excellence."

Now, if this proves what our author evidently supposes it to prove, it surely proves a great deal more,—either that there is no God at all, or that God, being what he is, cannot inspire certainty in the human mind at all, and that all certainty in such matters as concern his existence and his will is a 'note' of error, not of inspiration. But this is surely not the author's belief. Cleveland, who states the argument thus strongly, inclines, with something almost approaching conviction, to a belief both in God and in the actual communication of his divine will and character on many points to man. Is it even conceivable that God should exist, and should impress his will and character on us, and yet should be intrinsically unable to let us know that it is he who speaks, and that what he speaks is certainty itself? Admit as much as you please the fallibility and weakness and the manifold errors of man, still, if there be in the Universe a source of infallible wisdom at all, it is at least as certain as it is that he is infallible, that he can communicate to us as much of his mind as our minds and apprehensions will admit, and, therefore, as regards any thought that is within our cognisance at all, that he can assure us of its corresponding as closely as our limited capacity will admit, with the absolute truth of things.

What Cleveland, and Cleveland's alter ego, Mr. Percy Greg, seems to us wholly to ignore is this,—that religious certainty depends not on us, but on the controlling power which gives us grace to recognise it and the strength it confers. Speculative writers are always trying to find some guarantee of certainty as regards things above us in the constitution of our minds. No such guarantee is possible. The only way in which we can reach certainty is by subjecting our minds to that influence which a higher Power impresses on us, and impresses us as more than human. This is what Christ means by requiring that his disciples should assume the attitude of a child to its parents, when they come to him to learn. The paradox, if paradox it be, of fallible certainty, has never been half so plainly and powerfully stated by any sceptic as it was by our Lord himself, when he said:—"Verily I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein." Is there any certainty greater than a child's of what—if it be within the compass of its apprehension—its father's will on this, or that, or the other subject really is? And yet, is there any impossibility greater than that such a child should be able to analyse and explain the source of that certainty? General discussions, like Fichte's Kritik aller Offenbarung, on the a priori possibility of revelation, are more or less vitiated by this radical defect,—that they assume on our part the possibility of criticising the impression which a Power higher than ours is capable of making on our minds. Now, we can criticise what is beneath, but not what is above us. We can say with certainty, 'this is less than human,' but so soon as we are in the grasp of a power on every side higher than our own, our wisdom is to yield ourselves to it, and not to throw away all the help it gives us, on the very unreasonable ground that we cannot explain it to ourselves. The present writer knows exceedingly little of Buddhism, but his impression was that Sakya Muni, so far from affecting to reveal a higher power, taught only the doctrine of the vanity and thralldom of human desire,—in short, the blessedness of withdrawing ourselves from earthly attractions. Mahommed's teaching is, on all the points on which it differs from the Christian, definitely below it in every way, and, indeed, below a good deal of the Jewish and even Pagan teaching too. Moses and the Prophets never pretended to give more than an initiatory teaching in the Divine Will, and their teaching looked forward to higher teaching beyond. It is practically only in the case of Christ that a modern European could suppose that by submitting his mind to an influence infinitely higher than any other which the centuries have disclosed to us, he might find the true source of conviction and of certainty. Take another passage:—

"Cleveland.—In politics, in economic science, I know what I believe; so I think do you. But when it comes to those deepest, most fundamental problems on which turn the highest interests not of nations but of mankind, our views not of a temporary expediency but of universal truth, I am not fool enough to be a partisan nor passionate enough to be positive. If on these subjects a man is clearly, firmly, surely convinced, it is almost always—I will not say that he has decided without study but—that his mind was practically made up before he had mastered more than half the elements of the question.

Lestrangle.—Then you accuse all clergymen at least of judging without hearing; for they, I suppose, are bound to be sure.

Cleveland.—They have to make up their minds at four-and-twenty; and who at that age can have studied half the case? If they have mastered the evidences in favour of Christianity, they are content; if they have really investigated the great issues of Biblical criticism, they have been exceptionally careful and conscientious. But they have not taken in one half, hardly perhaps a tithe, of the vast ground their propositions really cover. A Christian believes in the Resurrection; and believing in that he looks no further, he is dispensed from studying anything that conflicts with the doctrines on which that puts the seal of miraculous attestation.

Lestrangle.—You don't believe that?

Cleveland.—Nor disbelieve. I cannot think that it happened; I cannot explain, can hardly conceive, how if it did not happen the Apostles come to believe it as they assuredly did—to live and die for that belief.

Vere.—And can you be content to remain in doubt on that fundamental question of all?

Cleveland.—Fundamental for you, who are satisfied of it. But your phrase 'content to doubt' conveys the fundamental fallacy of all orthodox reasoning; the idea that belief is matter of will. On that, as on most other questions of paramount importance, I am forced to doubt, because the evidence is always conflicting and often incommensurable.

Lestrangle.—Then, like me, you believe nothing?

Cleveland.—By no means. I believe—but I hardly know why I believe; I can very seldom say how much I believe it. I believe—but I can quite believe that I may be mistaken. I believe—yet I can see strong reasons for disbelieving. I believe—and yet I doubt. Can that be called belief at all?

Vere.—I suppose that few—save those who have resigned their intellect to some despotic authority outside themselves—fail to see, I will not say strong grounds for disbelief, but strong arguments against their firmest beliefs.

Cleveland.—Aye; but your doubts are temporary, or do not amount to doubt. Where you believe with full conviction, on the fundamental points of your creed, you never think it possible that you should be wrong.

Vere.—I don't know. What right have I to hold that the Church of eighteen centuries is wrong, and I right when we differ?

Cleveland.—I don't know what right you have to differ from the Church Universal; but you do. You may have no adequate ground for your belief, but—you believe. Now, on nearly every point of vital moment, I see both sides so clearly that, if I can feel which is the weightier, I cannot feel certain of either."

Now, surely the drift of that is that the strength of the belief always is, and ought to be, exactly commensurate with the balance of the arguments pro over the arguments con. But is it ever really so with a reasonable man? Cleveland himself says (p. 74) that few men know exactly why they believe anything, and denies the inference which the author of the book wishes to draw, that in that case "our belief is worth nothing." On the contrary, he maintains, and maintains very justly, that "a man's judgment is worth more, counts for more, than his arguments." But that admission is virtually taken back again, when Cleveland takes credit to himself for being in a suspense of mind exactly corresponding to the balance of arguments pro and con. We hold rather, with Cardinal Newman, "Many persons are very sensitive of the difficulties of religion. I am as sensitive as any one; but I have never been able to see a connection between apprehending these difficulties, however keenly, and multiplying them to any extent, and doubting the doctrines to which they are attached. Ten thousand difficulties do not make one doubt, as I understand the subject; difficulty and doubt are incommensurate." What, for instance, can be a greater difficulty than to reconcile the doctrine of causation with the belief in any, however limited, free-will of your own? And yet, how many there are who would say with us,—and, we think, rightly say,—that they have no more doubt of the existence of a power in themselves to determine what they shall do, than they have of their own existence or sensations? What can there be more difficulty about than thought-reading? And yet, who, that knows the mass of evidence in favour of it, doubts the fact of thought-reading? What is more difficult to understand than the vast—the infinite,—incoherence of the world of dreams, in which we spend well-nigh a third of our existence, or than the rare and exceptional, but marvellous lucidity which sometimes enables the dreamer to see far more than the waker would see; but who doubts the fact of incoherent dreaming, and who that knows the full evidence doubts the fact of occasional lucid dreaming? The truth is, that no man of real wisdom keeps his intellect balanced in proportion to the arguments pro and con, but, like Cleveland, often trusts his judgment implicitly, though there be a great many arguments which,—if they were the only evidence on the subject,—would make the belief held seem simply absurd.

Mr. Percy Greg has given us in this book many discussions of great subtlety and depth, but he has not succeeded in proving that it is in any degree unreasonable to hold with certainty many truths against which it is, nevertheless, possible to advance the most striking arguments.

A GERMAN ACCOUNT OF THE EGYPTIAN CAMPAIGN.*

COLONEL VOGT has attempted a somewhat difficult task, and one certainly beyond the limits of his information. Much of his book is built up on the war correspondence of English and Continental newspapers, and it consequently reproduces only too faithfully the mistakes which easily obtain circulation during the course of a war, and are so rarely corrected with sufficient emphasis afterwards. The war correspondent is a valuable institution, but the military historian should use him with caution. Colonel Vogt's account of the action at Alexandria bristles with inaccuracies. Fort Marsa el Kanat, "blown up by shells from the 'Invincible,'" was never once hit; no party landed at Marabout or Adjemi, and the latter work—not half finished—never fired a shot; while the guns of Fort Meks, stated to be disabled at 4.30 p.m., had all been spiked or disabled by gun-cotton by about 1.30 p.m. Colonel Vogt characterises the bombardment as premature, and in a sense this may be true; but the subsequent course of events could hardly have been foreseen, while there were obvious political reasons for not waiting till a fleet of transports filled with British regiments lay behind the ironclads. It is, moreover, very doubtful if the landing of "a small force" immediately after the action would have sufficed to save the town and win a "military success." In any case, it is almost childish to state "it seems obvious that time was purposely afforded to the national party to organise a re-istance, which it would afterwards be necessary to crush." Or, has the translator got into a muddle over the word "purposely"? Colonel Vogt may very fairly criticise our insane partiality for muzzle-loaders, but no guns "again burst on board the 'Alexandra.'" A crack in the inner tube does not necessarily render a gun unserviceable, and it is not necessary to take au sérieux all the criticisms of "English Service papers."

Summing-up the forces arrayed against us, Colonel Vogt states, "We are not alone in the professional world in thinking" that the expedition "should have mustered at least thirty thousand men." But our force did actually number thirty-two thousand, and in spite of the opinion of the "retired officer staying in Cairo," we are now holding Egypt with less than a fifth of the force he considers necessary for the purpose.

After a slight sketch of Egypt and the Egyptians, Colonel Vogt devotes a chapter to the British Army, to which we turn with some expectancy. He is severe on the cost of our small Army, which he compares with that of Germany. But, even setting aside the great difference of conditions, the cost of a voluntarily enlisted force must be greater than that of a conscript army; while, in these comparisons, the loss of producing power to the country which resorts to conscription is never set to the other side of the account. The training of our Infantry is unquestionably indifferent, but that our Cavalry and Artillery are "slow" cannot be so easily admitted. Lord Wolseley will probably be amused to learn that his "envious opponents . . . wish to refer to his Irish descent, rather than to moral causes, the daring assurance of his character." Colonel Vogt condemns the conduct of affairs at Alexandria prior to the descent on the Suez Canal, and the reconnaissances towards Kafr Dowar furnish him with a text for something like a sneer. It should be remembered, however, that the numerous correspondents had not much to write about, and that though they naturally magnified operations "which by Germans would be called a slight engagement of outposts," English officers were perfectly well aware of the relative importance of these little affairs. There is, moreover, some confusion as to Sir A. Alison's reconnaissance of August 5th, the only really serious attempt to approach the Egyptian position. The telegram quoted from the Temps, stating, "To-day the Egyptians did not answer the fire of the English," clearly refers to the day on which Colonel Vogt says it was sent—the 8th—and it is consequently absurd to say "this does not bear out the account . . . of which the English papers made so much." Nor does it seem quite fair to describe our proceedings at this period as "aimless and halting," since, it having been most wisely decided to operate on the Ismailia-Cairo line, there was really nothing to be done but to hold on and wait for the transports. Again, it is hardly correct to say that "a considerable amount of initiative was shown by the Egyptians." The latter might have harassed our outposts to death, but considerably forebore to do so, and their "initiative" was practically limited to spade work, mostly by the forced labour of civilians. The correspondent of the Daily Telegraph must have peculiar views of coast defences, to have stated that "some of the works," at Aboukir, "are certainly as strong as the forts of Portsmouth." We wonder if the Germans will really believe this. The correspondent may be excused, as he had only seen the works from the deck of the 'Decoy,' but now that we know all about these works—it was possible for any one to ride over them during the latter half of September—it seems useless to quote conjectures formed at the time. Characterising the seizure of the Canal on August 20th as "a happy combination," Colonel Vogt quickly disposes of M. de Lesseps. "No General could or would allow himself to be deterred from his appointed task by any protests from private individuals." But will Germans generally endorse the view,—"England can come to no other conclusion than that she ought to keep possession of this important maritime passage; important not only for herself, but for the whole world, as well for commercial as for military purposes"? The events on the Ismailia-Tel-el-Kebir line are briefly and not very carefully sketched. Thus, with regard to Salihyeh communicating with Kassassin by a "straight road"—perfectly straight, since, having got the right line, there was nothing to do but to keep straight on in order to get there—we are first told that "to garrison it would have weakened more important positions," but a little later on, "in the double position of the Egyptians at Tel-el-Kebir and Salihyeh lay an immense tactical strength."

Of course, we have the old story that the infantry were saved from destruction at Kassassin by Colonel Drury-Lowe's cavalry; this was to be expected. In blaming Lord Wolseley for losing time—"full four days"—after his landing, we think that Colonel Vogt does not fully realise the condition of things. To suppose, as he seems to do, that it would have been possible to land and rush straight at Tel-el-Kebir argues a want of appreciation of the difficulties of the country. Lord Wolseley had not only to put an Army Corps on shore, but to use a little wharf, inferior to the pier of a Thames penny steamboat, as the base from which military stores of all kinds and every requisite of life, except water, had to be sent to the front. Moreover, the distance was full thirty miles of bare desert, some of it terribly bad marching-ground, while the heat was extreme. There were, in fact, conditions which no German army has yet been called upon to face, and short though the distance and small the numbers, measured by European standards, it is hardly correct to say "the provisioning of so small a force could have been easily managed." Later, however, Colonel Vogt seems to realise the difficulties more fully, but it is impossible to accept his estimate that three pack mules in a desert can carry as much as a cart on a European chaussée.

The battle of Tel-el-Kebir is described in the words of the correspondent of the Standard, who manages to get the Highland Brigade on the wrong side of the Sweet-water Canal. Colonel Vogt seems to think the attack something of a risk, but hints that Lord Wolseley may have wished to "silence all such voices" as that of the wise "officer of high rank at Alexandria," who, according to the Times, disapproved of the transfer of base to Ismailia, apparently preferring to place the flooded Nile, spanned only by bridges, which Arabi could have destroyed in a few hours, between the English forces and their objective, Cairo. Or perhaps "English gold" had "smoothed the way to success." Lord Wolseley's success is, however, admitted to be the "justification of his means," while the energy shown in following up the victory—to our mind, the greatest proof of military genius he has ever shown—is allowed to deserve "unmeasured praise." The narrative is now rapidly wound up, not without numerous errors, more or less important. It is sufficient to notice one, probably derived from a study of the "Service papers":—"All the machinery of the War Office has again proved unwieldy and impractical. Its influence, which obstructed and narrowed the free action of the Army, was scarcely counterbalanced by the inferiority of the enemy and the bravery of the British troops." Granted that the machinery of the War Office is so unwieldy as to render real Army reform almost hopeless, none the less is it true that in no war in which we have been engaged for many years has that unwieldiness been less felt, the free action of the Army less hampered, or the General more trusted and independent.

HENDRIK CONSCIENCE.*

THE novelists who stood highest in the estimation of the present generation of readers are rapidly disappearing. It almost seems as if envious Time, passing over the cyphers, were determined to obliterate, first of all, the indicating figures. A couple of weeks ago, we had to deplore the death of Tourgénief; we are now forced to speak of Hendrik Conscience as gone from us. Neither of these men will soon be forgotten, yet were we compelled to choose between their respective claims to grateful memory, we would venture to assert that the sweet healthfulness of the Fleming is more valuable to humanity than the rare literary talent of the Russian.

Hendrik Conscience was born at Antwerp in 1815; his father was a Frenchman, his mother a Fleming. This fact deserves notice, for, while in his boyhood, Flemish was used almost exclusively in familiar intercourse, yet French was looked upon with something more than respect, as the speech of the educated. Young Conscience was fortunate in being able to learn both languages thoroughly; his first literary attempts, however, were made in French. While yet a boy, he wrote some spirited little songs, which may still be heard from time to time in the streets of Antwerp. But in 1830 the revolution took place, and the uprising of the Flemish people was followed by a revival of Flemish literature. In 1838, Conscience published a historical novel in Flemish, entitled De Leeuw van Vlaenderen, "The

* Author of "The Lion of Flanders," "Veva; or, the War of the Peasants," "The Miser," "The Poor Nobleman," "The Conscript," &c.

Lion of Flanders," and this work made the young man famous. From beginning to end the book is merely an expression of patriotic feeling, yet this fact alone is sufficient to explain its enormous success. All honours were shown by the nation to the interpreter of the national enthusiasm; Conscience was made Keeper of the Records of the City of Antwerp and Registrar of its Academy of Arts. Six years later he was called to fill a Chair in the University of Ghent, and appointed by the King teacher of Flemish to the Royal children. Shortly afterwards, he was appointed Curator of the Wiertz Museum, at Brussels, which lucrative post he held until his death.

Conscience was not so widely esteemed and so protected without good reason. For thirty years he wrote indefatigably, yet neither the quantity nor the quality of his work bears such testimony to his industry as does the steady improvement visible throughout. Each novel was better than the preceding one. In The Progress of a Painter, he reveals to those who read between the lines how severely he judged his own productions, and how determined he was to accept from himself nothing less than his best. His humility, his industry, are both due to the earnestness and height of his aspiration. "The enthusiasm of my youth," he writes, "and the labours of my manhood were rooted in my love for my country." To raise Flanders, is to him the first, the holiest of all aims. But Flemish freedom is threatened by the power of France; accordingly, the two best historical novels of Conscience depict uprisings of the Flemish people against French despotism. In the quarrel between Edward I. of England and Philip of France, Guy, Count of Flanders, sided with Edward; and when Edward was recalled to make head against Wallace, Philip conquered Flanders. The scene of The Lion of Flanders opens at this moment. In the novel, we are shown how the whole country, from Artois to Zealand, revolted against the foreign foe, and how the French yoke was broken at Courtrai. The faults of the book are mainly due to the dislike which Conscience has for the French; his antipathy to them throws an air of exaggeration over the characters, and is so naïvely consistent as to be amusing.

In Veva; or, the War of the Peasants, the scene opens in the last years of the eighteenth century. It will be remembered how the French Republican forces overran Flanders, and at Jemappes, in 1792, tore the Netherlands from Austria. The Flemings at first received the invaders well, and fraternised with the apostles of liberty; but love soon changed into hate. The Conservative Flemings might have borne the abolition of all titles and privileges of nobility, but they could not be expected to like the new taxes levied under a foreign authority better than they had liked the old ones; and when the home-loving peasants were forced by the conscription into the French Army, secret disaffection became open revolt. The conscripts fled to the woods, the peasants gathered into bands, and engaged in guerrilla warfare against the invaders. Flanders became another La Vendée. The heroic but ineffectual resistance forms the theme of The War of the Peasants. As a fiction, this book is far superior to The Lion of Flanders. The plot is not so closely fettered to history, and the story gains more in dramatic unity than it loses in regard to historical accuracy. In both books the feeling is genuine, in both the style is vivid and picturesque, but in the later work the author has mastered his material, and the language, in ease and sobriety, is that of an artist in words. The book won for its author a world-wide reputation, and the French nobly replied to the attacks of Conscience, by being the first to admire the writer. Love of country manifesting itself in the desire for national independence was, as we have seen, the enthusiasm of the early manhood of Conscience; but patriotism, to him, came to mean something more than the mere desire of freedom.

In what may be called his second period, Conscience devotes his powers directly to the task of social regeneration. Already in his historical novels he had shown his sympathy with the democratic leanings of his age by choosing his heroes from among peasants and artisans; he now sets himself to depict the suffering of the poor and to define its cause. In such novels as De Giergaerd ("The Miser"), De Arme Edelman ("The Poor Nobleman"), &c., he is determined "to apply the glowing steel to the cankered wounds of which society is dying." Now, in defining the cause of these wounds, Conscience gives proof of high intelligence:—

"The detestable doctrine," he writes, "that gold is chiefly to be desired, annihilates the very idea of self-sacrifice, of duty, of virtue. It is the death of all love, all honour, all endurance. The first-fruits of this creed have already been gathered. And so we find growing to-day in man, with ever-increasing rapidity, the instincts he has in common with the brutes, bodily lusts, material longings, together with an ever keener jealousy and envy of others."

The feeling of Conscience is here almost as intense as that of Ruskin, or even as that of Carlyle:—

"Since the higher classes themselves acknowledge that they have no other right to their money than the simple fact of possession, since they deny and decry personal worth, since they affirm that gold is powerful enough to transform a blockhead into a man of influence, why shouldn't the masses strive to take possession of this mighty gold, even by main force? For when once they have it, the end justifies the means; they are absolved by the mere fact of success. . . . Riches should be looked upon as a power which can only be hallowed by being consecrated to good, noble, and worthy ends."

After the warning comes the appeal. In book after book—such as Wat cene Moeder Lyden Kan ("How a Mother can Suffer")—he sketches the suffering, the degradation of poverty; again and again he shows how unselfish deeds react upon the doer, to the purification of the character. Yet Conscience does not shut his eyes to the continuity of time, or of the process of development. He sees that the progress made in one age may cost it far too dearly, and yet that the step taken may be fruitful of unmixed benefit to the future. He, therefore, looks with sympathy upon the material progress of the present day. All the world knows how the Flemish peasant reclaimed from sterility that desert tract which lies between Antwerp and Venloo, how the industry of man turned the sand of an ancient sea into fertile land. All the world knows, too, how Conscience has described the conquest:—

"That brave and toilsome peasantry stirred up the sterile depths, and watered them with their sweat; they summoned science and industry to their aid, drained marshes, diverted the streamlets that descend from the highlands towards the Meuse, and put them in circulation through innumerable arteries to fatten and enrich the land. What a glorious fight it was of man against matter. Our descendants will hardly believe their own eyes when they behold a golden sea of corn or a dale of green grass where we have seen the sun mirrored in water, or on the glass-like surface of shining flint-sand."

There are some who will infer from these extracts that Conscience was rather a patriot and social reformer than an artist in the proper sense of the word; nor up to the end of this, which may be called the second period of his life, would Conscience himself have denied the impeachment; years, however, bring the "philosophic mind," and in later life Conscience became aware that the artist's mission was something other than that of a teacher in a Kindergarten. "Does not the poet know by a sure and swift insight all things that are, and is it not his task to depict them?" Of Conscience as an artist, we shall say but little. Yet, inasmuch as we have made mention of his best work in the other lines of his activity, we cannot refrain altogether from speaking of his novel, The Conscript, as of a work not unworthy of the author of The Mill on the Floss. There is, indeed, a difference of race between Maggie Tulliver and Trine (short for "Catherine"); a difference, too, in the cadre of the picture, for Trine is a peasant-girl who can only write with infinite difficulty; but yet we venture to think that no other hand in Europe in the last forty years could have given us Trine, save only the hand of George Eliot. As Gretchen is the perfect German peasant-girl, so Trine is the ideal Flemish one; and if both George Eliot and Conscience are greatly inferior to Goethe, their place is yet high enough, for they both stand in the first rank of European novelists. The fountains, too, of their enthusiasm may be traced to a common source; that "love of man" which was the religion of the English-woman, resulted often in effects closely resembling those due to the Christian sympathy with all that suffers so deeply felt by the Fleming. This comparison with George Eliot is the best we can make. In both, there is the same humour, the same exactitude of healthy realism; in both, the realism is used as a foundation on which to rear a superstructure of emotion and thought; their methods are similar, it would ill become an Englishman to compare the results. Yet it may be said, in regard to style, that while the instrument used by George Eliot is far superior to that used by Conscience, the Fleming is undoubtedly the greater artist. To the homely vigour of the Teuton he has added the gracefulness, the measure, which are peculiar to the best French prose.

To compare Conscience to any other Flemish author would be to pay him a poor compliment, yet something may be done in this way, too, to define his position. As in England the return can be traced from the pessimism of Byron to the earnestness of George Eliot, so this rhythm in Flanders may be measured by comparing the "Lucifer" of Vondel to the writings of Conscience. Nothing can be added to his reputation, whether as author or as man. He was regarded by the ablest critics with admiration, and his books have been translated into German, Italian, French, and English. Thousands of readers think of him with what must be called affection, and the secret of this supreme success must be sought in the sweetness of his nature. It is no small tribute to the inherent truth and beauty of the man's character, that we are compelled to use his own words when trying to describe him,—“I am one whom God endowed, at least, with moral energy, and with a vast instinct of affection.”

AN AMERICAN VIEW OF ENGLAND.*

THE judgment passed by eminent foreigners upon England is always interesting and instructive. To see ourselves as others see us should be the wish of a nation, as well as of an individual. Many of our faults, indeed, are visible enough, without the spectacles of strangers. Our strength is sometimes the source of our weakness. We are too proud, too prone to be contentious, too apt to suppose that we must invariably be right and all who differ from us wrong, too ready to think that the wide earth is made for the special benefit of the English race, that,— “Seas roll to waft us, suns to light us rise,

Our footstool earth, our canopy the skies.”

All honest criticism, then, ought to be welcome, and when it comes to us from America, and from two of the most original and thoughtful men America has produced, it has a value which is not limited to the time in which it was written.

The volumes before us, as all our readers know, have been, though perhaps in a less attractive form, for many years before the public. Emerson's first visit to England was in 1833, the year in which the first Reformed House of Parliament assembled; a second visit was paid in 1847, and the result of these visits is to be found in English Traits, in which the writer expresses his opinion of what he saw with remarkable vividness and force. With the exception of an interval chiefly spent in Italy, Hawthorne lived in England from the spring of 1853 to the summer of 1860. Our Old Home appeared after his return to the States. He had taken notes abundantly while with us, and these notes, which convey the first impressions of an original mind, are even more interesting than the carefully written book formed with their assistance. We are glad that a new edition of the works of Emerson and of Hawthorne published simultaneously in this country affords us an opportunity of returning to volumes which can never cease to charm.

They differ considerably in character. Emerson takes, for the most part, a rapid glance at certain points in our life which strike him most forcibly. To see England well, he says, needs a hundred years; and he is content to take a broad view of the land and the race, marking our peculiar characteristics and the secret of our power, our faults and virtues, our literature and religion, our foreign policy and domestic life. Hawthorne notes these traits, too, in his own delightful way, but he loves to loiter about towns and villages, to enter churches and cathedrals, to visit almshouses and cottages, to explore the hidden recesses of the country, and to express his affection, not wholly untempered with another feeling, for whatever age has made venerable. To both writers, England is emphatically the “Old Home,” and even their fault-finding is that of sons proud of a worthy parent. Let us note cursorily some of the opinions they express about this little island and its inhabitants.

Forty years ago, Emerson was struck by the patriotism of the race, by the way in which we held together, by our trust in each other; and he observes that difference of rank does not divide the national heart. In politics and war, he says, Englishmen hold together as by hooks of steel. He is struck, too, with “the fine physique and personal vigour of this robust race,” and regards as one source of our power the dislike of change. “As soon,” he writes, as Englishmen “have rid themselves of some grievance, and settled the better practice, they make haste to fix it as a finality, and never wish to hear of alteration more.” But we are too stiff and precise, and “in this Gibraltar of propriety, mediocrity gets entrenched and consolidated and founded in adamant.” As compared with Americans, the Englishman is said to be cheerful and contented; when he wishes for amusement he goes to work, and his hilarity is like an attack of fever. One of his highest virtues is the love of truth and liberty, one of his most grievous defects the homage paid to gold; yet Emerson might have added that in a country like England rank shares the homage with wealth, whereas the millionaire in America shines by his wealth alone. The frame of our society is, he says, aristocratic, the taste of the people loyal, and, he adds, “English history is aristocracy with the doors open. Who has courage and faculty, let him come in.”

As a republican, Emerson sees the good as well as evil side of an aristocracy; the Church of England, on the contrary, though praised for many virtues, is viewed only on one side. To him, it is not a living power, but an institution existing on tradition, and, moreover, inextricably connected “with the cause of public order, with politics and the funds.” With this able writer's creed, or rather lack of creed, such a conclusion is inevitable; but he is just in pointing out several palpable evils in Church organisation. The growth, however, that of late years has perceptibly influenced the National Church is the best reply to Emerson's animadversion, and already many of his once forcible words on the subject have the decay of age upon them. The loyalty to truth for which he praises us generously in one chapter can be scarcely said to agree with the inference that in accepting the Church of England, to which the English are passionately attached, they are content to “take in a lie” at the same time. We are dreadfully given to cant, he says; but cant means hypocrisy, a vice incompatible with the pervading love of truth for which he gives us credit. If it hurts our self-love to be informed that we have a taint of hypocrisy in the blood, it is cheering to be told by an American of Emerson's high mark that only the English race can be trusted with freedom, that our culture is not an outside varnish, that England has yielded more able men in five hundred years than any other nation, and that if the American system is more democratic and humane, “yet the American people do not yield better or more able men, or more inventions, or books, or benefits, than the English.” “Congress,” adds Emerson, “is not wiser or better than Parliament.”

There is a solid value in the English Traits which we respect and admire, but we do not know that these masterly sketches of English character give us a greater interest in the author. Hawthorne, though he sees some of our faults as vividly as Emerson, and gives us many hard hits, attracts us to him irresistibly. The reason is not far to seek. American though he be to the backbone, his affection for England is that of a lover and a child, and he has a hundred things to say about her that make us proud and pleased. He declares, indeed, that he can never in a foreign land forget the distinction between English and American. Why should he? But he says also, on leaving England for Italy, that “it seems a cold and shivering thing to go anywhere else.” And with what heartiness does he appreciate the beauty of our scenery! Nay, he has even kind words for the climate, the only thing belonging to Englishmen, he says slyly, of which they are not proud. A perfect summer day in England is exquisite enough, he observes, “to atone for the whole year's atmospherical delinquencies. Italy has nothing like it, nor America.” And the beauty of England makes him desperate, so impossible is it to describe it. To be reproduced with pen and pencil, “it requires to be dwelt upon long, and to be wrought out with the nicest touches.” Again, writing of Wordsworth's country, Hawthorne says:—

“I question whether any part of the world looks so beautiful as England—this part of England, at least—on a fine summer morning. It makes one think the more cheerfully of human life, to see such a bright, universal verdure; such sweet, rural, peaceful, flower-bordered cottages—not cottages of gentility, but dwellings of the labouring poor; such nice villas along the road-side, so tastefully contrived for comfort and beauty, and adorned more and more, year after year, with the care and after-thought of people who mean to live in them a great while, and feel as if their children might live in them also, and so they plant trees to overshadow their walks, and train ivy and all beautiful vines up against their walls, and there live for the future in another sense than we Americans do. . . . Certainly, England can present a more attractive face than we can.”

Passages like this, some of them longer, and all expressing a tender and affectionate sympathy with the beauty of the “Old Home,” occur frequently. But this sympathy is not confined to natural objects. For London, the dream-city of his youth, Hawthorne at once acquired a home-feeling. He found it better than his dream, and is never weary of losing himself in its streets, and wandering without any particular object in view. St. Paul's appeared to him "unspeakably grand and noble, standing in sublime repose in the very heart and densest tumult of London." He was struck with its airy spaces, and observes that, unlike a Gothic church, it is full of light, and that light is proper to it:—

"It is a most stately edifice, and its characteristic seems to be to continue for ever fresh and new; whereas, such a church as Westminster Abbey must have been as venerable as it is now from the first day when it grew to be an edifice at all. How wonderful man is in his works! How glad I am that there can be two such admirable churches, in their opposite styles, as St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey!"

To St. Paul's he returns again and again, always with fresh delight; and of the Abbey he says, "I think I never could be weary of it; and when I finally leave England, it will be this spot which I shall feel most unwilling to quit for ever."

This genuine enthusiasm is felt by Hawthorne for all the "things of fame" he finds scattered so thickly throughout England. "The world," he says, "surely has not another place like Oxford; it is a despair to see such a place and ever to leave it, for it would take a lifetime, and more than one, to comprehend and enjoy it satisfactorily." York Minster impressed him as the most wonderful work which ever came from the hands of man, and the view of Durham "was grand, venerable, and sweet all at once." Of the great Cathedrals, Hawthorne writes with a sensibility and a glow of feeling which we who have them so near to us, and can see them so often, may perhaps fail to comprehend.

It would be unjust to conclude from the few passages quoted that Hawthorne has a universal affection for everything English. He sees plenty to blame in our institutions, as we have already intimated, and thinks that they are by no means so stable as they seem to be. On many social evils, which bode ill for the future of the country, he writes with something like indignation; but for the island itself, and for the lovely objects on it, he has little to say but what is good. And while writing less of people than of places, he does express frankly and warmly the kindness he received from all sorts and conditions of men in England, and not from those only who could appreciate his peculiar genius. He says, indeed, that an American seldom feels quite as if he were at home among the English people; but this sentiment, it is evident, had no strong hold upon him. Hawthorne was a very reserved man, and did not thaw to strangers readily, but when once the heart was touched no one could be more genial. The friendship felt for him by many in this country was undoubtedly reciprocal, and the confidence of friendship carries with it as few things else can, the sense of home. After all, the obvious fact remains that England can never be what the States are to an American, and it would have been strange if, in the sad moments which come inevitably to a spirit finely touched like Hawthorne's, he had not felt the loneliness of a stranger in a land that was not his.

This imperfect notice of volumes that deserve to be universally read has been written with a special purpose, and we shall end it, after the custom of the old fabulists, with a moral. If to Americans England be the most interesting country in the Old World, what should it be to ourselves? Its beauty is exhaustless, its associations numberless, its objects of interest so varied that every taste may be gratified, and yet foreign travel has such mystic charms—and we are far from saying it is without its charms—that thousands of wealthy Englishmen spend their time and wealth upon the Continent year after year, whose knowledge of their native land is confined to places devoted to fashion or to sport. "One may have lived in much larger countries," says Mr. Louis Jennings, "but there are none which it takes so long to get tired of as England." This is true, but the men and women to whom we are alluding do not prefer foreign travel because they are weary of their native country, but because they know so little about it.

SELF-CONDEMNED.*

WE can most of us contemplate with equanimity, if not with satisfaction, the endurance by others of the punishment their misdeeds entail, and it is possible that some choice spirits may experience a kind of logical though grim joy in suffering the penalties attached to their own bad actions. But few persons, we fancy, are to be found possessed of the stern courage displayed by the heroine of these volumes, who judges herself mercilessly, without regard to any of the extenuating circumstances which the reader perceives so easily, and turns the key upon herself in a sort of moral gaol for what, after all, seems to be no very dire offence. It is advisable, no doubt, to be well off with the old love before being on with the new, and a pretty woman cannot be too careful of the manner in which she distributes her smiles; but Katherine Carey was not really guilty of the offence implied in these trite warnings, nor responsible for the unhappy results of the offence she actually committed. She supposed herself to be in love with Roger Hackblock, but this was before she knew what love meant, and she had, besides, been so brought up by her parents, whose interests were bound up in the match, that she came to regard herself as destined by a sort of natural process to become Mrs. Hackblock, in due course. Nor was the son of the senior partner in the big blacking house of Hackblock, Higgins, and Hackblock possessed of any of the attractions, physical or mental, which young ladies, in or out of novels, usually look for in their lovers. He had a large, bony, flattened nose, eyes of a "cold, unspeculative, unkindly blue-grey," coarse, characterless mouth, and equine teeth. It was too plain he was "one of the great army of Philistines," of whom it could be foreseen that he "would live and die a hard, calculating, money-making machine," spending his whole life and energies in making a large fortune larger, and looking upon all originality as proof of knavery or lunacy. How could such a man hope to find favour in the eyes of a girl of whom a single glimpse, as she distributed strawberries to a group of ragged urchins in a dull Westminster street, drew from Lewis Barrington, successful writer of novels, leading articles, and plays, the energetic exclamation, "If ever I marry, that shall be the woman!" Lewis Barrington meant what he said, and early in the second volume becomes the accepted lover. How could it be otherwise? He had none of the defects Roger had, and possessed most of the virtues and good qualities Roger had not. Then Katherine's troubles begin. She loses her mother, to whom she is tenderly attached. Her father, who is a partner in the Hackblock firm, is turned out, upon the discovery by mère Hackblock of his daughter's passion for Barrington, and dies penniless and miserable. Katherine, considering herself the cause of these disasters, refuses to see her lover, and takes a situation as a sort of help in the household of a good-natured, but fidgety and whimsical old lady, full of æsthetic oddities, who makes life a burden to all around her. At last, however, she relents, and permits herself to enjoy a vision of happiness. But terrible events tread close upon the heels of this concession, and once more she condemns herself to a punishment which has become harder than ever to bear, and which to us seems less than ever merited. Of the final result we shall say no more than that we trust we have discovered in a phrase used by a friend of Katherine's—page 282 of the third volume—the right solution of the problem suggested by Barrington's exclamation at the beginning of the first.

At Mrs. Hunt's treatment of her heroine we must confess to feeling a little indignant. Barrington, despite his literary talents, rouses no admiration in us. He is a selfish fellow, does nothing great or noble, and condescends to adopt a mean disguise for the purpose of procuring an interview with Katherine, whence flow all her miseries. Her one fault, the weakness she showed on this occasion, is surely visited far too heavily; and it is with scant justice, artistic or other, that she is made the scapegoat for the sins of her relations and lovers, without compensation and with little commiseration. We can but trust that in that fourth volume which will never be written, she is enjoying all the happiness which the undeserved calamities that have befallen her in the three we have before us entitle her to claim.

For the rest, having gulped down our indignation at the hard measure allotted to the heroine, we can honestly say that Mrs. Hunt has written a most amusing novel. Intertwined with the fortunes of Katherine and her lover are those of a delightful artist, Frank Davenport, and his even more delightful wife, Nancy. Davenport is one of the numerous class who make money with difficulty, and spend it with ease. No sooner does he find his purse weighted with a little cash than he runs off to buy knick-knacks, amber necklaces, and Japanese dresses for his wife (who is in sad want the while of flannel petticoats), and on one occasion an immense carved and gilt bed, which fills up their bedroom, but which he declares it is an education in art to sleep in. It must, however, be added that his moral perception is less keen than his artistic, for to Nancy's distressing cough and haggard looks, due in great measure to the various domestic worries his thriftlessness causes her, he pays little attention. There are moral Philistines, we fear, to be found among those who consider themselves least akin to the dwellers in Gath and Askelon. Some of the sketches of certain aspects of modern society are most amusing, showing a good deal of observation in their gentle sarcasm, and a lightness and picturesqueness of touch that add both to their truth and interest. Katherine, in her palmy days, takes it into her head that she would like to know something about cooking. So away she trips to South Kensington, that home of the utile et dulce, and in a "plain morning-dress, large apron, with pocket, bib, and brown-holland sleeves," feels "quite a good little kitchen-maid." There she learns to scrub pots and pans, make currant dumplings and daintier dishes, and is in the act of tracing scales on the back of a portion of fish and mashed potatoes, moulded into the form of a haddock, when her occupation is put an end to by the sudden apparition of Lewis Barrington. A motley crew enough were her fellow-students. Servants who wanted to improve themselves, mistresses who wanted to know how to teach their servants, young ladies with much time on their hands who wanted to do something with it,—all under the dominion of a couple of servants, and a "handsome lady-superintendent." "The real ladies accepted the work which was given them, and set about doing it with hearty good-will, saying little or nothing about dirt or difficulty." But the would-be ladies,—

"Tried to assume the airs of princesses driven out of their kingdoms, and kept up a continual buzz of exclamation to the servants, to themselves, and to every one who came in their way, about the strangeness of finding themselves doing such menial work. . . . Most of them showed a strong disposition to avoid all contact with base metals, by wearing cheap, dirty-white kid gloves. None of them had apparently ever been brought face to face with a black pan before, nor did any seem to have been positively informed that kitchen utensils did not clean themselves."

The description of a haymaking fête, too, is capital. The hay-field was hired for the occasion; the young ladies wore pink calico and white sun-bonnets, the gentlemen blue blouses and straw hats, into which they put themselves with a certain shamefacedness. They soon got tired of forking the hay, and cried out for rakes, as more picturesque. Of course there was not much haymaking done, and the farmer had to call in a troop of buxom village lasses to complete the task; but there was a good deal of lunching, popping of champagne corks, and various merriment, just dashed with a notion of labour, to lend a sort of reality to the play. The most finished portrait in the book is perhaps that of Mrs. Wilbraham, with whom Katherine found a refuge after her father's death in the capacity of a companion or help. Her principal occupation consisted in looking after the æsthetic education of all about her. She maddened her housemaids by making them quit dust-pan and broom to look at a fine rainbow-effect, wanted to have her meals in the garden, that the servants might have the opportunity of smelling the fragrance of flowers and hearing the song of birds, and desired them to put no starch in their petticoats, that the natural beauty of the lines of the figure might not be distorted or hidden. With a true love of beauty and considerable cleverness she is nevertheless silly, the type of a too numerous class who hang about the confines of art, and imagine themselves entitled, by reason of a certain impressionability they possess, unaccompanied by any power of expression, to regard the rest of the world as mere Philistines. Despite her foolishness, however, Mrs. Wilbraham, by dint of natural honesty and unselfish simplicity, completely foils the grim Mrs. Hackblock in an amusing conversation on the subject of Katherine's enormities, which will be found in the third volume. It is on the sketches of surrounding life it contains that Mrs. Hunt's book will depend for its popularity. She has a firm, graceful touch, a command of good-natured sarcasm, and an easy, fluent style that prevent her from ever being dull, or often common-place. But she is unequal, her work lacks completeness, and she does not always take the trouble to do justice to her evident powers.

FOLK-ETYMOLOGY.*

"MAN," says the compiler of this valuable and entertaining dictionary, "is an etymologising animal. He abhors the vacuum of an unmeaning word. If it seems lifeless, he reads a new soul into it, and often, like an unskilful necromancer, spirits the wrong soul into the wrong body." Allowance made for any error that may lurk in these metaphors, Mr. Palmer's propositions are undeniable. Men are fond of etymological investigations, and are prone to err in making them. Dugald Stewart was of opinion that they are hardly worth making at all. He regarded them as unfavourable to elegance of composition, refined taste, or enlargement of the mental faculties, and he dwelt with some plausibility upon the ill-effect which they might conceivably have with respect to our poetical vocabulary:—

"Few words," he said, "in our language have been used more happily by some of our older poets than harbinger; more particularly by Milton, whose Paradise Lost has rendered even the organical sound pleasing to the fancy,—

'And now of love they treat, till th' evening star,
Love's harbinger, appear'd.'

How powerful are the associations which such a combination of ideas must establish in the memory of every reader capable of feeling their beauty; and what a charm is communicated to the word, thus blended in its effect with such pictures as those of the evening star, and of the loves of our first parents. When I look into Johnson for the etymology of harbinger, I find it is derived from the Dutch herberger, which denotes one who goes to provide lodgings or a harbour for those who follow. Whoever may thank the author for this conjecture, it certainly will not be the lover of Milton's poetry. The injury, however, which is here done to the word in question is slight, in comparison to what it would have been, if its origin had been traced to some root in our own language equally ignoble and resembling it as nearly in point of orthography."

The Scotch philosopher would have strengthened his position if he had written "far more ignoble," instead of "equally ignoble." But nothing can render the position itself impregnable. As Mr. Garnett points out, the principle involved in it would make us quarrel with half of our national vocabulary, which must, in the nature of things, have been applied to low and familiar objects, when it was the language of a rude and barbarous people. Readers who are familiar with the essays of this admirable philologist will remember how aptly he illustrated his own remark with "the yeasty waves" of Shakespeare, and how brusquely he disposed of the critic who would quarrel with that forcible and appropriate epithet on account of its connection with malt, hops, and beer-barrels. Horne Tooke's assumption that words ought always to be used in their primitive signification is absurd enough. But it is quite as absurd to suppose that anything can be gained by shutting one's eyes to that primitive significance, when a clear sight of it is still attainable. There are some, perhaps, who may be shocked to learn from Mr. Palmer's dictionary that the words "good" and "God" are not etymologically connected. Others may be vexed to learn that "Sweet Cicely," that pretty name for the plant Myrrhis odorata, so suggestive of old English country life and fair milkmaids, has no more to do with the feminine name "Cicely" than "Sweet Alison" has to do with the old form of Alice. But all may do as Prospero bid Miranda do, and rest collected in the assurance that Mr. Palmer's wand is as beneficent as that of "the rightful Duke of Milan." We are speaking broadly, and would by no means imply by this remark that we assent to all the corrections of folk or popular etymology that are proposed by Mr. Palmer. This is far from being the case. But we regard his book as a valuable contribution to philology, and philology as a study which, when treated in an enlightened and philosophical spirit, is worthy of all the exertion of the subtlest as well as most comprehensive intellect. It happens, also, that Mr. Palmer approaches this study on its most attractive side. His book is not "caviare to the general," and may be dipped into with pleasure and profit by readers who have small Latin and less Greek. Those who understand it best will like it best, of course; but the merest tyro in book-lore will find something to amuse and instruct him in each of its six hundred pages.

It is time, however, that we should give from these pages a specimen or two of that "verbal pathology" which they diagnose, on the whole, so well. The plant whose name in Greek is κентаύριον, in Latin, "centaurea," in French, "centaurée," in English, "centaury," appears in German as "Tausendgüldenkraut" (the "thousand-gulden-plant"). But how? Well, approximately speaking, a "gulden" was about equal to our florin, and a Roman "aureus" to our pound. A hundred "aurei," therefore, equal a thousand florins. It is bootless to inquire whether the philologist who discerned "centum aurei" in "centaurea" did so of jocularly preposse, as Swift discerned "oat-stealer" in "ostler," or whether he was a pedant of the sixteenth-century order. It is just possible that he was not a German at all, and that this quaint error may have owed its birth to some ancient Roman legionary. Its vitality is virtually indestructible, and it is curious to think how many sick German folk may have thought that the medicinal herb which wrought them so much good was rightly named as worth its weight in gold. Our next specimen is a "corruption," if corruption indeed it be, of a very different order, though it may be said to come to us in "concatenation accordingly" through "aureus." "Aureole" is a word which we need not stop to explain. Mr. Palmer's account of it is well worth reading, and his quotation from De Quincey carries weight with it. We dissent, however, from his conclusion. He wishes us to believe that "areola" (a little halo), a diminutive of "area," is the true and original form. He refers us to "aréole," in French, but can he quote any passage from a French author where "aréole" is used in the significance of "a little halo"? Can he, and this is more to the purpose, quote any passage from a Latin author where "area" is used in the sense of a halo? We are aware, of course, from the dictionaries, that Seneca speaks of haloes as "splendores quos Graeci areas (i.e., ἄλως) vocavere." But this passage of itself proves nothing, and cannot outweigh the fact that Littré is content to derive the French "auréole" from "aureola," with "corona" understood. Littré is not infallible; but he is so righteously prompt with his origine inconnue, that we must call Mr. Palmer's attention to the fact that, misunderstanding the great French lexicographer, he has misrepresented him under the word "aspic." "Bloody Mars"—for if Nature proceeds not per saltum, we must through the remainder of this notice—is a curious corruption of "blé de Mars," and a popular name for a kind of wheat. If this wheat be not "red"—and Mr. Palmer gives no hint that it is—then the identity of the planet's name and the month's was never more curiously illustrated. Mr. Palmer rightly treats "curmudgeon" as an altered form of "cornmudgin," and takes no notice of the derivation "cœur méchant," which was supplied to Johnson by his "unknown correspondent." Neither should we, but for the amusing mistake into which it led poor Dr. Ash. Oblivious or ignorant of the fact that Johnson was acknowledging the source of his derivation, he quaintly says in his Dictionary that "curmudgeon" comes from the French "cœur," unknown, and "méchant," a correspondent!

What is a tabby cat? The dictionaries say, a striped or brinded cat, as if marked like "tabby" (tabinet), a waved or watered silk. Mr. Palmer suggests that "tabby," when applied to a cat, stands for "Tibbie," and is derived from "Tibalt," or "Tybalt" (=Theobald), the proper name for Puss in the old beast epic of the middle-ages. He is probably right; but he is wrong in quoting from De Quincey, "springs upward like a pyramid of fire;" as if De Quincey were not quoting himself from Milton a line which he felt, and rightly felt, was too well known to need marking with inverted commas. "Please the pigs" is pretty widely known to mean "Please the good folk," as the fairies were euphemistically called, and is a corruption of "Please the pixies." "Please the Pharisees" has not passed into our language, though it deserves to do so, for other and quite different reasons. Yet "Pharisees" is a popular corruption in Sussex, Hampshire, and elsewhere of "fairies," old Scotch "phairies or phareis, the guid wichtis." We shall conclude with an anecdote, quoted by Mr. Palmer, in illustration of the fact. Before doing so, we must warn intending purchasers of this book—and their name should be legion—that we have only been able to set before them a few crumbs from this "table richly spread in regal mode, with dishes piled." The Ettrick Shepherd held that there was a deal of fine confused eating in a sheep's head, and there is a deal of fine confused reading in a dictionary like this. Had such a dictionary fallen in Charles Lamb's way, he might have been moved to exempt it explicitly from those biblia a-biblia, or books that are not books, in which he has implicitly placed it. We ought, however, to say that although Mr. Palmer has very properly made a fivefold division of his corrupted words, in order to give his readers perfect contentment he ought to supplement these divisions with a general index. The anecdote is this:—"A preacher in a country village once preached on the text: 'There was a man of the Pharisees named Nicodemus. The same came to Jesus by night.' An old woman of the parish said she liked the discourse very much indeed, 'And I always did hear say, that it was by night the fairies danced on 'Harborough Hill.'"

CURRENT LITERATURE.

The British Quarterly Review. October. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—The first article in this number is Dr. Gibb's essay on "The Life and Times of St. Anselm," for such it is, only two or three pages being devoted to a brief notice of writers who have recently dealt with the same subject. The brief summary of Anselm's doctrine of the Atonement given in the concluding pages is especially excellent. Mr. Ralston deals with a topic in which he is thoroughly at home in his "Indian Stories," and gives an account of this very curious literature which will please many readers. Another important article is "Cromwell in Ireland," in which Mr. Denis Murphy's work is discussed, and, we think, very fairly discussed. Cromwell was not naturally cruel, if we may judge of him by the rest of his life, and he certainly approached nearer to true religious toleration than any of his contemporaries; and it is only reasonable, therefore, to conjecture that there must have been something exceptional in Ireland to make him, as he certainly was in his dealings with that country, both very intolerant and extremely cruel. Probably he recognised, as Elizabeth had recognised before him, that England was fighting for its life against the Papacy. If Rome had conquered, we should have had, he thought, massacres compared to which Drogheda and Wexford would have been nothing. It is a pleasure to turn from these painful themes to an admirable essay by Mr. A. M. Clerke, on "The Dog in Homer." The dog the Iliad, says Mr. Clerke, is an object of loathing and disgust. He is domesticated, indeed; witness the dogs of Priam and Patroclus, but he is ready to devour his master. The dog in the Odyssey is a miracle of fidelity, is made the subject of a most pathetic episode, and receives, for the first time in literature, the crowning honour, in the Iliad vouchsafed only to the horse, of a name. In this Mr. Clerke thinks that he finds a convincing argument for the theory of the Chhorizontes. And he proceeds to conjecture that the author of the Odyssey was a native of western Greece, familiar with the most famous breed of dogs in ancient times,—the mastiffs of Molossus, a breed that still, it seems, exists in ancient purity. The writer on "Life Insurance Finance" exposes the injustice of the "loading" system. Why should insurers be overcharged, and then compensated with a chance (which, of course, is as unprofitable to some as it is profitable to others) of getting back the excess at the quinquennial division of profits? The other articles are, "Among the Mongols," "The Four Hundredth Birthday of Luther," "Mr. Roden-Noel's Poems," "The Second Part of Faust: a Study," and the "Libert Bill." The writer of this last quotes Macaulay, who seems to have looked forward to the admission of natives to the highest civil and military positions. That is certainly "thorough." It would be a little startling to have a native commander-in-chief, with, say, another Mutiny in prospect.

READING-BOOKS.—It was certainly a happy idea to make a reading-book out of the selections which we have in the volume entitled Chapters in Popular Natural History, by Sir John Lubbock, Bart. (National Society's Depository.) The book contains six sections, the subjects of which are, "Ants," "Bees and Wasps," "The Colours of Animals," "On Flowers and Insects," "On Plants and Insects," and "Fruits and Seeds." Nothing could be more happily suggestive of those habits of observation which are so valuable to the young than such topics, and there can be no better guide than Sir John Lubbock. One incidental, but not trifling, good result from such studies may well be the prevention of aimless cruelty and waste. No one who knows how wonderfully ordered a community is contained in an ants' nest would wantonly destroy an ant-hill.—In the series of "Bell's Reading-Books," we have Gulliver's Travels (Bell and Sons), "abridged for the use of schools," and containing the Brobdignag and Lilliput voyages.—In the "Globe Readings from Standard Authors" (Macmillan and Co.) we have The Vicar of Wakefield, with a Memoir of Goldsmith, by Professor Masson. (Surely the phrase "known to have written no end of compilations" savours too much of slang to suit any serious book, much more a reading-book for the young?) Marmion, and the Lord of the Isles, with Introductions and Notes by Francis Turner Palgrave; and The Lay of the Last Minstrel, and The Lady of the Lake, by the same editor. Tales from Shakespeare, by Charles and Mary Lamb, with an Introduction by Alfred Ainger; and A Book of Golden Deeds, by Charlotte M. Yonge.—Messrs. Macmillan also publish Elementary-School Readings in the Principles of Agriculture, by Professor Henry Tanner, a reading-book which certainly promises to be useful and interesting.—In Blackwood's Educational Series, edited by Professor Meiklejohn, we have "Britain and England, from before Christ to 1154 A.D.;" and "Second Historical Reader, Standard V., England from 1154 A.D. to 1603." (Blackwood and Sons.)—We have also received Chambers's Graded Readers, Book IV. (W. and R. Chambers.)

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE French Ministry decline to issue a "Yellow Book" on Tonquin, because negotiations are still advancing, but have issued a kind of pamphlet giving a history of their progress. It is most unsatisfactory reading. It appears that the Foreign Office did, on September 6th, ask the Chinese to open the town of Man Hao, in Yunnan, as a dépôt for trade, to declare Tonquin from that point down to Sontay "neutral," and to leave the rest of Tonquin, including the Delta of the Songkoi, to them. Moreover, the neutral zone was to be governed by Anamite Mandarins, Anam being French, and French troops were to have right of entry into it at will to "repress any disorder." This offer, which was almost impudent, was peremptorily rejected by the Chinese, who on the 16th inst. proposed terms which involve the evacuation of Tonquin, and the opening of the Songkoi up to Sontay to the commerce of the world. M. Challemeil-Lacour in his turn declares these terms inadmissible, and suspends negotiations until the reinforcements have arrived, and "accomplished facts" shall have had their influence on China. The two Powers are, therefore, waiting, but not negotiating.

Most of the French papers approve the action of the Government, but the Orleanists and the Reds are very bitter. The former say the Government have left to France only the alternatives of a discreditable retreat or a disaster, while the latter denounce the notion of a war with China as monstrous. Their Chief, M. Clémenceau, intends to meet any request for a credit to send troops to Tonquin with a direct negative, and he will find, it is said, serious support, even if he takes a division, as he threatens to do, before the "credit" is formally asked for. The Government as yet hold firm, but they have not stated the amount of the credit they will ask, and are apparently waiting until their forces in Tonquin, which by November 1st will amount to 7,000 men, have performed some great feat. There are, it is said, hesitations about this feat, the Admiral in command in Tonquin having discovered that Bacninh, the first place to be attacked, is defended by heavy guns, and that his artillery will be deficient. It is probable, however, that some desperate attempt will be made, and that if the Black Flags are defeated the Chamber will give M. Ferry a majority. On the other hand, a repulse would be almost fatal to the Ministry, unless, as is hoped, M. Ferry accepts the decision of the Chamber, changes his Foreign Minister, and turns his attention wholly to domestic affairs.

The Daily News states that the business of the Cabinet Council called on Thursday was to consider and accept a settlement of the Shaw incident offered by France. The French Government will pay Mr. Shaw £1,000 as compensation, and express regret that he should have been detained. If this is correct, which we do not doubt, the French Foreign Office must be considered to have behaved well. They were scarcely responsible for an Admiral in such a condition of health, the fire eaters round them were eagerly advising resistance, and they knew that the British Government was most loth to accept any new ground of quarrel. They were, however, gravely in the wrong, and in acknowledging this they showed a self-restraint more creditable than most of their recent proceedings. The compensation, though not large, is sufficient, and to have haggled would have been unworthy of the British Government, more especially as the fact of the payment will protect all Englishmen in Madagascar against the irritability which seems for the moment to have mastered the French marine. The Consular incident at Tamatave is not settled yet, but it does not involve any claim to compensation.

Mr. James Lowther is our favourite Tory speaker. He made a speech at Coventry, yesterday week, which ought to be reprinted and distributed by the Liberal Associations all over the country. In it, Mr. Lowther boasted that he had never been "one of those to bow the knee to the Baal of falsely-called Free-trade,—on the other hand, he had always denounced it as the most leviathan impostor of modern times, sacrificing the interests of the United Kingdom for the purpose of pandering to the interests of those who did not own the sway of her Majesty." How Sir Stafford Northcote must groan over these speeches of Mr. Lowther's! What use is it trying to persuade the nation that his is the cautious and reasonable party, when Mr. James Lowther is sure to make a speech just before or just after him which excites ten times as much cheering as his own because it virtually represents the late Sir Robert Peel as a priest of Baal, who ruined England to serve the foreigner?

On Monday, Sir Stafford Northcote replied, at Carnarvon, to an address from the Conservative Associations of the six counties of North Wales, and attempted to comfort them for their small success in imbuing that country with Conservative views by representing that, though Wales is certainly not Conservative, yet, by all the principles of traditional usage, it certainly ought to be so. Wales was the cradle of the British Empire; long before the Norman, or the Saxon, or the Roman set his foot on these shores, Wales was inhabited by the same race living there now, the race that is the parent stock of the British. Such traditions and the pride of such an ancestry ought to make Wales thoroughly Conservative; and if they did not, it must be, Sir Stafford Northcote held, because Conservative principles had been misrepresented by Liberal prejudice, and perhaps even to some extent because Conservatives themselves had proved to be deficient in sympathy with the great mass of the people. Sir Stafford insisted greatly on the magic power of sympathy, and appealed to Welshmen to combine their Conservative pride in an ancient lineage and a proud history with warm national sympathies, which would popularise that pride and subordinate it to the service of the nation. He warned the Welsh solemnly against the Radicals who asked them to invest in schemes of which it could only be said that, like one of the South Sea bubble companies, "the nature of it was to be disclosed hereafter." Unfortunately, that description applies much more strikingly to the policy of Lord Beaconsfield than to the policy of Mr. Gladstone. Even the late Lord Derby described the greatest of his domestic measures as "a leap in the dark," while the foreign policy of Lord Beaconsfield was an even greater leap into a thicker darkness.

Sir Stafford Northcote, speaking at Bangor on Tuesday, must have had Mr. James Lowther in his mind, we should think, when he spoke of "men among us who are playing, perhaps, a selfish game—perhaps it may be called a mad game—and who are likely to cause a great deal of injury to the best interests of this country. Those men must be checked. They can be checked only by the steady, workmanlike opposition which the Conservatives can offer to them." Unfortunately, "steady and workmanlike opposition" is never offered by Conservatives to Mr. James Lowther, though it certainly should be offered to his mad attempt to persuade the people of Coventry into a new demand for Protection, and all the miseries of a war of tariffs. At the lunch in the afternoon, Sir Stafford entreated the Conservatives to establish Conservative newspapers in Welsh, and also to imitate his friends in one of the Eastern Counties of England, who had so far advanced in their organisation that they had already told off all the distant voters to particular owners of private carriages, who were to convey them to the poll at the next general election. That was nearly all Sir Stafford had to say at Bangor. The nightmare of Mr. Lowther no doubt sat heavy on his breast.

Mr. Raikes, who followed Sir Stafford Northcote, did not imitate his moderation,—a quality which the not very amiable politician who represents the University of Cambridge does not understand. He said of the Corrupt Practices Bill passed in the recent Session, he feared that “the predominant party in Parliament passed that Bill using hypocrisy as a cloak to cover their real intentions. He was afraid that the Government had passed that measure rather in the interests of persons who were not likely to be a credit to any constituency, and who were thereby to be introduced as candidates for Parliament.” That remark strikes us as not only politically malicious, but as very silly too. Can a motive be conceived why the present Government should wish to get discreditable candidates into the House? Is not the number of anarchical elements in the House already the greatest difficulty of the Government? And how can the discouragement of bribery and corruption tend to the multiplication of discreditable candidates? Mr. Raikes’s spleen is greatly in excess of his intelligence.

Mr. E. A. Leatham ended his speech at Huddersfield on Tuesday with a passage of singular strength and eloquence, which deserves a fuller record than any it has found in the London papers. After remarking that some one would say, “You forget Ireland,” he went on, “I wish I could forget Ireland; Ireland is the skeleton in our cupboard, and for the last few years the cupboard-door has stood open both night and day.” He maintained that our policy had been a just one, and that the next revulsion of feeling in Ireland would be on the side of reason and justice. “We must persist in our policy of absolute and unfaltering justice; but, on the other hand, there must be no trifling about the maintenance of the Union. . . . Sincerely as I am attached to the Liberal party, and warm as is my allegiance to those who lead it, I would renounce both, rather than admit that upon this supreme and cardinal question it was possible to give way. The country which begins to parley with its own dissolution is lost. The obligation to maintain the body politic is vital; it is this which made the Americans of the North struggle to the death in order to maintain the Union, and the same obligation compels us. To maintain their great America whole and indivisible, the Americans of the North changed for a time their whole nature. God grant that it may never be necessary for us to change ourselves. A nation of unmartial shopkeepers and of patient farmers became at once the most resolute, the sternest, and perhaps the fiercest amongst men. They flung economy to the winds; they turned their backs upon prosperity; steadfastly they looked death in the face. Is it nothing—a sentiment which is so great that it should so seize upon a whole people and change and transform them at its pleasure? The whole world trembled with the shock and shuddered at the carnage. But they saved their country. And so, if the worst comes to the worst, we can save ourselves.” Such a passage as this, from a thorough-going Radical like Mr. Leatham, is worth a hundred such speeches from Conservatives, as evidence of the hopelessness of Mr. Parnell’s cause.

The long war between Chili and Peru appears at length to have ended. The Peruvians, it will be remembered, refused, in face of the Chilian demands, to form a Government which could either accept or reject them, and the Chilians therefore treated Peru as a conquered country. Wearied out at length with the occupation, which was deliberately made painful by every incident of military tyranny, the Peruvians of the cities at last accepted General Yglesias as President, and called a General Assembly to support him. The terms agreed upon are not yet known, but it is believed that the principle adopted is the cession of the nitrate-yielding territory to the conquerors, subject to ultimate redemption at a fixed price; and the Chilians have consequently evacuated both Lima and Callao, retiring to their own land. The war has been remarkable for its ferocity, and for the revelation it has afforded of the great superiority of the Chilians, who are of nearly unmixed blood, and who have conciliated their Indian tribes, to the mixed people of Peru, under whose rule, we suspect, the native population cared little whether it were conquered or no. The hatred between the old Spanish Colonies is now quite as great as between any European States, while the rights of war are pushed farther than has been usual in the West since the middle-ages.

The Colonial Office is clearly determined that the question of annexing, or not annexing, New Guinea shall remain in its own hands. It awaits the result of the Federal Conference on the subject to assemble in Sydney in November. Meanwhile, an expedition has been organised, under Mr. H. R. MacIver, to make a descent on the island, and organise a local Government, as the North Borneo Company did, and so force the hand both of the Colonies and of Great Britain. The project appears to be serious, and Lord Derby, therefore, on the 24th inst. addressed a letter to Mr. (or “Brigadier-General”) MacIver, informing him that “he finds himself under the necessity of informing him especially, and without delay, that the contemplated operations cannot be permitted;” and that if they are persisted in, the High Commissioner in the Western Pacific, and the officer commanding her Majesty’s Naval forces on the station, will be ordered to “interfere.” In plain English, any ships landing an expedition will be sunk at sight. That is, at all events, a decisive policy, and, in view of the contemplated Conference, is quite justifiable, though Mr. MacIver is right when he says that New Zealand was acquired by an expedition similar to his own. It has become quite impossible for the regular Governments to tolerate irregular adventure; and their strength, with the modern developments of ironclads and swift armoured corvettes, has become irresistible. All the filibusters of England and America together would be sunk in an hour now-a-days, by a Power like Holland.

General Lopez Dominguez, the new Spanish Minister of War, has, with the sanction of the King, issued a decree which may produce consequences. Under its provisions, the higher Staff offices in the Army, which are now held during good behaviour, become tenable only for three years. The decree expels from active service one Captain-General, five Field-M Marshals, seven Lieutenant-Generals, and forty Brigadiers, and destroys the hopes of probably twice as many more of the highest officers. At the same time, it allows General Dominguez to fill most of the great military appointments with his own friends. It has, therefore, created intense irritation, some of the dismissed officers even saying that to be just the rule should be applied first to the King, who is Commander-in-Chief. It is difficult for any but Spaniards to decide whether this particular order is wise; but it is certain that the Spanish Army requires a thorough weeding amongst its highest officers. If the Throne were stable, 5,000 officers, at least, would be sent into civil life with small pensions; but only a King who had won a pitched battle would dare to introduce such a sweeping reform.

The Times’ correspondent in Egypt gives a most satisfactory account of the condition of the Army. The kind treatment of the officers and the regular discipline they enforce have so impressed the men that the number of volunteers is continually increasing, and it is believed the men allowed to leave will refuse to depart. Moreover, the men, who were formerly locked up in barracks when off duty, are now allowed leave at certain hours, and return punctually, even when permitted to revisit their homes. That is a gratifying account, and shows that military service, under just conditions, is not hated by the Fellaheen, though they dislike it when it is mere slavery in uniform. At the same time, we must not forget that before the Mutiny broke out in Bengal, in May, 1857, every Sepoy on leave returned punctually, that disorder in cantonment was the rarest of events, and that dismissal was considered by the men a terribly harsh punishment. No men ever were so easy to command, till they sprang at their officers’ throats in open and determined revolt.

It is said, though we cannot vouch for the report, that all the London Joint-Stock Banks intend to offer to take charge of their customers’ securities for a charge of one-sixteenth, that is, 1s. 3d. per cent. They would then, as paid bailees, be legally responsible for the bonds. The Banks, at the same time, to protect themselves, would insure each other against loss, and probably arrange for some special form of inspection. We hope the report is true, for the Banks would thereby add greatly to the comfort of life. Few men like to keep securities in their houses, where the danger from fire is great; and many dislike relying on lawyers, whose strong rooms may be entered by unknown clerks. They, therefore, trust the Banks, but the Banks are certainly not responsible for boxes left in their charge, and their responsibility when they draw the dividends and carry them to credit is a most perplexing question of law. Is the advantage they derive from the practice equivalent to payment? At the same time, the Banks usually pay for bonds stolen from their custody; and it is far better to make payment certain, and at the same time beneficent to the Banks.

Another great strike is believed to be approaching in the coal trade. The price of coal in London has gone up 1s. 3d. a ton, and the Yorkshire miners contend that they are entitled to a share in the advance. They therefore demand an increase of fifteen per cent. upon their wages, or nearly twopence in every shilling. The masters, many of whom have long contracts to work off, resist this increase, though it is intimated they would grant five per cent., and on Wednesday the delegates of 41,000 miners agreed that notices should be given. The men appear to have reason and custom on their side, though they may be asking too much; but the masters are firm, and neither party is willing to consent to arbitration. Unfortunately for the men, wages have been low for a long period, and they are not rich; while the masters benefit both by the invalidation of low contracts, which usually contain a proviso about strikes, and by the high prices at which they get rid of any stocks they possess. The London coal-dealers exult in a strike which enables them to charge almost anything they please, and to empty their stores at an advance of from 20 to 40 per cent. In extremity, they can supply themselves from districts which have not struck, and their customers are practically powerless.

The Bishop of Exeter has expressed both the strongest and the most paradoxical opinion on the subject of marriage with a deceased wife's sister, of which we have yet heard. He said, at the Exeter Diocesan Conference on Tuesday, according to the Guardian, that the evil of legalising such marriages would, though less in degree, be exactly "the same in kind" as the evil of restoring polygamy. We have not the least notion what that means, unless it be that in some sense the relation of a man to his sisters-in-law,—supposing it were lawful for him to marry any of them in case his own wife died,—would approximate to that of the husband of many wives to those wives. Such an assertion seems to us as deadly an attack on the sacredness of marriage under the existing law, as could well be made, for it implies, of course, that the relation of a man to all those female friends or relatives of his wife whom it is not illegal for him to marry in case of her decease, already approximates to that of a man with many wives towards those wives. What can Bishop Temple mean? It seems to us that his powerful and masculine judgment has on this subject suffered some grave and exceptional perversion.

The Bishop of Manchester has very rightly intimated, at the Manchester Diocesan Conference, that should the law decide that he is bound to institute Mr. Cowgill to the living of Miles Platting, he will submit to the law. That, of course, we all expected from one who has insisted so much on obedience to the law,—except, indeed, so far as regards conformity to it in the matter of his own dress. But the Bishop added that if the result of the law-suit which is to come before the Courts next month should be adverse to his own view, he would have very seriously to consider his own position, for in such a state of the law the administration of a diocese would become to him a burden which he could no longer bear. This hint has very naturally caused "great concern throughout the diocese," where Dr. Fraser is very justly popular. But it can hardly be serious. The only result of a decision adverse to the Bishop would be to diminish his responsibility, not to increase it. How could it possibly have increased his responsibility, if he had found that he had no option but to institute Mr. Cowgill, and leave Mr. Cowgill to judge for himself whether, after admission, he would conform to the law, or not?

The Dean of Carlisle, in an excellent letter to Tuesday's Times, calls attention to the odd inaccuracy which is so common, not only amongst the enemies of the Established Church, but also sometimes amongst its friends, in reference to the powers of the State over the State Church. Mr. Bright, for instance, had spoken of the State as supplying to every parish in England ministers of the Gospel to teach the farm labourers. In point of fact, except in the case of Crown livings, which are relatively very few, the State does not place over any English parish ministers of the Church. The Bishops and ecclesiastical corporations appoint many of them, private patrons more. It is not the State which supplies these ministers of the Church, and the Dean of Carlisle, who for thirty years has found himself able to say "ditto" to Mr. Bright in almost all matters except those of religion, complains of the misleading character of such statements. Dr. Oakley is quite right. Whatever may be the weak points of the Establishment, it is not one of them that the religious teachers of the people at large are chosen by secular authorities for their own secular purposes; and any language which implies so gross a misrepresentation of the facts, carries men's minds off on a wrong track.

Lord Justice Fry, in giving away the prizes at Saltaire on Monday, made a sharp attack on reading for mere amusement, and advocated reading societies for the special study of particular authors, and also of particular subjects. Of course there are various kinds of reading for amusement, and some of them are more than unprofitable, really injurious; but a good many reading societies are unprofitable too, and are certainly a sad waste of time for quick and vigilant readers, who could learn four times as much in the same time in lonely reading as in the fruitless discussions of a miscellaneous club. Further, we would say, that hardly any reading which is undertaken merely for the purpose of self-instruction, and without the stimulus of some eager interest, is of much use. Books laboured through only because serious persons assure you that they ought to be read, hardly ever leave any impression at all—you must desire to know what is in a book, before you can really learn anything from it.

In the Geodetic Conference at Rome, where England, the United States, France, Prussia, Switzerland, Italy, and Hamburg were all separately represented, it was decided on Tuesday, by twenty-two votes to five, to accept the Meridian of Greenwich from which to reckon longitude, and to reckon it on from West to East from 0 degrees to 360 degrees, so that there shall no longer be East and West longitude. Further, it was decided, by twenty votes against eight, to begin the reckoning of the day from midnight, i.e., from the beginning of the civil day, instead of, as our Greenwich astronomers now do, from noon. In other words, eleven a.m. will in future be the eleventh astronomical hour as well as the eleventh civil hour (instead of being the twenty-third astronomical hour, as it now is); while eleven p.m. will be the twenty-third astronomical hour, instead of, as it now is, the eleventh astronomical hour. It is hoped that the decision in favour of the English meridian of longitude will tend to persuade England to accept the Continental weights and measures, and to join the Metrical Convention of May 20th, 1875. That, however, is a very serious matter. To popularise mètres, and centimètres, and kilomètres is a very much greater affair than to get a learned class to accept a special longitudinal meridian.

Sir Moses Montefiore, the Jew philanthropist, entered on his hundredth year on Wednesday, and received congratulations from his own community and from many eminent Christians all over the world. He entirely deserves them. A most successful man of business and a man of vast wealth, he has devoted his time and his money for half a century to reduce the sum of human suffering. He has, of course, attended to his own people first, but he has displayed no narrowness or tribal exclusiveness, while his business ability has enabled him to address himself to remediable evils, instead of wasting his energies on dreams. Such a career deserves honour, but we should like to know why so meaningless a date was selected. For a man to be a hundred years old is so rare an event, that men can hardly help noticing it; but there is no poetry about ninety-nine. We observe that Sir Moses Montefiore's health is described as wonderful; but men of that intense vitality usually keep their health to the last. Lady Smith was perfectly well when she died, and an old pauper who was recently asked to choose a present on attaining a century chose to go up in a balloon, went up, and came down delighted.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE CLAIMS OF HUMDRUM.

IT is a hard position that Sir Stafford Northcote has to fill. He has to persuade the Irish that the party which steadfastly and passionately resisted what the Irish care for most, is the party on which they should fix their whole affections, and to persuade the Welsh that in spite of their eager Nonconformity they ought to be much more enthusiastic for the party which has never yet conceded anything willingly to the Nonconformists, than for the party which has given them all they have gained in the last sixty years. And he has to do more than this. He must not only quicken, if he can, the sympathies of Irish tenant-farmers with the party of landlordism, and the sympathies of Welsh Calvinists with the party of Episcopalian dignity, but he must do so without endangering his position as the leader of the Moderates,—those who find themselves almost as much alienated by Lord Salisbury's sneers at the fatal concessions of the past generation of Conservatives to Liberalism, as they do by the proposals of the Liberals of the present day. It will not do for Sir Stafford Northcote to tell the tale of what Lord Salisbury calls "Disintegration" as Lord Salisbury tells it. Even to suggest that the repeal of the penal legislation against Roman Catholics was a blunder, and the Irish Land Acts crimes, would render the cause of Conservatism hopeless in Ireland; while to rail at the spoliation of the Irish Church and the abolition of English Church-rates would set Wales in a flame against the so-called National party. Moreover, the difference between the position of Sir Stafford Northcote and the position of Lord Salisbury is this,—Sir Stafford Northcote's strength lies amongst the Conservatives of great cities, Conservatives who think it madness to doubt that Liberalism in the past has done a great deal for the country, though they hold that Liberalism in the present has got too much "way" on, and decidedly needs the services of a guard who thoroughly understands the use of the permanent brake. Lord Salisbury's strength, on the contrary, lies amongst great Peers and Squires,—men who will listen even to Mr. Lowther with respect, and who have never heard that Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett is the laughing-stock of all sane politicians. Hence, Sir Stafford Northcote, if he is to retain his honourable position as a fair and moderate critic of his great antagonist, cannot wrap himself in his wrath as he reviews all the achievements of Liberalism, or mock at the Liberal leader with the bitterness of the scorner, like Lord Salisbury. It would destroy his position as a moderate man. It would bring him distrust from the very Conservatives whom he chiefly desires to honour, the Conservatives who have carried great constituencies, Conservatives like the Conservative Member for the Tower Hamlets, or the Conservative Members for Liverpool. Nay, more, we have every reason to believe that Sir Stafford Northcote, though he is not averse, of course, to make his opponents look foolish when he can, is himself perfectly aware of the measure of truth in their position. He does not for a moment suppose that there is nothing solid to be said for their policy, either in the past or the present. He is moderate enough to see the difficulty of his own attitude. He does not know how to apologise for refusing a vote to householders in the counties, when it is given to householders in the boroughs. He hardly tries to apologise for that refusal; he only deprecates reopening a great question which has not been settled very long. Furthermore, he is painfully aware of the disadvantage at which an Established Church stands, in a country where the great majority of the people are not members of it. If he had his way, he would do all in his power to persuade the members of such a privileged Church of the minority to live on terms of cordiality and good-fellowship with the Nonconformist majority. He would deprecate with all his heart all airs of condescension on the part of such a Church, and do his best to minimise the points of difference in a district where all aggravation of these points of difference tends to render the position untenable. There is not the least reason to suppose that when Sir Stafford Northcote kept silence about fixity of tenure in Ireland, and complimented the piety of the Dissenters in Wales, he was merely using the language of political strategy. He felt, no doubt, with all his heart, that there was a great deal to be said for the tenant-farmers of Ulster, and a great deal to be said for the Nonconformists of Wales, a great deal which he could himself say with perfect sincerity. And though he did not say it, because he was aware that that was not the office of a Conservative leader, he did all he could do by his example to prevent his followers from speaking in an opposite sense, and needlessly irritating the conservative Liberalism in which he was compelled to see so much of reason.

But what does all this come to? Why, simply to this, that Sir Stafford Northcote, unless he were so brilliant a man as to be able to enliven his speeches by playful witticisms which do not wound, and subtle discriminations which strike exactly between wind and water, is forced to be humdrum, and ought to be sincerely respected by all fair critics for being humdrum. How could he have been otherwise, except at the expense of both prudence and truth? It is no easy task to rally the Conservative party and yet not to rally the Tory party, and yet that is precisely Sir Stafford Northcote's task. If you have in effect to say this,—'Our antagonists have, of course, a great deal to say for themselves, there is no doubt of that, but then they are much too violent and go too far. Of course, we have often been wrong and they right; but none the less we are right now in dragging them back, and they are wrong in wishing to press on,'—if that is the real drift of a leader's mind, as we believe it to be the real drift of Sir Stafford Northcote's,—what can he do but utter humdrum remarks on the necessity of keeping the nation well together, on the great danger of allowing local tendencies to take the lead of national tendencies, on the alarming hints thrown out by the left wing of the Liberal party and the undue humouring of the Radicals by the Whigs, on the unfulfilled prophecies of the Liberals, and on their discrediting allies, the party of infidelity. Unless Sir Stafford Northcote was one of the greatest wits of the day, and could dress up thoroughly common-place ideas in a most brilliant dress, he could hardly help talking humdrum; and experience has shown that men who can dress up thoroughly common-place ideas in a very brilliant dress, are very seldom indeed so prudent as to limit themselves to the common-place ideas. Like Lord Salisbury or Mr. Disraeli, their brilliance leads them into very dangerous ventures; and when they once begin to play with fire, the whole edifice of Conservatism, properly so called, is soon in a blaze. What we respect in Sir Stafford Northcote is precisely this, that he is frank and simple in his representation of humdrum ideas. He has the strength of mind not to try to be brilliant at the expense of safety. He knows perfectly well that Lord Salisbury's ideas are not the ideas of urban Conservatives, that nineteen out of twenty urban Conservatives think that the Liberal policy, at least up to the death of Lord Palmerston, was the wiser policy, and that there is a great deal to be said for the Liberal policy even since that date, though cautious men would prefer not to say it. Of course, that view must give a colourlessness, something like a vapidness, to the political oratory of the man who represents it,—unless, as we said before, he combined after a fashion almost unheard-of the utmost moral caution with extreme intellectual inventiveness. If he is to be true to his middle view, he must not mind being humdrum. Sir Stafford Northcote does not mind being humdrum. His speeches in Ulster and in Wales have been humdrum to the verge of desperation. But we maintain that that is creditable to Sir Stafford Northcote, not discreditable. He might have brought out enthusiasm enough by personal invective which would have misrepresented his convictions, or by political avowals which would have undermined his influence. He has not chosen to elicit enthusiasm at that expense. He has toiled on praising the national party till the very word "national" must have almost lost its meaning to him, and he must have idly wondered to himself what it all meant. But none the less he has persevered in abstaining from all needless offence, and in uttering the most praiseworthy platitudes with an air of enthusiastic moderation that entitles him to the genuine admiration of true Conservatives and the respect of all Liberals, who well know how easy it would have been for Sir Stafford Northcote to enliven his speeches with imprudences, and to enrich them with irritating and offensive exaggerations.

THE FRENCH MINISTRY.

THE determined attitude assumed by M. Ferry has had its effect upon the Extremists. They were full of courage before the Session began, but their first meeting revealed to them their weakness, and they are shrinking from conflict on domestic questions. The expulsion of the Orleanists is not to be mooted as a party question—though M. Gatineau will raise it on his own account; the Budget is to be left to the experts, who appear resolute to be rid of M. Tirard; General Thibaudin is not to be turned into a popular hero; M. Grévy is not to be censured for behaving like a gentleman to King Alfonso; and the whole force of the attack is to be directed against the policy of the Cabinet in Tonquin. Upon this subject the Right and the Extremists and M. Grévy are all in accord, and as the peasantry are with them so far as they understand the matter, a very formidable vote may be the result. That vote may be met, however, by the resignation of M. Challemel-Lacour; and M. Ferry, once warned that the country will not tolerate great expeditions, may recede from his Chinese policy without loss of honour, the order of the Chamber acting like the order of the Sovereign in absolute Monarchies, as irresistible force majeure. We gather from M. Ferry's language on Thursday that he intends to keep the road open for a retreat, and is anxious for a discussion in the Chamber before he brings forward the Vote of Supply or Crédit which would pledge his Government to immediate action. Indeed, he taunted his opponents till they fell into his trap, and agreed to an interpellation. If they will take this course and he recedes, he may form a very strong party, and meet the Chamber next February with a solidified majority. We heartily wish he may.

The Pall Mall Gazette asks why any Liberal should wish this, and why M. Clémenceau will not do as well as M. Ferry; but the answer seems to us written on the face of the circumstances. We have no more liking for M. Ferry than our contemporary has, detest his tolerance for persecution, and believe his foreign policy to be in its essential ideas thoroughly unprincipled,—a policy of seizing by force on profitable estates. But we desire to see the French Republic succeed, and this not only from sympathy with Republicanism as an ideal method of government, but from a keen regret at the present condition of Continental affairs. The European nations seem to us frost-bound, petrified, fastened in their places by a sort of spell. They are all frightened till they cannot advance a step in the path of freedom, and are less self-governed than they were twenty years ago. Russia is, as she always was, immovable, the Germans make no headway towards self-government, the Austrians care for nothing but gentle administration, the Italians are afraid to touch social questions, and only France shows symptoms of internal life and energy. If those symptoms prove false, if France reverts to a Monarchy or a Dictatorship, or expends the energy begotten of freedom in sterile colonial wars, the cause of true liberty in Europe—that is, the cause of wise government directly by the people—will be hopeless for years, perhaps for the remainder of this century. There will be no nation left with a free initiative. And that France will so revert, if the Extremists and the mob of Paris seize the helm, is, to our minds, beyond a doubt. Wholly apart from the wisdom or folly of Extremist views—and we know quite as well as the Pall Mall Gazette does that on points like the condition of the poor, wisdom is not with the Opportunists—they are not the views which the French nation is ready to accept. That nation consists of some seven million adult males, of whom five and a half million are possessors of real property, and a half million more draw part of their incomes from sources other than daily labour. These six millions regard attacks on property with horror, consider the Army a Conservative institution, rely on the Bureaucracy as decent Londoners rely on the Police, and are essentially almost as Philistine, though in a different way, as the English middle-class. To suppose that they will tolerate a régime of adventure either in foreign affairs or in the internal organisation of France such as the Extremists desire to commence is positively foolish, and all power, whether of the purse, or the ballot, or the bayonet, is ultimately in their hands. Even if experience is not to be consulted, their prejudices must be, and their prejudice is for a governing Government, which will not make concessions leading, or supposed to lead, to anarchy. They do not want a régime in which no man shall give an order. They want a Government which will carry out the laws, and can pursue a course, and not shift with every wind; and if the Republic cannot produce one, they will desert the Republic. Hitherto, the Republic has not produced one, and the consequence has been that power has accreted to the enemies of authority and to the mobs of the cities to an extent which seems to us positively dangerous. We do not say for one moment that all the ideas of the mobs are wrong. We acknowledge fully that the Opportunists ought to secure to the people some sort of Poor Law, much more individual freedom, and a greater control over municipal and communal affairs. But all these things will be secured if the Republic lasts, and will not be secured if it falls; and it will fall, if the enthusiasts, and the demagogues, and the Socialists obtain the control of the over-powerful machine which is called the State in France. It is essential that the sober-minded Republicans should be warned of this danger, and asked to hold together, and encouraged to keep the helm, even if in consequence the ship is becalmed; and as M. Ferry is willing to perform this function, we wish him every success in domestic affairs.

We wish it all the more, because M. Ferry threatens, if defeated, to appeal to the people through a dissolution. The French Constitution is in that respect most imperfect, the elections being at long intervals, and the power of dissolution not reserved to the Ministry. The consequence is, the Deputies, feeling safe for four years, think themselves at liberty, first, to job in the most outrageous way, till every department is besieged by place-hunters, and the Treasury is crushed by demands for "improvements;" and secondly, to act on ideas far in advance of those held by their constituencies. Radical Members in France are seldom peasants, workmen, or men of business. The great majority are young professionals, with student ideas, little experience in governing, and a passionate wish for distinction,—men with the old optimistic faith in humanity, and a belief that all wrongs can be righted and all miseries brought to an end. They differ from their electors as much as English Members did during the Beaconsfield régime. They require, beyond any representatives in Europe, the discipline of frequent contact with those who elect them, and under the Constitution they get it only once in four years. M. Ferry, in shortening the period and compelling them to bethink themselves of their seats, is doing his country a service, and one to which no true English Radical can reasonably object. If the French people wish for anarchy, or desire to set out in quest of Utopia, or are anxious to throw off government altogether, they may have a right to learn for themselves the sad lesson they will be taught; but, at all events, it is for them to take the responsibility of the decision, and M. Ferry cannot be wrong when he says plainly that he will accept the arbitration of the nation between himself and his adversaries. At all events, if he is wrong, so are all British Constitutionalists, Radicals included.

TORYISM AND NONCONFORMITY.

LIBERALS watch Tory attempts to storm their strongholds with feelings which vary greatly, according to the locality attacked. They are not much interested in Tory addresses in Ireland, whether in the North or South. A secret belief that the Irish Extremists, whether Orangemen or Parnellites, will act upon some impulse in their own minds, and without reference to the arguments which divide the two great parties, takes much of the reality, and, therefore, of the interest out of the speeches delivered by the regular chiefs, except so far as they may reveal plans. In Scotland, again, it is difficult to care what is said. Scotchmen, for the most part, are determined Liberals, and so sensible, that preaching Toryism to them is like preaching it to the Liberal Front Benches, a commendable exertion, which nobody expects to have the least result. But when Sir Stafford Northcote enters Wales, he compels thoughtful Liberals to consider a very interesting question,—the relation of Nonconformity to politics, and the reason for believing, as we all perhaps do believe, that an alliance between the Conservatives and the non-Episcopal religious bodies is quite impossible. We are all so accustomed to that phenomenon, that we cease to consider it one; yet, if you think about it, it is not so very easy of explanation. People say that it is explained by history, by the Tory persecution of the Puritans, by the fact that Nonconformists never have been in full accord with the laws under which they live; but is that statement quite sufficient? Whigs have persecuted very nearly as hard as Tories. The Governments which upheld the Test Acts, and deprived honest Nonconformists of all political rights, were guided in the main by Whig coteries, and the change of sentiment has not been confined to one of the two parties. The Tories would not reimpose the old disabilities, nor is it they alone who support the Established Church. If it were, if the Liberals were in the least united upon Church questions, the Church would go down in a Session, and the verdict would be ratified at the next election. Moreover, the Nonconformists have not suffered more historically from the Tories than the English Roman Catholics, and the English Roman Catholics are by no means Liberals as a body. Some of them are, but a great many are not; and their total tendency, if all social grievances were removed, would be, we suspect, to the other side, the side which clings most fondly to the past, which admires a hierarchical organisation of society, and which has within it no anti-supernaturalist section. It is strange, on the purely historical hypothesis, that the Dissenters and the English Catholics should be so different.

We believe that English Dissenters are Liberals, as Scotch Presbyterians are Liberals, quite as much from strong sense, and dislike of social inequalities, and sympathy with the common folk among whom they live, as from any ecclesiastical feeling whatsoever. No doubt, their secular struggle with the Church has had its effect, and so has the habit of mind produced by the rejection of authority, and so has the custom of democratic action strengthened by centuries of congregational organisation; but the influence of the strictly political feeling developed by what we may call the hard or sensible way of looking at affairs, the conviction that the people can manage for themselves, and the desire that they should manage, have been at least as powerful. Nonconformist electors are by no means inclined to accept any candidate who will vote for Disestablishment, without reference to the rest of his political creed. On the contrary, they very often thrust ecclesiastical questions into the background, and ask about finance, foreign policy, municipal rights, and so on, till their opponents taunt them, and especially their ministers, with being as worldly as the remainder of mankind. This is especially true of hereditary Dissenters, and therefore, while we feel confident that for the present they will remain determined Liberals, we are by no means so certain that their Liberalism will endure as a party distinction for centuries more. Boys now at College may live to see the great Nonconformist bodies Tory. To begin with, if the Establishment ceased to exist, Dissenters would range themselves much more often than they do now on the religious side, which might also be the Tory side. We do not expect, as we know that some of our friends do, that English Radicalism will ever, even temporarily, take a strongly irreligious turn, a turn, for example, like that of French or Swiss, or even German Radicalism, and become distinctly anti-Christian. On the contrary, we incline to believe, with Mr. John Morley, in the most suggestive paper he ever contributed to the Fortnightly Review, that much of the current scepticism is only skin-deep—is, in fact, the play of minds frolicking in what appears to them the emancipation produced by scientific discovery—and look forward to a very speedy and possibly very sharp reaction; but there may be in the infinite complexities of modern life a burst of irreligion, or rather defiance of Christianity, and if there is, the Dissenters would be more appalled and recalcitrant even than Churchmen or Roman Catholics. We should in such a case see Presbyterians, Wesleyans, Congregationalists, and all other orthodox sects thoroughly alienated from Liberalism, and possibly prepared, like their Puritan forefathers, for very strong measures of repression. They would, at all events, act like the same bodies in America, and cease once for all to act in unbroken masses upon one political side. And we believe at least as strongly that this would be the case if Liberalism turned Socialist. It is not very likely that it will, but we do not like some of the tendencies of our day in that direction; and if it does, we suspect the Dissenters will revolt sooner than Churchmen. It is hard to say why, unless it be that they come more directly in contact with the harsher facts of life; but the Dissenting Clergy always give us the impression of accepting those facts, of believing in Political Economy, so to speak, more strongly than the Clergy of the Established Church, who sometimes let pity master their judgments, in a regrettable, though not discreditable way. The laity of the Nonconformist Churches have even stronger convictions, and the last persons in the world whom we should expect to tolerate plunder for pity's sake would be a Conference of Dissenting Deacons. All their prejudices would be outraged, as well as all their principles, and they would be as trustworthy on the side of order and property as peasant-proprietors are. They might vote for tenant-right, or for compulsory sales of huge estates kept for sport; but they would be reasonable about compensation, and treat schemes for the nationalisation of the land as follies contrary to Scripture. An English Dissenter is very seldom an Utopian dreamer, except sometimes about Missionary work, and has usually learned very thoroughly by sad experience that comfort is attainable for the mass of mankind only by very dreary, sordid, and monotonous toil. Wild schemes of sudden improvement annoy him, both as religious man and as Philistine, and if wild schemes are proposed by Liberals, we should expect a sudden and sharp revulsion in Nonconformist politics. It is not among the non-Episcopalian Churches of America, where the sects are quite free, that we find Socialist schemes prosper; nor is it from New England farmers, who are our own Dissenters with poor freeholds to manage, that we look for schemes for releasing everybody from unpleasant toil.

We can conceive, therefore, of the long alliance between Liberalism and Dissenters coming to an end, though we do not expect to see it; and we rather wonder that Tory leaders, instead of abusing Mr. Gladstone, which is waste of breath, do not try to appeal to the Nonconformist orderliness, ordinarieness, and passion of individualism, and point out how closely Toryism represents these things. The argument would not be quite true of all Toryism, for we suppose we must class Lord Salisbury within his party; but it would be true of a large division of Conservatism, the division which finds solace, or even delight, in the worship of the customary. Lord Shaftesbury was a good Tory once, though nominally a Palmerstonian Whig, and the difference between Lord Shaftesbury's mind and that of an able, well-to-do, philanthropic, Congregationalist Deacon, is not so wide that it never could be bridged. It has not been bridged yet; but then, modern Toryism, let us not forget, has never, since Sir Robert Peel died, been represented by an English middle-class man. Lord Derby, though English, was an old noble with a ray of genius in him; and Lord Beaconsfield was in mind, as well as race, strictly an Oriental.

A RADICAL ON IRELAND.

MR. E. A. LEATHAM'S speech at Huddersfield on Tuesday is one of those impressive signs of the times which the leading journals, for some reason or other, agree to ignore. Mr. Leatham is well known as one of the ablest of Mr. Bright's followers. We should have called him a thoroughgoing Radical, if Mr. Bright had not taken a rather unexpected objection to the use of that term. At all events, Mr. Leatham is an enthusiastic antagonist of the principle of an Established Church, a warm friend of the "advanced" policy as regards Reform, generally opposed to measures which enhance the power of the Government, and prepossessed against further "centralisation." For a man holding these views to speak as he spoke on Tuesday upon the subject of the Irish wish for a repeal of the Union is significant, as few political events are significant. We have extracted his eloquent peroration, word for word, in another column. But here we need only say that Mr. Leatham regards civil war in its worst form as a much lighter evil than any concession to Ireland which can be regarded as tending towards the dissolution of the Empire. He speaks of the fearful sacrifices made by the North to put down the rebellion of the Southern States, as the true example for us in such a matter as this. On the question of justice to Ireland, he is as strong as we could have been. Let us do justice, he says, as we would do justice to England or Scotland, without asking whether it will conciliate Ireland or not; let us do justice, even if we have no hope that we can conciliate Ireland, simply because it is justice, because we have no right to maintain the Union and yet to refuse justice to any constituent part of that Union. But when we have done justice, let us set our face against any weakness in relation to the Union, as we would set it against any weakness in regard to the principle of government itself. Let Ireland once believe that she may wrench herself free from the Central Government, and there is no real reason why other parts of the Empire should not follow her example, or, at any rate, follow her example up to the point at which it pleases them to follow her example. Civil war is bad; civil war is a sharp anguish while it lasts; but civil war is temporary. The consequence of trifling with the principle that the part is not at liberty to sever itself from the whole, is worse than civil war, because it means the beginning of dissolution in the corporate body, a loss of control over the limbs by the centre, a growing paralysis which is the most painful form of decay, and which must end in death.

We agree with Mr. Leatham absolutely, but what we want to do in this article is not so much to expound or support his meaning, as to press on the Irish Nationalist party, and all who may have any lurking sympathy with the Irish Nationalist party, the significance of such views as these in the mouth of such a man as Mr. Leatham. It means this: that the advanced Liberals,—we may, we think, say the Radicals, in spite of Mr. Bright,—do in this matter not only feel no sympathy with the Irish Nationalists, but will desert their own leaders rather than allow them to make concessions to the Irish Nationalists. Mr. Leatham says this expressly, and we maintain that Mr. Leatham expresses the general view of the advanced party. There may be a few exceptions. Mr. Cowen doubtless would be dead against Mr. Leatham, but then Mr. Cowen hardly pretends now to express the views of any section of the Liberal party, and assuredly Mr. Cowen has no Liberal following. Mr. Labouchere occasionally trifles with the Irish party. Mr. Burt, again, now and then betrays more sympathy for their peculiar tactics than we quite like to observe in so strong and so good a Liberal as Mr. Burt. Sir Wilfrid Lawson doubtless trifles too often with the secessionist tendencies. But is it possible to find so many as five advanced Liberals anywhere who would follow Mr. Cowen rather than Mr. Leatham, on any issue in which it was generally held that a concession to Irish separation was deliberately made? We do not believe it. We are quite sure that there are scores of advanced Liberals,—scores of extreme Radicals,—who would follow Mr. Leatham in deserting the Government, if they ever had occasion to think that the Government was disposed to concede what would end in a policy of disintegration.

Now, if this be true,—and we believe that Mr. Parnell, with his cool judgment, will see that it is true,—what is the use of continuing the perfectly hopeless fight for what is called Home-rule? That a policy of decentralisation is even more needful in Ireland than in other parts of the kingdom, because nowhere has centralisation gone so far and produced such mischiefs as it has produced in Ireland, we have been foremost to maintain. But decentralisation,—throwing less strain on the centre and more on the local authorities,—is one thing, and exchanging one centre for two distinct centres, is quite another. Now, if Radicals follow Whigs, and Whigs follow Conservatives in declaring that this shall never be, what has any patriotic Irishman to gain by saying that it shall be? He has nothing in the world to gain but the certainty of ensuring a long course of extreme wretchedness to Ireland, and a long course of wretchedness not quite so profound for the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The Irish Home-rulers can punish us very severely, if they will, but only at the cost of punishing their own country still more severely. On the other hand, if they would but take home to themselves the conviction that by pressing for Home-rule they are but urging Ireland into civil war, and that by urging Ireland into civil war they are only urging her into another and most disastrous defeat, whereas, by accepting the principle that the Union is final, they may gain for Irishmen all that Englishmen want for themselves, and all that Scotchmen want for themselves, and gain it without even any serious sacrifice,—if they would but take home to themselves this conviction, how very soon they might earn for themselves the reputation of the most enlightened patriots, and give strength and prosperity and peace not only to Ireland, but to the Empire.

LORD SALISBURY ON "ROOKERIES."

LORD SALISBURY'S anxiously-expected paper in the National Review upon "Labourers' and Artisans' Dwellings" is very unlike his usual performances. It is simple and straightforward, and though it does contain a plan, or rather a sketch of a plan, for remedying the evil he complains of, it is penetrated throughout with a certain hesitation. After observing that the improvement in rural dwellings is considerable—which is true rather of certain districts than of all England—he proceeds to admit the whole case against the Rookeries in great towns,—to affirm that the State, having sanctioned "improvements" which cause congestion, is bound to intervene, and to suggest the best method of intervention. He rejects the plan of creating suburban cities connected with the centre by cheap trains, chiefly, it would seem, for the inadequate reason that the Railway Companies do not like the plan, and contends that the remedy must be sought by building huge structures into the air, on the system followed in Paris and Vienna. The Peabody Trustees have done this in a manner which enables them to let a "tenement" of two rooms at 4s. 4d. a week, which may be taken to be just half the ordinary workmen's payment—usually 4s. a room—and which has proved sufficient, after providing for repairs, to yield 3 per cent. He would, therefore, adopt the Peabody Trust as a State organisation, lend the Trustees State money at 3 per cent. on the security of the buildings, as is done already in loans for drainage purposes, and so gradually provide sufficient houses for the Poor. He would not lend the money to a municipality, because a municipality, changed frequently by election, is apt to be extravagant; and he greatly desires volunteer help, upon the plan successfully carried out by Miss Octavia Hill, that is, the purchase of Rookeries by philanthropists, who will personally enforce decency and orderliness. He also wishes all great employers to house their work-people,—a suggestion which looks practicable, but is slowly adopted, because it limits so decidedly the right of dismissal.

This is a definite plan, but Lord Salisbury, after detailing it, betrays unexpected hesitation. He says we know too little of the statistics, and nothing at all of the classes who want help, and would, therefore, preface any decision by a searching inquiry. He says:—"The difficulty is greatly aggravated by the singular absence of accurate information on the subject. Statistics on this point are absolutely silent. That London is overcrowded we know; and that the ill-effects of overcrowding, both on health and character, are very terrible. But we do not know even approximately the number of the sufferers, or where they live, or what they earn. How are we to judge of the measures required to remove this evil, if we have no notion of its extent, or how far it is the offspring of mere poverty? It ought to be within the means of our central or local authorities to throw some light upon the circumstances and conditions of the hardships to which a vast multitude of the inhabitants of London are probably exposed,—hardship which is known to be acute, and is believed to be growing." There is a singular doubt visible in that paragraph, but we may, we imagine, set it aside for the present and treat the plan as the one which Lord Salisbury in power would recommend. As such, we can see no objection to it, certainly none of any Party kind, unless it be its incompleteness. The plan would provide good buildings, without unendurable expense in construction; it would, if boldly pushed forward, relieve the existing congestion; and it would, while providing house-room for large numbers, compel due attention to sanitary conditions, a point of the last importance. The Peabody Buildings are all drained and ventilated on scientific principles. It is not a Socialist plan, and though it pledges State resources, it does not place it out of the power of the nation, upon good cause shown, to hold its hand. We see no reason whatever why any Liberal should not propose or support it, except that it requires one great addition. Lord Salisbury avoids the whole question of sites, though he acknowledges that the rising price of sites is one great factor in the question:—"The Peabody Trust have been able to purchase about nine acres of the Board of Works for 5s. a foot, because Parliament compelled the Board to sell for this purpose, and this purpose only. But the Board itself, taking the land compulsorily, paid not 5s., but a guinea per square foot, including all expenses. It is estimated that, by this restriction upon the disposal of the land cleared under S. R. Cross's Act, Parliament has caused the Metropolitan Board of Works the loss of half a million of money; which is, in effect, a contribution by the ratepayers to the erection of artisans' dwellings in central situations." No one who has really examined the question doubts that part of the work must be destructive, that the Rookeries must be pulled down, and that the tenement houses must be erected upon their very sites, always selected by the house-jobbers for their convenience to some business or other. Is Lord Salisbury prepared, when a "Court," or "Yard," or "Rents," or "Lane" has been thoroughly surveyed, and condemned as unfit for human habitation, to expropriate it at a fair valuation, and sell it to his Peabody Trust? Or will he allege that this is an interference with property, and, by allowing preposterous claims for compensation, render his whole scheme nugatory? He says nothing, and judging his opinion by all he has ever said about property, we distrust his final decision. We expect him to argue that, the property being taken for the good of the public, must be taken in the usual way,—that is, at its full value, plus ten per cent. for forcible expropriation; and this, as he himself admits, in describing the operations of the Peabody Trustees, would be nearly fatal to his scheme. They obtained sites from the Metropolitan Board at low prices, the difference falling, under a local Act, upon the rates.

We trust we shall not be mistaken. We are entirely opposed to pillage for philanthropic purposes, the worst temptation of the Red school. We wish the owners of "Rookeries"—by which we mean clusters of houses unfit for human habitation—to be treated fairly; but our idea of fairness would, we imagine, differ considerably from Lord Salisbury's. No man has a right to keep up a nuisance, and a rookery may be a nuisance. If it is so declared to be by competent authority, we would offer its owner three alternatives,—to rebuild it, under the provisions of a strict Act; to allow the Peabody Trustees to rebuild it, and hand it over to him, the cost remaining as a mortgage on the structure; or to sell it outright, at so many years' purchase, the number being fixed by the condition of the building, and the rental it would be worth if occupied in a way accordant with the health of the community. Beyond this we would not go, for no man has a right to set up, say, a copper-smelting furnace in London, and then, when the Judges order it to be closed, claim compensation for the profits of injurious fumes; but will Lord Salisbury go so far? We greatly doubt it, and must hear his speech upon that subject, before we are fully convinced that he is at one even with Moderate Liberals upon the rehousing of the poor. Is the letting of unhealthy houses, in his view, a noxious trade, or not? If it is, then his plan will work, for sites may be obtained without unendurable pressure on the rates; but if not, then it will not work, for the cost will produce a fierce reaction, amid which the great work will be postponed too long.

We must not forget, moreover, that any improvement, to be of the least use, must be accompanied by a most stringent Act controlling the building of the future. Otherwise we shall simply be compelled to do the work, which will be excessively costly, over and over again. There is no sign whatever that the vast movement of population towards the great cities which is the origin of urban overcrowding will slacken yet for years. Labour tends more and more to concentration, the great business, with its skilled workers and severe discipline, under-selling all competition by little men; the country folk are swarming towards the more open careers offered by the cities; and the better atmosphere produced by drainage diminishes the consumption of life. It is indispensable, therefore, if we spend money to abolish or alleviate existing evils, to prevent their recurrence; and this will require Acts far more stringent than any as yet upon the Statute Book, Acts which we fear will raise permanently the proportion borne by rental to total expenditure. That proportion is steadily rising throughout the world, till on the Continent and in America there is not one great city where the people do not declare that the first of their difficulties is to pay rent, and where there is not a silent war almost as bitter as in Ireland, though less sanguinary, between the landlords and the tenants. We have not reached that point in London; but even here, a married clerk on 25s. a week pays, if he takes two rooms, one-third of his whole earnings for his rent.

THE CRISIS IN THE COTTON TRADE.

LANCASHIRE men who are old enough to know say that, with the single exception of the time of the American War, the weaving branch of the cotton trade is just now in a worse condition than it has been since the Repeal of the Corn Laws. Although there is no general stoppage of machinery, many weak masters have succumbed, others are discharging their less efficient hands, and there is hardly a town in the county where weavers are not idling in the streets, and asking vainly for work. Even in the Burnley district, where manufacturers practise an almost ferocious economy, and live like their own workmen, they cannot make both ends meet; their capital is lessening week by week, and many see ruin staring them in the face. Frequent failures attest the severity of the crisis; but private arrangements, the particulars of which are known only to those concerned, are said to exceed in number those publicly announced. Embarrassed manufacturers who find it impossible to go on show a statement of their affairs to their principal creditors, of whom there are probably not more than three or four, and these, to save the costs of liquidation, the loss arising from forced sales of machinery and stock, and, above all, to avoid publicity, accept the best offer they can get, and consent to the smaller creditors being paid in full. According to report, there are manufacturers who have made more than one "arrangement" of this sort, which the French phrase à l'amiable seems best fitted to characterise. But solvent manufacturers complain that this system, however convenient it may be for some people, counteracts the law of the survival of the fittest, and aggravates a state of things which can be ameliorated only by weeding-out the weak and curtailing production. How sorely pressed are mill-owners, one fact, which, though technical, is easily understood, will suffice to show. It is a rule of the trade, based on long experience, that to cover the cost of production and interest on his capital, a master-weaver should have a margin equal to double the operative weaver's wage. If, for instance, he pays the workman a shilling for weaving a certain sort of cloth, the master should have another shilling to meet other wages and expenses, and, as the saying is, "to get his own money back." At present, however, the difference between the price he must give for his yarn and the price he receives for his pieces leaves a margin of no more than half the weaver's wage. In other words, not only is the manufacturer earning neither interest on his outlay nor remuneration for his labour, but he is consuming his capital. As may be supposed, in such circumstances, the depreciation in the value of cotton-mill property is something portentous. Factories that cost £13,000 cannot be sold for £3,000; others, which as "going concerns" were valued at £20,000, fetch no more than £5,000; and, plentiful as money is, there are few lenders bold enough to advance money on the security of cotton mills.

Manufacturers who spin their own yarn are in a better position than those who do not, and spinners who are not weavers are making a profit. The Oldham joint-stock mills have lately declared dividends varying from six to thirteen per cent., and they find little difficulty in disposing of their production. The difference between the two branches is traceable to several causes. Chief among the causes of depression in the weaving branch is unquestionably the coincidence of over-production with a diminished home demand, arising from agricultural distress and the long series of deficient harvests; and the home demand being for calicoes, and not for yarns, its falling-off naturally affects the owners of spindles less than the owners of looms. Then, again, the former have suffered less than the latter from the protective policy of foreign States. Yarns are in some sense raw material, and in the interests of Continental manufacturers they are generally admitted at relatively less onerous rates than calicoes. A few weeks ago, the French Government temporarily repealed altogether the duty on a certain class of cotton yarn, and there is hardly a country to which cotton yarn, either coarse or fine, cannot be shipped to advantage. Calicoes, on the other hand, can hardly be shipped anywhither without the probability, if not the certainty, of loss. Continental markets are all but closed to them by hostile tariffs, and every other market is glutted.

In theory, the evil should work its own remedy. Capital should be diverted from weaving to spinning, until the balance is redressed, and both are placed on the same footing. But the "diversion" of capital fixed in unsaleable buildings and plant is not easily effected, and there are few loom-owners who possess any spare money for investment, either in spindles or anything else. At the same time, spindles are being increased and looms stopped, yet the process is a slow one; and it is in the nature of things that weaving should remain as it has hitherto been,—the least profitable and most precarious department of the trade. The moment it becomes a little profitable, weaving is overdone. Any man with a thousand pounds and a little credit (obtained only too easily) may start a loom shed. The building can be put up and filled with machinery,—to be paid for by instalments,—in a few months; the Manchester agent will advance full value on the cloth as soon as it is delivered in his warehouse, sometimes before; and if all goes well, the manufacturer sometimes succeeds. If he fails, "arrangements," as we have hinted, are not difficult, and the loom-maker and the agent generally contrive to "get out" without loss. The condition under which a spinner begins business are altogether different. The least capital with which a man can start a spinning mill on the latest model is from fifteen to twenty thousand pounds, it cannot be completed in much less time than three years, its successful management requires closer attention and more technical knowledge than the management of a mere weaving concern, and the utmost credit given for cotton in the Liverpool market is ten days. For these reasons, competition in the production of yarn is less keen than competition in the production of calicoes. As in most other industries, large capitalists have the best chances. On the other hand, the principle of association seems to answer better when applied to spinning than to weaving, for the Oldham joint-stock mills are engaged exclusively in the production of yarn, and their success is the more satisfactory in that their shareholders are chiefly composed of operative spinners and other small capitalists, for whose savings there are so few profitable investments. It is not likely that the distress among the weavers will be of long duration, and the fears expressed in some quarters that the trade is permanently ruined are utterly chimerical. The absence of foreign competition in neutral markets proves that English manufacturers can still produce more cheaply than those of any other country; the human race is multiplying all over the world; the moment a civilised child is born it becomes a user of calico, and with the revival of agriculture, which cannot remain for ever depressed, the home demand for cotton goods cannot fail to increase, and will in all probability coincide with that diminution of production which has already begun. But the process of recovery must necessarily be very gradual—it has not yet set in—and the hands would be very ill advised to provoke a strike, as some of them have threatened to do, by refusing any reasonable concessions which the masters may require. In many Lancashire mills, women weavers are earning from twenty to twenty-three shillings a week, and though this may not be an extravagant rate of remuneration for the work they perform, it is far above the average earnings of their sex in other branches of industry. No time could be worse for a strike, and from the adjournment of the Conference between representatives of the employers and the employed—which was to have been held on Wednesday last—at the request of the latter, we infer that wiser counsels are prevailing among the operatives, and all danger of a strike is past.

MR. TROLLOPE AS CRITIC.

IN Mr. Trollope's "Autobiography" he gives us a brief estimate both of his own works of fiction, and, to some extent, at least, of the novels of his contemporaries. What does one gather from these chapters of his own power as a critic? Certainly this,—that his critical powers did not in any degree approach the calibre of his creative and constructive powers. That he had a substantially sound judgment on such matters is a matter of course, for the great characteristic of all his novels is knowledge of the world; and a perfect knowledge of the world, even taken alone, implies that there could not have been in him any wide deviation from the healthy taste of cultivated Englishmen. Mr. Trollope's taste in novels was doubtless a sound one. Especially in relation to the novels of domestic life he was an admirable judge. He thought for a long time that Miss Austen's "Pride and Prejudice" was the best novel in the English language. Then he placed "Ivanhoe" above it. Then he accorded the highest position to Thackeray's "Esmond." Whether the finest critical judgment would endorse these views we greatly doubt, but they are sufficiently in accordance with the average judgment of educated men to show the thorough sanity of Mr. Trollope's taste. Again, of the novelists of his day, he puts George Eliot second to Thackeray, and greatly prefers the novels of her first period, those down to and including "Silas Marner," to her later tales. He has no high estimate of Dickens's knowledge of human nature, thinks his pathos somewhat false in ring, and cannot even justify to his own judgment the vast popularity of Dickens's humour. Of Bulwer, Mr. Trollope's estimate is altogether low, and though he recognises his great talent, he finds mannerism and affectation in all his works. Of Wilkie Collins and his school, again, Mr. Trollope speaks with great frankness and good sense. It vexes him that "the author seems always to be warning me to remember that something happened at exactly half-past two o'clock on Tuesday morning; or that a woman disappeared from the road just fifteen yards beyond the fourth milestone." Again, on his own works,—whether he judges with delicacy, or not,—Mr. Trollope's judgment is thoroughly sane. He prefers the Barsetshire series to any other class of his novels, and thinks "The Last Chronicle of Barset" the best of the series. He could remember less, he said, of "The Belton Estate" than of any book he had ever written, and doubtless there was less of his own mind in it than in any book he ever wrote. All these opinions show Mr. Trollope's judgment, we do not say to be of the highest kind,—his estimate of Dickens's humour seems to us palpably and absurdly defective,—but thoroughly healthy and marked by the right tendencies. But there was very little of the finest elements of the critic in him. No great critic, we take it, could possibly have preferred Thackeray's "Esmond," with all its skill and fineness of texture, to the overflowing wealth and power of "Vanity Fair." In "Esmond," Thackeray's creative power was certainly much less prodigal, much less magnificent in its effects, than it was in "Vanity Fair."

Again, even in "Esmond," Mr. Trollope does not single out anything like the finest scene, when he selects Lady Castlewood's defence of Henry Esmond to the Duke of Hamilton, as the scene of the book. Thackeray rose far higher in the passion of the scene in which Lady Castlewood welcomes Henry Esmond back from the Continent, after the Evensong in Winchester Cathedral, than in that of the scene with the Duke of Hamilton. Indeed Thackeray is almost always much greater when he paints the unchecked overflow of a woman's love, than when he paints her in a dramatic position addressing herself to a number of hearers. His passion is tender and deep; in the scenes of social effect he cannot help showing that he is not only a painter of the heart, but a satirist of the weaknesses of men.

The truth was, as is evident from his "Autobiography," that Mr. Trollope, knowing how inferior is the function of criticism to the function of creative genius, never recognised the distinction between the two, and was not aware that, as a rule, vast creative power is too active, too positive, to be receptive and to discriminate very finely the shades of effect in the works of other authors. It is comparatively seldom that redundant creative power is accompanied by fine critical power. Sir Walter Scott, the most powerful by far of all English novelists, was, like Mr. Trollope himself, a sound and sensible, but by no means a fine critic. Sir Walter was too much occupied by the hardy and teeming life in his own brain to lend fully his imaginative life to the service of others. It is the same with Dickens, and apparently even with George Eliot. What is wanted for truly fine criticism is the receptive side of the poet, without an imagination so teeming as to interfere with the fullest exercise of the receptive powers. Some of the best criticisms of our century have been the criticisms of Goethe and of Matthew Arnold, both of them fine poets, but both of them poets without hurry of creative impulse, without imaginative idiosyncrasy so preponderant as to prevent them from fully submitting their minds to the influence of other men of genius of whose work they desired to form a true estimate. Nothing can be less like such a temperament as this than the temperament of Mr. Trollope. Let us see how he himself describes his own creative power, and the manner in which it worked:—

"I had long since convinced myself that in such work as mine the great secret consisted in acknowledging myself to be bound to rules of labour similar to those which an artisan or a mechanic is forced to obey. A shoemaker, when he has finished one pair of shoes, does not sit down and contemplate his work in idle satisfaction. 'There is my pair of shoes finished at last! What a pair of shoes it is!' The shoemaker who so indulged himself would be without wages half his time. It is the same with a professional writer of books. An author may, of course, want time to study a new subject. He will at any rate assure himself that there is some such good reason why he should pause. He does pause, and will be idle for a month or two while he tells himself how beautiful is that last pair of shoes which he has finished! Having thought much of all this, and having made up my mind that I could be really happy only when I was at work, I had now quite accustomed myself to begin a second pair as soon as the first was out of my hands."

And yet though Mr. Trollope has almost always begun one novel on the day succeeding that on which the previous novel was finished, he has, he tells us, been entirely wrapped up in his creations, and has lived his life with them as if they were the inhabitants of his own world:—

"But the novelist has other aims than the elucidation of his plot. He desires to make his readers so intimately acquainted with his characters that the creatures of his brain should be to them speaking, moving, living, human creatures. This he can never do unless he know those fictitious personages himself, and he can never know them unless he can live with them in the full reality of established intimacy. They must be with him as he lies down to sleep, and as he wakes from his dreams. He must learn to hate them and to love them. He must argue with them, quarrel with them, forgive them, and even submit to them. He must know of them whether they be cold-blooded or passionate, whether true or false, and how far true, and how far false. The depth and the breadth, and the narrowness and the shallowness of each should be clear to him. And, as here, in our outer world, we know that men and women change,—become worse or better as temptation or conscience may guide them,—so should these creations of his change, and every change should be noted by him. On the last day of each month recorded, every person in his novel should be a month older than on the first. If the would-be novelist have aptitudes that way, all this will come to him without much struggling;—but if it do not come, I think he can only make novels of wood. It is so that I have lived with my characters; and thence has come whatever success I have obtained. There is a gallery of them, and of all in that gallery I may say that I know the tone of the voice, and the colour of the hair, every flame of the eye, and the very clothes they wear. Of each man I could assert whether he would have said these or the other words; of every woman, whether she would then have smiled or so have frowned. When I shall feel that this intimacy ceases, then I shall know that the old horse should be turned out to grass."

Is it possible that an author who has lived this sort of imaginative life for day after day during thirty years, giving himself no rest, but entering a new imaginary world on the very morrow of the day on which he quitted the world which had just grown familiar to him, should be capable of that fine receptivity of mind which is requisite to appreciate with any delicacy the productions of others? It seems to us quite certain that neither Sir Walter Scott nor Mr. Trollope,—both of whom, in their very different spheres, led this kind of imaginative life,—did appreciate with any delicacy the productions of others. Nor could Mr. Trollope give us a better proof of this than his very unhappy remark in relation to Lady Eustace of "The Eustace Diamonds." "As I wrote the book, the idea constantly presented itself to me that Lizzie Eustace was but a second Becky Sharpe; but in planning the character I had not thought of this, and I believe that Lizzie would have been just as she is, though Becky Sharpe had never been described." Mr. Trollope need not have given us this assurance. He might almost as well have warned us that Archdeacon Grantley was not taken from Shakespeare's "Wolsey." Becky Sharp,—he spells her wrongly, as he does also Colonel Newcome, whom he repeatedly calls Colonel Newcombe,—is a type of the infinite resource and unscrupulous genius of feminine intrigue,—a type of audacious craft as rich and humorous, and as full of the buoyant energy of selfishness, as Iago is rich and unscrupulous and full of buoyant malignity and evil. Lizzie Eustace is a treacherous, cunning little drawing-room woman, of no humour, no great power, and far, indeed, from the dimensions of Becky Sharp. If Mr. Trollope had compared Lizzie Eustace to Thackeray's Blanche Amory, he would have been nearer the mark. Becky Sharp is one of the greatest creations of Thackeray's genius. Lizzie Eustace is not even one of the best creations of Mr. Trollope's.

Indeed, one of the best evidences that Mr. Trollope's power is not in the main of that receptive kind which makes the critic, is the great inferiority of his women to his men. We agree with him that Lily Dale is a good deal of a prig. But we do not agree with him in any depth of admiration for Lucy Robarts, or indeed for any other of his heroines, though we like Grace Crawley the best. The feminine essence is beyond the reach of men unless they be true poets, and never was there a man of great creative power who had less of the poet in him than Mr. Trollope. He speaks of the necessity of a certain rhythm and harmony of style, but his own victories were achieved in spite of a style that was almost painfully devoid of grace or inward expressiveness. He has what we may call a bouncing style,—not, of course, a style of bounce, but the style of a bouncing ball,—one not ineffective to produce the impression that the events narrated by Mr. Trollope are real events, happening to real people, and reported by a real observer,—but effective rather because it is the style of a reporter hurrying on with the chronicle of matters which he has undertaken punctually to note down, than because it reflects any profound impression made on the feelings and imagination of the narrator. His style is clear, business-like, rapidly moving, noisy, and a little defiant, as if the writer would be beforehand with you, and wished to assert his own right to be heard before you had had time to dispute that right. It is a hard and rather dictatorial style that does not seem so much to come from deep-felt impressions as from certain knowledge. That is a good style to produce the sense of reality, but it is not the style of a fine critic, and though Mr. Trollope was a sensible critic,—as indeed he was sensible in everything,—a fine critic, even of his own writings, he was not. And for the same reason, probably, he was not a successful editor. His editing of the St. Paul's Magazine was conventional. He did not really know how to use contributors, how to make the most of them. Mr. Trollope's stories were well spun out of the imagination of a keen and vigilant observer; but all his observing power was assimilated in the work of creation, was used-up as the flax is used up in the making of linen, and apparently he had little opportunity left for reflecting on the works of others, and for discriminating the fine threads and delicate colours by the use of which they had made their work characteristic and unique.

CAPTAIN MAYNE REID.

AS our judgment on Mayne Reid's novels is not that of our contemporaries, we are disinclined to allow his death to pass without a word of criticism. As an individual, we know nothing about him, except that in our judgment he missed his true career, and would have made a first-class agent of the Geographical Society, to explore dangerous or excessively difficult regions, like Thibet, the Atlas Range, or the unknown hills and locked-up Valleys of Eastern Peru. He was a man of exceptional daring, having a positive liking for danger; he had the topographical eyes which should belong to every General, and he had a faculty of description; which he watered down for his novels till it was hardly apparent. During the only interview this writer ever had with him, accident induced his interlocutor to ask about the Pintos, the parti-coloured race sprung from native Mexicans and the cross-breed between Indians and Negroes, who are stated to exist in one State of Mexico. The writer disbelieved in them, and expressed his disbelief; but Captain Mayne Reid, who declared he had seen specimens of the race, held him quite fascinated for half an hour by a description which, if imaginary, was a triumph of art, but which left on the hearer's mind an impression of absolute truth. The Captain was never, however, so employed; but after his life in Mexico and on the southwestern border of the United States, he settled in England, to write novels, at first for amusement, and latterly, we regret to hear, as a means of subsistence. These latter novels are rubbish, which we need not notice, but the former or Mexican series have a literary quality which ought to have rendered critics less contemptuous. Captain Mayne Reid could not analyse a character at all, and never created one; or if he did, that character, Seguin, the good scalp-hunter, is too utterly exceptional, too nearly a maniac to be considered a literary creation. He must have been drawn from some out-of-the-way and horrible experience. Nor could he paint his lay-figures in a very life-like way. Good and bad, his Mexicans, men and women, and mountaineers, and American desperadoes, and faithful Indians, and villainous bandits, are all alike,—a little same, and not a little tiresome. They have qualities, but not characters, and move like marionnettes. They all go through wonderful adventures, and if they had all got killed in them, as about three-fourths of them did, nobody would have cared. The stories, too, are not very exciting, being devoid of plot, and made up of a succession of violent scenes, in essence stagey, in which the reader knows from the first that at a proper time the machinery will move, and the good folk, usually American, will be protected from their murderers, usually Mexican. Gustave Aimard, who trod in the same track, managed that part of his business better, and had besides, or perhaps affected, a hatred of the "North American" which gave a literary flavour of some sort to his descriptions of character. Nevertheless, Mayne Reid did possess one literary faculty of a very rare and noticeable kind. He could create atmosphere as very few but the greatest story-tellers have ever done. The characters might be poor, and the story a jumble of horrors, and the plot utterly unintelligible, but all the time the reader was in Mexico, conscious of residence under a new sky, of life amidst a strange architecture, of the presence of dark-skinned natives who were not abstract "natives," still less any other natives, but natives of Mexico alone. This impression was due, we believe, to the fact that Captain Mayne Reid, for all his want of literary power, could, when he wrote, transport himself to the country he loved, actually saw it and its people with his mind, and so never made a localising blunder; never forgot that such and such people, not European, would be there; that the hills would have such a colour, that the vegetation would be of such a kind, that the very water would exhibit certain peculiarities. The result is a perfect illusion, under which we fancy ourselves in Mexico, and though we wonder why the people act in such an out-of-the-way and senseless fashion, we never weary as strangers, of looking on at the novel and striking scene. This was Captain Mayne Reid's sole power—no mortal can read him when outside Mexico—but he possessed it as regards Mexico in a unique degree, in such a degree that we gravely doubt whether any book whatever gives so vivid and so accurate a representation of "the land of Anahuac," as he delighted to call it, as his series of very absurd stories.

Why did those stories sell? Well, not in the least because of their "tone," and very little because boys liked them. Boys did not care about them much, and do not buy novels in three volumes; and their tone was by no means so good as the Daily News, for example, says it was. The novels are, no doubt, entirely free from sensuality, and with the exception of a single page, containing a story of outrage, which we firmly believe the author knew to be true, and put down without consciousness of its impression on a reader, there is not in the novels an "objectionable" sentence. But they positively smell of blood, and are pervaded throughout by a contempt for human life and suffering which, if the characters were but a little more real, would be most deleterious. As it is, the executions are executions of dolls, but the descriptions even then are often too realistic, while Captain Mayne Reid is far too apt to condone and even to teach a theory of reprisals, which, no doubt, his characters would have held, but which confuses every notion of right and wrong. Let a man be treacherous, and somebody hangs him over a precipice, or dashes out his brains, or burns him alive, or in some way or other inflicts capital punishment with a bloodthirsty exultation which cannot but harden the reader's mind. This artistic defect is the more striking, because Captain Mayne Reid obviously abhorred cruelty, and like Fenimore Cooper, though not quite so invariably, makes the characters he likes best, eager to secure justice; but it exists, and we believe the explanation to be this. The author knew his scenes of murder, vengeance, and torture to be true, and felt them to be as much beyond his power to alter as the tropical vegetation of the "Tierra Caliente."

The real cause of the popularity of Captain Mayne Reid's novels, which, as regards one or two of them, may last long, is that they gratify not the boyish, but the human love for pure romance, for stories in which there are practically fairies, though they are called Mexican ladies, and genii, though they are dressed as American filibusters, and devils, though they appear as Don Rafaels or Antonios; and probabilities are set aside, and everything happens as it is convenient it should happen, and nobody cares a dump whether there are any laws, human or divine, or not. Adventures are adventured, and the adventurers fall into frightful dangers, and get out of them again by wonderful means; and laws, literary or other, are simply a burden. That is the secret of the "Arabian Nights," and it is that of Mayne Reid, as is also that of the indefinitely abler novels sold in such scores of thousands by Jules Verne. The story-teller of the "Arabian Nights" uses Haroun al Raschid and the Jins and the name of God almost at random, to get rid of probabilities; while Mayne Reid uses heroic sharpshooters, or impossibly faithful Indians; and Jules Verne employs scientific forces, like electricity, but the object in all cases is the same. It is to be rid of the coercing, compressing, and therefore limiting chain of cause and effect,—to set the imagination really free, and let it revel for a moment in an unconditioned world. It does revel, and we all like the momentary sensation, even although we are all the while critical enough to be annoyed with our own pleasure. We enjoy the impossible carpet, which goes where it likes, and the impossible Rifleman, who kills whom he likes, and the impossible ship, which sails under the Isthmus of Suez, the impossibility being part of the pleasure, not a deduction from it. Of course, if the writer has something more in him, and can produce "The City of Brass"—most awe-inspiring of all Arab stories—or a scene in the centre of the earth, in which a primeval giant, huge as Og, rudimentary as a rock, watches and milks the mammoths, we have another enjoyment, too; but we can dispense with it, and find pleasure even in Mayne Reid, and the marionnettes which caper in the glowing air, furious storms, and over-vast scenery of the slopes from the huge Mexican plateau. We see no harm in the enjoyment; it is only "Jack, the Giant Killer" for the grown-ups; and we believe firmly that some day Romance will again be a widely popular form of fiction. Man grows gloomier and gloomier, but the child-like element in him is happily not dead yet.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to inform your readers, whose consideration may have been drawn to the above subject by the article in your issue of September 29th, that a scheme for feeding the poorest children in our Board Schools has been in successful operation for six months at Lisson Grove, and at Saffron Hill, Holborn? At Lisson Grove, 70 or 80 children have been dined three times a week, on roast mutton or beef, rice or suet pudding, potatoes or haricot beans, at a cost, reckoning food alone, of 4½d. per head; the object aimed at having been not to give the most economical meal possible, but to provide the most nutritious dinner possible for children, some of whom come to the table but once a week, others twice a week, and only the most needy three times a week.

A third of the children are the children of widows. Their mothers' earnings seldom average ten shillings a week; often there are three or four children to be kept out of this, sometimes more; with many, the earnings are less than half the above sum. The remainder of the children who come to us have fathers, either ill, disabled, or "out of work."

And now, practical people will ask, "Are children visibly benefited by one, two, or even three dinners a week?" We unhesitatingly answer, "Yes, they are brighter and stronger, and fitter to teach," a testimony that is corroborated by their teachers. Fresh cases of need, leading us to remove to a larger room, are pressing upon us.

Last week, visiting the home of one of the children, a girl of ten, we learnt that she had not tasted meat for four or five months; the child has no father, her mother is dying in consumption. This child has gone daily to school, with what capacity for assimilating knowledge may be left to the imagination of your readers. Another girl, living in a cellar kitchen, in a more than commonly respectable street, had not been to school the day we called, because her mother (a widow) had not a slice of bread to give her, and could not bear to send her to school without food.

Most of us now-a-days, I believe, are sufficiently well instructed to form a notion of the mischief likely to arise from the constraint of long hours, with hard or monotonous tasks, where there is not enough nutrition for the functions of growth alone. The dinners are now given at Omega Hall, Omega Place, Alpha Road, on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, at 12.30. The visits of any interested will be cordially welcomed there, and all information will be gladly supplied, on application to my address. Contributions should be sent to the Treasurer, H. E. Allen, Esq., 44 Marlborough Hill, St. John's Wood, N.W. It is earnestly desired to extend this movement into other and equally or even more necessitous districts.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AS BY LAW ESTABLISHED."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Failing better answers to Mr. Fletcher's inquiry in your paper of October 13th, he may be reminded that Statutes 1 Will. and Mary I., c. 6, 5 Anne I., c. 8, 39 and 40 George III., c. 67, require a certain oath to be taken by the Sovereign at Coronation. Part of that oath is that the incoming monarch will, to the utmost of his power, "maintain the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion Established by Law," and will "maintain and preserve inviolably the settlement of the Church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established."

Men skilled in matters legal may be able to supply fuller answers to Mr. Fletcher and "G. C. P.," but this appears sufficient to show that the phrase in question is sanctioned by the Law and Constitution of the realm.—I am, Sir, &c., October 22nd.

JOHN MACNAUGHT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Here is an example of the phrase earlier than any yet given in your columns. It is from the will of Dr. Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln, who died January, 1662, and is quoted in Isaac Walton's Life (1678):—"And here I do profess to die in the communion of the Catholic Church of Christ, and a true son of the Church of England, which, as it stands by law established," &c.—I am, Sir, &c., M.D.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—That a clergyman should wish to belong to a Church not "by Law Established" is, after all, but natural, if he be a believer in spiritual force. Still, under the circumstances, what is the use of disclaiming such a connection? In the discharge of my functions, I notice, every quarter, in the returns of marriages on the usual forms one clergyman always runs his pen through the word "Established," printed on the forms. Does not, however, such a declaration go for nothing?—I am, Sir, &c.,

A SUPERINTENDENT-REGISTRAR.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—When your correspondent, Mr. Fletcher, asks,—“Can any one lay his hand on a statute which has established the Church of England?” he surely asks what is a very unpractical question. For even if it were not possible to refer to the several statutes known as the Reformation Statutes, as well as to various statutes in which the phrases “the Church of England as by law established” and “the Established Church” are to be found, can any one deny that the State upholds, and regulates the affairs of, the Church of England, by means of Acts of Parliament and of administrative arrangements, in a sense altogether different to that in which it interferes with the government of other Churches? That is what is meant by “Establishment,” and it matters very little in what particular phraseology the Church so established is referred to in public documents. It is a matter of things, rather than of words.

I may add, however, that in the Coronation Oath the Sovereign promises not only to maintain “the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion established by law,” but also “the settlement of the United Churches of England and Ireland, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof, as by law established,” together with the rights and privileges appertaining to the Bishops and Clergy.

It is also a curious fact that in the original draft of the petition of the Seven Bishops to James II., relative to the Royal declaration on liberty of conscience, presented on behalf of themselves and the Clergy—a fac-simile of which is given in Cardwell’s “Documentary Annals of the Reformed Church of England,” and which is in the handwriting of Archbishop Sancroft, the form of subscription is, “Your Majesty’s most faithful, loyal, and obedient subjects and servants, the Clergy of the Church of England by law established.” This was altered to “the Clergy of the Established Church of England,” and although in the petition as actually presented neither of these forms appears, they show that the phraseology, which some persons appear to think is of modern origin, was in current use at that period, and that the recent Royal Commission has simply followed both usage and legislation in recommending that the Judges of the Provincial Courts and the Final Court of Appeal should be required to declare themselves to be members of “the Church of England as by law established.” As the Commissioners apparently undertook to describe the exact constitutional position of the Church, the fact that they adopt such language may be regarded as some proof of its strict accuracy.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. BRIGHT AND THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your notice last week of Mr. H. H. Fowler’s address to his constituents at Wolverhampton, I find the following words:—“When Mr. Fowler asked why the House of Lords should not be reformed, Wolverhampton cheered him most lustily,—and we wish the Conservative leaders in the Peers would carefully watch the growing signs of public impatience with which their obstructive attitude towards Liberal measures is received.” At the immense meeting in the Town Hall which Mr. Bright addressed during the Leeds Conference, there was no part of his speech which was more lustily and emphatically cheered than that in which he referred to the reform of the House of Lords.

Almost before the first sentence which introduced this question was concluded, the whole audience broke forth into a ringing and deafening cheer. A more unmistakable evidence of the growing impatience of the people at the obstructive attitude of the House of Lords could not be found, especially when we remember that the 4,000 men and women who crowded the Victoria Hall on that occasion did not represent merely the somewhat pronounced Liberalism of the largest Yorkshire borough, but also represented the public opinion of 500 Liberal associations in all parts of the country. This fact gives additional force to your suggestion that the leaders of the Conservative Peers would do well to take notice of this significant sign of the times, for if they foolishly determine to ignore it, they will do much to bring on that conflict between the two Houses of Parliament which, as Mr. Bright said, “is full of peril to one of them, and full of humiliation to both of them.”—I am, Sir, &c.,

JUSTICE TO IRELAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your article of October 20th on “Disintegration,” you say:—“Nor is there much more use in considering whether Irish hatred is incurable or otherwise. If it is not, we are taking all the means we can to cure it; and if it is, we must still take the same means, and endure the resulting failure as we best may.” This is terribly cold comfort to all those who have been induced to follow the lead of the authors of the great measures passed to conciliate Ireland. Hear Mr. Bright on the Church Disestablishment Bill of 1869 (Annual Register, 1869, p. 37):—“I say when I look at this measure, I look at it as tending to a more true and solid union between Ireland and Great Britain. I see it giving tranquillity to our people.” Hear Mr. Gladstone on the Land Bill of 1870 (Annual Register 1870, p. 39):—“Hesitate, then, I beseech you, for a moment before you run the risk of lighting a flame which you will in vain labour to extinguish, lest it should be the unhappy fate of your country that after she has surmounted every difficulty, borne every calamity, and conquered every enemy, she should at length miss the prize of national peace, happiness, and contentment, through the agency of those whom she believed to be her friends.” Again, he says, on the Land Bill of 1881 (Annual Register, 1881, p. 99), “Then the year 1881 will not have passed without adding to the Statute Book another great emancipating and redeeming measure, necessary alike for the prosperity of Ireland, the fame of Parliament, and the strength and solidity of the United Kingdom.” These were pointed to again and again as the “fruits of justice,” and for these great ends were those measures passed. And it is a terrible commentary that in 1883 we find the Spectator, instead of being able to point to these fruits of justice, the peace and contentment of Ireland, and the “solidity of the United Kingdom,” forced by the discontent and sedition which exist to be thankful that, with a formidable army and a splendid force of constabulary present amongst them, there is “no fear of rebellion in Ireland.”

I am myself a Liberal, and have agreed to the principles of all the great measures passed by the Liberal Party. But I think, as honest men, we are bound to suspect something wrong, when we find our measures bearing such disappointing fruits.—I am, Sir, &c.,

PHYSIOLOGICAL EXPERIMENT AND PHYSIOLOGICAL SPECULATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The question has been raised in your columns as to whether physical injuries are ever transmitted from parent to offspring. Permit me to say that certain experiments recorded by an eminent physiologist throw an important light on this question. As these were experiments on live animals, the Spectator could not be expected to republish or to make use of them.

It appears to me a matter for regret that the ingenious speculations of the Spectator should be cut short by its inability to make use of knowledge gained by a method of which it disapproves.

I can hardly be wrong in assuming that you would not wish to encourage or give value to the work of Vivisectionists. The experimental results to which I have above referred would furnish you with decisive information; but is it not considered objectionable for one and the same person to run with the hare and to hunt with the hounds?—I am, Sir, &c.,

E. RAY LANKESTER.

11 Wellington Mansions, North Bank, N.W.

[Did any sane man ever scruple to avail himself of sound knowledge, whether that knowledge ought, or ought not to have been available? Professor Lankester might just as well say that because some of Napoleon’s campaigns were gigantic crimes, strategists who disapproved them ought to be regarded as both “running with the hare and hunting with the hounds,” if they made use of them in writing on military strategy. Any such scruple would be idiotic. But none the less, Napoleon would not have been justified for making those campaigns on the ground that he was going to add greatly to the resources of military science, by the huge vivisectional experiments he was about to make.—Ed. Spectator.]

ANTHONY TROLLOPE’S “AUTOBIOGRAPHY.”

SIR,—In your review of Anthony Trollope’s “Autobiography” you say:—“His own explanation” of his unpopularity “is that he was impecunious, badly dressed, and neglectful of his own appearance; but boys have never cared much about these drawbacks." Six years' experience of public-school life lead me to dispute this last assertion in the strongest possible manner, and dispose me to trust the novelist's analysis of the causes of his own unpopularity. His penetration in this respect is evidence to my mind that the "disagreeable dullard" was even at school a keen observer of human nature. Disagreeable in some respects he must probably have been, to account for permanent unpopularity of so extreme a kind; but the three causes enumerated by himself account for a great deal, a very great deal.—I am, Sir, &c.,

AN HARROVIAN.

FAITH AND DOUBT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Many will be interested in your notice of Mr. Percy Greg's book. It is, as regards the present time, a representative book, viz., it presents with much accuracy what many minds think and feel to-day upon the great subjects of religion. Its position is that the evidence before our minds is not such as fairly to induce faith, but that the legitimate attitude of mind as regards faith or denial is a state of betweenness. It is the outcome of these years of so-called rationalistic research and criticism.

You rightly say, "The truth is, that no man of real wisdom keeps his intellect balanced in proportion to the arguments pro and con," but more than this, in the subject in question it is highly fallacious. There is one important consideration which is conspicuously wanting in all these books, and especially in Rationalistic literature generally, and that is the fundamental question as to what really constitutes evidence. Those who are unversed in law and the principles of evidence are often surprised when, in a Court of Justice, they hear what appears to them to be important evidence objected to, and not allowed to go to the jury as proper evidence at all. Now, the absurd credulity of some people, and the no less absurd incredulity of others, are owing to ignorance or disregard of the fundamental laws of evidence. Among all classes, learned and unlearned, there is abounding ignorance as to what is evidence, and as to what is not evidence; and there is also abounding disregard of the claims of right evidence to decide men's minds for the truth. The Rational (so-called) attacks on the Bible and religion are examples of this ignorance and absurd incredulity. We see men otherwise well informed, as many "Rationalists" are, yet very ignorant of sound evidence, or careless of its claims. When we correct our judgment according to the right principles of evidence, and also by a common-sense regard to the events of history and of every-day occurrences, we perceive that the allegations of those who profess to show that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, or the exact documental divisions of Genesis, &c., are wholly absurd and illusive. And, on the other hand, we perceive that if the evidence, patent, latent, direct, inferential, full, and unanswerable, which we have, does not establish the truth and divine authority of the Bible, then there is an end of attempting to establish anything by evidence. I hold, therefore, that this betweenness state of mind is either an absurdly mistaken or an unrighteous and guilty state of mind.—I am, Sir, &c.,

REALITY AND SENTIMENT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Here are two sides of a question. 1. A healthy sign of the times is the general ridicule shown towards things sentimental and display of feeling. 2. In as far as it is a sign of the times, it is the reverse of healthy, for it shows an absence of the sense of reality and earnestness in life.

I suppose there is some truth in each of these opinions. I wish you would sift it out, Sir, if you have time and space, some day. I am a clergyman, and have a great sense of the wholesome effect of ridicule, when properly applied (it is applied to us Clergy, often enough, e.g., last week's Punch), but when it tends towards cynicism, it cannot be healthy, surely? Mixing a good deal with the poor, I know there is much less of this laughter at show of feeling amongst them than among the upper classes, and I believe it is because their hard struggle for existence makes life more real to them,—not a thing to be either philosophised about, or to be brought with great labour into an artificial condition, but to be lived. I do not know if you will think the question worth raising in your columns.—I am, Sir, &c.,

BOOKS.

THIS is in every way a characteristic book. It is very characteristic of Mr. Trollope that full six years before his death he should have completed an autobiography which he did not intend to be published in his life-time. In that, as in everything else that he did during his literary career, he was always several years in advance of his actual needs, and to those who know how rarely literary men are in advance of their actual needs, how much they trust to the spur of necessity for the stimulus requisite for the supply of those needs, this redundant energy of Mr. Trollope's will seem not only characteristic, but even unique. Again, the absolute frankness of the book is most characteristic of Mr. Trollope; and so is its unequalled,—manliness we were going to say,—but we mean something both more and less than manliness, covering more than the daring of manliness and something less than the quietness or equanimity which we are accustomed to include in that term, so we may call it, its unequalled masculineness. Mr. Trollope is not only candid in this autobiography; but of any deficiency of his own which he wishes to confess, he confesses himself almost defiantly. In speaking of his oratorical shortcomings, he remarks, with great truth, "If there were something special to be said, I could say it in a common-place fashion; but always as though I were in a hurry, and with the fear before me of being thought to be prolix." That was undoubtedly also Mr. Trollope's manner even in conversation, and that manner communicates a certain superficial appearance of aggressiveness even to the style of his autobiography. There is a hurly-burly frankness about it, as of a man who is defying the public to prevent him from saying of himself precisely what he wants to say. And, no doubt, he does say precisely what he wants to say; and what he wants to say is most creditable to him; but it is thrust upon us somewhat too headlongly, too much after the fashion of the ardent hunting man he was, one who would ride straight across country, and was determined never to avail himself of any gap or gate which would furnish a more natural transition from one position to another. Then the book is also highly characteristic in its confessions of Mr. Trollope's official and political morality. Nothing more creditable to a public man than what he tells us of his relation to the Post Office after he became a really trusted and efficient servant of the Post Office, could well be conceived. It is not the conscientiousness of his work to which we refer, for we hope that is common enough, but its austere independence of anything like concession to the weakness of his superiors,—its masterful resolve to let the authorities know that, implicitly as they were obeyed, they had the full and sole responsibility of carrying out a policy which one of the ablest of their subordinates thought foolish, and the folly of which he would not shrink from demonstrating so far as they gave him the chance. There are very few public officials who have the courage to act thus, and yet no line of conduct more patriotic, more truly useful to the institutions of the country, can be imagined, than this pertinacity of able subordinates in pressing their detailed criticism on the attention of their superiors, even at the very time at which they are implicitly following the instructions they receive. So, and so only, can the higher authorities get the full advantage of the experience of their subordinates, as well as the advantage of their fidelity in carrying out orders:—

"During the whole of this work in the Post Office it was my principle always to obey authority in everything instantly, but never to allow my mouth to be closed as to the expression of my opinion. They who had the ordering of me very often did not know the work as I knew it,—could not tell as I could what would be the effect of this or that change. When carrying out instructions which I knew should not have been given, I never scrupled to point out the fatuity of the improper order in the strongest language that I could decently employ. I have revelled in these official correspondences, and look back to some of them as the greatest delights of my life. But I am not sure that they were so delightful to others."

No wonder Mr. Trollope was not always a favourite at headquarters. It is greatly to the honour of the Post Office that he was valued as highly as he was, and was entrusted with so many responsible duties by its chiefs. No doubt, in those "delicious feuds" of which he speaks with such intense enjoyment the feuds in which, apparently, he was generally pitted against Sir Rowland Hill and Sir Rowland Hill's party, he was frequently right, though sometimes at least wrong. As regards, for instance, the question of competitive examinations, on which he so vehemently adopted the Conservative side, we believe him to have been quite wrong,—and wrong even on the very grounds on which he attacked the new system. But often, doubtless, Mr. Trollope was absolutely right, and we feel pretty sure that he understood the art, necessary in so great a Department, of governing men, much better than Sir Rowland Hill.

This book is characteristic also in the complete sincerity of its somewhat mundane ideal of life. Mr. Trollope seems to be one of the few men who have really reached their ideal, and enjoyed reaching it to the full. It is not often that a man of genius,—and no one will deny that Mr. Trollope was a man of genius,—would be able to write as Mr. Trollope writes in this frank and manly passage:—

"I had created for myself a position among literary men, and had secured to myself an income on which I might live in ease and comfort,—which ease and comfort have been made to include many luxuries. From this time for a period of twelve years my income averaged £4,500 a year. Of this I spent about two-thirds, and put by one. I ought perhaps to have done better,—to have spent one-third, and put by two; but I have ever been too well inclined to spend freely that which has come easily. This, however, has been so exactly the life which my thoughts and aspirations had marked out,—thoughts and aspirations which used to cause me to blush with shame because I was so slow in forcing myself to the work which they demanded,—that I have felt some pride in having attained it. I have before said how entirely I fail to reach the altitude of those who think that a man devoted to letters should be indifferent to the pecuniary results for which work is generally done. An easy income has always been regarded by me as a great blessing. Not to have to think of sixpences, or very much of shillings; not to be unhappy because the coals have been burned too quickly, and the house linen wants renewing; not to be debarred by the rigour of necessity from opening one's hands, perhaps foolishly, to one's friends;—all this to me has been essential to the comfort of life. I have enjoyed the comfort for I may almost say the last twenty years, though no man in his youth had less prospect of doing so, or would have been less likely at twenty-five to have had such luxuries foretold to him by his friends. But though the money has been sweet, the respect, the friendships, and the mode of life which has been achieved, have been much sweeter. In my boyhood, when I would be crawling up to school with dirty boots and trousers through the muddy lanes, I was always telling myself that the misery of the hour was not the worst of it, but that the mud and solitude and poverty of the time would insure me mud and solitude and poverty through my life. Those lads about me would go into Parliament, or become rectors and deans, or squires of parishes, or advocates thundering at the Bar. They would not live with me now,—but neither should I be able to live with them in after years. Nevertheless, I have lived with them. When, at the age in which others go to the Universities, I became a clerk in the Post Office, I felt that my old visions were being realised. I did not think it a high calling. I did not know then how very much good work may be done by a member of the Civil Service who will show himself capable of doing it. The Post Office at last grew upon me, and forced itself into my affections. I became intensely anxious that people should have their letters delivered to them punctually. But my hope to rise had always been built on the writing of novels, and at last by the writing of novels I had risen. I do not think that I ever toadied any one, or that I have acquired the character of a tuft-hunter. But here I do not scruple to say that I prefer the society of distinguished people, and that even the distinction of wealth confers many advantages. The best education is to be had at a price, as well as the best broadcloth. The son of a peer is more likely to rub his shoulders against well-informed men than the son of a tradesman. The graces come easier to the wife of him who has had great-grandfathers than they do to her whose husband has been less,—or more fortunate, as he may think it. The discerning man will recognise the information and the graces when they are achieved without such assistance, and will honour the owners of them the more because of the difficulties they have overcome;—but the fact remains that the society of the well-born and of the wealthy will as a rule be worth seeking. I say this now, because these are the rules by which I have lived, and these are the causes which have instigated me to work."

There is a great deal in that passage which any man might well be proud to be able to write with that complete and absolute truthfulness with which Mr. Trollope has written it. But there is in it a curious revelation of the secret of Mr. Trollope's energy and efficiency in the bareness of the ideal itself, and the overflowing satisfaction with which it is contemplated. Strangely enough, Mr. Trollope could create characters, and did create characters who, if they had written down their own ideals, would have painted something which seems to us infinitely higher than such an ideal as this. His own favourite, Plantagenet Palliser—not the Plantagenet Palliser of Framley Parsonage, but the Plantagenet Palliser of Can You Forgive Her? and the subsequent novels, especially when he becomes Duke of Omnium, and has to manage unruly children after the death of his wife, had a far higher ideal than this. Mr. Harding had a far higher ideal than this. So had Mr. Crawley, and so even had Dean Arabin. But it is difficult, after reading this autobiography, not to feel that Mr. Trollope had a higher ideal when thinking the thoughts of some of the children of his own imagination, than he had when thinking his own. Of course, as he tells us, this Autobiography is not intended to give any record of his inner life. But the very passage in which he tells this, and in which he is taking his farewell of his readers, is written in a key that does not suggest any of those subtler and deeper yearnings which usually enter into the essential ideal of a man of genius:—

"It will not, I trust, be supposed by any reader that I have intended in this so-called autobiography to give a record of my inner life. No man ever did so truly,—and no man ever will. Rousseau probably attempted it, but who doubts but that Rousseau has confessed in much the thoughts and convictions rather than the facts of his life? If the rustle of a woman's petticoat has ever stirred my blood; if a cup of wine has been a joy to me; if I have thought tobacco at midnight in pleasant company to be one of the elements of an earthly paradise; if now and again I have somewhat recklessly flattered a £5 note over a card-table;—of what matter is that to any reader? I have betrayed no woman. Wine has brought me to no sorrow. It has been the companionship of smoking that I have loved, rather than the habit. I have never desired to win money, and I have lost none. To enjoy the excitement of pleasure, but to be free from its vices and ill effects,—to have the sweet, and leave the bitter untasted,—that has been my study. The preachers tell us that this is impossible. It seems to me that hitherto I have succeeded fairly well. I will not say that I have never scorched a finger,—but I carry no ugly wounds. For what remains to me of life I trust for my happiness still chiefly to my work,—hoping that when the power of work be over with me, God may be pleased to take me from a world in which, according to my view, there can be no joy; secondly, to the love of those who love me; and then to my books."

That is hardly the tone, we think, in which a man would write who had purposely kept out of his narrative the highest aspirations of his life. Mr. Trollope was thoroughly in earnest in wishing to teach a high morality by his tales,—and no tales could be purer than his from anything like mischief; at the same time, we should say that what he understood as a high morality was a morality of a very limited kind, and involved little more for men and women in general than insisting that girls should be modest and loving, and that men should be honest and diligent, and should know their own minds. He hardly even teaches so much as that men should be pure as well as women, or that women should be courageous as well as men. Here is one of the passages in which he exhibits his doctrine as to the moral teaching of the novel:—

"The writer of stories must please, or he will be nothing. And he must teach, whether he wish to teach or no. How shall he teach lessons of virtue and at the same time make himself a delight to his readers? That sermons are not in themselves often thought to be agreeable we all know. Nor are disquisitions on moral philosophy supposed to be pleasant reading for our idle hours. But the novelist, if he have a conscience, must preach his sermons with the same purpose as the clergyman, and must have his own system of ethics. If he can do this efficiently, if he can make virtue alluring and vice ugly, while he charms his readers instead of wearying them, then I think Mr. Carlyle need not call him distressed, nor talk of that long ear of fiction, nor question whether he be or not the most foolish of existing mortals. I think that many have done so; so many that we English novelists may boast as a class that such has been the general result of our own work. Looking back to the past generation, I may say with certainty that such was the operation of the novels of Miss Edgeworth, Miss Austen, and Walter Scott. Coming down to my own times, I find such to have been the teaching of Thackeray, of Dickens, and of George Eliot. Speaking, as I shall speak to any who may read these words, with that absence of self-personality which the dead may claim, I will boast that such has been the result of my own writing. Can any one by search through the works of the six great English novelists I have named, find a scene, a passage, or a word that would teach a girl to be immodest, or a man to be dishonest? When men in their pages have been described as dishonest and women as immodest, have they not ever been punished? It is not for the novelist to say, baldly and simply: 'Because you lied here, or were heartless to her, because you Lydia Bennet forgot the lessons of your honest home, or you Earl Leicester were false through your ambition, or you Beatrix loved too well the glitter of the world, therefore you shall be scourged with scourges either in this world or in the next;' but it is for him to show, as he carries on his tale, that his Lydia, or his Leicester, or his Beatrix, will be dishonoured in the estimation of all readers by his or her vices. Let a woman be drawn clever, beautiful, attractive,—so as to make men love her, and women almost envy her,—and let her be made also heartless, unfeminine, and ambitious of evil grandeur, as was Beatrix, what a danger is there not in such a character! To the novelist who shall handle it, what peril of doing harm! But if at last it have been so handled that every girl who reads of Beatrix shall say: 'Oh! not like that;—let me not be like that!' and that every youth shall say: 'Let me not have such a one as that to press to my bosom, anything rather than that!'—then will not the novelist have preached his sermon as perhaps no clergyman can preach it?"

It is perfectly obvious that Mr. Trollope succeeded in embodying this ideal of the moral teaching of a novel in almost all his tales. But in how very few of them did he portray a character which puts before us a very high or delicate standard of motive and principle, such as that of the Duke in The Duke's Children, or that of Mr. Harding in all the Barchester stories, or that of Mr. Crawley in The Last Chronicle of Barset, or that of Dean Arabin in the same story. For the most part, Mr. Trollope is content with showing up the meanness of cowardice and dishonesty, and the misery of marrying without love, and he owes it rather to the force of his imagination than to his own personal ideal of what life should be, if he takes us into a finer and rarer atmosphere of spiritual feeling. The redundant healthiness and energy of Mr. Trollope show themselves abundantly in this autobiography, as in his stories; but certainly part of the secret of that energy was that he did not spend his strength, like George Eliot, on constructing subtle, or fastidious, or ambitious moral ideals, nor even, like Thackeray, on lamenting that human weakness so frequently foils the endeavours which the human conscience originates.

The passage in these volumes which has given us as much pleasure as any, is the admirable one in which Mr. Trollope sketches his own political attitude, and gives the rationale of his political belief. We have always had the impression which Mr. Frederic Greenwood, who was the editor of the Pall Mall Gazette during the period of Mr. Trollope's contributions to it, has just confirmed, that Mr. Trollope was not an able political writer, and hardly ever touched a political question so as to throw any fresh light upon it. So much the more gratifying is it to find in his Autobiography a passage so clear and thoughtful, and so full of wise moderation, as the following:—

"Writing now at an age beyond sixty, I can say that my political feelings and convictions have never undergone any change. They are now what they became when I first began to have political feelings and convictions. Nor do I find in myself any tendency to modify them as I have found generally in men as they grow old. I consider myself to be an advanced, but still a Conservative-Liberal, which I regard not only as a possible but as a rational and consistent phase of political existence. I can, I believe, in a very few words, make known my political theory; and as I am anxious that any who know ought of me should know that, I will endeavour to do so. It must, I think, be painful to all men to feel inferiority. It should, I think, be a matter of some pain to all men to feel superiority, unless when it has been won by their own efforts. We do not understand the operations of Almighty wisdom, and are therefore unable to tell the causes of the terrible inequalities that we see,—why some, why so many, should have so little to make life enjoyable, so much to make it painful, while a few others, not through their own merit, have had gifts poured out to them from a full hand. We acknowledge the hand of God and his wisdom, but still we are struck with awe and horror at the misery of many of our brethren. We who have been born to the superior condition,—for in this matter I consider myself to be standing on a platform with dukes and princes, and all others to whom plenty and education and liberty have been given,—cannot, I think, look upon the inane, unintellectual, and toad-bound life of those who cannot even feed themselves sufficiently by their sweat, without some feeling of injustice, some feeling of pain. This consciousness of wrong has induced in many enthusiastic but unbalanced minds a desire to set all things right by a proclaimed equality. In their efforts such men have shown how powerless they are in opposing the ordinances of the Creator. For the mind of the thinker and the student is driven to admit, though it be awestruck by apparent injustice, that this inequality is the work of God. Make all men equal to-day, and God has so created them that they shall be all unequal to-morrow. The so-called Conservative, the conscientious philanthropic Conservative, seeing this, and being surely convinced that such inequalities are of divine origin, tells himself that it is his duty to preserve them. He thinks that the preservation of the welfare of the world depends on the maintenance of those distances between the prince and the peasant by which he finds himself to be surrounded;—and perhaps, I may add, that the duty is not unpleasant, as he feels himself to be one of the princes. But this man, though he sees something, and sees that very clearly, sees only a little. The divine inequality is apparent to him, but not the equally divine diminution of that inequality. That such diminution is taking place on all sides is apparent enough; but it is apparent to him as an evil, the consummation of which it is his duty to retard. He cannot prevent it; and therefore the society to which he belongs is, in his eyes, retrograding. He will even, at times, assist it; and will do so conscientiously, feeling that, under the gentle pressure supplied by him, and with the drags and holdfasts which he may add, the movement would be slower than it would become if subjected to his proclaimed and absolute opponents. Such, I think, are Conservatives;—and I speak of men who, with the fear of God before their eyes and the love of their neighbours warm in their hearts, endeavour to do their duty to the best of their ability. Using the term which is now common, and which will be best understood, I will endeavour to explain how the equally conscientious Liberal is opposed to the Conservative. He is equally aware that these distances are of divine origin, equally averse to any sudden disruption of society in quest of some Utopian blessedness;—but he is alive to the fact that these distances are day by day becoming less, and he regards this continual diminution as a series of steps towards that human millennium of which he dreams. He is even willing to help the many to ascend the ladder a little, though he knows, as they come up towards him, he must go down to meet them. What is really in his mind is,—I will not say equality, for the word is offensive, and presents to the imaginations of men ideas of communism, of ruin, and insane democracy,—but a tendency towards equality. In following that, however, he knows that he must be hemmed in by safeguards, lest he be tempted to travel too quickly; and therefore he is glad to be accompanied on his way by the repressive action of a Conservative opponent. Holding such views, I think I am guilty of no absurdity in calling myself an advanced Conservative-Liberal. A man who entertains in his mind any political doctrine, except as a means of improving the condition of his fellows, I regard as a political intriguer, a charlatan, and a conjuror,—as one who thinks that, by a certain amount of wary wire-pulling, he may raise himself in the estimation of the world."

That seems to us one of the wisest and tersest summaries of political principle which we have ever come across, one given, too, with none of that hurry and noisiness of style which so often injures Mr. Trollope's reflective writing. It does not make us regret that Mr. Trollope failed in his canvas at Beverley,—for life in Parliament would certainly have been waste of life to him,—but it does show us that there was more of the statesman in him than we had ever before suspected, for unquestionably Mr. Greenwood is right in saying that in political writing Mr. Trollope generally failed. Only a charlatan or a madman will talk of the equality of all mankind, or even of all the citizens of one nation. Only a Tory will talk of artificially created inequalities as if they were pure blessings, which it becomes wise statesmen jealously to protect, and even to exaggerate. But the true Liberal will, as Mr. Trollope says, do all in his power to attenuate the artificial inequalities which caste and privilege have created or exaggerated to the great disadvantage of those who are heavily weighted in the race, without attempting to raise in any class the false hope that by any possible manipulation of affairs it can ever be contrived that all men shall start with even chances in life, or even that equal powers shall be sure of equal success. The principle of true Liberalism was evidently held by Mr. Trollope in its simplest form. But we doubt whether political life ever interested him like the development of human character; and political life treated from a merely social point of view was a theme which he would justly have despised.

BELINDA.*

MISS BROUGHTON is one of the few novel-writers whom we miss, now that no really great master of the art of fiction is left among us, if for a season or two they make no sign. Her faults are as conspicuous as her merits, and they are the more irritating, because it is evident from her persistence in them that she takes them to be meritorious; but everything that she writes is readable, and everybody remembers that there has not been a novel by her for some time, and is glad to see Belinda. This is a good deal to have to say of any writer, in an era of transient trash; it is a pity that the author of Second Thoughts has not given her serious critics—not mere flatterers, but those who think she might make better use of her exceptional ability—much more than this to say for her present novel, which has come after an unusually long interval. In its predecessor, Second Thoughts, there was more literary merit, as well as greater excellence of other kinds, than Miss Broughton had previously displayed; and she refrained in that work from most of her former offences against good taste, from flippant and irreverent treatment of sacred subjects, and from the distortion of family relations into their meanest, ugliest, and least respectable forms. Not only had the book more grace in it, but it had better grammar. In both these respects, we regret to find Miss Broughton backsliding. Belinda, with plentiful touches of the writer's characteristic brilliancy, and sharp, sudden pathos, with much pictorial beauty, and occasional charming gusts of fresh feeling for the loveliness and the loftiness of Nature—passages quite unlike the set descriptions in which most writers convey what they take to be local colour—carries us back to equivocal grammar and worthless company.

Age made contemptible by selfishness and insincerity, youth without reverence, and lives of human beings with as little principle or responsibility to govern or direct them as if the people in the story were all wandering elves, in a world where cause and effect have no correlation; such are the chief objects we are invited to contemplate in the course of the history of Belinda Churchill, one of the two sisters to whom Miss Broughton adheres, with the constancy of Mr. G. P. R. James to his two horsemen. One cannot read the book without wondering whether the author really never did hear or read of people who could be good, without being dull; who were capable of taking a serious view of their relations to each other—the view of the law and the Gospel alike—and maintaining them with decent consistency, but who were not ponderous bores, or totally uninteresting, for all that. If she acknowledges that such people exist, why can she not give them a place in her novels? In the present instance, we have not the worthless, despicable, and hated father, who has figured in several of Miss Broughton's former stories; but we have a selfish, worldly, false old woman, the grandmother of the two girls, who is as little to be admired. There is humour in the scenes between the Churchill girls and the old lady—whom "Belinda does not amuse, while Dandet, from whose pages her grandchildren's entrance rouses her, does"—but it is humour that has an ill taste; humour that offends, just as when the young man with whom Belinda's sister has been flirting comes up with her on a mountain walk in Wales, and she says, "A more direct answer to prayer I have seldom heard of;" that observation offends. Sayings of this kind are not witty, and not well-bred; they are the cheapest and the easiest sort of "patter" going, no more difficult or admirable than a "topical" song; and the author of Belinda has better things than vulgar flippancy to season her discourse withal. There is real comicality in her Miss Watson, the ever inopportune busybody, who is always at hand to interrupt the lovers, postpone the catastrophes, and generally help the plot—it needs helping a good deal, for there is not much of it—and who is a kind of compound of Paul Pry and Miss Pratt, in The Inheritance. Miss Watson's rudeness, her invincible assurance, her ineffable self-sufficiency, her shrewdness, and her pertinacity, are admirably drawn; and as she is nobody's near relation, there is not the bitter taste in her sayings and doings that spoils the humour of the other sketches. There is also real comicality, close observation, and true sympathy in all the parts that the Churchill dogs are made to play in the drama. We have been indebted to Miss Broughton for several delightful dogs, especially for that sociable "Mr. Brown," who "did not mind mustard," and we are now truly grateful to her for "Punch" and "Slutty." The Churchill dogs are acquisitions of great price, especially "Punch," whose nicely graduated reception of his mistress's visitors is a gem of humour and appreciation.

Lively dialogue is always to be looked for in a novel by Miss Broughton, and Belinda gives us a good deal. It is sometimes rather too lively; the sallies of Sarah occasionally go beyond the mark of good taste, as, for instance, when she talks of her sister's having gone to a party, where she met "the usual refuse of a second-rate literary salon; dirty little poets, and greasy little positivists." Without pretending to a knowledge of how young ladies talk among themselves, we think it is safe to conclude that they do not say that sort of thing. Sarah Churchill is an amusing person, but she is an example of Miss Broughton's tendency to draw one-sided characters. She is a flirt who is always flirting, a funny flirt, and not a bad creature, though she has no more principle than her grandmother; but one can form no notion of her apart from flippant, rather vulgar, flirtatiousness, except it be a sharp knowledge of not the best world. We can laugh at, and with her, but she is too plainly and persistently a foil for the sentimental woes of Belinda to be true to any kind of nature, except it be that unclassed and elfish sort to which we have before alluded.

Belinda, the heroine of the story, is one of Miss Broughton's young ladies, and she falls in love with one of Miss Broughton's young gentlemen. The latter is a much-faded specimen; until the critical period of illicit love-making arrives, when he becomes as vivid, under the influence of her purpose, to take his neighbour's wife "to the Devil" (it is the lady who frankly and truly describes the transaction in these words) with him, as any of his predecessors. Otherwise, David Rivers conveys no notion of an individuality. The author has not troubled herself to give him any, and she bestows no originality ("no smallest," as she would say, in that queer diction so dear to her imitators), upon the device by which Belinda and David are parted, at a time when their love is innocent. The frank boldness that employs an expedient which belongs to the most venerable traditions of the novel-writer's craft, is only to be justified by a satisfactory treatment of the subsequent situations. Miss Broughton has fulfilled that condition. Nothing can render her theme pleasant or edifying; but, having made her heroine marry a selfish, old, valetudinarian pedant, whose character she draws with cruel force and great success, for Professor Forth is as distinct as he is disagreeable, and then brought her and her former lover together again under circumstances of skilfully piled-up temptation and facilities, Miss Broughton treats the situation with great ability. We wish she had not created that situation, one as odious in fiction as it is revolting in real life. The wooing of a married woman to her ruin by a man who profanes the name of love by that deed of theft and scoundrelism can never be otherwise than pitch, not to be touched without defilement; but the author deserves praise for the way in which she brings the sure and certain penalty of illicit love into evidence. We know, of course, that she will save Belinda (if it is to be called saving her) in the end, and that she will kill off the inconvenient and inconsiderate old Professor, leaving her readers to finish the story with wedding-bells and everlasting felicity, and taking no account of the heavily-handicapped start in life of two people with such a record in their past as the scenes that precede the happy release of the Professor. This finale would leave much to be desired in point of morality, even according to the standard to which it is reasonable to bring a novel, but for the way in which the writer handles her objectionable subject. That way vindicates her. The ill-savour is inevitable, but the poison is extracted by the following passage, and others like it, which we cannot quote, occurring after the lovers have arranged their flight:—

"Oh, if it were but all right! all on the straight! What could Heaven do better than this? Ay! but the might of that 'if'!"—"And you must go?" she says, sighingly; "you think it is quite unavoidable; you must?"—"I must," he answers, in a tone as grudging as hers; "there is no help for it; there are—hesitating—there are arrangements to be made that I must make personally, that could not be done by writing; and I must also go to Milnthorpe, to see about my work."—"It—this—will not make any difference to your work?" she asks rapidly, and in a tone of acute alarm; "it—it will not injure your prospects?"—"Of course not, of course not," he answers, in a tone of feverish reassurance; "why should it? What connection is there between a man's private life and his business relations? What concern is it of theirs whether I—I—"—"You run away with your neighbour's wife," she says, in a low, hard voice, finishing his sentence; "why do you not speak out? If a thing is not too bad to do, it is not too bad to say." But through the dark he divines the agony of the blush that accompanies her words; and again that sword-like pain, which had marred the first moments of his triumphant bliss, once more traverses his heart. . . . "You will not be long away?" she says, with a passionate wistfulness; "you will not leave me long alone?"—"Need you tell me that?" There is almost derision in his tone. . . . "You will not despise me more than you can help?" she whispers, with a sob, dark as it is, hiding her face on his breast. "Of course you must despise me, but you will try and hide it as well as you can, will not you?" Are his wits wandering? Can this be his divine and lofty lady, preferring this miserable prayer? Can this be he, blasphemously listening to it? "How am I to get through these days?" she moans, clinging to him. "Oh, come quickly back! How am I to look him in the face, without telling him what I am planning against him? If he says one hard word to me, it will be the death of me! Happily for me, he never does." . . . For all answer, he only strains her more desperately to his heart. . . . "I shall be always fancying that you are growing tired of me," she whispers. "Promise not to grow tired of me! Promise! promise! Remember that I shall have nothing, nothing but you in the whole, wide world, and that when you are gone from me, everything will be gone! But what is the use of making you promise? How can you help it? If you grow tired of me, you will grow tired; and there will be an end of it."

The whole of this scene is remarkably fine, and may claim to be as far from "encouraging the others" as the sternest moralist could require. But now that we know Miss Broughton can deal powerfully and fitly with such a topic as the entrance on deadly sin and ruin by a man and woman who have a prevision of the inevitable punishment, we should be glad to think that for the future she would let her lively fancy, her pleasant humour, her quick sympathy, her delightful sense of the beauties of Nature, her sharp satire, and her keen sensibilities find more wholesome exercise than she has afforded them in the medley of passion and triviality called Belinda.

THE reconstruction of a vanished world is one of the most difficult and most enchanting feats of science, and when accomplished with success is, perhaps, the best impulse that can be given to the further progress of research and thought. But if the knowledge, industry, and ingenuity required for the work are immense in the case of an Owen or a Lyell, where the things dealt with cannot lie, even more are those qualities needed in the man who is dealing not with dead and inanimate matter, but with the ever-living and ever-changing institutions of mankind. Mr. Seebohm in his book on the English village community has shown this constructive power of the scientific imagination in its highest form. Its publication forms an epoch in the early history of institutions. The researches of Maurer (we must claim to be allowed to drop the unnecessary "von" of German names) in Germany, the writings of Sir Henry Maine on the English and Indian village communities, and Mr. Mackenzie Wallace's great work on Russia, have familiarised us with the thought that in the village community was to be found the key to the early history of civilised life everywhere. But no one has worked out the details of the history of the village community or grasped the main outlines of its working with such industry and clearness, nor has any one presented them in so interesting and vivid a form to the public as Mr. Seebohm. The book is a model of what such a book should be. Starting with the township of Hitchin, where he lives, Mr. Seebohm gives us from old records a lifelike picture of an English manor before the era of enclosure Acts and the working of the three-course system of agriculture on open or common fields. Then, by picking up a hint here and a word or two there, he carries us back step by step from the known to the unknown, through the times of Edward III. to those of the hundred-rolls of Edward I., and so to Domesday Book and Saxon charters, King Alfred's will, even up to the laws of King Ina and of King Ethelbert, in the seventh and sixth centuries, or within a century of the conquest of England by the Saxons. Through all these centuries, in all parts of Saxon England, he finds the village community organised as a manor, with its lord and his court, its demesne land and its open fields, its three-field system and Lammas meadows, its villains, its cottiers, and, in the earlier times, its slaves. He finds, in fact, that the typical English village community was not one of equal freemen, holding equal shares, and administering a common property, but one of lord and serf, in which the serfs were the land-slaves of the lord, who alone, with perhaps a few dependants planted on his demesne, was a freeman, and, to use modern parlance, a citizen.

Instead of early English economic history being the story of the gradual decline of the freeman taking his own share of the common land into the serf tilling his lord's land, and his rise again into the free copyholder or leaseholder, it should, according to Mr. Seebohm, be regarded as a continuous rise of the serf bound to whatever servile services his lord required into the villain bound only to services fixed by custom, and thence, again, into the free cultivator at a fixed money rent. The "hams" and "tons" of the Billings and the Wellings, which we had been taught to regard as the early homes and towns of a free community of equal English which had been converted by the Saxons of the degenerate days of Edward, and by the conquering Normans, into manors, were really manors all along. It is even worse than this. In tracing the origin of the English village community, Mr. Seebohm shows that it was not derived from the Celts of Wales, and of Cornwall and Ireland, who were still in the semi-pastoral, and not in the agricultural stage, and though they had the common-field system, had an earlier form of it than prevailed in Saxon England. They were freemen, who were not yet settled in fixed agricultural abodes, but, like the Germans of Tacitus' time, still redivided their lands year by year, and, instead of "calling them after their own names," called them after some physical peculiarity of hill, or wood, or stream. We are, therefore, transported to the Teutonic mainland from whence the English came. Here Mr. Seebohm ventures to meet Maurer, and attack him on his own ground. The numerous ingens and heims of Germany, the ignys and incourts of France, are no mere traces of free village communities, but are identical with the weils and villes which mark the Roman villa, and the Roman villa is the common ancestor of "ham" and "heim," of "ville" and "ton," of "court" and "manor." Geography, etymology, history, old charters of German and French abbeyes, Roman agricultural writers, Roman historians, Roman law-givers, Varro, Cæsar, Tacitus, Cicero, and Justinian, all are made to contribute their quota to the proof that the village community was one of serfs, not of freemen; was the product not of free German tribes, not even of the conquering Germans planted by their own force among Roman villæ, but of conquered Germans planted by the force of the later Roman emperors within the Roman border, to cultivate what they had devastated, and to uphold the system which they had endeavoured to overthrow. Further, the three-field system is to be identified not with the system of equal inheritance amongst heirs, but with the system of the inheritance of one; and that one, though latterly the eldest, yet probably at first the youngest son. In fact, the custom of borough-English is made to furnish the disproof of its being an English custom, and to point rather to a survival of Celtic ownership under Roman rule. Moreover, for this revolutionary book leaves none of our most cherished prepossessions of the early history of our race untouched, the three-field system points to the origin of the English not in the "bogs and sands" of Jutland and Friesland, where the one-field system prevailed, but in the richer lands of the Rhine, Bavaria, Elsass, Württemberg. Lastly, instead of the Saxons annihilating and exterminating the Romano-British, and devastating, destroying, and deserting their settlements, the "hams" and the "tuns" and the manors were situate on the very sites, and probably were cultivated by the very inhabitants of the Roman villa, the Roman "dominus" merely giving place to the English "lord;" the "colonus" to the "gebur;" the "jugerum" to the "acre;" the "centuria" to the "hide;" and the "sordida munera" to the "villain-services."

Now, all this last part goes a little too far. Why is the direct evidence of Bede as to the former homes of the English to be rejected, when his indirect evidence as to the prevalence of the manorial system is to be accepted? and, if deportation is to be accepted as the origin of great part of the English nation, is it likely that in those days Bavarians and Rhinelanders would be transported to Britain rather than those of Lower Germany? Moreover, the custom of borough-English, even if it be admitted not to be English, as is probably the case, but Welsh, is, at all events, more a mark of a borough than of the country. Only during the last summer assizes, for instance, the custom was asserted at Gloucester. Gloucester, as Mr. Seebohm reminds us, was one of the latest conquered of English cities, and was close to places where, as he shows, the Welsh tribal system, and not the English village system, prevailed. But the custom was strictly limited to the city of Gloucester within its ancient Roman boundary, and, as Mr. Seebohm virtually admits, whatever may have been the case with Roman and British villas, the English invaders carefully avoided the towns in the early period of their occupation. The existence of the custom of borough-English, or the inheritance of the youngest son, ought, therefore, not to be pressed into the service of his theory, as showing a connection between Germans abroad and at home, so much as between Celts abroad and at home, and no one has ever denied that the Celts were in occupation of the Rhine and of Britain before the Teutons. Indeed, if the argument drawn from it is good for anything, it rather goes to prove the Celtic origin of the village community, an origin which Mr. Seebohm denies. At the same time, it must be allowed that the real evidence for any particular domicile of the English in Germany is exceedingly scanty, and so is the written evidence of the thoroughness of the English conquest. But the facts that there is no record of the conquest in Welsh sources, and that everywhere Roman remains appear to have suffered from fire, would tend to show that Mr. Freeman and Mr. Green were right in representing it as not a mere conquest, like that of the Normans, but an annihilation. At the same time, it is possible that the English may have destroyed the Roman houses and the Roman churches, and not have destroyed the hovels of the German and Celtic serfs, and may have retained the remnant of the agricultural population in its old homes, doing its old work. It is, of course, also open to Mr. Seebohm to contend that the English, wherever they came from, came as emigrants, and not as mere conquerors, with their wives and children, their serfs and slaves, their corn-seed, and even cattle. Whatever may be the ultimate view which may be adopted as to the origin of the English, and of the English village community and the universality of the manorial system, there is no doubt that the whole subject must be reconsidered, in the light of the new facts and new arguments brought to bear on it in this book. There can be as little doubt that even if the universality of the manorial system in Saxon, as distinct from Danish and Welsh, England be not proved, yet it must be admitted that it prevailed far more widely in pre-Norman England than has hitherto been suspected, and that if not universal, it was at least the most general form of land-tenure in the midland and south-east of England.

But whether the village community was free or unfree, never before has its working been so vividly brought before us as it is both in the text and in the admirable maps and plans by which it is illustrated. The skill with which the author has seized upon every point of vantage, and has turned the most unexpected facts into cogent pieces of evidence, would have made his fortune as a criminal lawyer. We see before us the old village, with its common plough, to which the various landholders contribute oxen according to their ability, and share accordingly the strips of land into which the common field is cut up. We realise how it was that such an apparently impossible system as that of holdings of land scattered in acres and half-acres, "lying dispersedly," as old deeds have it, all over the common fields, came to be not only possible, but necessary. We learn the origin of those curious ridges or "linches" which mark the site of those ancient fields now enclosed, in the continuous turnings of the furrow on the side of a hill at the end of a strip one way, and that the balks of turf—which are still to be seen in fields in Oxfordshire, for instance—marked the divisions where the plough went back idle to renew its furlong or "furlow-long" course down the field; we learn that the acre was the measure of the land which a plough team could do in a day which ended at mid-day; we see the wretched husbandmen toiling their three days a week for the lord, paying him their "little dues of wheat and beer and oil,"—fetching and carrying, and toiling and mowing, that he may dwell in ease and luxury. Seeing all, we can thank our stars that if there are in these days "clouds over Arcady," that Arcady is a very much nicer place to live in than it was in the times of "good King Edward," or in the days of the later Edward who was known as the English Justinian, or even of his grandson, the victor of Crecy. The interest of the book never flags. At every turn new light is thrown on some well-known passage or ancient difficulty. Nothing could better illustrate the keenness of vision and open-eyedness, if one may use a word which ought to exist, if it does not, which are characteristic of the author than the interpretation placed upon the "faire field" of Piers Ploughman's Vision, with its "diggers and delvers," its "balks" and its "half-acres" which have to be "eared" by the "ploughman" and the cooks selling "hot pies, all hot," as clearly pointing to the common fields, where the whole village is collected for work and society. Nor could anything be more ingenious than his interpretation of King Edward the Confessor's dream, when he saw "the green tree, after severance from its trunk and removal for the space of three acres," return to its parent stem, as perhaps suggested to the "delirious King" by a tree growing out of one of the balks, which "the uneven glass in his window-pane moved apparently three acres' breadth up the open field" which he looked on, "restoring it again to its root as he sank back upon his pillow." This interpretation would have raised the author to great honour in the Court of Nebuchadnezzar, and displays a critical ingenuity of the highest order. The whole book is full of suggestive and incisive criticisms of the same kind. Whether all of them are sound, and whether the general conclusions drawn from them are established or not, the book is rich in materials for thought, and is certain to become the starting-point of further research into this most intricate and interesting subject.

MR. F. W. H. MYERS' ESSAYS.*

No reader, however exigent, will expect us, in the space at our disposal, to give anything more than an outline description of, and a fragmentary comment upon, these volumes. Not that they are bulky, for they contain less than six hundred pages, not printed too closely for pleasant reading; but they are so crowded with the results of reflection and research, and deal with such a variety of interesting subjects, that the critic is baffled, not, as he too often is, by poverty, but rather by the superabundance of interest. The first of the Classical essays treats of Greek Oracles, the last of the Modern essays is devoted to Rossetti and the religion of beauty; and between these we have papers on Virgil and Victor Hugo, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus and Ernest Renan, George Sand and George Eliot, Mazzini and the late Dean Stanley, the poetry of Archbishop Trench and the natural theology of the author of Ecce

Homo. Mr. Myers is to be congratulated upon the catholicity of his tastes and interests, but it is a quality which is occasionally rather perplexing to a conscientious reviewer.

Taking these volumes as a whole, our impression is that they contain nothing quite so good as the best portions of the little book on "Wordsworth," contributed by the author to the useful series of volumes on "English Men of Letters;" but every one must touch his highest possibility sometime, and Mr. Myers does not seriously disappoint any reasonable expectations raised by that admirable contribution to biography and criticism. The style of these essays is lucid, graceful, and dignified, with no defect, indeed, save an occasional strain or affectation of the kind which spoils so much of our recent prose, and which shows itself in Mr. Myers' pages mainly in fantastic and far-fetched phraseology, as when, for example, we read that one of the prominent characteristics of Archbishop Trench's poems is their expression of "gnomic and sententious calm." These lapses are, however, infrequent, and for the most part, Mr. Myers' manner is as pleasing as his matter is interesting and instructive.

Of the longest and most elaborate of these essays, that on "Greek Oracles," we must not stay to speak; partly because the majority of the following papers deal with matters of less esoteric interest, and partly because the present writer does not possess the familiarity with this region of research which alone could give him the right to appraise with authority the conclusions at which Mr. Myers arrives, though he can appreciate to the full the clear and interesting manner in which his materials are set forth. In the two other essays included in the Classical volume, those on Virgil and Marcus Aurelius, a greater number of us will feel at home; and often as the greatest Roman poet and the noblest Roman emperor have been written upon, the essays of Mr. Myers are inspired by such genuine enthusiasm and understanding that he writes with the freshness and gusto of a discoverer. We were about to say that we like the essay on Virgil less than that on Marcus Aurelius, but there will be greater truth as well as graciousness in the remark that while we like the former essay much, we like the latter more. Mr. Myers' estimate of Virgil has something of the strain to which we have referred; the voice of the critic has a falsetto tone, and though there is perhaps nothing in the essay that is really extravagant, nothing for which a more or less good case could not be made out, we seem to be kept perpetually on our guard against the exaggeration of one who is a eulogist rather than a critic. Perhaps the opening paragraph, which strikes the key-note of the composition, is largely responsible for this attitude of suspicion. Mr. Myers rhetorically writes:—

"In literature, as in life, affection and reverence may reach a point which disposes to silence rather than to praise. The same ardour of worship which prompts to missions or to martyrdom when a saving knowledge of the beloved object can be communicated so, will shrink from all public expression when the beauty which it reveres is such as can be made manifest to each man only from within. A sense of desecration mingles with the sense of incapacity in describing what is so mysterious, so glorious, and so dear."

This, as Jeffrey said, will never do. We venture to say that an overwhelming majority of those who admire Virgil most, and who think, not without reason, that they understand what it is in his work which is worthy of admiration, will feel that these sentences do not ring true, that they are strained and unreal, that they are overcharged with that forced emotion which we call sentimentality. We know that it has become the fashion to introduce into criticism the language of spiritual devotion and erotic passion. Mr. Pater, for example, talks about the Frieze of the Parthenon with the same solemn ardour with which a devout Catholic might speak of the Virgin Mary; but it is a bad fashion at the best, and we are sorry to see it followed by so sane and sober a critic as Mr. Myers. Happily the pages which follow are not what might have been expected from such an introduction. Here and there the style is so unduly ecstatic that we instinctively prepare ourselves for protest; but the matter is such that no real necessity for protest ever arises, and we do not praise Mr. Myers too highly when we say that we know no critic who has expounded more clearly, realisably, and fully those characteristics of Virgil's work, in virtue of which it touches us and comes home to us more frequently and more keenly than the work of any other poet of the ancient world. Of the essay on Marcus Aurelius we have not space to speak as it deserves. It is both an illuminating and an inspiring study, the worth of which is largely dependent upon the fact that we are brought into such close proximity with the personality of the Imperial Stoic, and in companionship with the man we come really to understand the full meaning of his writings. As Mr. Myers justly remarks, "Character and circumstances, rather than talent or originality, give to the thoughts of Marcus Aurelius their especial value and charm;" we are interested in what is said for its own sake, but still more for the sake of the sayers; and though it would not have been possible for Mr. Myers to have contributed anything new to our knowledge of the great Antonine, he so groups the old materials as to leave a still more vivid, and veracious impression than we had before.

The contents of the volume of essays dealing with Modern themes are of somewhat unequal value. The article on Mazzini is very thorough, and penetratingly sympathetic, but it would have left a sharper impression upon the mind if the elaborate estimate of Mazzini's character and work had been thrown into bolder relief by an abbreviation of the historical proem, which seems to have—though we hesitate to write the word—a suspicion of tiresomeness. The essay on George Sand, though full of thoughtful analysis, is, to us, the least satisfactory of any of the papers in these volumes. It is difficult to lay a finger on any special passage, and say that it is unsound; every individual verdict is true enough in itself, but so much that is equally true is omitted; and the image presented to us is less an image of the real George Sand than of a transfigured eidolon. The want of moral health in the great writer's life is reflected even in those works where the sentiment, as sentiment, is of the purest order, and a critic who fails to perceive this can hardly be implicitly trusted. We turn with pleasure to the trenchant estimate of Victor Hugo, an essay which we commend to the notice of the noisy English clique who for the last few years have been singing shrill hymns to the glory of the literary posturings they regard as the contortions of a mighty Titan, hurling eternal defiance at the Olympus where kings, priests, and we know not what other noxious powers, sit trembling. Mr. Myers does not fail to do justice to what in Hugo's work is worthy of praise,—to his vividness and intensity of imagination, his command over the striking incidents of life and the broad outlines of character, his tenderness of touch when he speaks of the poor and the oppressed and of little children, his splendid mastery of language; but he exposes with dignified severity his want of knowledge, his want of truth, his want even of the fine sensibility in which he evidently most prides himself, his rhetorical artificiality, and most of all his stupendous egotism, which never sleeps, and never casts a veil over its wakeful face. To any one who has even a fair acquaintance with M. Hugo's works, and who, at the same time, has kept his head, it is not necessary to bring evidence in support of such an indictment; but Mr. Myers, perhaps discreetly, performs this work of supererogation, and makes his case obviously, as well as inherently, impregnable.

Of the articles on George Eliot and Rossetti it is not necessary to speak at any length; they have been so recently published in another form that they are probably well remembered by the majority of readers. The former deals with George Eliot the woman, rather than with George Eliot the writer; and the record of the impression made by her upon one who knew her well and revered her deeply, cannot be without its interest. The essay on "Rossetti and the Religion of Beauty" is full of interesting matter, but seems to us ingenious, rather than instructive. Just as by a patchwork system of quotation, Shakespeare has been proved to be a Catholic, a Protestant, an atheist, a lawyer, an accomplished man of science, and lastly, to be somebody else than himself, so by the same system Mr. Myers proves Rossetti to have been a modern "unconscious" Platonist. That Rossetti had a strong mystical bent is true, and all mysticism has its affinities with Platonism; but in his detailed parallel, Mr. Myers seems to break a butterfly of fancy on the wheel of an elaborate criticism. Two of the most important of the essays are those on M. Renan, and on the notable work, Natural Theology, by the author of Ecce Homo; but we cannot discuss them in a sentence, and will therefore content ourselves with this recognition of their place. We may, however, just remark, interesting as they are, that they are made less satisfactory than they might be by their writer's personal reserve, by his hesitation in committing himself, by his preference for a hypothetical manner of stating views and opinions. We have a general impression of the position which Mr. Myers occupies, but we cannot say with certainty that we exactly know where to find him; and if, in our hearing, a reader were to say that he did not know whether

Mr. Myers unmistakably affirmed the being of a Personal God and an individual immortality, we might think him dull of apprehension, but could not accuse him of utter stupidity. This remark may probably surprise Mr. Myers; but to have clear convictions and to make their clearness visible to all the world are different things, and the difference is hardly sufficiently apprehended by the writer of these papers. In spite, however of their somewhat tantalising tentativeness, they are full of stimulus, and ought not to be missed by any reader of these two attractive volumes.

"PUT TO THE PROOF."*

We scarcely know whether to begin our notice of this novel by praise or criticism, for both come very much to the fore as we turn over the pages; but as the critical sentiment is more excited by the first half of the story and the laudatory by the second, we will begin by criticism. Put to the Proof is evidently the work of a young—an exceedingly young—lady, which, in itself, is anything but blameworthy; but is it not a pity that, this being the case, she did not get the advice of an older person or have her story overhauled by some professional hand, to save herself from the many absurd and outrageous errors which spoil an otherwise clever story and tempt us to say, as we read the first volume, that the book is written by a child and is not worth perusal? And, as far as the first volume is concerned, this is strictly true. The characters there introduced are carelessly drawn, perfectly un-lifelike, and absolutely unnecessary to the rest of the story,—all, that is to say, excepting, of course, the character of the heroine and of her tutor. The situation is in the highest degree unnatural—we may say impossible—and artistically inexcusable, as the plot, such as it is, is quite independent of it. We are presented with a young man, apparently of a weak character and feebly obedient in everything to the will of a tyrannical old father, who suddenly develops strength of purpose, calmly weighs his future, and, fully appreciating the effect of his determination, rejects for his wife the lady whom his father has chosen for him and marries a beautiful mill-girl upon whom his affections have been set since his early boyhood. His father disowns and disinherits him, as he expected, and the husband and wife go off together to work for their living; but before long the wife dies and is soon followed by her husband, who, apparently without any misgivings, leaves his little daughter, Margaret, to the tender mercies of his father, her only living relative. The old man accepts the trust but refuses to have any intercourse with his young grand-daughter, or even to allow her name, which is the same as her mother's, to be mentioned in his presence; and, on one occasion, when asked what the child's name is, deliberately misnames her to avoid pronouncing the name of the woman he so much disliked; whereupon the little girl states hotly that her name is Margaret. Upon the arrival of the child, Mr. Terry—the child's grandfather—orders three rooms in the east wing of the mansion—as far from the part of the house inhabited by himself as space would permit—to be prepared for "Miss Terry," and advertises for a tutor, as he particularly objects to governesses; and there, in these three rooms, live Margaret and her tutor, for ten years, during which time Mr. Philip Welford—the tutor—has four interviews with Mr. Terry, and Margaret apparently only one. They meet occasionally out riding, when Mr. Terry and Mr. Welford take off their hats, and Margaret bows. Mr. Welford holds what are regarded as exalted and peculiar views on the subject of woman's education, which appear to result in a species of Kindergarten system,—the greater part of Margaret's education being carried on out of doors, and viva voce. Mr. Welford also engages a dress-maker to instruct her in millinery and dressmaking, and he himself initiates her into the mystery of wood-carving. We hear nothing of music, so we must conclude that that science is not included in the curriculum of woman's higher education. In this way, as we have said, ten years of Margaret's life—from eight to eighteen—pass peacefully away.

The whole story is, of course, ridiculous and impossible. No English gentleman, accustomed to good society, could so disregard the wise conventionalities of life as to permit such a state of things as that described; and when Agatha Entwistle—Mr. Terry's ward and the lady rejected by his son—brings about the dismissal of Mr. Welford in the interests of propriety, we cannot look upon her as the meddling, mischief-making person that Miss Fothergill seems to think her. The impression produced upon the reader's mind, when he is introduced to Agatha Entwistle, is that she is going to be the evil genius of the story; but the dismissal of Philip and the introduction of a weak young nephew, as suitor for Margaret's hand, are her worst acts, and before the end of the first volume she is finally disposed of. Again, we have ample reason to conclude that Margaret's life with Philip at the Hall is to sow the seeds of a permanent attachment, which is to be the point of variance between Margaret and her grandfather, and probably to cost her her inheritance. But no,—a calm but warm and hearty friendship, and nothing more, runs through their intercourse from beginning to end. Margaret does lose her inheritance, but not through Philip. It is certainly a great art, in writing stories, to keep secret the plot and surprise the reader with an entirely unexpected result; but it is quite the reverse to be constantly introducing persons and circumstances apparently intended to excite curiosity, and, when the reader is beginning to get interested in their development and to ask what happens, to come down upon them with "Oh, nothing happens; that is all." The introduction of Mr. Banks, the lawyer, is another instance of this tendency to irrelevant incident; we imagine that he is going to play some conspicuous part in Margaret's future, but he quietly disappears, and is seen and heard of no more.

The relation between Margaret and her grandfather is thoroughly absurd, as may be inferred from this final interview between the grandfather and grand-daughter. He has been trying to force Agatha's protégé upon her as a husband, and she has been refusing to accept him:—

"His face took an expression of fiendish malignity. He looked at her furiously. Had she shown the least sign of fear, he would probably have struck her; but she had never been taught to think that a graceful timidity is becoming in a woman, and she stood firm and unblenching before him. He did not dare to strike her, but looked at her for a moment with all his hatred of her visible in his face; then suddenly his face changed, his arm dropped nerveless to his side, and he fell insensible to the ground."

At the end of the first volume Margaret is thrown upon the world—with Philip as her only friend—to earn her own living as a wood-carver, and this result might quite easily have been arrived at without this exceedingly unnatural and unpleasing preliminary passage in her life, for she is a simple, natural woman, and no more, with no queer twists of character which need accounting for as the result of her strange bringing-up,—unless, indeed, her amazing skill and success in her work, which are certainly astounding, can in any way be attributed to it,—she completes, for instance, in less than three months—working some four hours a day—what would take years to accomplish; namely, all the carving in a small but elaborate and exquisitely finished church:—

"The carving certainly merited the admiration which was bestowed upon it. Margaret had surpassed herself. The delicate tracery and openwork looked almost like lace in their fineness, and the bold, firm strokes proved the hand of one who had mastered her art. Perhaps the most beautiful thing of all was the immense cross which stood at the top of the chancel screen, and which was twined with wreaths of passion flowers, all cut in the shining black oak."

Oak is not black and shining when freshly carved. And all this carving is done in the church itself, after the wood-work is erected. We only extract this passage out of many as an instance of Margaret's mighty doings in this line, but it will be quite sufficient, we are sure, to justify our recommendation to Miss Fothergill to ask some advice on practical subjects before attempting another novel. The secrecy which is apparently quite easily maintained, too, as to the birth of her child, is quite impossible and absurd.

However, we have occupied enough space in fault-finding, but we have done it advisedly, and not out of mere captiousness, for we consider Miss Caroline Fothergill a writer of great promise, and well worth finding fault with, which is no small praise. Her faults are the faults of youth, inexperience, and ignorance, and her talent is unmistakable. She expresses herself capitally; indeed so easy, fluent, and masterly is her style, that we have many times been tempted to waver in our judgment as to her youthfulness, and to think that the book must, after all, be the work of a practised hand. Before we put aside criticism and turn to the more congenial work of praise, we must, however, seriously call Miss Fothergill's attention to a fault which ought to be and might very easily have been avoided. There is a great deal of carelessness in her work. She does not remember what she has previously written. She goes back from July to June, for instance, and makes a person, just described as sitting with his back to someone, look into his eyes. In the description of Philip's relation towards his mother, he is at one time represented as always giving way to her, and at another as always having his own way in the end. Angel represents her own family as perfectly indifferent to one another, yet when you are introduced to them you find it to be by no means the case. At one time you are told that Margaret is called by her married name by all the people whom she knows in the village where she is married, and at another that she has never been addressed by that name. All this is pure carelessness.

Having got rid of the disagreeable relations and the tiresome lover in the first volume, Margaret plunges into a delightful atmosphere of pleasant companions and congenial work, and the second and third volumes are interesting and unique in their conception. Miss Fothergill describes well and gracefully. She is particularly happy in her description of attitude. It is a characteristic little trait in her writing. All her people "move" for us. A word or two, and you see the graceful girl's supple motions as she crosses a moor, lies back in a railway carriage, or throws herself into an easy chair. The pose of her figure—her step, even—seems familiar to you, and two or three words, simply written, have produced these effects. In the whole book there is no effort. All is easily, naturally, and forcibly expressed. Sentiment and feeling are dealt with in the same direct and simple, but impressive, manner. Margaret's eccentric friend, Angel Darling, is a unique creation. Her hatred of men, and her calm and airy cynicism as to things in general, are brought out in very clever contrast with her youthful charms and her beautiful person. This antipathy of hers to men is most amusingly touched upon in many places, as in such sentences as the following. When Margaret confesses her marriage, "Angel, I am married," Angel breaks in with, "You want me to help you. What can I do?" It was not until she was thinking over the interview afterwards that Margaret was struck by the fact that no sooner had Angel heard that she was married, than she took it for a settled thing that she must be in need of help." Again,—"'Still, if they do come back,' went on the child, in a glow of enthusiasm,"—the child is speaking of some African explorers,—"'think of the glory they will have!' 'They will all get the Victoria Cross for saving one another's lives,' said Angel sarcastically." Angel's dutiful attempt to fall in love with Philip, for Margaret's sake, is very cleverly described. And the fixity of purpose with which the authoress abstains from criticism, and lets this original conception of hers speak for herself—never attempting, to the last, to explain her oddities, neither condemning nor justifying her—is a stroke of real genius. Moreover, Angel's one great passion—her love for Margaret—is effectively brought out. Sibyl, Angel's little sister, though so slightly drawn, is another charming sketch. Her shy devotion to her beautiful, cold sister, makes a delightful little picture; and the gentle mother of these girls, in her bleak, moor-land home, is well described.

On the whole, the two last volumes of Put to the Proof are clever, original, and interesting, and full of promise for the future, though there is a considerable want of point and method even in them. The incidents are too isolated, and do not arise sufficiently out of one another. A little more careful construction and consolidation of plot, more painstaking in the choice of details, and an avoidance of such manifest absurdities as we have mentioned, would have made this novel an excellent one. But, in conclusion, who is "put to the proof?" Is it Margaret? We should have thought that the steadfastness of her character was established in the first few chapters, and needed no proof.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Aunt Judy's Magazine for 1883. This year's volume of Aunt Judy's Magazine, containing contributions from Mrs. Ewing, Mrs. Molesworth, and other well-known writers, is, on the whole, a very good one. The serial story, by the author of the "Atelier du Lys," "Bride Picotee," is charming, simple, touching, and just what children will delight in. The other two serial stories are interesting, too, but in a much less degree, and they can neither of them be called natural. There are, however, many very lively stories, completed in single numbers; the fairy-stories by L. Lobenhofer, and that by "Z. A. E. N.," being very pretty, fanciful little tales, and infinitely superior to the run of modern fairy-tales.

There are several capital little sketches of great men, and many other valuable and instructive papers,—perhaps a few too many of the heavier kind, for a children's magazine, which, as the editors should be careful to remember, is intended for the hours of recreation, and not of instruction.

The Westminster Review, October. The first article in this number is a plain-spoken utterance in "Great Britain, the United States, and the Irish Question." The writer sets forth very strongly, but, to our minds, not at all too strongly, that the Liberal party has served Ireland in the past and is ready to serve it hereafter in a way that deserves recognition by the Irish, and by their sympathisers elsewhere; that the isolated policy of the Parnellites is folly, and that the Irish Republic is nothing less than an absurdity. The other political question discussed is "Australasian Federation." The essay on "The Belief in the Immortality of the Soul" surprises us somewhat. We do not profess to have followed very closely the development of religion and philosophical thought in the Westminster, but we were scarcely prepared to find that the belief in immortality is an unprovable opinion, with the balance of probability enormously against it. Of "all the attempts made hitherto," says the writer, "to secure a basis for the belief in a future life, the best, in our opinion, is that of modern Spiritists." Anything more astounding than this we have seldom read. It is a relief to turn to lighter subjects. The writer of a review of the memoirs of Mr. Greville and Lord Ronald Gower has made, as he could scarcely fail to do, some amusing reading out of his subject. "Goldfields, Ancient and Modern," contains, with other interesting information, a curious little fact about the Boers of thirty years ago, quoted from Mr. Baines on the "Gold Regions of South-East Africa." Mr. Baines was made a "vogel vrie," which means in plain English that any one might shoot him if he pleased, because he could use a sextant, so jealous were they of their country being opened up. The other essays are, "Politico-Economical Heterodoxy," "Cliffe-Leslie," "Ernest Renan," and "Dr. Tuke's History of the Insane in the British Islands."

M. Tulli Ciceronis pro P. Sestio Oratio. With Introduction, Explanatory Notes, &c. By Rev. Hubert A. Holden. (Macmillan.)—This is a worthy sequel to Mr. Holden's excellent edition of the Pro Plancio, to which it is, indeed, a fellow-oration. Cicero was never in a happier mood of oratory than when he defended these two clients. He spoke from his heart, which he did not always do, and, indeed, no advocate ever can do. The men had helped him, and he did his best to help them. The introduction, gives a lucid view of the events which led to the exile of Cicero, to the return, and, among other graver results, to this prosecution, one of the ways in which Clodius sought to avenge himself for the defeat of his designs. The explanatory notes are copious, and leave the student little to desire. Once or twice, perhaps, this help is scarcely as judicious as it might be. On "obsolescit," for instance, in "neque alienis unquam sordibus obsolescit," the editor has the note, "is soiled, tarnished, loses its polish," and quotes three passages (from Horace, Q. Curtius, and Pliny), in which the word is used. Of course, "to be soiled or tarnished" is a good rendering enough; but a young student who is content with this, instead of looking the word out in his dictionary, will not have reason to thank the editor for his help. He will altogether miss the interesting question whether obsolesco is connected with "obs-oleo" or "ob-soleo."

Folk Tales of Bengal. By the Rev. Lal Behari Day. (Macmillan.)—These stories, collected at the suggestion of Sir Richard Temple, were taken down from the mouths of various natives of Bengal, five in all, two of them being Brahmins. It is interesting to know that not one of these persons knew English. This is, of course, a guarantee for their genuinely native character, and indeed they have a very genuine look. (We notice, by the way, on p. 141, the expression, "There was a fly in the ointment." Is this an undesigned coincidence, as indeed it might be, or has the transcriber unthinkingly borrowed a Scripture expression?) The tales have no little intrinsic interest. The story of "Phakir Chand" is, to our minds, as good as anything in "The Arabian Nights." Indeed, it strongly reminds us of the beautiful tale of "Jullanar of the Sea," which, curiously enough, is not included in the popular editions. A king's son and a minister's son find themselves by the side of a tank, wherefrom there issues in the dead of night a terrible serpent, having in its crested hood a great diamond, by the light of which it seeks its prey. Of this they contrive to possess themselves, and by its power penetrate the depths of the tank, and find there a palace, inhabited by a princess lovely beyond comparison. And so, with most romantic adventures, the story goes on till it comes to the conventional ending, "and so they lived happily together till the day of their death." "Rakshasas," the Bengal equivalent for "vampires," play an important part in these stories. Few superstitions would seem to be more widely spread. Besides their proper interest, the stories, of course, suggest curious resemblances. Readers of Herodotus will think of Rampsinus and his treasury, and the thief who outwitted him, when they see "The Adventures of Two Thieves, and of Their Sons." But the sympathy of the Bengal tale-teller is not, as that of the Egyptian seems to have been, with the thieves. They prosper, indeed, for a time, and are exceedingly clever; but they quarrel over a gold mohur, the odd one out of a bag, which both wish to keep for themselves; and they come to the end which is as regularly reserved for the bad people, as the living happily ever after, is for the good. The King orders "four pits to be dug in the earth, in which they were buried alive, with all sorts of thorns and thistles, the elder thief and the younger thief, and their two sons." The "Match-making Jackal" is a curious parallel to "Puss in Boots." The jackal attracts attention by chewing betel leaves, a luxury which argues that he comes from a very wealthy country; and on this he builds his scheme for the advancement of the poor weaver, "whose ancestors were very rich, but whose father had wasted the property which he had inherited in riotous living." Other resemblances will discover themselves to the reader, who will find a real treat in this volume.

Forbidden to Marry. By Mrs. G. Linnæus Banks. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—Mrs. Linnæus Banks writes realistic novels, not of the hideous kind with which M. Zola disgraces literature, but thoroughly wholesome and sound of tone. Lancashire life, as it was now nearly a century ago, is her theme. This time her scenes are laid now in Manchester, now in Chester, with the variation of some adventure in the Delamere Forest, through which travellers between the two had in those days to pass. If she has a special object, it is to make her readers understand what a different thing school-life and apprentice-life were two generations ago to what they are now. But she knows better than to make any such object too prominent. Muriel D'Amyer, her heroine, is a very interesting person, and her love-story, though there is nothing very novel or remarkable about it, is sufficiently interesting. Lively little sketches of last-century manners are interspersed, and the whole effect of the scene, as Mrs. Banks has portrayed it, is remarkably natural and truthful. The title, we must remark, is not very happily chosen. There seems to have been no "forbidding to marry" but what was perfectly justified by Providence.

The Quatrains of Omar Khayyám. The Persian text, with an English Verse Translation. By C. H. Whinfield, M.A. (Trübner and Co.)—This is one of the most interesting volumes in the "Oriental Series" to which it belongs. Omar al Khayyám was one of the most learned men which Islam has produced,—a man of science and a poet. The date of his birth is not known, but he died in old age in A.D. 1139. His poems present a strange mixture of practical epicureanism and mystical thought. He was a pantheist, a necessitarian, and an antinomian. The most obvious of the characteristics of his poems is his praise of wine, to which he continually returns, as being, as it were, the one thing certain in a world of shadows. We do not profess to judge of the faithfulness of the version which Mr. Whinfield here presents to us, but we can vouch for its being fluent and melodious, and generally readable. And those who are competent to judge have the opportunity given them of doing so, as the Persian text is printed on the opposite pages to the English version. Here is a specimen, which will give an idea both of the original and of Mr. Whinfield's manner of treating it:—

"Take up thy cup and goblet, Love, I said,
Hunt purling river-bank and glassy glade;
Full many a moon-like form has heaven's wheel
Of into cup, oft into goblet made.
We buy new wine and old, our cups to fill,
And sell for two grains this world's good and ill;
Know you where you will go to after death?
Set wine before me, and go where you will!
Was e'er man born who never went astray?
Did ever mortal pass a blissful day?
If I do ill, do not requite with ill!
Evil for evil how canst thou repay?
Bring forth that ruby gem of Badakhshán,
That heart's delight, that balm of Turkistán;
They say 'tis wrong for Muslims to drink,
But ah! where can we find a Muslimán?
My body's life and strength proceed from Thee!
My soul within and spirit are of Thee!
My being is of Thee, and Thou art mine,
And I am Thine, since I am lost in Thee.
Man, like a ball, hither and thither goes,
As Fate's resistless bat directs the blows;
But He, who gave thee up to this rude sport,—
He knows what drives thee, yea, He knows, He knows."

Omar Khayyám was, of course, a heretic. He could not understand why Mahommed had forbidden wine to the Faithful just because a drunken Arab once cut his saddle-girths, and he openly sneers at the delights of Paradise. But, like other heretics, he found safety in conformity and in concealing his opinions, and the learned men of Islam have found a mystical and edifying meaning in his most irregular utterances. He affords a curious example of the revolt of thought against the bondage of the Mahomedan system.

True to the Core; a Romance of '93. By C. J. Hamilton. 2 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—The Rebellion of '93 is not an attractive subject. To an English reader, at least, it is difficult to know where one's sympathy should be given. The ruling nation was careless of justice, and brutally cruel; that which was struggling against it was pursuing a phantom, and presented a miserable spectacle of internal dissension. Its honest men were mostly fools, and there were a terrible number of knaves in its midst. And then one has an uneasy feeling, as one reads, that the fires are by no means extinguished, and that the romance may be speedily turned into reality. But out of these unpromising materials, Mr.—or is it Miss?—Hamilton has constructed a story of some merit. Her heroine, Norah Buidh, "yellow Norah," so called from her wealth of amber-coloured hair, is a picturesque figure. She loves one of the Patriotic Brotherhood, whom she shelters when he is benighted on the hills near her home, and continues to do her best to help and shield him. The characteristic figures of the time are introduced into the story as it moves on. There is Lord Castlereagh, concealing his ambition under an exterior of languid indifference; the brutal Major Sirr, representing the worst aspect of English ascendancy; the patriots, with their useless devotion to a lost cause; and, of course, the odious figure, invariable phenomenon in any scene of Irish history, the traitor and informer. The author has made a careful study of the subject, and achieved a fair amount of success.

We have received two works on the new Bankruptcy Act, The Bankruptcy Act of 1883, with Introduction, Notes, &c., by W. A. Holdsworth, Esq. (Routledge and Sons.) Mr. Holdsworth adds "the Debtors Act of 1869," and an Index. The New Law of Bankruptcy, with Introduction, Tables, Notes, and an Index, by A. B. Bence-Jones, M.A. (Griffith and Farran.)—With these may be classed An Election Manual, by J. E. Gorst, Q.C., M.P. (Chapman and Hall), containing "The Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Act, 1883."—Building Estates, by Flower Maitland (Crosby Lockwood and Co.), contains the law on the subject of building, &c., and a great variety of other information as to cost, method, &c.

FIFTY YEARS of CONCESSIONS to IRELAND: being a Short History of the Remedial Measures passed by the British Parliament for Ireland between the Years 1831 and 1881. By R. BARRY O'BRIEN, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "The Parliamentary History of the Irish Land Question." Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 16s. The Second Volume, completing the Work, is in preparation.

Mr. JOHN BRIGHT, after acknowledging the receipt of a copy of Mr. O'Brien's work, says:—"If men will read your history of the fifty years they will know more of Ireland, and may make more allowance for the present unhappy state of the relations between her and the more powerful island. I thank you for your kindness in sending me your book. I hope it may be extensively read and prove useful."

New Novel by the Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor.'"
Now ready, in 3 vols., at all Libraries.

A SEA QUEEN. By W. Clark Russell. 3 vols. crown 8vo, 31s 6d.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Clark Russell lets the heroine of his latest novel, 'A Sea Queen,' speak for herself, and a charming tale she has to tell us of the sea and its brave and hardy sailors and infinitely varying aspects. As in the case of 'The Lady Maud,' and the half-dozen other fascinating works from the same pen, the author makes at once for his adopted element, and we are hardly through the first fifteen pages when we plunge into all the excitement, so skillfully conjured up. 'A Sea Queen' lacks none of that vigour and force which have made 'The Wreck of the Grosvenor' and 'A Sailor's Sweetheart' household words wherever a kindly feeling is entertained for 'poor Jack' and his hard life afloat.
Every page of this new book is fresh and charming, full of fine thought and abundant observation, and we cannot give it higher praise than to say it is worthy of a place beside the capital sea stories from the same source which have preceded it."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"A very moving story.....An autobiographical narrative related from dictation and edited by the gentleman whose name appears upon the title-page, and than whom there is none living, as experience would lead one to think, better calculated to do justice to the tale. He evidently has the sea in his blood.....The narrative is written with great vigour, picturesque-knowledge, and sympathy, and when occasion offers, with much drollery."

SHAKESPEARE.—The RIVERSIDE SHAKESPEARE.
Edited by RICHARD GRANT WHITE. 3 vols. crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, £1 16s.
(A Large-paper Edition has also been printed, of which only a few copies are for sale. 6 vols. 8vo, cloth extra, £3 3s.)

An entirely New Edition of Shakespeare's complete works, edited by Mr. White, who is recognised both in England and America as one of the most acute, discriminating, and competent of Shakespeare scholars. It will be printed from new electrotypes plates, and is intended to be the best and handsomest inexpensive Edition of Shakespeare ever produced in this country. The excellent editorial work of Mr. White will commend it to scholarly readers, while its beautiful typography and comparatively small cost will secure for it a multitude of intelligent readers all over the country.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE week has been marked by what may prove a grave misfortune for France. The Chamber, by a vote of more than two to one, in a very full house, has affirmed the policy of conquest in Tonquin as essential to the honour and the interests of France. The attack was feeble, though supported in able speeches by M. Granet, editor of La France, and by M. Clémenceau; but no other known man intervened on that side, and M. Clémenceau was fettered by incessant admissions that simple withdrawal was impossible. M. Granet charged the Government with breach of its engagements, with concealing the true situation, especially as to China, and with sending out insufficient forces. It had promised all fine things, but as a result its troops were barely able to defend themselves in the Delta of the Songkoi. M. Clémenceau pointed out the analogy of the war with the invasion of Mexico, and insisted that the Government had deceived the Chambers and violated the Constitution, by entering on a war "which, if not a war with Anam and China, was at least a war with Anamites and Chinese." He animadverted fiercely on the policy of waiting for events recommended by M. Challemel-Lacour, which he defined as the policy of the Empire that had led to the invasion of France.

The defence of the Government was entrusted solely to M. Challemel-Lacour and M. Ferry. The line taken by the former was that France had originally entered Anam fairly, to punish a massacre of Roman Catholics, which is true; that Anam is an independent State, which is not true; that Tonquin is part of Anam, and that the King therefore had a right to sign the Treaty of Hué. He utterly denied the suzerainty of China, and doubted all through the reality of Chinese menaces. M. Ferry took up the same ground, denying that China would fight, alleging that Li Hung Chang had disavowed the Chinese Ambassador—a statement ridiculed by the Marquis Tseng in phrases intended to hint that the telegram was manufactured for the debate—and adding some most significant sentences about the value of the province. All manufacturing nations, he averred, were possessing themselves of the unexplored markets, and why should not France draw near to China, with its four hundred millions of purchasers? "One must think for the future positions of the sons of honest Frenchmen." A more cynical avowal of a rapacious motive was never made; but it was applauded, as was the statement that France had been "aggrandised" by the occupation of Tunis. Finally, after two days of very thin and lifeless debating, the vote of confidence proposed by M. Paul Bert was passed by 330 to 160.

M. Ferry will now, it is believed, ask a large vote of credit. He distinctly stated in the debate that it was the intention of his Government to seize Sontay and Bacninh, the two fortresses on the Songkoi, and that if China resisted he should employ the Fleet against her. He, however, ridiculed the idea of China fighting, and it would appear certain that after the debate all Securities in Paris rose. This result, like the vote of the Deputies, is mainly due to the profound ignorance of Frenchmen about distant countries. The peasantry do not know where Tonquin is, and the Deputies cannot get rid of the notion that China is a pig-tailed Power, rather comic than formidable as an opponent. This notion was common in England forty years ago, and in France has still the mastery of many educated men. They will probably be gravely undeceived, but not quickly, as the campaign will take the form of an advance up the Songkoi, resisted by European Generals in command of mixed Chinese and Tonquinese forces. The consumption of troops will, therefore, be slow; and the Government, which already reiterates in every telegram that the "health of the troops is excellent," will be able for some time to conceal the extent of the effort to be made. It must, however, come out at last; and then, we venture to predict, operations will slacken, until at last France has practically retired. She has never persevered in a scheme of Asiatic conquest.

The speaking has begun with a rush. Sir Henry James has spoken at Dumfries, Mr. Courtney at Liskeard, and Mr. Stanhope at Perth; Lord Richard Grosvenor and Mr. Osborne Morgan at Carnarvon; Lord Salisbury twice at Reading; Sir Charles Dilke four times in Scotland; and Mr. Goschen once in Edinburgh. Of these speeches, most of them able, Lord Salisbury's rose to the highest blistering-point; while Mr. Goschen's was, on the whole, the most remarkable as a confession and defence of political creed. Sir Henry James's, besides much suave humour, contained a most lucid, effective, and, we believe, a most accurate exposition of the Tory distortions of the finance of the Government; while Mr. Courtney's was marked by that rather cut-and-dried official dogmatism in which, since his accession to office, he has taken pains to excel. We cannot profess to give any estimate, however short, of all these speeches,—indeed, many of them were intended rather for local than for general consumption; but we note with the greatest pleasure that everywhere politicians on both sides are doing their utmost to give the constituencies some personal contact with those who represent their interests in Parliament. That is a kind of political education not only better than mere newspaper reading, but almost essential to the most profitable newspaper reading on political topics.

Lord Salisbury boasted at Reading on Tuesday that unless you rise to the revolutionary point, you cannot abolish the House of Lords except with its own consent; and that though fear of death has caused many strange vagaries, it is not easy to conceive fear of death resulting in suicide. He went on to make the strange and very unhistorical assertion that the strong Conservative bias of the House of Lords dates from the accession of Mr. Gladstone to power, and was not noticeable under Lord Palmerston. Of course no one would expect that the House of Lords would veto the Conservative legislation of Lord Palmerston; but every one knows that when for once he did suggest any strongly Liberal measure,—like the creation of Life Peerages,—the House of Lords rose in insurrection against him. Lord Salisbury has persuaded himself that the great Liberal majority in the House of Commons is an extremely transitory phenomenon, and he admitted that the House of Lords could not last unless it was sustained by the public opinion of this country. To that opinion he proposed to make a most confident, and did make a most vehement appeal.

He declared that Mr. Gladstone's Government had apparently made it its first object to discourage and dishearten the English race all over the world, and to fill all who are opposed to them with "wild and unlawful hopes." The Government were alienating everywhere British subjects from the British Empire. Lord Salisbury was triumphant over the supposed coldness of the French apology for Admiral Pierre's treatment of Mr. Shaw, and declared that in spite of the German leanings of his own policy, he had got on better with France than Lord Granville. He believed that directly we withdraw our troops from Egypt, French intrigues there will begin, and that our influence there will,—to the great disgust of the whole English people,—soon be a thing of the past. The same thing, he declared, is happening in Ireland. The Liberal Government is withdrawing its support from those who really uphold the Union, and doing everything in its power to increase the influence of those who hate the Union. On the Reform question he declared that he saw no reason for making any difficulty as to the assimilation of the borough and county franchise in itself; but he would not hear of assimilating the county and borough franchise until he knew what was to be done in the way of redistributing the seats, for to separate the two measures would be like "accepting the proposals of an architect for making some great change in your town, without first seeing the plans on which the architect proposed to go." Lord Salisbury's simile is not to the point. If Reading had positively determined to pull down a wall of partition, it might very well set to work to pull it down, even though it had not yet decided how to apportion the ground on which the offending wall was built.

Sir Henry James, at Dumfries, chiefly set himself to refute Mr. Gibson's fallacious representations of the comparative finance of the two Governments, which he did with uncommon ability and precision. Also, in the latter part of his speech he criticised very impressively the appeals made by Lord Waterford,—one of the bitterest opponents of the Irish Land Act,—to Sir Stafford Northcote's Ulster audience, not to endanger the large concessions they had gained under the Irish Land Act, by imperilling the Union; in other words, Lord Waterford appealed to the Act which he had described as one of confiscation, to secure the loyalty of the Irish farmers, and yet wanted that loyalty not for the Government which passed the Act, but for the Opposition which resisted it! Sir Henry James went on to advocate making the residential franchise the principal one for counties as well as boroughs, tracing very humorously the anomalies of the franchises conferred by cutting tithe rent-charges and other faggots into qualifications for party voters. He excited great cheering by tracing one of the earliest creations of these faggot votes to a certain Sir James Lowther, of Westmoreland, soon after the Act of 1774. Sir Henry James is evidently deeply convinced that enfranchisement of non-resident investors in political property of this questionable kind, is a bogus qualification of the worst description.

Mr. Courtney, at Liskeard on Monday, distinguished his speech by vehemently opposing any attempt to touch reform in the next Session. He wished to see the County Government Bill passed first, and he spoke of the resolutions of the Leeds Conference with profound contempt, partly because they asked to have the County Franchise Bill dealt with at once, partly because they had condemned the present minority seats accorded to a few great county and town constituencies. Mr. Courtney is quite right in saying that the principle of duly representing minorities in the country at large is a perfectly sound and absolutely democratic principle. But does he propose to extend the present experiment to the length and breadth of the country? If he does, he takes his stand on solid ground, but hardly, we think, on ground on which he has much chance of support. If he does not, he must be aware that to represent the minority in a few large constituencies, without representing the minority at all in nineteen out of every twenty constituencies in England, results in an even falselier picture of the balance of opinion in the whole community, than there would be if there were no minority representation at all.

Sir Charles Dilke has made four speeches in Scotland this week, but the speeches are hardly up to the mark of his old Chelsea addresses, and it seems to us that he feels more or less fettered by his position as a junior Member of the Cabinet. He did, however, give a very effective answer to Lord Salisbury's suggestion that the failure of the Commercial Treaty with France left us in a worse position as regards our commerce with France than we were in before, for he showed that we are undoubtedly, on the whole, in a better position than that of the old Commercial Treaty,—which we never wished to renew, but only to amend. And he made a good point against the Conservative cry that in redistributing seats we must not go by the "mere numbers" of the population. Certainly, says Sir Charles Dilke, we will not redistribute seats so as to go by the "mere numbers" of the population; but then, at least, we must not go by the mere absence of numbers, and that is what the Conservative objection really means.

Mr. Goschen's confession of political faith in Edinburgh on Wednesday was very striking, and in many ways very contagious. He is perfectly right in asserting that moderate Liberals lose influence by want of enthusiasm for their own moderation,—in other words, by staying at home and reading an amusing book, when the less moderate politician goes to the political meeting, and inculcates on others his own want of moderation. Probably a strongly propagandist belief in political moderation is one of the rarest of political qualities. Mr. Goschen also described vividly the growth of democracy in this country, and the strange impression of the Tories that the growth of democracy is all due to the conjuring of that great magician, Mr. Gladstone. He held that the weakness of the Tory creed on this subject is due to this,—that the party has not been merely educated, "but over-educated," by Lord Beaconsfield. For himself, he avowed the old belief in the representation of classes, and did not want to support the county franchise, because the class which lives on weekly wages is already too powerful in the constituencies, and does not want any additions to its power. He expressed most eloquently his conviction of the duty of sustaining abroad England's credit,—he would not call it England's "honour," since the "honour" of England was now associated with that great blow to our national credit, the swoop upon Cyprus,—but he insisted on the difficulty, if not impossibility, of at once civilising half-civilised nations, and, at the same time, treating their patriotism with the respect and deference with which we always do and must treat the patriotic feelings of free Western States. The attempt to civilise them must, more or less, he said, interfere with their freedom; while the jealous regard for their independence must, more or less, prevent their civilisation. The whole speech was full of thought and statesmanship.

London has been disturbed this week by a great crime, the motive of which is still not ascertained. At a few minutes before eight on Tuesday evening an explosion shattered the end carriages of a train travelling from the Praed-Street Station, on the Metropolitan Railway, to the Edgware-Road Station; while at a few minutes past eight a similar explosion occurred on the Metropolitan District Railway, between Charing Cross and Westminster. In the former case, three third-class carriages were shattered, and above forty persons injured, four of them seriously, though no one was killed, the sufferers being all poor men and women. In the latter case, the gas was extinguished, part of the roof over the carriage-way blown out, and three persons thrown down, but no injury was done to life. The explosion is believed to be due to dynamite, and the balance of opinion among experts is said to be that in each case criminals, supposed to be ignorant men, had hung infernal machines, timed to explode before the whole train passed, out of a carriage window, and then cut the string, the intention being to wreck the lines, and cause the largest possible amount of injury and annoyance to London. Colonel Majendie, however, has not yet given his opinion, nor are the facts all known, and many of the theories advanced are only clever guesses. It is well to wait, but meanwhile the public attributes the outrage, which has profoundly shocked opinion, to some secret society within the Fenian organisation, which is "making war" on the British Government by destroying private property and endangering the lives of innocent citizens.

Mr. Murray Smith, Agent-General for Victoria, publishes a circular from Mr. Service, Premier of that colony, convoking a "Convention" of the Australasian Colonies at Melbourne on November 25th. Each colony is to send four delegates, and the subject to be discussed is larger than the annexation of New Guinea, or the control of the islands of the South Pacific. The Australian statesmen have evidently perceived that if Australia is to have dependencies of her own she must organise a general government, and Mr. Service in his circular lays it down that the Convention is "to discuss the basis on which a Federal Government could be constituted." This is an immense expansion of the original idea, and points to the formation, at no distant date, of a grand "Australian Dominion," probably richer, if not larger, than the Canadian one. The movement will have the hearty sympathy of Englishmen at home, who are delighted to see the Colonies first develop into States, and then group themselves into strong and growing Powers. We are always delighted to depreciate ourselves, and certainly in Ireland and South Africa we have causes enough for humiliation, but the spontaneous action of bodies of Englishmen is often strangely successful. There will be a Federal Australian State yet, counting among the considerable Powers of the world, with a free constitution which Englishmen at home will carefully omit from their studies. We wonder how many educated men among us know the rights of a Canadian "Province" against the Canadian "Dominion."

Mr. W. R. Brodie, of West Savile Road, Edinburgh, is a Tory graduate of the Edinburgh University, and not quite sure if he can vote for Sir Stafford Northcote as Lord Rector. He "doots" if that gentleman "quite adequately represents the Conservative party," and writes to Lord Randolph Churchill to inquire. Lord Randolph's reply is positively delicious. Yes, he says, you may vote for Sir Stafford. Nobody "adequately represents" the Liberal party, and neither Sir Robert Peel nor Lord Beaconsfield at any moment of their lives adequately represented the Conservatives. But a Conservative who rejects Sir Stafford Northcote must have an "unduly sensitive political conscience." "Sir Stafford Northcote leads the Opposition in the House of Commons; he has devoted more than a quarter of a century to Parliamentary labours; in that time has sacrificed all his energies and much of his health to the maintenance and diffusion of sound political doctrine, and among modern public men possesses the unique, the unprecedented qualification of being respected and eulogised as much by his opponents as by his friends." The mingled tone of patronage and loyalty in that letter is quite perfect. The middy pats the captain on the back, and exhorts all A.B.'s to obey him promptly.

Something is going on in Portugal, and if Lisbon boasted a Special Correspondent, we suppose we should know what it is; but at present, affairs are a little obscure. As we understand the situation, Portuguese Liberals want to reform or abolish the Upper House, and are so urgent that King Luis, who neither approves that nor any other reform, is said to threaten an abdication. This would make his eldest son, the Duke of Braganza, a lad of twenty, King, and as he is understood not only to be a Liberal, but to entertain "Iberian" views, his accession would be viewed with great jealousy by Conservatives, both in his own country and in Spain, where only last week, according to the Times, a Cabinet Council was called specially to discuss him. These statements are, of course, officially denied, and everything is said to be going well in Lisbon; but it appears to be certain that the Liberals are exasperated, both about the Peers and the finances, that the King is exceedingly unpopular, and that the Crown Prince is making a series of long visits to foreign countries. It is probable that, in presence of considerable external dangers, everything will end in some endurable compromise, the Peers' veto, for example, being limited to one Session. The King, it should be mentioned, has none.

The Times publishes a telegram from its correspondent at Khartoum announcing the total defeat of the Mahdi, or False Prophet of the Soudan. According to his narrative, which was brought in by two soldiers and an Arab, Hicks Pasha, with 11,000 Egyptians, was attacked (date not given, but between September 25th and October 3rd) by 30,000 Arabs, armed with lances. They split into two columns, and Hicks Pasha, with his Remington rifles, artillery, and rockets, made terrible havoc among them. The Arabs at last fled, leaving 8,000 killed on the field, and took refuge with the Mahdi in Melbas, where they were again attacked and routed, the Mahdi being either dismounted or killed. The survivors fled to the town of El Obeid, which, on October 4th, fell into the hands of Hicks Pasha, with the Government Treasury and establishments. The story looks true in essentials, as the Arabs, confident in their Prophet, would attack in that way, trying to surround the numerically inferior force; but it is doubted at Alexandria, the numbers are ridiculous, and the dates are not very trustworthy. Why, when victory had opened the road, should a messenger take all that time to get to Khartoum, not 200 miles off? The story, if true, is important, first, because the greatest Egyptian danger has ended; and secondly, because the victorious army will be a more influential force than Sir Evelyn Wood's newly-formed battalions.

The silent struggle which has recently been waged between Prince Alexander of Bulgaria and his Russian officers has ended in the dismissal of the latter. Various reasons are assigned for this step, but the substantial one is that the Russians held themselves bound to take their orders from St. Petersburg, instead of the Prince. As this position was inconsistent with the restored Constitution, Prince Alexander requested Colonel Redgher, the Chief of the Staff, to resign, and on his refusal, ordered him into arrest. He thereupon resigned, with his subordinates, and the management of the Army has been restored to Bulgarian hands. The Russian Government affects in its inspired papers to approve this decided step; and, at all events, will make, for the present, no effort to punish it, or to remove Prince Alexander. The Bulgarians, therefore, have their destinies completely in their own hands, and will probably restore their Russian drill-masters, on the understanding that they are to be servants, and not rulers of the Principality. Mr. Forster, who has been visiting Sophia, thinks they would do better without an army, as they cannot hope to resist a great Power; but he forgets that if there is ever to be a Federation of the Balkans, the only hope for independence, each State must contribute its quota of effectives.

The Freeman's Journal, which does not know what it would be at, is very angry, both with Mr. Leatham and with us, for our strong view that the union with Ireland should be preserved even at the cost of civil war. We observe that the Belfast Northern Whig, in replying to the Freeman's Journal, declares in the most uncompromising fashion that it is not English Liberals alone, but Ulster Liberals, who would prefer civil war to the beginning of disintegration by the concession of Home-rule to Ireland. The Freeman's Journal prefers, at present, Tory to Liberal Government, because it thinks that more could be squeezed out of a Tory Government,—by the help of Radical aid,—than could be squeezed out of a Liberal Government by the help of the "Fourth Party." And, of course, the Freeman's Journal has a perfect right to that rather ambiguous position. But why it should fall foul of Mr. Leatham and of us for regarding the integrity of the kingdom as the first condition of sound policy, is not very apparent. There is nothing very illiberal in objecting to go back to the Heptarchy; and there is nothing very illiberal in declining to take the opinion of a journal which favours the Tories as to what Liberalism should imply.

The Municipal elections this year have, on the whole, gone against the Liberals; but that must not be regarded as in any degree tending to establish the existence of a true Conservative reaction. The truth is that in all minor contests there is a disposition to trim the balance, and give an innings to the losing side, but this does not by any means apply to great issues, such as a general election raises. When the stakes are trivial, a great many people like to see them going to the depressed party,—a great many people who have, nevertheless, no notion at all of handing over stakes of the utmost value to that party for the same reason. Nevertheless, the Liberals will do well to remember this permanent popular instinct for giving a turn to the losing side, and to work all the harder for their cause on that account.

Mr. Matthew Arnold delivered his first lecture in the United States on Tuesday, in the Chickering Hall, New York. His subject was "Numbers," and his thesis that the multitude generally go wrong, but that the few,—the remnant, he called them,—who care for the truth, prevail against numbers in the end. It is, of course, impossible to judge of the lecture by the meagre epitome of it telegraphed to the Times; but it seems to us certain that to judge by the inverse ratio of the numbers of the adherents of any view, would give even a worse rule for discovering where the truth lies, than to judge by the direct ratio. There are questions on which the popularity of an opinion,—or, at least, of a sentiment,—is a gauge of its truth, but there are no questions on which the unpopularity of an opinion, or of a sentiment, is any gauge of its truth. Newton did not stand so much alone in his mathematical views, as the man who bored the Mathematical Society a few years ago with his demonstration that he had squared the circle. A religion which has no power to move numbers is certainly false, though a great many religions which have a vast deal of influence over numbers are certainly false also. Was not Mr. Arnold leading his hearers off on a false scent, when he raised the numerical question at all?

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE FRENCH DEBATE ON TONQUIN.

IT is impossible for true friends of the French Republic, especially if they have wished success to M. Ferry in resisting clamour, to read the debates of Tuesday and Wednesday in the Chamber without a sensation of dismay. M. Ferry and his colleagues scarcely offer an argument for the invasion of Tonquin which might not have been used, and was not used, in defence of the Expedition to Mexico. The only difference is that the main argument, which under the Empire was an ambitious epigram, is, under the Republic, a sordid calculation. Napoleon III., always inclined to vague and mystical utterances, declared that his grand object in invading Mexico was to reinvigorate the declining Latin race on the American continent; while M. Ferry justifies the conquest of Anam, including Tonquin, by declaring that France must think of future generations, and that "while every other maritime Power and manufacturing nation is getting a share of the unexplored markets of the world, France is right in drawing near to China, with her 400,000,000 of consumers." In other words, France conquers Tonquin in order to open a grand market for her manufactured goods. The design of conquest was expressed with the most cynical clearness. France, said M. Ferry, had not yet occupied the whole Delta of the Songkoi, but she intended to do so, and when she had "seized" the fortresses of Sontay and Bacninh, both garrisoned by Chinese regulars, she could never be driven out, and China would become more reasonable. No Minister repudiated or qualified these sentiments, and they were endorsed by the immense majority of the Chamber, which, by a vote of 339 votes to 160, accepted a resolution, introduced by M. Paul Bert, now the elected mouthpiece of the Opportunists, approving "the measures taken to maintain the interests and honour of France." To all appearance, the Republican Government is as little scrupulous as that of the Empire; while the Republican Chamber, except that it contains an Opposition, is as ready to vote for filibustering expeditions as the Corps Législatif. No passages in M. Ferry's speech excited more applause than those in which he alleged that France, having engaged herself in Tonquin, could not "in honour" draw back, except, indeed, those in which he boasted that "he had aggrandised France in the Mediterranean by the occupation of Tunis," an occupation, it will be remembered, intended only "to chastise the Kroumirs," of whom no one since that moment has ever heard. The Chamber, to judge by its votes, has as little care for principle as ever, and is as easily carried away by phrases about the honour and the interest of France.

Nor is this all. The parallel between Tonquin and Mexico is closer still. The failure of the invasion of Mexico was due in the main to a political blunder of Napoleon III. He had made up his mind, in common, no doubt, with many other statesmen, that the South would succeed in its war for independence; and it was the victory of the North, and the menacing attitude assumed by the Cabinet of Washington, which ultimately led to that astounding act, the abandonment of the Emperor Maximilian, and to the fall of the short-lived Mexican Empire. The Government of the Republic is making an almost precisely similar blunder as regards the Powers which will ultimately protect Tonquin. Unless both M. Ferry and M. Challemeil-Lacour are inventing beliefs, which, in spite of the statements made by the former about the Kroumirs, we cannot suppose, both of them are convinced that China is, as M. Granet put it, "une puissance négligeable,"—an unreal Power, which may safely be disregarded. They either hold, or affect to hold, that she dare not declare war, lest she should break in pieces; and that if she should resist a French occupation of Tonquin, it will not be necessary even to send an army, but her defeat may be left to the powerful fleet of France. So confident was M. Ferry of Chinese powerlessness, that he treated the Marquis Tseng, who would lose his head if he outtripped instructions, as a sort of diplomatic impostor, and read aloud a telegram from M. Tricou, now at Shanghai, stating that Li Hung Chang had disavowed the Ambassador. Li Hung Chang! The Chamber, which knows as much of the personages of China as of the great men of Siberia, was so moved by these mysterious syllables that it remained in commotion for five minutes, and, it is said, voted under the impression that China had withdrawn her opposition, the facts being that Li Hung Chang is Viceroy of Pecheli, and though in some sense "Premier," has no more power to "disavow" the Empress's Ambassador than Lord Spencer to "disavow" Lord Lyons. No inquiry was made as to what the Viceroy had disavowed—he had probably only regretted the rather unusual publication of despatches by the Marquis Tseng—but every one jumped to the conclusion that war being imminent, China had given way. The dramatic incident, possibly prearranged, soothed away opposition. None of the great facts of the situation—that Peking cannot now be attacked, except by a large army; that the Chinese have drilled and organised 100,000 men under American and German officers, and armed them with Remington rifles; that the Imperial Government cares nothing about a blockade, which will only realise its own ideal of non-intercourse with Europe; that this blockade will vex and worry not only English traders, who are long-suffering, but German traders, who are not; that Russia only two years ago shrank from war with China; and finally, that the Tartar dynasty would be lost if it gave up Tonquin—were so much as alluded to by the Ministry or the Members of the majority, or, for that matter, by any speaker of the Opposition. Both majority and Ministry are plunging into a grave war with an old, vast, and persistent Empire, which has never yielded a foot until her capital was threatened with bombardment, with light hearts, easy consciences, and an avowed conviction that war with China—war to be waged in a tropical delta, full of fortresses, covered with forest, and liable to inundation—would, to a Power like France, be only a maritime promenade. The Fleet is to do everything, even in Tonquin. One fact alone could exonerate the Ministry from the charge of hopeless rashness; if M. Ferry has a secret treaty with Russia binding the Czar to advance on Peking, and so recover Kuldja the moment the French reach Bacninh, then, no doubt, his plans have a solid basis beneath them, for Russia, if in earnest, could reach Peking without passing the fortresses on the Peiho; but there is no hint, however distant, of any such arrangement. On the contrary, M. Jules Ferry, who has failed to obtain a Japanese alliance, actually said that in defying China he was acting as front and chief of the European Maritime Powers. He actually hinted that he had the support of Germany, whose one grand foreign trade will be stopped by a blockade; of England, which will be fined some six millions in the price of tea alone; and of India, which will see her opium revenue stopped for at least a year. If ever a Government in this world went into a great war without adequate reason, and in entire ignorance of the forces it might have to encounter and the risks it might have to run, it is the Republican Government of France in this quarrel about Tonquin.

But, it may be alleged, it is not a great war. Well, we entirely grant that we do not know what line the Russian Government will take—a cardinal factor in the affair—and that we cannot be absolutely certain that the War party in Peking will ultimately control the policy of the Empire. But there are a few elements in the question of which we can be certain, and they are these. The Russian Government, with a deficit for the year of £3,000,000, does not want a cruelly expensive land war just now, before its Asiatic Railway has been even begun. The Chinese Government, as it stands, is ready for war, and has for thirteen years carried on slow but important wars with the Panthays, with the Kashgari, and with Russian dependants, with signal and terrible success. It is certain that, if it chooses, it can arm the Black Flags, the brave mountaineers of Tonquin, with good weapons, can assist them with 50,000 regulars drilled by Europeans, and can defend three powerful fortresses mounted with Krupp guns. It is certain that it can expend any number of militia in defending the ways—they are not roads—to Man Hao, and that it will be aided by the climate, by the floods, and by the liability of French conscripts to disease. And it is certain that M. Ferry underrates the danger, takes credit for sending only 10,000 troops to Tonquin, talks nonsense about Anamite allies, who are just like Bengalees, and rejected Admiral Jauréguiberry's most seriously-offered advice to make the Expedition sufficiently large—30,000 men was, we believe, suggested—to ensure a decisive campaign. It follows that unless Russia moves, of which there is no sign, and unless China gives way, which she cannot do, and unless France develops a Clive, the one form of genius not natural to her, the Republic has entered on a long, troublesome, and expensive campaign, in which conscripts will be profusely wasted, and which, even if successful, will not be illustrated by victories perceptible to all the world. If that is the kind of protracted effort which French peasants will approve, or even tolerate, then the world has totally mistaken their temper, their policy, and French history; and it is upon their cordial adhesion that the Republic ultimately depends. The invasion of Mexico was the beginning of the misfortunes of the Empire, and we cannot see that the invasion of Tonquin is better justified, less risky, or more likely to secure political or commercial advantage. France is, in fact, to fight China at her least vulnerable point, for the privilege of placing a low duty on English and German exports up the Songkoi. Verily, the wisdom of universal suffrage is not past question.

MR. GOSCHEN IN EDINBURGH.

MR. GOSCHEN'S speech in Edinburgh on Wednesday is not a mere unit in the score or so of the week's speeches. It is one of those speeches which are of the nature of actions, which carry you into the mind of the speaker, and make you feel that he is not so much putting views before you as making you feel what he has been compelled to take into account in actual life,—sometimes difficulties that he has surmounted, sometimes problems which he has tried to solve and found only partially soluble, sometimes perplexities out of which he has found no clue at all. For example, what could be more striking and instructive than his comment on the inconsistency inherent in a great deal of our popular feeling in relation to the treatment of the Native races in our Dependencies and our Colonial Empire. First, there is the great missionary wish to raise their moral condition and their standard of life and habit,—to get rid of the slavery among them,—to reform the corruptions of their Governments,—to rectify their finances,—and to lighten the burdens on their peasantry. Then there is the desire to leave them to themselves, to avoid dictating to them our views of political life, to encourage and respect their national self-esteem and avoid encroachments upon it. Now, says Mr. Goschen, are these two perfectly distinct ends really compatible? Can we get rid of slavery in Asiatic or African States, and get rid of the despotism of the princes, and reform their finances, and sweep out the corruptions of their administration, and make the position of the peasantry tolerable, without undertaking to govern them entirely, and scattering to the winds all notion of respecting their national pride and their national traditions? On the other hand, can we respect their national pride and their national traditions without resolving to tolerate their despotisms, to wink at the oppressiveness of their Governments, to cast to the winds all notion of reforming their finances, and even perhaps all notion of insisting on the abolition of slavery? Mr. Goschen has evidently studied this question carefully in the East. He knows very well that it is a real question. He is perfectly aware that we are attempting in Egypt, and, perhaps, elsewhere, to find some tolerable compromise between two very different solutions, and he is evidently extremely doubtful whether a compromise between them that will really work, can be found. We suspect,—though this is only an inference, for he does not tell us his conclusion,—that his vote would be for boldly governing and civilising, wherever our duties to our present dependencies require our positive interference; but for repudiating as far as possible anything like interference, wherever it is possible to leave an endurable Asiatic or African system to pursue its own way. Anyhow, Mr. Goschen sees that the English Democracy entertains two quite distinct wishes with regard to the Native races with whom we are more or less concerned, and that it is not yet prepared to say which of the two wishes shall have most weight,—the wish to civilise and educate, or the wish to respect the institutions and the traditions of Native States and Tribes whose institutions are not civilised, and whose traditions are not humane. We incline to think that Mr. Goschen wants to lead the Democracy to clear up its views on these points; and to assume power and govern beneficently, yet strongly, wherever the interests of the Empire and the interests of mankind appear to point to moral civilisation as the necessity of the hour; but to repudiate force, and to repudiate the meddling which leads to half-and-half measures, wherever it is possible in justice to the duties which we have already undertaken, to postpone the assumption of further duties. In putting the case so powerfully and lucidly before the English Democracy, whose growing supremacy he so fully recognises, Mr. Goschen has, at all events, done a great service to the English people.

On another class of questions, of less immediate urgency, but of no less importance, Mr. Goschen is equally clear and statesmanlike,—the questions, we mean, which affect the organisation of our Civil Service, our Army and Navy. As we understand him, he urges Englishmen of all classes to give up the idea of retrenchment simply as an empty formula, and to substitute for it the idea of retrenching all inefficient expenditure, and adapting our Services in the strictest possible manner to our needs. Let us get our minds clear, he says, as to what we really want for the efficient organisation of the Empire,—what education we want, what Army we want, what Navy, what munitions and fortifications, and let us think nothing excessive which is necessary for the full efficiency of the supply of these wants; but let every inefficiency be docked away, with an unsparing hand. Further, in forming our ideal, let us never for a moment doubt that to continue both abroad and at home the great work in which we have engaged, to continue it to the best of our power, and to accept any additional responsibilities which the hour requires for discharging our engagements in the best possible fashion, is good for us, and that the time has not come when we ought to draw back from the lines traced for us by our ancestors, and confess ourselves either too weak for the tasks we have inherited, or too sensitive and squeamish to endure the reproaches lavished on us for an inadequate performance of those tasks. Here, again, we completely agree with Mr. Goschen. We believe that he is perfectly right in regarding the duty of retrenchment as implying nothing more than the obligation to get rid of all waste,—waste having an indomitable tendency to creep into every great organisation. But what waste is, no one, of course, can decide, without knowing precisely what he intends to do, and whether or not he could do it equally well at less cost. Mr. Goschen as an economist deprecates heartily anything like superfluity, and is eager for the utmost efficiency. Only, he says, let the efficiency be the efficiency of a great Empire, and not what would be called efficiency by that minute party which would rather see the Empire go to pieces, than keep on foot a strong Army and Navy to sustain it. Here, too, the Democracy must clear up its own ideas, and not confuse between the retrenchment of every inefficient and unnecessary expense, and the serious undermining of British power by grudging the nation efficient services wherewith to defend and develop its policy and to uphold its will.

It is on the political development of the Democracy that we agree least with Mr. Goschen. No one can recognise more fully or vividly than he does what the advent of Democracy in the United Kingdom means. He sketches with great power the change which it has effected in Parliament, in the constituencies, in the position of statesmen, in the character of our legislative proposals, in our dreams and in our aims. And he shows with great vivacity how those who do not recognise this new presence among us, bewilder themselves by ascribing to the conjuring of Mr. Gladstone what is not Mr. Gladstone's doing at all, but what the spirit of democracy has found its fullest expression for through the medium of Mr. Gladstone's character and life. But what puzzles us is that Mr. Goschen recognising thus fully what democracy means, should not recognise also that democracy can be regulated and guided and made to understand itself, only by those who do not put up toy barriers in its path, but who appeal to genuinely democratic principles against the abuses and blunders, not of the democracy, but of the mob. Mr. Goschen all but admits that the chance of securing the assent of the British people to the principle of the representation of classes, to which he himself wistfully clings, is dead and gone. He almost admits that now that you have enfranchised the artisans in Parliamentary boroughs, you must enfranchise the artisan in the villages and the unrepresented towns, and the agricultural labourers too. And yet, though he admits this reluctantly, he makes shipwreck of his own political influence by insisting that he will be the last man to yield. That seems to us a little childish; and it seems to us not a little childish that he will not hear for a moment of decentralising the extravagantly and dangerously centralised Government of Ireland, until Ireland shall have given up that habit of disloyalty which this extreme centralisation has chiefly tended to cause. If it were proposed, in offering Ireland more local self-government, to give her more physical opportunity of organising rebellion, then might we join in Mr. Goschen's objection. But to maintain that to let the Irish make their own roads, and impose their own rates, and build their own workhouses, and enlarge their own harbours with less control from Dublin than they do at present, is to increase their opportunities for rebellion, instead of rather to occupy their minds with wholesome business which would divert them from rebellion, seems to us strange superstition. It is the secret meetings in which treason is plotted which we encourage by discouraging open municipal meetings. To our minds, Mr. Goschen's adhesion to Lord Hartington's dangerous doctrine as to self-government in Ireland is the weakest part of his speech. Let the Irish ratepayers deal themselves and at their own cost with all the dreamy projects for making a Paradise of Ireland, and we should soon hear less of rebellion, and less, perhaps, of futile philanthropy too, than we hear now.

It seems to us that the political attitude which would best suit Mr. Goschen would be that of a democratic statesman bent on making the Democracy realise how much there is in empire which entails a great burden on the people at large; how easy it would be for a people who will listen to demagogues to ruin their own hopes; how important it is not to confound a democracy with the noisy mob; how contrary to all democratic principle it is to get the opinion of only one class, however big, in place of the opinion of all the people; how disloyal it is to the people, by any juggling to drown the voice of any section of the people which, by its numbers, has a fair right to be heard. Nor do we understand why Mr. Goschen thinks that by greater subdivision of constituencies, we should get a less true representation of the varieties of opinion entertained in the nation. To us, it seems that the more numerous are the electoral subdivisions, the more certain it will be that every variety of opinion which largely prevails will get itself adequately heard; while the larger and more unmanageable are the electoral divisions, the more probable it will be that the views, thoughts, and wishes of the thoughtful will be swamped in the sea of votes. But however this may be, surely it would be far better for Mr. Goschen to accept the Democracy, and apply his mind to the great problem of securing under it a fit representation of all thinking men, as well as of the unthinking crowds, than to try, by playing the part of a political Cæsar even more sanguine than the Roman, to defend a bridge which is not defensible, and to sacrifice himself in the attempt.

MR. FORSTER ON EUROPEAN TURKEY.

MR. FORSTER will, we fear, have learned a disagreeable lesson from the result of his interview on Wednesday with the agent of the Pall Mall Gazette. He had just returned from a considerable tour in Eastern Europe, during which he had seen most of the interesting scenes, met most of the considerable men, and talked to most of the statesmen in European Turkey. On his return, he was interviewed by some one upon the Pall Mall Gazette, and related the conclusions he had formed. His remarks were excellently reported, with his permission, in Wednesday's issue of that journal, and constitute a deliverance which, if uttered as a speech at Bradford or in London, would, we do not hesitate to say, have attracted the attention of the whole world. There has not been for years such a contribution to Western knowledge of the results of the Russo-Turkish War, one so frank, or so full of trustworthy information. Yet it fell nearly dead. Even the Pall Mall Gazette had no leader on the statement, and, so far as we know, no London journal either reproduced it or commented on it, or attacked it. This is not a consequence of any want of interest in the subject, for, as it chances, events in Bulgaria are just now watched through a microscope, but is purely a result of the form in which the information was conveyed to the world. One-half, we believe, even of the readers of the Pall Mall Gazette either never saw the statement, or glanced at it without a notion of its importance. We will endeavour, therefore, to give a summary of Mr. Forster's opinions, which, be it remembered, are those of a man of Cabinet rank, who has three times visited Turkey, who is accustomed to study Ireland and India, who is by no means indisposed to strong government, and who, on the Turkish question, once or twice struck ourselves as a little too tolerant of the claims of the Ottoman caste.

Mr. Forster entirely confirms the Liberal view as to the condition of affairs in Constantinople itself. The Sultan, Abdul Hamid, he says, though placed on the throne to be a tool in the hands of those who murdered Abdul Aziz and dethroned Murad, has made himself more feared by the Pashas than any Sultan since Mahmoud. "The awe of him lies heavy upon every Pasha in Stamboul. The Government of the Ottoman Empire, such as it is, is absolutely centred in him. He insists upon doing everything, knowing everything, seeing everything. As a result, no business is done, nothing gets settled, there is a universal block. He keeps his Pashas well in hand, but beyond that, by trying to do everything, he really accomplishes nothing. His empire is rotting into ruin." This is the universal testimony alike of Turks, diplomatists, and travelling foreigners, and Mr. Forster only puts it into incisive language. How the Sultan has attained this authority he does not explain,—we believe the secret is simply that he pushes his perfectly legal pretensions as Vicegerent of Heaven into all things, and while Mussulmans cannot resist, there is no other force;—but that he has it is past all doubt, and as one consequence the Treasury is empty, and bills for necessities only paid by orders on distant provinces which are sold at fifty per cent. discount. The troops even in the Dardanelles "are barefoot and as ragged as the poorest of Irish beggars, unpaid and miserable." "None of the soldiers in the Ottoman Service, except those which parade before the Sultan, are paid." They receive provisions and arms, and are left to eke out what is wanting by plunder. The result is that there are no means of governing left in the Pashaliks, that the "provinces are infested with brigands," and that even the Pashas are ashamed of the condition of affairs. "Macedonia, for instance, is in a horrible condition. It is overrun with brigands, who terrorise the country up to the very suburbs of Salonica. When we were at Salonica, one of the leading merchants told me he dared not call upon his best customers, for fear he was captured en route. At Adrianople a gentleman told me that he could not enjoy a day's shooting without the constant dread of being himself the prey of brigands. There is no law, no order, no security for life and property. Things are getting worse and worse, by sheer rottenness. I was told that the Pasha governing one of the vilayets conterminous with Eastern Roumelia has sent to Constantinople begging for means wherewith to govern a little better, for the contrast between his district and that of the adjoining autonomous province was really too great." In Salonica, which Mr. Forster rightly points to as one of the most important cities in Eastern Europe, and destined, from its geographical position on the straight line between London and Asia, to still higher fortunes, the people are so miserable that they would welcome any change which alleviated their sufferings. The Turks themselves are weary and despairing, and the Turkophiles have disappeared. "Seven years ago, when I visited Turkey I found many Turkophiles. This year I have not discovered one. The race is extinct. Not one man of any nationality did I come across in the whole of my tour who even pretended to believe that anything but destruction lay before the Turkish Government, and that, too, before very long."

That is Turkey, in the judgment of a statesman who believes in strong government; now let us turn to the "wretched little States" which are rising on the ruins of the military despotism which for so many centuries has weighed upon the Eastern half of the old heritage of civilisation, a vast region once more civilised than the West, filled with a brighter population, studded with more splendid cities, and still possessed of far greater natural resources. We must give Mr. Forster's own words. While stating that Prince Alexander of Bulgaria had, at twenty-three, to undertake a task which the most experienced statesman could hardly have performed, that all classes in Eastern Roumelia are anxious for the continuance of Aleko Pasha as Hospodar, and that the ablest statesman he found in the Balkan peninsula was M. Tricoupis, the Premier of Greece, Mr. Forster states:—"The contrast between the vilayet of the Danube as I saw it in 1876, and the Principality of Bulgaria as I saw it this month, was most striking. In less than seven years a race of slaves have become a nation of freemen. I saw hundreds, I may almost say thousands, of Bulgarians, as I went about the country, and was as much delighted as surprised at the sturdy independence and intelligent aspect of the peasant people. The policy of giving them self-government has been signally successful. The Bulgarians are well able to govern themselves. That is the chief fact that is impressed upon my mind as the result of my visit. If only foreign Powers will leave them to themselves, they will work out a very creditable future for Bulgaria. Their progress has already been surprising, and if they are let alone, it will continue. This applies to both the Bulgarias—Bulgaria north of the Balkans and the southern Bulgaria, which is called Eastern Roumelia. Of the two, Eastern Roumelia is, I think, more advanced; but the Bulgarians south of the Balkans were always better educated, and, in short, more civilised than those in the north. Wherever you turn you meet evidence of some improvement. To begin with, the Bulgarians have suppressed that brigandage which is the curse of all the regions still under the Turk. In Eastern Roumelia, this work is absolutely complete. In Bulgaria it is so, with the exception of a small tract in the north-east, near the Varna Railway. With that insignificant exception there is no place in either of the Bulgarias where law and order do not prevail, and where the authority of the police is disputed. When you consider that the whole of that territory was the cockpit of the East; that Pomak, and Circassian, and Bashi-Bazouk overran it only six years ago, and that it is not five years since the Russian armies quitted the province from which they had driven the Turk, this is a very notable fact." The Bulgarians, he says, though they like the Russians, do not want them. They are perfectly competent to govern themselves, and they have already advanced their material civilisation far beyond that of Southern Russia. They would be quite independent, if only the blunder of the Treaty of Berlin were rectified, and the two Bulgarias—which, Mr. Forster observes en passant, are filled with Bulgarians, and not, as is often alleged, with Greeks—were allowed to unite themselves, and develop as they wish. In both provinces the Bulgarians are enthusiastic for education, their leading men are educated at the "Robert College"—the American College at Constantinople—and "both the Governments have established universal, free, compulsory education. There is a school in every village, and scholars in every school. In a large elementary school at Sophia I subjected a boy, who would with us belong to the third or fourth standard, to the test which I always apply in visiting schools in this country. I asked him to read a passage selected at random from the newspaper of the day. Nothing could have been better than the ease and emphasis with which the little fellow read off the passage given to him." We must add, as a little touch which brings the change strongly before us, that some of the powerful men in Bulgaria who guide Prince Voghrides in his administration belong to the family of the Gueshoffs, who "narrowly escaped hanging at the hands of the Turks six years ago." It is added that the Turks who aided in the massacres live unmolested in the country, just as the cruellest West Indian slave-owners were pardoned by the Negroes after emancipation, and that five Members of Parliament at Philippopolis and fifteen at Sophia are Mussulmans:—"I could find no proof that the Government subjects them to any ill-treatment. My attention was particularly called to one Moslem landowner, who, it was stated, in the old days had burned a monastery and massacred its inmates, who had sold one-half of his land, and although an absentee landlord was regularly drawing rents from the other half. In some villages where the Pomaks continued to live, men who were known to have murdered the fathers and husbands of orphans and widows of their neighbours were unmolested. North of the Balkans, where the relations of the two races had never been so inflamed as in the southern province, there was no complaint of ill-treatment."

We do not believe that there is a diplomatist in Eastern Europe who will not confirm every one of these statements, and yet we are told, when we argue for the autonomy of Armenia, that the Christian races even in Europe are incapable of self-government, that their grievances are Russian inventions, that to rescue them from Constantinople is to condemn them to death, and that the only way to govern them well is to hand over the Balkans to the House of Hapsburg. Better Austria than Russia, for Austria, as Italy showed, can be shaken off, but compare Mr. Forster's evidence on Bulgaria with Mr. Evans's evidence on Bosnia-Herzegovina. They are not equal witnesses, it is true; but both are Englishmen, with eyes, with experience, and with the habit of speaking truth.

LORD SALISBURY AT READING.

LORD SALISBURY is always efficient in stirring up passion. His speeches at Reading seem to have been carefully devised for the purpose of irritating French jealousy of England, Colonial distrust of England, and Irish implacability towards England. The French Government, he says, is so weak and so unstable that it cannot control its own agents abroad, but it is certainly not the fault exclusively of the French Government if everything has not gone smooth; English policy must share the blame; and the weakness in French control must be regarded as only aggravating the mischief due to the vacillation of the English Cabinet. France and England went on very well together,—though not quite as well as the German Powers, with whom it was much more important to have a cordial understanding, went on with England,—so long as the Tory Administration was in office. It was Mr. Bright's reluctance to use physical force which upset our Egyptian policy, and Mr. Bright could not have sat in a Tory Cabinet. The Dual Control in Egypt, under Tory Government, worked well; whereas nothing the Liberals have done or can do in Egypt, if they keep their engagements, can work well. If they retire, as they promise to do, French intrigue will soon upset all they have done; and though that intrigue may be due to busybodies, and not to the Government of the Republic, the result will be the same. The moment the English troops leave Egypt, French intrigues to recover the power lost in Egypt will recommence. Of our Colonies and Dependencies, Lord Salisbury tells us that they cannot for the future respect the Home Government at all. We discourage and dishearten all our own people, and deliberately fill all our enemies' hearts with "wild and unlawful hopes." The Colonists are being told "not by words, but by acts more eloquent than words, that England is powerless to protect her Dependencies." The Government had used Oetawayo precisely as if they wanted to spread disorder. "They let him out of prison when they saw prospects of peace, and then they let him go when he had destroyed it." It is the same, says Lord Salisbury, in Ireland. There, the Government are trying to do all in their power to alienate Ulster, and make Ulster feel that it is to be given over bound hand and foot to the will of the other three Provinces. The inference which Lord Salisbury's speech suggests to us, and will suggest to Ireland, is that the old Orange cries ought to be resuscitated, and resuscitated in the interest of the Tories. Such is the general drift of Lord Salisbury's orations,—contempt for France, with hints as to how she may, nevertheless, get the better of a government as weak as her own, the Liberal Government of England;—proud indifference to the complaints of all those native races in India or our Colonies which conceive that they have grievances against us, and cordial encouragement to the disloyal feeling with which Anglo-Saxons regard any attempt to do justice to those native races; finally, in Ireland, the policy of "the Pale," so far as it is at all applicable to modern conditions. And this summary represents, we really believe, Lord Salisbury's true mind. On all the difficult questions of foreign, colonial, and domestic policy, his would be a policy of scorn and selfishness; he would exaggerate the English arrogance and the English indifference to the feelings of other races, until we had no alliance left except with the Turks and the Teutonic nations, and until no loyalty remained for us except the loyalty of those who think that the English spirit is chiefly shown by trampling on all that is not English, as if it were the dust under their feet.

We have reason to be thankful that Lord Salisbury periodically refreshes the mind of the country with this douche of scornful intolerance, otherwise the people might forget what the exchange of the Government of Mr. Gladstone for the Government of the Conservatives would be likely to mean. Sir Stafford Northcote is so mild and, on the whole, so fair, that they might very well think it safe to put him for a time at the head of affairs. But, unfortunately, as we have often experienced already, it is not Sir Stafford Northcote's mind, but "a darker and more dangerous spirit" which would rule the counsels of the Tory Cabinet; and for the Liberals, it is of all things most important that the character of that spirit should not be ignored, and that men should not forget that it is one which cannot even secure the loyalty of the Conservative Peers, so reckless is the caste-feeling and so rash is the conduct which expresses it. Domineering, arrogant, and rather embittered than softened by failure, Lord Salisbury is just the statesman who, if he ever had the full control of affairs in this country, might bring about some great catastrophe by his passionate management of foreign affairs, or by his high-handed indifference to all those interests of our vast Dependencies which are not mere English interests in disguise, or even perhaps by his contempt for the political desires of the English democracy. In his speeches in Wales, Sir Stafford Northcote dwelt very earnestly on the magic power of sympathy, and insisted that the Conservatives did not take sufficient pains to show people of all classes interested in our political institutions, how profoundly Conservatives desire to improve their condition and to understand their wants. Well, if he would but study Lord Salisbury's speeches, he would soon understand why the Conservatives are never likely to get credit for such desires as these, so long as Lord Salisbury continues to be regarded as their most brilliant mouthpiece. Sympathy with landlords and aristocracies is almost the only kind of sympathy which Lord Salisbury ever betrays. He may now and then interest himself in the best means of getting rid of "rookeries," both as a proprietor who clearly sees that such property is discreditable, and as a statesman who knows that "flouts, and jibes, and sneers" will never bring the masses of the people to his side. But he is hardly master of his own spirit, and whenever he addresses a popular audience, "flouts, and jibes, and sneers" preponderate, simply because the spirit which produces them is too intractable to be tamed. The spirit of exclusive pride is not the spirit of sympathy. And the spirit of exclusive pride has been the secret of Lord Salisbury's undeniable power, from his first speech as Lord Robert Cecil, to his last speech at Reading as the Conservative leader. While the spirit of Lord Salisbury continues to keep its ascendancy over the spirit of Sir Stafford Northcote, we may feel pretty safe as to the thorough-going Liberalism of the constituencies, even though that tide of popular favour which Mr. Gladstone's great name commands, were no longer at the service of the Liberal party.

ENGLISH WORKMEN ON SOCIALISM.

IT is most satisfactory, amid the wild ideas which are in the air on every side, to observe the attitude of the English representatives who attended the International Conference of Trades Unionists—or "Federation of Handicraftsmen," as the French call it—held in Paris this week. The Englishmen had a good many temptations to express rather extreme ideas. They knew their colleagues from France, Belgium, Italy, and Spain greatly wished it, and they wanted to conciliate them, in order to obtain their aid in resisting the importation of foreign workmen into Britain. Moreover, they desired to show that English workmen understood Continental difficulties, and were not wholly immersed in their own insular plans and aspirations. And finally, they, being human beings, were pleased with the very marked desire to pay them honour, and to recognise them as men in the very forefront of the battle of Labour. Mr. Broadhurst, for instance, was placed in the chair by a kind of force, though he pleaded that he did not know French, and was not familiar with the methods of Continental meetings. Nevertheless, the national character prevailed. Not one of the English men or women present could be prevailed on to say anything in advance of his own convictions, or to join in the condemnation of capital, or to ask for State regulation of wages, or to sanction legislation as to hours, or to agree, even in the abstract, that collectivism should be substituted for combination. Mr. Broadhurst, who presided on Monday, maintained in the boldest way that workmen had in England effected such changes through combination that they were bound to stick to the old lines, and reject interference by the State; Mr. Burnett declared that the old Chartists, who believed in State action, had been proved by experience to be wrong, combinations securing much more than laws ever could; and Miss Simcox affirmed that even women could effect more by combination than by demanding laws. These ideas were not approved, but the Englishmen only grew stubborn, and on the following day Mr. Broadhurst read, amidst a chill silence, a paper in which he declared that the notion of the State assisting workmen's corporations was one from which "he profoundly dissented;" that if Government began regulating wages, it would soon ask how the wages were spent; that adult men ought not to be protected by statutes, but to protect themselves; that in England, middle-class men had constantly exerted themselves to secure rights for workmen; that the idea of an international law regulating hours of labour was impracticable, as the English hours could not be adapted to foreign hours; and that, finally, the Continentals should form stronger and above all richer Associations, and secure their rights through them. The Continental Delegates did not hiss, but though all belonging to the more moderate party among workmen, and ready to turn Anarchists out of the room, as, indeed, they subsequently did, they listened to the Englishman without one word of approval or adhesion.

The scene must have been thoroughly characteristic, the determined Englishmen, who were admitted to have won such victories—that was conceded on all hands—coolly persisting in expounding their practical though sometimes Philistine ideas, in the teeth of the cold disapproval of the representatives of half-a-dozen nations, who, nevertheless, had insisted on giving them the first place, as the most successful of Unionists. The French reasoned logically, the Spaniards declaimed, the Italians thundered about treachery till they were ejected from the hall, and the Englishmen went on with their statements of facts which were unanswerable, but which somehow took no grip of the foreign audience. Perhaps, however, the most characteristic touch was that these very Englishmen demanded, in the name of brotherhood, a purely insular and selfish advantage, and not only did not see that it was selfish, but convinced their Continental colleagues that it was not. They asked, as their single request, that when a strike was on, Continental workmen should not come in and work at the price Englishmen rejected. They were quite moderate, as usual. They did not want legislation, or any application of force; but they did want that foreign workmen should see how unbrotherly this practice was, and how opposed to the principles of International Trades Unionism. They were obviously quite sincere, though a little vehement, and thought it most unneighbourly of German stonemasons to come to England on low rates of pay, and so spoil a nice, promising strike. We do not believe it once struck one of them that they were defending insulated Trades Unionism against International Trades Unionism, and voting for the abolition of the very idea, the great idea, which they went to Paris to represent. That idea is, of course, that all the workmen of Europe, or, indeed, of the world, have a common interest in obtaining a larger share of the profit of capital, or in plainer words, higher wages. The English Delegates concede the idea, and as its first application demand that nobody shall have higher wages except Englishmen. For example, English masons are earning 6s. a day, and strike for 7s. A thousand German masons who are only earning 4s. think 6s. wealth and come over, and being protected against attack by the tremendous social strength of London, which in various ways limits the efficacy of boycotting, they take the work. The English are consequently compelled to accept 6s., and Mr. Broadhurst complains loudly in consequence that this is outrageous. It may be so, if Englishmen form a corporation bound to each other by contract, express or implied, to employ no foreigners; but on international principles, it is not outrageous at all. What is outrageous is that the English should object to a German rise of wages in the Germans' own country. Clearly, the departure of the thousand Germans, and the possibility of more departures, diminish the competition in Germany, and so make it easier for the German masons who remain at home to aspire to English rates of pay. English masons are injured by the movement, not the federated masons of Europe, who rather are benefited. Mr. Broadhurst will reply that he cannot think for all Europe, and must consider his own comrades—he was, he said frankly, a mason himself—and from one point of view he may be right; but then the point of view is fatal to Internationalism, which he went to Paris to defend. He actually pleaded the gospel of fraternity as a reason for acting on the gospel of individualism. If that illustration, his own, does not suffice, let him take another. The iron trade, say, is slack in America, and wages shrink to two dollars a day. That rate, however, still attracts Staffordshire men and Welsh ironworkers, and they crowd into the States till wages in that trade cannot get up again. Does Mr. Broadhurst think that wrong, or would he support Americans in boycotting all English immigrants able to work in iron? If he would, he must agree that English wages should be kept low, in order that American wages must rise, for that is the effect of forbidding emigration to America; while if he would not, he should not lecture the poor Germans, who, in coming to London, are only emigrating to the best market accessible. The truth is, the international restriction of labour is not only unbrotherly, but impracticable, as we think even Mr. Broadhurst will see, if he will consider a crucial and final instance. There can be no doubt that the emigration of English, German, and Swedish agriculturists to the States is increasing the breadth of land sown with wheat, till prices tend to droop, and the older farmers find it difficult to get along. Would the American farmers be right in preventing an immigration of agriculturists, and if not, why not? Their country is theirs, their rights are as great as those of stonemasons, and their industry is, if anything, rather more beneficial and important. Why are they forbidden to keep up the price of grain?

The blunder is a serious one; and yet, on the whole, as we said, we feel content with the appearance of the British workmen's Delegates in Paris. They were entirely free from "views," from belief that the world could be mended in a day, from any feeling of mere hatred, either for Governments, or classes, or individuals. They were, to a man or woman, opposed to violence; they believed in capital as a useful agency, though requiring, perhaps, like steam, to be kept under control; and they understood and strongly advocated the principle of insurance, always as conservative as husbandry, because, like husbandry, it produces a crop long after the sowing. They did not much alter their confrères' views, but they seem to have inspired a somewhat sullen respect, and to have been considered only too moderate and reasonable. That is a good character to obtain, if not a striking one, and in a day of wild theories, when everything is in the crucible, and some things are put there only to see what will come of them, it is a character that we are happy to see British workmen earn. After all, Socialism is not a power in a country where the picked Delegates of the greatest trades reject with scorn the notion of subsidies from the State.

DEMOCRACY OR PLUTOCRACY?

WHILE the minds of politicians are being exercised about the expenses of elections, and the possibility of candidates for Parliament who will not need to follow Iago's advice and put money in their purses, it is just as well to remember that the Corrupt Practices Bill has not dealt with all the sources of expense. The personal expenses of the candidate are, indeed, limited to £100, though how in a four or five days' election a man can legitimately spend £100 on himself it is difficult to see. But there are two large items of expenditure in a Member of Parliament's budget, one of which is expressly and the other inferentially left untouched by the Act.

The Act expressly leaves the expenses of the Returning Officer as they were left by the Returning Officers' Act, 1875. That Act defined and limited the amounts which might be charged by returning officers against the unfortunate candidates. But though it defined and limited them, the definitions and limitations have not proved sufficient to reduce the expenses within the compass of a poor man's purse, even in a small constituency. The Mayor's "little bill" in the last election at Liverpool is a striking example of what they may amount to in a large constituency. The Mayor sent in a claim for £2,273 5s. 3d., or nearly £200 more than in the previous election, and £1,000 more than in the one before that. The successful and defeated candidates both objected to the payment, and had the bill taxed, under the provisions of the Act, in the County Court. But when items amounting to over £350 had been struck off, including a charge of £99 10s. for stamps for voting-papers, which it was proved were old stamps, the two candidates appear to have bethought themselves of the future, and, not wishing to appear in the light of "repudiators," agreed to stop the taxation, and pay the rest of the bill. The Corporation then, by a vote of perhaps questionable legality, voted to the Mayor out of the Corporation funds the amount of the illegal charges which had been disallowed. After this, bold will be the candidate who will venture to question the accuracy of a Returning Officer's charges. But it is certain that while those charges have to be met by the candidates, so far as the throwing open of Parliament to comparatively poor men is concerned, the Corrupt Practices Act might as well have been omitted from the Statute Book. That Act may prevent a competition in expenditure among those who have money to spend, but it does not admit to the competition those who cannot afford to throw away several hundreds of pounds, however talented or worthy.

Unpopular though it may be, what other method can be devised of meeting these expenses except that already adopted in municipal elections, and nearly carried the Session before last as to Parliamentary elections, of throwing them on the rates? It has been urged, especially by the Gallios of the "upper" classes, that they do not see why a man who does not care about politics should be taxed for the amusement and benefit of those who do. But the obvious answer is that it is the duty of a man not to be a Gallio in politics. Besides, there are Gallios as to every measure that benefits the public for which forced contributions are levied. There are Gallios as to education, Gallios as to roads, and even Gallios as to the necessity of drainage and the prevention of disease. A farthing in the pound extra would be no great tax on the political Gallio. A seemingly more formidable objection is that the poor man would not pay the rate, and would, therefore, have his candidate's expenses paid by the rich. It is to be observed that the number of candidates makes very little difference to the expenses of an election. But a more substantial answer is that the poor man does pay rates just as much as the rich man, and probably at a heavier rate. He would not, indeed, feel the additional farthing directly, but it is pretty certain that it would be reckoned in his rent, with a good twenty per cent. added. But there can really be no comparison between the two inconveniences of an additional farthing rate and the prohibition of poor candidates. Besides, if the expenses were thrown on the rates, it is probable that they would be considerably reduced. Some importunate Town Councillor of the adverse party would be sure to arise, and ask why it was that the Mayor had charged for a new set of ballot-boxes, when the old ones used at the last election could hardly be considered as worn out by the dropping-in of even 10,000 voting-papers; or why he paid £15 for the professional assistance of Mr. Gammon, when Mr. Snap would have rendered his services for 13s. 4d. There can be little doubt that if an election was conducted not with a view to pickings, but with the object of cheapness and efficiency, a very considerable saving might be effected.

The expense of registration is a worse charge than that of returning officers, because it is more persistent. Elections may only occur once every seven years, but registration must be attended to every year. Three hundred a year in a small borough is a serious drain on any moderate income, and when it comes to looking after the registration of a county at the rate of £1,000 or £1,500 a year, it no longer remains a mystery why county elections are followed by mortgages on landed estates. It has been suggested that payment of Registration expenses is illegal under the Corrupt Practices Act. No time is laid down for the beginning of an election, and no one may be employed for payment "for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate," except as specified by the Act. The Act does not mention registration, and the Registration agents of rival political parties clearly are endeavouring to promote the election of their candidates. But it may be argued, on the other side, that looking after registration has nothing to do with "the conduct and management of an election," and that the connection is too remote. But whatever the law may turn out to be, it is quite certain that Registration expenses are expenses of a very serious kind, which are practically imposed by law. For the intricacy of the law as to the qualification for a vote is largely to blame for the sums spent on Registration. The refined or rather the muddled difference between the householder and the lodger franchise is largely responsible for the difficulties of registration in boroughs. When elaborate inquiries have to be instituted as to whether the landlord has a room in the house himself or not, or whether he keeps a key of the front door in his pocket, before it can be known whether a man is a householder, and therefore entitled to be put on the Register, and when once there to remain there, or whether he is only a lodger, and must himself go and claim his vote every year, legal talent and experience must needs be employed. But legal talent and experience are expensive luxuries.

It is quite time that the distinction between the householder and the lodger was abolished, and that every man who pays rates, directly or indirectly, should be entitled as of right to be placed on the Register. The requirement of a year's residence, which, in a large number of cases, means practically nearly two years' residence, is a sufficient safeguard against household suffrage becoming identical with universal suffrage. The loafer and vagabond do not sleep for "a year and a day" in the same bedroom. The domestic servant and the "unemancipated" son are not ratepayers; and if need be, the ratepayer of the household might be required to make a solemn declaration as to the status as regards the rent-paying of his inmates, so as to avoid any fraudulent or colourable evasions of the ratepaying test. But the duty of making up the Register should be thrown, as it is now, as regards householders, on the Overseers, who should also be bound to see to its accuracy. If any payment was wanted for the additional labour thus imposed on these officers, it might be easily provided by a reduction of the absurdly high salaries paid to Revising Barristers, or the Revising Barristers might be made to do the work themselves. As it is, for a month's work of generally a very easy kind, at a time of year when legal business is at a stand-still, these functionaries receive £200 a year. They are appointed in a haphazard kind of way, by the senior Judge who happens to be going circuit in the district in which a vacancy has taken place. As the work is of a sort which

"one fellow can do as well as another, and a deal better too," the office has thus come to be regarded as a peculium for the youthful sons or personal friends of Judges, or as a kind of consolation stakes for the assiduous attendants of Circuits whose briefs are not equal in number to their years. Judging by the avidity with which Recorderships of £40 a year are sought after even by her Majesty's Counsel, it may be presumed that Revising Barristerships would be regarded as no contemptible prize, even if the emoluments were reduced to £50 a year, or the duties were raised to the level of the present rate of pay.

At all events, until some reform is effected both as regards Returning Officers' and Registration expenses, it is mere hypocrisy to contend that the law of Parliaments is the same for the rich as for the poor, and that the door of the House of Commons is thrown open to talents of brain, and not to talents of gold and silver. While the law remains as it is, our Democracy is a Plutocracy disguised.

EVOLUTION AND MIND.

TWO remarkable criticisms on the doctrine of the Natural Evolution of Mind have appeared within the last few days, one a striking sermon preached last Sunday week before the University of Oxford, by the new Regius Professor of Hebrew, the Reverend Canon Driver;* the other an equally striking address,† by Professor Upton, of Manchester New College, delivered at the opening of the new session. Both are concerned with the doctrine of physical Evolution. The former deals chiefly with the supposed incompatibility between that doctrine and Revelation, the latter with the real incompatibility between any doctrine which professes to evolve mind out of the physical organism, and the Christian doctrine of human responsibility and of the divine relation to the human spirit. By different approaches, both writers reach the same end. Canon Driver insists that the essence of inspiration is to convey true spiritual teaching to man of his relation and duty to God; that this is often conveyed in the Bible by parable and allegory, as well as by literal history; and that the story of Creation is not to be considered as a report of literal facts, but as such a selection from the ancient traditions of mankind as would press home the truth that God was before the Universe and created it, that the physical is subordinate to the moral creation, that the nature of Man is impressed with the living image of God, which image his own disobedience clouded and distorted, and that the providence of God has so over-ruled human destiny as to give us the opportunity of restoring that image again in all its beauty. Such is Canon Driver's view of the early chapters of Genesis. He regards them as the traditions selected by some Hebrew prophet, under the guidance of the Divine Spirit, to teach men the subordination of the physical to the spiritual universe, and the direct responsibility of Man to God. So long as this lesson is learned, he thinks that the physical cosmogony which appears to be involved in these chapters is immaterial—may very likely be erroneous—and is no part of their real drift. But he insists that what they do definitely teach, namely, that the supersensual element in man, the existence of a spirit in man, cannot be accounted for as the product of the natural organism, is of the very essence of Revelation, and is not a lesson which Science,—concerning itself, as it must, mainly with the evolution of the physical structure of the body,—has the right to traverse. Science, he holds, may deal with the question how the body of man came to be what it is, and may even determine it in its own fashion, without threatening in any way the theology of the Bible. Even if it should be eventually proved that the body of man was prepared for him by direct descent from the body of lower species, there would be nothing in that to threaten the doctrine of Scripture,—which all true philosophy confirms,—that there is something in the soul of man which does not admit of explanation by virtue of his bodily descent, something which entirely justifies the "religious contemplation of Nature," and justifies it even more completely after science has made her voice heard as to the physical links in the chain, than before those physical links had been traced out.

And what Canon Driver asserts as the essence of the doctrine of Creation taught in the Bible, Professor Upton asserts as the essence of the true philosophy of Man. "If the soul of man," he says, "and its moral and spiritual activities, can be accounted for and explained on the same principles on which recent Evolutionists endeavour to explain, and to some extent succeed in explaining, the history of our planet and the origin and development of the forms and feelings of the animal kingdom, then it seems to me evident that the raison d'être of Manchester New College virtually ceases to exist, seeing that in this case the theological knowledge which it is its special mission freely to impart, vanishes into the shadowy background of outgrown fancies and exploded delusions. Let it once be granted that man is wholly a part of Nature, and therefore wholly explicable in the way in which Nature is explicable, and it will not, I think, be difficult to show that our present ethical ideas and religious sentiments are essentially irrational and unjustifiable." Professor Upton maintains, on the other hand, that the methods of science are inapplicable to the study of mind, unless you take care in studying mind to remember that, the student and the object of study being identical, you must not forget to include all the consciousness of freedom, personality, and activity with which the student approaches his study, as part of the object of study itself. It is the nature of scientific study to regard the object studied as determined by inviolable laws which may be recorded; and when the object studied is outside the student, this assumption may be true. But so soon as the object studied becomes the student himself, the danger is great that the student will regard himself as an observable phenomenon only, and forget that every voluntary effort to apprehend himself is part of the self to be apprehended; so that if, for instance, he is treating himself as determinate at the very moment when he is resolutely determining to sound the depths of what is in him, he is really hoodwinking himself by omitting from the object gazed at, the volition of the gazer which ought to be part and parcel of that object, and which would be part and parcel of it, were it only possible, as it is not, to catch subject and object in the same swift glance. Professor Upton maintains, therefore, "that the spirit or will of man cannot be treated as a part of Nature, and brought within the range of the phenomenal sciences, without a violation of the fundamental fact of consciousness, namely, the distinction between the self-determining subject which knows and acts, and the passive object which is known and acted upon." If this free, self-determining activity, which is of the very essence of moral responsibility, of our sense of right and wrong and duty and sin, is to be treated as a mere product of material evolution,—with which it is absolutely incommensurable,—instead of as relating the soul to God, the spiritual life will necessarily be explained away, and resolved into an illusion or a dream. For the purpose of scientific evolution, you must find something analogous to the blossom in the germ. But Professor Upton very justly denies that there is in Nature anything at all analogous to the sense of freedom and responsibility which it is required to evolve out of Nature; and for its origin, therefore, he looks to the supernatural, and finds the witness of God in the consciousness of freedom.

We have only one objection to make to Professor Upton's admirable lecture, and that is, that in our opinion he concedes too much, when he admits as reasonable or at least conceivable, Professor Clifford's hypothesis that the germs of sentience, which may, he thinks, inhere in all matter,—as the inside aspects of material substance,—are developed without assuming any creative power, into the sentience of the higher animals, just as the atoms of inorganic bodies are developed, pari passu, into the structure of the higher animal bodies. Professor Upton thinks that "it may be true, as some recent Evolutionists maintain, that sentient life, in some exceedingly faint and diffused form, pervades even inorganic nature, assumes a less indeterminate shape in the organism of vegetables, and at length, in connection with the elaborate nervous system and brain of the animal, becomes so concentrated as to reach that stage which we call distinct sensation or feeling. In discussing such matters, Evolutionists are on their own proper ground, and their conclusions cannot possibly, so far as I can see, unfavourably affect theology." We quite allow that Professor Upton defends the pass against the Evolutionists at the strongest point, when he defends it at the consciousness of human freedom, and declares that there is no possibility of "evolving" freedom out of what is not free, and self-consciousness out of what is in no sense a self. But while we cordially approve of the position he has chosen as the strongest, and, indeed, to our mind, one wholly unassailable, we cannot concede that evolution can be reconciled with creation at all as a real process of growth, unless you concede implicitly to the cause all that you find explicitly in the effect. If sensations of a high, complex, and intense kind can be "developed" out of sensations of a very low, simple, and dull kind, that means that a great addition is made to the total sentient power of the universe; and this addition must be either quite uncaused, or drawn out of a great reservoir of life previously invisible to us. You cannot explain vivid, subtle, and progressive sensibility by referring merely to the dull, simple, and stationary sensibility which preceded it. The gain, if gain it be, must either be regarded as purely uncaused, or as due to a power which was not adequately expressed in the lower stage of sensation, and which has furnished the resources for this new development. We traverse, therefore, the materialistic hypothesis as any true explanation of evolution, from first to last. It is quite true that it is most manifestly and startlingly defective at the point at which it professes to bridge the gulf from determined life to free life, from impersonal life to personal life, a gulf that can never be bridged. But the blot there, though more striking than at any other point of the process, is really to be detected much sooner. Evolution means either gradual creation by a Creator on a definite plan, or the growth of non-existence into existence,—which is contrary to every principle of materialistic thought from beginning to end. It is true evolution, if the form "evolved" was long before "involved" in the Creative will. But it is not evolution at all, it is mere magic, if at every step in the upward growth physical forces are transforming themselves into something perfectly new which they did not before even suggest, and becoming, first, chemical, then vital, then sentient, and lastly moral, by a spontaneous alchemy of their own. Therefore, grateful as we are to Professor Upton for his striking lecture, we cannot but think that he is willing to concede too much.

JEWISH SENSITIVENESS.

WE publish the letter of our correspondent, Mr. Oswald John Simon, with every respect, both for him and for his motives, but with a feeling of simple bewilderment at his obvious irritation, and of perplexity as to what he and his fellow-tribesmen really want. We published last week a paragraph about the honours paid to Sir Moses Montefiore, which was not only intended to be most honorific to the aged philanthropist, but, if we can understand English at all, actually was so, and was so understood by the immense majority of our readers, but which has made our correspondent quite savage. He is angry on no less than six counts,—angry because we called Sir Moses a "Jew philanthropist;" angry because we thought him a successful man of business; angry at our calling him rich; angry because we said he attended to his own people first, but showed no tribal exclusiveness; angry because we observed that unusual vigour was a frequent characteristic of extreme age, and quoted an instance we had recently heard of; and angry because, as he alleges, we are always disparaging "a certain religious denomination." We deny that he has reason for anger on any one of the counts, though we shall not condescend to discuss the one about centenarian vitality. If Sir Moses Montefiore is not a man of great wealth—"vast" wealth was, perhaps, an error, when the scale of modern fortunes is considered—then all accounts of him, and all popular ideas of his position, and all deductions from his constant and splendid benefactions are in error together. If he is not a successful man of business—we did not say in business—how did he found the establishments his biographer in the Times says he did found, or arrange a dozen delicate and difficult negotiations with foreign Courts for the benefit of his community, or manage the endless charities with which his name is honourably connected? If he has not attended to his own people first, how is it that in every Jewish community in the world his is the most honoured name, or why do his panegyrists quote his missions to Russia and Morocco, and his intervention on behalf of his people in Roumania and Servia, as his highest titles to the respect of mankind? The panegyrists are right, patriotic philanthropy on behalf of a despised and poverty-stricken race being, of all philanthropies, the noblest; but why, then, are we wrong? And again, why are we guilty of using opprobrious terms, when we styled Sir Moses a "Jew philanthropist"? In what way is either term any but one of honour? Would Mr. Simon think we were abusing a friend of his, if we called him an English, or a French, or a German, or an Indian philanthropist; and why should we not use the word which all the world uses, which is incessantly employed in the Jewish newspapers, which Sir Moses Montefiore has employed in a hundred fine appeals for his people, and which to our ears conveys so little of opprobrium that we should write of St. Paul as a "Jew of Tarsus" without a thought of derogation, or any idea except that we were marking his nationality? As it happened, we had no intention of alluding to Sir Moses Montefiore's creed at all, but only to his freedom from the frequent exclusiveness of his race; but even as regards creed, we do not see any opprobrium in a word accepted by all mankind and used in all literatures, and that by men themselves belonging to the faith. We quite acknowledge, however, that communities occasionally dislike a term which, to outsiders, conveys no opprobrium; and if this is the case among Jews, as it certainly is among Quakers and Swedenborgians, we shall be happy to employ the phrase that they prefer. But we can see in their own papers no evidence of such a feeling, and should ourselves have thought that if opprobrium lurked in any designation of the people, it would have been discovered in the word "Israelite," which is often held to mean the opposite of "an Israelite without guile."

And finally, as to our own alleged habit of disparaging "a certain religious denomination," we utterly deny it, for we deny any disrespect for Judaism, which, though now encumbered with a partly meaningless ritual, and chilled in its inner life by doubts of its own divine origin, is essentially a noble though insufficient creed, a form of Theism not spoiled, as Mahomedanism is, by the release of God from all obligation to his own creatures. It has evolved throughout its history some of the noblest minds, it has for ages enabled its votaries to resist bitter persecution, and it even now affords consolation and light to some of the loftiest minds and most benevolent hearts to be discovered in Europe. So little do we despise it, that we are aware of and rebuke ourselves for a faint distaste for those who apostatise from it, or at least for those who, without embracing Christianity, disown or condemn the faith of their ancient tribe. That we find the modern perversions of Judaism often rather contemptible in their earthiness and want of sincerity, is true; but to dislike these things is not to dislike Judaism, a creed out of which our own faith certainly sprang, and with which it is indissolubly connected. So far from feeling any contempt, we have for a quarter of a century past contended for the total release of the Jews in all countries, and under all circumstances, from any disabilities whatever, holding that absorption will be the most rapid cure for their tribal exclusiveness, which, nevertheless, we have never denied their right, if they believe it advantageous, to maintain. We think them wrong, and wrong also in avoiding the usual occupations of mankind, and seeking to live solely as distributors; but that is their own affair. That they will in the end, as a new and exclusive caste of aristocrats, possessed of too large a share of wealth, exercising too much power, and adding too little to the world's resources in return, draw down on themselves the angry attention of the democracies of the world, is, in our judgment, certain; but we do not either hate or despise them for that, any more than we hate or despise the 5,000 or so of Englishmen who, according to Mr. Michael Davitt, eat up all the surplus wealth produced by British labour. There the caste is, and in describing it, we do so with no wish except to state the facts as accurately as may be.

We hardly understand the present extreme sensitiveness of the Jews. They have a very noble history behind them. They produce in two or three branches of thought and of art some of the highest names. They excel all men in the great faculty of accumulation. They are rapidly acquiring an influence in politics so great that in some countries it is considered a danger, and that in all it is out of proportion to their numbers. They admit, and exult in admitting, that in all countries they are bound together by a chain of tradition which is rarely, if ever, broken, and the strength of which consists in the fact that, besides being Frenchmen, or Germans, or Englishmen, they are Jews; yet, according to our correspondent, they think it an offence that this name should be applied to them. Why should they object to their own name, any more than any other people, or sept, or class, whose pride it is to keep certain traditional rules of pedigree inviolate? The name, in England and France at least, holds them up to no dislike, and while they remain separate, some separate name they must have, for granting all they claim, that in each country they are among the best of citizens, they are in each country something more. Parsees do not fret when they are called Parsees, and Armenians proclaim their nationality from the hill-tops. We suppose the truth is that Jews have now risen so high in Europe that, like Americans before their great war, they are sensitively alive to any mention which implies that they are separate from other nations; but why not accept the separateness, and, as Sir Moses Montefiore has done, and the most exclusive of all bodies, the Quakers, have also done, make it a claim to honour? The Jews want at heart to be treated like an aristocracy. Well, let them be an aristocracy, with its sacrifices and its ideals, as well as its claims, and the treatment will inevitably come. Separateness is no social disadvantage, and if it were, the disadvantage is self-earned, and not produced in the slightest degree by outside criticism. So far from Sir Moses Montefiore losing by being known as a Jew, he would not, as an ordinary philanthropic Englishman or American, have received half the honour paid to him last week. The wires did not quiver with telegrams when Mr. Peabody died.

BEARDS.

THERE is a good deal of recrimination, more or less amicable, between men and women, on the question which of the two sexes is more under the slavery of Fashion. Men, doubtless, have much to say on their side. Their fopperies in dress are foolish enough, and have been at times almost incredibly silly—witness the shoes with curling toes in which the dandies in the days of the early Plantagenets rejoiced—but, on the whole, they do not match the extravagancies of feminine taste. And then there is tight-lacing, a practice to which, while artists vainly proclaim that it disfigures the form, and physicians to as little purpose declare that it is unhealthy, the women obstinately cling. But then, on the other hand, the history of the Beard is a terrible record of male folly. If some inhabitant of a superior sphere were called down to hear the case, as in Leigh Hunt's apologue the angel is called in to arbitrate between the Man and the Fish, what would he say when it was thus presented? Here is a natural growth, which is commonly allowed to be ornamental, which certainly conceals what are often the weaker and least shapely parts of the face, which helps to protect important organs of life, the removal of which is tedious, painful, and, in possibility at least, dangerous—was not Dionysius compelled to singe off his beard with hot walnut-shells, for fear of letting a razor approach his tyrannous throat?—and yet at various epochs sundry nations have agreed, as far as might be, to remove it,—and not only this, but to make its removal a test of mental sanity and moral goodness. It is this last fact, the bigotry, so to speak, which has commonly been associated with this fashion, that makes the history of the Beard so strange and, we may venture to say, so humiliating a record. Does it not seem absolutely incredible that not more than a quarter of a century ago, Archbishop Tait, then Bishop of London, an exceptionally liberal prelate, actually forbade one of his clergy, a man of the highest character, to read prayers in his own church on the occasion of a confirmation, because he had the sense to let the hair grow on his upper lip; and that Lord Justice Knight Bruce absolutely refused to hear, in fact ignored the presence of, a bearded young barrister who attempted to address him; and that in a case well known to the present writer, all the dignified machinery of the governing body of a school was called in by the head master, to compel an innovating colleague to shave?

These instances are striking, because they are recent, but the whole history of the subject is full of the most curious anomalies. In earlier antiquity, the wearing of the Beard was, with the exception of Egypt, where the priests certainly were shaven, universally customary. It was, indeed, held to be peculiarly sacred. To touch it was to make the most solemn appeal possible to compassion (a fact possibly connected with the helplessness of a man so grasped). The Greeks recognised, indeed, a peculiar type of beauty in the beardless Apollo; but this feature was certainly a part of their ordinary conception of the manly form, and they certainly did not, as Dr. Doran supposes (strangely misled by an analogy of sound), "style as Barbarians, unshaven savages, all nations who were out of the pale of their own customs and religion" ("Encyclopædia Britannica," edition 1876). Shaving, however, seems to have become common after the best days of Greece had past. Alexander the Great is represented with a beardless face; and he is said to have made his Macedonians doff their beards, as affording a dangerous hold to the enemy in close combat. It was certainly one of the Greek fashions that made their way into Rome, and after a long struggle it seems to have prevailed. Barbers from Sicily are said to have settled in the city as early as 300 B.C. Conservatives, such as Cato the Elder, seem to have fiercely resisted the change. Scipio Africanus the Younger is said to have been the first who shaved daily. But the fashion prevailed. The heads of the great Romans of the last age of the Republic are beardless; and the custom seems to have continued during the early Empire. To be able to grow a beard was, of course, a sign of manly years, and the young Romans cultivated it as diligently as an ambitious lad among ourselves; but to cut it off was a necessary sacrifice to custom, though, if we may judge from an expression in one of Cicero's Letters, there was a class of ultra-fashionable youths who wore a small beard. Augustus, the Elder Pliny tells us, always used the razor. "Bearded" became a synonym for something old-fashioned, and even silly. The philosophers, however, still were champions of nature, though not always creditable champions, as they were often believed to make the beard, and its accompaniment the cloak, serve in the stead both of wisdom and virtue. Some of the Emperors, however, after the end of the first century of our era, seem to have worn the beard, Julian, in the fourth century, being a conspicuous example. In our own country, the English before the Conquest were commonly bearded, though the Norman fashion of shaving was creeping in, just as the Greek fashion had crept into Rome. "An army of priests," was the report brought back by Harold's spy from the camp of the invaders. The conquerors of Senlac seem to have imposed their custom of shaving upon the conquered, and it was one of the grievances of the English under their new masters that they were compelled to shave. After two centuries, however, beards again asserted their right to exist. The portraits of pre-Reformation founders at Oxford and Cambridge frequently display the beard; but it seems to have gone partially out of fashion in the days of the Tudors. Dr. Doran tells us that the Benchers of Lincoln's Inn forbade any bearded person to sit at table unless he paid for double commons. Still, there are conspicuous exceptions. The beard which Sir Thomas More moved out of the way of the executioner's axe has become famous. The appendage, too, must have been common, when Elizabeth thought it worth while to impose a tax on all who wore a beard of more than a fortnight's growth. The Reformers, again, certainly were bearded, as, in the earlier half of the next century, were the statesmen and prelates of the Stuart Monarchy. Meanwhile, shaving became more and more common among the ecclesiastics of the Roman Church (the Greek communion, conservative in this, as in all things, has always clung to the beard), though the Popes, as late as the end of the seventeenth century, seem not to have personally followed the practice. With us, shaving became almost universal with the Restoration, the Second Charles, with whom the growth seems to have been naturally deficient, setting the fashion. Still, there were those who refused to surrender the beard. In Ely Cathedral, for instance, as late as the first decade of the eighteenth century, we see the bearded effigy of a Bishop of the See. Then came a long period, lasting down almost to this generation, during which no words were hard enough for the audacious creature who dared to show himself in the haunts of his fellows as, it may be presumed, Nature had intended him to be. He was supposed to be revolutionary in politics, and heretical in faith, if not positively an atheist. Persons not yet middle-aged will remember how fiercely the controversy raged. It sounds ludicrous now to a younger generation, which, thanks to the struggles of their elders, enjoys a perfect freedom in such matters; but it was not a laughing matter at the time. Bishops and judges, as has been said before, not only denounced, but persecuted the beard. Masters forbade it to their employés. A well-known West End Bank, with a certain humour that does something to atone for the tyranny of the act, issued an edict that "gentlemen were not to wear beards or moustaches during office hours." Congregations deserted ministers who had the presumption to appear as according to all tradition, and indeed all probability, the founder of their religion appeared. Slowly the opposition became less vehement. A bearded clergyman was appointed to a Bishopric (not in England, it is true,—that has not yet, we think, happened), and declined to follow the suggestion of his Metropolitan, and shave. Now, every man may do as he pleases; but certainly, while he has to own to a record of such unreasonable intolerance on the part of his own sex, he cannot say much about feminine subservience to Fashion.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE SPECTATOR AND THE JEWS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your columns of this date, a paragraph relating to the venerable Baronet, Sir Moses Montefiore, has been read with some surprise. I shall feel obliged if you will allow me, in due respect, to make some remarks upon it, through the same organ. Being a staunch Liberal of an advanced school, I naturally watch with interest the observations of the Spectator. Adding to this the fact that I am of the Jewish religion, I have always been curious to see how the most Liberal periodical referred to Jews and Judaism.

First, permit me to remind you that the word "Jew," used as an adjective, is regarded generally as a term of opprobrium. I will not refer to an inaccuracy which the English suggests. I am sure, as a Liberal, that you would be the last to use a term with the object of touching anybody's sensitiveness; and, therefore, I regard the first sentence of the paragraph "Jew philanthropist" as a possible error of print. Again, a philanthropist does not require the adjective of Jewish or Christian, because philanthropy is common to all men, and independent of the accident of creed.

As a matter of fact, Sir Moses Montefiore is neither remarkable as a "successful man of business," nor as a "man of vast wealth." He was all his life a gentleman of fair means, and independent of a career of remuneration. From his own lips, I have heard the story of how he paid £1,500 in the early part of this century to become a member of the London Stock Exchange, which he joined not because he desired a pursuit of that nature, but as a means of opening an avenue of respectable livelihood to less fortunate persons who, by reason of their faith, were at the time under disability. His relation to the mercantile world was therefore temporary and accidental, rather than a main point in his career. A man without offspring, and of simple habits, being devoted absolutely to the public good, may appear richer than he is.

The remark in the Spectator that "he has, of course, attended to his own people first, but he has displayed no narrowness or tribal exclusiveness," seems to border on the ludicrous. "Charity begins at home," but the home of Sir Moses's charity was everywhere, and, in point of fact, he began with the Jews and Christians together in the exercise of his noble generosity and large-heartedness. So far back as 1840, the Crown did not create a baronet of a Quaker because he was kind to Quakers, nor elevate a Catholic because he gave money to Catholics. Sir Moses Montefiore received his honours of the Crown, because, as a subject of the Crown, he showed himself to be a great philanthropist.

The last part of the paragraph, which compares the centenarian of unusual personal eminence with those cases that occasionally one hears of from the workhouse, is at once unbecoming and almost flippant. There is no parallel, and I do not comprehend the lack of interest which the writer of the paragraph betrays in the attainment of a great age, in whatever sphere of life it may occur. Whether in a workhouse or in a palace, it is physiologically of precisely the same interest; but in the case of a man who during the great part of that century has been prominently before the world, the interest is obviously heightened, because it is more rare in men of that class. In the case of Sir Moses Montefiore, the interest is of a special kind, for the character and nobility of the man are special. This is the unanimous opinion of the civilised world, and expressed by the Press of all parties, with one dissentient. It is unfortunate for the Liberal party that that one dissentient should be an organ of theirs.

I am bound to add that this is one of a series of opportunities, some of which have been created and others arising naturally, which the Spectator has seized to utter a word of disparagement against a certain religious denomination. A proceeding such as this, from personal knowledge I am able to state, does more injury to our great Liberal cause than all the organs of the Conservative party attempt to effect. It estranges from the ranks adherents who have no connection with that race, but believe that race prejudice is the extreme opposite of Liberal principles, against which it is the duty of their party to wage war. So far as Jews are concerned, no single portion of the Press are likely to disturb them. Personally, as a Jew, and with some knowledge of history, I regard with indifference the views either of an individual or a particular newspaper, because from my experience I am aware that the public opinion of this great country is a sufficient guarantee of respect toward the Jews; and if I do not regard such efforts with scorn or silent contempt, it is because the silence is broken by my fears that a Liberal organ may, and has unconsciously done mischief to the great Liberal party. Trusting that you may regard nothing that I have written as inconsistent with courtesy, and the consideration which your important columns command, I am, Sir, &c., NONCONFORMIST TORYISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—There is great force in your article on the relation of Nonconformists to the Liberal party, and in the conclusion you arrive at that, Disestablishment once effected, Nonconformists are likely to be found in more frequent alliance with the Conservative feeling of the country. That idea bears also upon many who are now Conservative not because they are not in sympathy with many points of the Liberal creed, but because their veneration for the Establishment prevents their union with the party that is likely to liberate the Church from State control. That liberation accomplished, the divided religious forces of the nation would unite, and flow in one deep, strong current, that would tell mainly upon moral and social progress, and not so much upon questions of mere party. The power exerted on public opinion and on Governments, in the interests of sobriety, chastity, peace, philanthropy, by such a combination would be a unique phenomenon in English life.

The function of organised society and of civilised Governments, in a Nonconformist's view, is not so much economic as moral,—the culture of character. He makes war upon certain archaic institutions mainly because they place obstacles in the way of the free expansion of character by large classes of our countrymen. For there cannot be equal facility for the development of the mental or moral energy of a people, while religious inequalities or disabilities exist. Another fundamental idea of Nonconformity is, given full freedom for the growth of character, to give to the highest and noblest character power, authority of all kinds, legislative and spiritual. This principle is constantly wrought out in many Nonconformist Churches, which unite the most democratic constitution with high reverence for the specially gifted in the brotherhood. The Nonconformist element in politics must of necessity be, in a nation in which the Church is free, anti-Socialistic, Conservative, sympathetic, harmonising, supremely loyal to all great characters in public life, ardently anxious that such characters should exercise the largest power, and that ignorance, and folly, and wickedness should exercise only a minimum of power.

The Nonconformist is naturally averse to the undue elaboration of Government. He detests officialism; he believes in the authority of an enlightened public opinion; he believes that a righteous, God-fearing race need very little government; he knows that the regeneration of society must come from within, from the renewed inner life and conscience of men, and not by any rectification of the external and physical conditions in which they are found, though these have their due place in a complete system of human culture. Consequently, he looks with only a limited appreciation upon all legislative enactments and machinery.

Now, all Socialistic proposals are proposals to elaborate the functions and extent of Governments into all regions of action, so that the right and the desirable shall be done from little freedom of choice, but from the unerring action of the State and the direction of the State official. Socialism would make Government an organised disease, ramifying through the whole community, and sapping the strength and health of the whole organism. Upon such hallucinations Nonconformists look with no approval at all; with Mr. Bright, they hope such questions will never be ripe for settlement. The Nonconformist factor in politics, therefore, must be Conservative in the truest sense; reverent of the rights of men, and of the rights of property also. An illustration of this we have in America, where the instinct for property is very strong, and within even Republican borders sturdy Conservatism flourishes.

But what shall be said to this, when we find the leader of the party of order, Lord Salisbury, in his article on "Disintegration" in the Quarterly, stating that Mr. George, the author of "Progress and Poverty," is "a combination of Marat and the Dissenting minister?" I must leave Mr. George's admirers to defend him from the alleged resemblance to Marat; but in the interests of accuracy, and charity, and courtesy, I must protest against the association of Dissenting ministers with the bloodthirsty ferocity of Marat, and the crude and visionary crotchets of Mr. George. If the master of gibes, and flouts, and sneers knew how conservative of the noblest traditions of English freedom and progress Nonconformists actually are, he would not have penned that bitter and spiteful epigram.—I am, Sir, &c.,

MR. SEEBOHM ON MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It may not be a matter of much consequence what I said at the Leeds Conference in support of my amendment, "That the subject of the representation of minorities was too important to be disposed of hastily at the Conference." But as I have been represented as favouring equal electoral districts, with one Member to each, it may be worth while to correct the mistake.

I did, indeed, allude to this method of representing minorities as one which seemed to me to be in favour with the Conference, though not courageously avowed by its leaders. I mentioned the fact that in 1874, in the Metropolis, a Tory majority of many thousands of voters were made by the magic process of division into sections to return twelve Liberals and only ten Conservatives, as a proof that the division of constituencies might end in greatly over-representing minorities. I also expressed the conviction that, to break up political units like Birmingham into pieces, making Mr. Bright the Member for Ward No. 2 or No. 3, instead of a Member for Birmingham, would be likely to exaggerate local interests and to provincialise the House of Commons.

I can hardly think that on reflection our great constituencies will accept the haphazard, and often undue, representation of minorities secured by splitting them up into wards, in preference to some modification of the present system, which shall avoid some of its awkward incidents, and leave the solidarity of these great units of political life intact. Will you allow me to add, in conclusion, how astonished I was that the Spectator, after, for so many years, having consistently supported the fair representation of minorities, should, in a moment of needless despair, have jumped from the frying-pan into the fire?—I am, Sir, &c.,

The Hermitage, Hitchin, October 31st.

F. SEEBOHM.

[We have never regarded the present plan as anything but a hint of a sound principle. Mr. Seebohm himself will hardly deny that, as it is, it rather aggravates the evil of the under-representation of minorities in the nation at large. Nor, unless it be very greatly extended, and extended to small as well as great constituencies, could it be otherwise. What even infinitesimal chance is there of getting it thus extended? Can Mr. Seebohm hold out the hope that any substantial fraction of the House of Commons will support a large extension of it, and its application not only to great, but to small constituencies?—Ed. Spectator.]

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your issue of the 20th ult., you quote, apparently with approval, Mr. Bright's statement about the representation of the four "three-cornered" borough constituencies, that, "whilst other 142 boroughs return 176 Members, they, in effect, return only four Members;" and you remark, "That is unanswerable." As far as Mr. Bright's argument depends on his assumption that the minority clause was a plan by which the House of Lords not only "did not give to each of the big towns three Members, but deprived them of the influence of two," it is very easily answered, by pointing out that in the above statement he obtains his result entirely by the simple device of using the same word in different senses in the two parts of his sentence. In stating how many Members the four big towns "in effect" "return," he uses the word "return" in a sense of his own, in which it has probably never before been used. (A lexicographer who seeks to include this new meaning of the word will have to explain it something in this manner:—"A Parliamentary borough is said to 'return,' in the Brightian sense, a certain number of Members. This number is the difference between the number of Members returned, using the words in their ordinary sense, who would in all probability vote on one side in a strictly party division, and the number of Members returned by the same borough who would, in all probability, vote on the other side; e.g., in the year 1883, the City of London would have been said to 'return' two Members. Note, 'return' is never used in this sense of county constituencies.") Having determined how small a number could possibly be the number "returned" by the four big towns, which he makes, very rightly, one each, Mr. Bright then asks how many are returned (without inverted commas) by other 142 boroughs, and, reverting to the ordinary meaning of the word, answers triumphantly and very truly:—"One hundred and seventy-six. Now, is not that an astounding fact?" Of course, the fact is that, in Mr. Bright's own private meaning of the word, the "return" by these 142 boroughs may be nil, since it is conceivable that they are represented by Members who would vote half on one side and half on the other side in a strictly party division. I have no more taken the trouble to reckon up what is the actual party voting power of the 142 boroughs in question, than Mr. Bright took the trouble to speak in accordance with actual facts when he said that "when an election occurs, one Member is returned by each of the large cities by the minority." Mr. Bright only meant that there is nothing to prevent the happening of that which he seems accidentally to have said always does happen. I only say that there is nothing to prevent the return of 88 Liberals and 88 Conservatives by the 142 small towns.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"BY LAW ESTABLISHED."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I do not flatter myself that I am the clergyman who every quarter rouses the indignation of "A Superintendent-Registrar" by running his pen through the word "Established," printed on the forms of returns of marriages. I, too, however, am guilty of that enormity. But in my case, at any rate, there is no intention of "disclaiming such a connection," nor any rebellious motive whatever. I only try to obey, perhaps too slavishly, the Registrar-General. The Register books of my parish are old, perhaps among the earliest issued under the present system of registration; they omit the word "established," using instead, I think (I am at present away from home), the expression "Church of England." The Registrar-General requires me to sign a printed form, certifying that my returns are "true copies" of the entries in the books. I do not care to mess my books by altering them at every entry, so I alter the return-form. Verily, Horace's mountains are part of the eternal hills!—I am, Sir, &c., "RIDICULUS MUS."

THE CRISIS IN THE COTTON TRADE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your very excellent article on "The Crisis in the Cotton Trade," there is one error which I think it well to point out. You state that "a spinning mill on the latest model cannot be completed in much less time than three years." Kindly allow me to state that the Oldham cotton mills, as at the present time built and fitted with machinery, can be totally completed in less than half the time you give. There are high-class mills now running that have been finished in little over twelve months.—I am, Sir, &c.,

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The letter of your correspondent under this head seems to me to suggest some grave considerations. The children to whom the dinners are to be given are not, it appears, paupers, but belong to parents residing in the neighbourhood, and using the public elementary schools. If it be right to organise a system of giving gratuitous meals to such children, it is evident that it should be done on a large scale, if not universally. There is nothing exceptional in the condition of Lisson Grove, or in the prospect of the coming winter, to call for a special effort such as your correspondent describes. Nor is it easy to see on what principle her benevolence is restricted to Board Schools. Other public elementary schools in the district are filled with children of the same class, and those of the Roman Catholics with a still poorer class than the scholars of Board Schools. It is plain that, unless the proposed system is worked with great judgment, and with very full and accurate knowledge of the circumstances of the parents, this particular form of almsgiving may prove very mischievous. But it does not appear that either the School Board, or the responsible Manager of the school, or the honoured Rector of the parish—Mr. Llewelyn Davies—take part in this movement, or that they even approve of it. It will probably be said that the tickets for the dinners are given through the agency of the teachers. But the hard-worked master of a Board School is necessarily ignorant of the circumstances and real wants of the parents. He will doubtless, from motives of kindness, undertake the distribution of the tickets; and if he does not bestow them as rewards, will give them to the children who seem to him to be half-fed or most neglected. And on inquiry, it will almost certainly be found that these are generally the children of drunken, idle, and dissolute parents, who are only too glad to be relieved from the duty of feeding their children, and to spend the money thus saved at a public-house. It is in such cases that the well-known warning of Frederic Bastiat, in, "Ce qu'on voit, et ce qu'on ne voit pas," deserves especially to be borne in mind. What is seen is the pleasure and gratitude of a few hungry little ones; and this is undoubtedly gratifying to the philanthropic eye. What is not seen is the permanent demoralisation of the poor as a class, the premium which is put on idleness and vice, and the deep but legitimate discontent and sense of injustice felt by the self-respecting and honest poor man, who, though receiving no higher wages than his neighbours, makes an effort to keep his children neat and comely in appearance, and does not wish to have his children fed at the public expense. It is one drawback, and not an insignificant one, connected with our modern system of compulsory education, that it has to some extent diminished the sense of parental responsibility among persons of the poorest class. A legal obligation is always apt to diminish, if not to supersede, the consciousness of moral obligation. It may be that this is inevitable, and at least justifiable, in regard to elementary instruction, which the State regards, though the parent may not always regard, as a necessary of the young life. But if on any great scale, we are ever to establish in connection with the public elementary schools, which now contain four millions of children, a system of gratuitous feeding—if the less conscientious and thrifty parents are once encouraged to believe that sending their children to a Board School in a miserable and half-starved condition is the way to secure for them three good dinners a week, at other people's expense—the moral mischief will far more than outweigh whatever intellectual advantages are to be gained for the spread of popular education.

Meanwhile, it seems certain that wherever this somewhat perilous experiment is tried, even on a small scale, it should be managed on definite and right principles, and under the sanction of responsible persons who possess the public confidence, and whose names and experience offer some guarantee that the charity shall be dispensed wisely, with full knowledge of the actual needs and history of the persons to be benefited. There should be a thoroughly representative committee, a full and detailed publication of accounts, and a trustworthy public audit. There is nothing in the letter of your correspondent to assure the benevolent readers of the Spectator that any one of these conditions has been fulfilled in the present case.

"Blessed is he that considereth the poor." But he who gives alms without considering the probable effect of his gift, or the character and life of the recipient, will probably do more harm than good.—I am, Sir, &c., J. G. F.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your article of September 29th has elicited many letters, and I shall feel obliged by your publication of the following statement with reference to the above practical and not uninteresting topic. In the winter of 1863-64 an article appeared in Punch headed, "Dinners for Poor Children Wanted," and referring to a systematic plan of feeding children with meat once a fortnight initiated by Victor Hugo. This was the origin of the "Destitute Children's Dinner Society," which in the winter of 1866-7 gave 15,576 dinners, on payment of one penny by each child, at a cost of £229 9s. 3d. to the Society, and £61 18s. to the children who dined. It has progressed and prospered ever since, and the work is now extended to all parts of London, where misery and pauper education indicate the need of such assistance, the two qualifications for help being that the real need and merits of the children shall be ascertained, and that none but those attending schools shall be recipients.

In the season 1881-82, the number of dinners given was 187,329,—the children's pence (which are now reduced to half-pence) amounted to £381 1s. 3d., and the amount of grants to the local committees was £1,339 7s. 6d. The subscriptions and donations were £1,419 13s. 7d., and the society has a reserve fund of £1,690 19s. 1d., invested in Metropolitan Three and a Half per Cent. Stock. Last winter, the figures are slightly lower, but the work done was not less effectual; and the total working expenses for office, advertisements, printing, postage-stamps, and audit were £96 5s. 6½d.

The dinners are meat dinners of Irish stew and bread, and cost 3d. per head, of which 2½d. is given by our society, and ½d. for the bread by the child. They are regularly inspected by the members of our Committee, and are entirely of an undenominational tendency, as the names of the superintendents of the fifty local committees will show. I have accumulated evidence of the physical, moral, and educational benefit which the children derive from these dinners, and confidently assert that a larger return for money is got thereby than from any other form of charitable expenditure.—I am, Sir, &c.,

GEORGE A. ALSTON, Acting-Secretary, D.C.D.S.
Oxford and Cambridge Club, October 31st.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It may interest some of your readers to know that for some years an Association in Edinburgh has provided, during the winter months, two meals a day, for a large number of very poor children, on condition of their attendance at school.

The cost of each meal is 1½d.—breakfast, consisting of porridge and milk, or coffee and bread—dinner, of pea soup, or broth and bread. Attendance at morning school entitles the child to a ticket for dinner, and at afternoon school to a ticket for breakfast. The meals are not given to the children in the schools, but at centres in the various school districts of the city.

The Association was organised to assist the School Board in securing the attendance at school of the large class of children to be found in every city whose destitute condition would make their enforced attendance at school only a hardship. Every case for assistance is carefully examined by the Committee, who receive recommendations from the teachers of the schools and the compulsory officers of the School Board. The names of the children to whom aid is granted by the Association are inscribed on a separate register in the schools they attend, and the very high average of their attendance shows the good results of the work of the Association. I believe we have in regular attendance at the elementary schools in Edinburgh the very poorest class of children; but without the help of this Association, the School Board, with all their compulsory powers, would have found it impossible to drive these children into school.—I am, Sir, &c., FLORA C. STEVENSON.

VIVISECTION AND THE INHERITANCE OF DEFORMITIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Professor Lankester must be aware, (1), that the experiments to which he alludes in his letter to the Spectator are too repulsive in their nature to be republished in the columns of that journal; (2), that the "importance" of the results obtained by them is practically nil, compared with the light thrown on the subject of hereditary transmission by studies pursued under natural conditions in the immensely more extended field of observation; (3), that as regards either evidence or research, the experiments of vivisectionists in this direction are, to say the least, superfluous, scientific observation having already ascertained and verified the fact that injuries of the brain and nervous system, or those affecting the functional activities, are transmissible; while those which are strictly localised, as the scar of a burn, or the distorted foot of a Chinese woman, are confined to the individual, and not inherited by offspring.—I am, Sir, &c., E. READING FOR READING'S SAKE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—À propos of Lord Justice Fry's strictures on reading for mere amusement, may I ask you to find room for the following pregnant extract, from the "Diary of Alexandre Vinet"? It offers a test which solitary reading would probably be better able to meet than any reading society:—"La lecture me suffit moins que jamais. J'y reconnais toujours plus la paresse qui cherche à se faire illusion. J'en suis venu à reconnaître qu'un livre est d'autant meilleur, qu'il me force plus tôt et plus impérieusement à le quitter pour penser, ou pour composer sur l'idée qu'il a fait surgir en moi." How admirably descriptive is that simple phrase, "la paresse qui cherche à se faire illusion"! —I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

LYRICS OF PERICLES.—I.*

I.—INVOCATION TO CERES.

GODDESS of the golden horn,
Plenty's Queen when man was born,
Hear us where we bend the knee
To thine high divinity:
Hear the infant's hungering cry,
Mothers' prayer no more deny:
Shed thy store o'er field and town,
Ceres, send thy blessing down.

Want and Woe stalk hand in hand
Through the parched and blighted land;
Poppies o'er the leaguered plain
Kiss to death the poisoned grain,
And the wavy sheaves of gold
Wither in their spectral fold:
Wear again thine harvest-crown,
Ceres, send thy blessing down.

II.—FISHERMEN'S SONG.

After the battle, the peace is dear,
After the toil, the rest;
After the storm, when the skies are clear,
Fair is the Ocean's breast.
Out in the gold sunshine
Throw we the net and line;
The silvery chase to-day
Calls us to work away,
So throw the line, throw,—Yo, heave ho!

Fishers must work when the treacherous sea
Smiles with a face of light,
Though the deep bed, where their fortunes be,
May be their grave ere night.
Out in the gold sunshine
Throw we the net and line;
The silvery lives to-day
Flash in the silver spray,
So throw the line, throw,—Yo, heave ho!

III.—MARCH AND BACCHANAL.

Evoë, Bacchus, the King!
Evoë, Bacchus, we sing!
Cymbal and thyrsus we bring, Evoë!

Leaving Cithæron in shade,
Come with the Graces arrayed,
Come with the Asian maid, Evoë!

When Ariadne deplored
Theseus her lover and lord,
Thou wast the healer adored, Evoë!

Semele's offspring divine,
Giver of glorious wine,
Gladness and madness are thine, Evoë!

Come, then, our King in thy pride,
Come on thy panther astride,
Choose thee our fairest for bride, Evoë!

She whom thou wilt shall enfold
Thee with her tresses of gold,
Sounding thy pean of old, Evoë!

* Written for a proposed musical production of Shakespeare's play of Pericles, arranged by Mr. John Coleman.

Kiss her and lead her along,
While we thy votaries throng
Round with the mystical song, Evoë!

SONNET.

O SUMMER of the Saints, last yearning sigh
Of Earth fordone, full fraught with gentle peace!—
Smile of reposeful Nature, fain to cease
From labour and be locked in apathy,— Dreaming of summer roses, and the cry
Of fledglings, and the white lamb's innocent fleece,—
Yet drowsily, as she had won a lease
Of rest unblamed beneath a wintry sky,
The breath of winged winds is on my face,
Soft as a mother's touch; the golden Sun
Drinks Earth's slow incense-fumes, as slow I pace
On pearly sands, from Ocean's empire won,
By lapse of lulling waves that interlace
And part, then up with sparkling laughter run.

ART.

"WILD WEATHER."

THERE was certainly an unwonted bustle in the inn that morning. The bar loiterers showed a brisk and somewhat excited air; the landlord, one of the stoutest and best-tempered men in the world, had rolled up his sleeves a trifle higher than was usual at eleven o'clock. The old greyhound, ordinarily the only idle person allowed on the establishment, wandered to and fro restlessly, and poked his nose into one person's hand after another, as if to discover what was afloat. Even the young lady from London, who was chiefly notable for a crop of ginger curls and a dress-improver of the largest size, showed signs of animation. Doors blew open, windows rattled, bits of straw and seaweed flew cheerfully in at the swing-doors, sea, sky, and wind somehow had gone astray, and were poking their noses into the bar parlour, in imitation of the greyhound.

It was past eleven ere I had got my camp-stool, canvas, &c., packed up for the day's work, and was ready to start. It had been blowing hard all night from the south-west, and this was the morning of October 18th, when the high tide was foretold. It was strange how the wind, or the expected water, or some subtle combination of both, had affected the usually torpid inhabitants of Rye. A bold, almost buccaneering look, pervaded the people; the talk was all of the river, the sea, and the wind. The dwellers on the marsh had become for once dwellers by the sea, and were evidently proud of the fact.

To my amusement, I was looked upon with considerable respect, when it was found I was going down to the port, some two miles off, sketching. "You'll find it main rough down there," said the local carpenter, who was a bit of an artist in his way—at least so he fancied, for he had made the frame for an engraving of one of Gustave Doré's pictures—and the landlord pressed a glass of ginger brandy upon me before starting, as a sort of stirrup-cup, I thought, in case we should meet no more.

It was wild weather, certainly; the sky was a misty, thin blue, with thousands of small cumulus clouds drifting quickly onwards and upwards from the horizon. Every now and then towards the sea the wind tore a small space of the sky clear of the drifting rack, and disclosed a glistening extent of fleecy clouds, lying in long, close ranks against the blue, and looking as though they had never known or even heard of wind and storm. The old church and tumbled red roofs of the town showed clear and bright, with that brightness in which colour seems to be lost even more than in shadow. The noises of the shipyards, generally striking the visitor as the chief element of life in the town, were gathered up and swept into unison with the wind that rushed past them from the sea, and were only distinctly audible now and then in a lull. Within two or three feet of the old ferryhouse, the old ferryman looked down bewildered on a turbid, yellow current, which was substituted for the grey mud and quiet flow of the river in ordinary times, and said, half proudly, half sadly, as he ferried me across to the marsh, "There'll be three feet of water in my cottage, if the wind goes round to the north." I left him contemplating this prospect, which, by the way, was not realised, and set out along the sea-wall. Everything on the way spoke of the tide and the gale. The seagulls walking about quietly on the fields, and scarcely troubling to rise at one's approach; the cows and sheep lying down close to the shelter of the bank which separated the marsh and the river; the river itself spreading widely over its low banks, and lapping eagerly against the sea-wall, the submerged fences and gates, and the bare tops of the piles which marked the channel, alone showing above the water.

I must fail to describe, as I failed to realise distinctly, wherein lay the keen sense of excitement and pleasure which this scene conveyed. Whether it sprang from the contrast of the present appearance with the wonted desolate calm of the marsh and low-lying river, whether it was merely the bright sunshine mingling with the roar of the wind and the shrieks of the seagulls, or whether it was the invasion of the sea into its old territory—for long ago Rye rose above the waters instead of the land.

The scene, however, was worth looking at, even independent of any such feeling; and our countrymen who go to much expenditure of trouble and money to gaze upon the Roman Campagna, might find an easy substitute for many of its chief beauties, in their homely Sussex. Here, too, are softly moulded lines of field and heath, here are long sweeps of hills bounding a blue distance. Here, too, the colour shifts and changes momentarily with the drifting cloud-shadows, and flickering sunshine, and the eye can rove at pleasure over a plain as apparently boundless as the great Campagna sea. If Fairlight is not as high as Soracte, it, too, has a bold, precipitous outline, and a character of its own; and the simple tower of the church, which stands out so sharply on the crest of its down, might be a campanile, as far as strength and grace are concerned. There are no olive trees, and no aqueducts, and no tomb of a loving husband to a faithful wife; but there are old houses, whose beauty is twined with the doings of our own people; there is the Grey gateway, and the massive tower of Rye Church crowning the irregular houses, which seem to crowd round and look up to it, even as their inhabitants might do; and underneath the tower there are the black masts of the fishing-boats, pointing as with outstretched finger in the same direction. And for those who want more heroic architecture, and records of war rather than peace, is there not Camber Castle to be seen across the foaming water of the river? And, strangely enough, inside its green quadrangle is a circular tower, with a course of sculptured stone running around its rude masonry, which, if it stood alone on the Campagna, not one in a thousand folk would not guess to be Cecilia Metella's. And above all, is there not our old friend and safeguard, the sea, hinted at by that group of masts on the edge of the marsh, by the sand-hills which stretch out in long perspective from the port into the distance, and by the seagulls which fly shrieking above our heads? Something of the spirit of Kingsley comes over the scene, and shouts a glad defiance of the wild weather in the teeth of the spray and wind.

But there was no reaching the port that day, for the rising tide rushed feet above the little foot-bidge which led from the sea-wall towards the sea, and I was forced to content myself with the view of the flooded river and the town beyond. How it blew the palette in my face, and plastered "madder lake" on the nose and "cadmium" on the forehead; how it tore the canvas from my hand (no easel could have stood for a minute), and turned it face downwards on the rough, wiry grass; how it blew the medium out of its dipper, and spread it in a shower upon the middle of the picture; how I lost hat, handkerchief, and temper, need not be recorded, for these are all usual accidents of sketching in a gale; but the game was well worth its candle.

Not often in one's life does one get the chance to see one of Nature's best transformation scenes enacted in the very place and under the very circumstances which could most enhance its beauty, and for many a year the change of that quiet marsh into a seething mass of yellow foam, the way in which the wind roared, the sun shone, the seafowl shrieked, and the hungry water came rushing over fence and gate to within a foot of the crest of the sea-wall, will be worth remembering.

It seemed like coming back to another life, to return to the little inn, and find the landlord still serving his customers, the greyhound still prowling restlessly, and all folk talking unceasingly of the wild weather.

BOOKS.

THE POETS' BIRDS.*

THAT a book on the rich and unhackneyed theme of the treatment of birds by the poets should be very interesting, and, in its way, instructive also, is not to be wondered at; but this delightful volume has not only interest and instructiveness, but entertainment as well. Mr. Phil Robinson is, in the fullest sense of the word, a pleasant writer; he is a genuine humourist, and his humour is of the essentially English kind, reminding us of such choice spirits as Addison and Lamb rather than of the crowd of Transatlantic farceurs whose final cause seems to be the production of laughter. He has not, like them, any set humorous intent—has, indeed, no intent at all, save to interest his readers in things which have interested himself—but the fountain is within, and bubbles up because it cannot help itself, the stream wandering through his pages, like Wordsworth's river, at its "own sweet will." Then, too, Mr. Phil Robinson's books gain an additional charm from their tincture of old-fashioned scholarship,—the scholarship of the prescientific time, when protoplasm was unknown, but when speakers and writers quoted Horace as naturally as now-a-days they quote Tennyson, and when they wanted an illustration found one more readily in an ancient myth than in a modern instance. And yet, in spite of these caviare qualities, which are, it must be admitted, of a nature to repel "the general," Mr. Robinson's books may be heartily recommended even to that frivolous person the circulating-library reader; for they have the rich humanity which transforms the unknown writer into the known friend, the touch of nature that makes the whole world kin.

In many of his pages Mr. Phil Robinson holds a brief for his friends the birds, in an action against his other friends the poets, and though the suit is strictly amicable, the advocate feels free to indulge in much good-natured hard-hitting. He contends that the singers of the air have suffered many and grievous things at the hands of the singers of the earth; and though he loves the latter, neither his cause nor his conscience will suffer him to spare their manifold negligences and ignorances. Under one of these heads all the offences of the poets may be classed, and on both counts Mr. Phil Robinson makes out a terribly strong case against the helpless defendants. His first contention is that the birds, as an entire class, have been most unduly and unjustifiably neglected. While more than three thousand different birds are known to science, the author's researches enable him to declare that,— "Poetry takes ken of a bare hundred, and of even these a third are so casually mentioned that, virtually, they are useless to the text, and, so far as they contribute any special significance, force, or beauty, almost any other birds might have taken their places. The treasures of the tropics are absolutely ignored, and, in fact, Asia, Africa, and America might not exist, for all the advantage their bird-wealth has been to British poets; while Europe, except where its species are British species also, is similarly neglected. Taking foreign birds, we find only six—the ostrich, bird of paradise, pelican, flamingo, ibis, and vulture—and even these are only utilised to perpetuate half a dozen of those 'pseudodoxia' which Sir Thomas Browne tried to demolish two centuries ago. The ostrich is still, with the poets, 'the silliest of the feathered kind, and formed of God without a parent's mind'; the bird of paradise, not having recovered its legs yet, sleeps on the wing, and hatches its eggs in mid-air; the ibis still brandishes its 'spiral neck at snakes'; the pelican goes on 'opening to her young her tender breast'; and the vulture continues to 'spring from the cliff upon the passing dove.'"

The latter-named offences, particularly the libels upon the ostrich and the vulture, seem to be amply proved, and are certainly highly reprehensible, but we think that to the first portion of the indictment a fairly adequate answer might be made by the poets. Birds naturally appear most frequently in poetry which deals with landscape, and poets of nature, like Thomson, Wordsworth, and Tennyson, who take their stand on English ground can hardly be expected to people our northern woods with the brilliant-plumaged birds of the tropics, upon which Mr. Phil Robinson in a succeeding paragraph expatiates so appreciatively. It must also be remembered that the images of poetry must be drawn from objects with which readers of poetry have some sort of acquaintance, and what, to most of us, is the "magnificent hornbill," the "astonishing trogon," or the "glittering lory," but a name, and nothing more?

If, however, the poets at this stage scornfully cry, "Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung," they are too hasty in their self-congratulations; for Mr. Phil Robinson speedily attacks them in a more vulnerable spot. He seems to admit a certain weakness in his first arraignment, when he says "we can hardly quarrel with a poet for not writing about birds which he did not know of. But," he continues, "we can quarrel with him for not knowing about the birds which he did write of. And it is this second ignorance, therefore, this inner coil, that I complain of, and resent. For the larger offence, the neglect of the whole world's ornithology, we can find palliation, or, at any rate, we can condone it with regret. But for the smaller, more concentrated neglect, I feel but little tenderness. The poets have wasted two thousand exotic birds,—let that pass. But I feel it a duty to notice, in some detail, their unfair treatment of their seventy-six 'British species.'" Before we have read more than a page or two of Mr. Phil Robinson's "detail," we feel that justice to the birds compels us to give up the poets to his just vengeance. Does he not remind us that while the eagle is treated with due handsomeness, the hawk, which is but a smaller eagle, is always "ravening," or "gorged," or "bloody," and that thus, "what is grand in eagles is wicked in hawks"? Is it not proved only too conclusively that the bittern, crow, goose, jackdaw, magpie, ostrich, owl, and raven have been persistently libelled by the poets, who have evidently been actuated either by perverse malice, or misled by an ignorant prejudice almost equally culpable? Have not the poets shown their ignorance of the feathered tribes by all sorts of ludicrous errors, by speaking of the singing nightingale as "she," by confounding the solitary crow with the gregarious rook, by accusing the eagle of feeding upon human corpses, by making the cruel wind "bear away" the turtle dove's nest, an absolutely impossible feat, seeing that the nest in question is but a number of twigs loosely laid together, or, as Mr. Robinson puts it, "a mere scattering of 'spillikins' "? All these and many more incriminating questions have to be answered sadly in the affirmative, and the poets must needs hang their heads in shame. Still, though their faults are grievous, Mr. Robinson's four hundred pages of quotations, many of them perfect in knowledge as well as in affectionate appreciation, show how admirably they have striven to atone for their wrong, and we may forgive them their sins against the birds for the best of all reasons, that they have loved much.

Mr. Robinson's list of poets, though long, is not satisfactory. It includes a good many obscure, sixth-rate versifiers, and excludes greater poets who have really made the birds their debtors. A more discriminating choice would have taken the edge off some of his too sweeping accusations, and would have adorned his pages with some new gems. Mr. Robinson complains, for example, that poets, with one or two exceptions, have made no use of the coot or corncrake, but when dealing with the former omits Mr. Tennyson's "Brook" from his sources of quotation, and is evidently ignorant of Mr. Edward Dowden's exquisite poem on the latter bird. Mr. Tennyson is indeed entirely ignored, though Mr. Robinson distinctly exculpates him from his general accusations; and we search in vain for the curlews heard by the disconsolate lover in "Locksley Hall," for the two owl poems, or for that fine bird passage in "The Gardener's Daughter," where we read how,—

"From the woods
Came voices of the well-contented doves.
The lark could scarce get out its notes for joy,
But shook his song together as he near'd
The cuckoo told his name to all the hills;
The mellow ouzel fluted in the elm;
The redcap whistled; and the nightingale
Sang loud, as though he were the bird of day."

We are told that sea-birds have been slighted, and this is true; but why magnify the slight by omitting Mrs. Browning's beautiful and pathetic "Seamew," or the noble sonnet by Robert Stephen Hawker, which begins, "Our bark is on the waters;" and why, when Mr. Swinburne's musical and plaintive "Itylus" has been twenty years before the world, does Mr. Robinson, in his note upon the swallow, say, without any reserve, that the poets "seem to think that Pandion had only one daughter, and to forget that Progne was Philomela's sister?" In making his skylark quotations, Mr. Robinson has curiously forgotten Hogg's "Bird of the wilderness, blithesome and cumbersome," which stands second only to Shelley's great lyric, and he has found room for many things a score of which one would gladly give for such a poem as Mrs. Webster's rapturous "Skylark's Song." He has passed by the ouzel singing "under the crag," in Charles Kingsley's "Clear and Cool;" he has missed a magnificent passage about the swan in Mrs. Hamilton King's noble poem, "The Disciples;" and he has robbed his readers of Mr. Browning's perfect and unapproached description of a thrush's song:—

"That's the wise thrush; he sings each song twice over,
Lest you should think he never could recapture
The first fine careless rapture."

But we will pick no more holes. It is easier to find fault with such a book than it is to write it; and by writing it, Mr. Phil Robinson has placed us and the whole reading world distinctly in his debt. It is pre-eminently an out-of-doors book, a volume for the garden or the glade; but whether read indoors or out, it will be found delightful.

JAPANESE CELEBRITIES.*

THIS book exemplifies in a striking and not altogether unamusing manner the persistent ill-will with which American writers regard English external policy, wherever confronted with that of their own Government outside of the limits of Europe. In Japan this antagonism has displayed itself from time to time in a form which one would be tempted to call virulent, were it not that it has confined itself to "prave 'orts," rather than sought expression in overt act. In the Far East, England and the United States have, in practice, pursued an almost identical policy; but the Washington Foreign Office has exhibited side by side with its actual policy one of sentimental concession, which is kept carefully within the bounds of theory, while it serves as a text for the complacent contrast of American generosity and highmindedness with British rapacity and trickery. Whether any one was ever deceived by this show is doubtful; it is quite certain that no one is likely to be deceived by it now, and Mr. Lanman's strictures upon British diplomacy in Japan are, therefore, slightly anachronismal.

The author, who is favourably known in this country as the writer of some charming sketches of American scenery, somewhat in the manner of Thoreau, was secretary to Daniel Webster when the mission of Commodore Perry was determined upon, and afterwards became attached to, or, as he himself prefers to express it, identified with, the Japanese Legation at Washington. The present volume consists of some sixty brief biographies of contemporary "men of mark" in Japan, preceded by a survey of the revolutionary movement of 1868, and followed by a short history of Japan, contributed by the author to Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia, together with a description of Corea and of some outlying dependencies of the empire. In an appendix, an account is added of the origin of the expedition of Commodore Perry, which Americans possibly may find interesting; and a bibliography of Japan, which is, perhaps, the most useful portion of the book. Mr. Lanman's theory that the Revolution of 1868 was in great measure the result of the internal decay of the Shōgunate, hastened by the foreign demand for the opening of the port of Hiogo, will not stand examination. For nearly three centuries Japan enjoyed unbroken peace under the rule of the Tokugawa House, and when the treaties of 1858 were signed no symptoms were discernible of any wane of its power. From the days of Yoritomo a certain jealousy had existed between the western and southern clans, who resented, and the northern and eastern clans, who supported, the supremacy of the descendants of Iyeyasu. The Kiyoto Court leaned now to one, now to the other faction, as the intrigues of the Kugéor Court nobles in favour of or adverse to Yedo gained the upper hand. When Commodore Perry appeared in 1853 and 1854, the Shōgun party at Kiyoto were not supreme. The Yedo Cabinet soon recognised the impossibility of keeping up the policy of isolation, and no doubt were at heart desirous of reversing the decree of 1639,—a desire participated in by many of the best minds in the country. But the advisers of the Shōgun were unable to impart their convictions to the western Daimios and Kugés, who kept watch and ward over the palladium of Government at Kiyoto. Hence the Shōgun was driven to a variety of shifty devices to conciliate the foreigner on the one hand, and postpone the execution of the decrees issued by the Mikado for his expulsion on the other. The struggle between the rival parties became embittered by the envy which was aroused at Kiyoto by the rapid development of the wealth and prestige of the Yedo Court through foreign intercourse, and in January, 1868, the clans of Tosa and Satsuma, who, with those of Choshu and Hizen, had most vehemently opposed the Shōgun's policy, possessed themselves by a dexterous intrigue of the guardianship of the Mikado's person. From that moment they had the country with them, and the immense advantage of the countenance of the foreign representatives, who had long been disgusted with the duplicity of the Shōgun's advisers—for which the circumstances in which the latter found themselves were largely responsible—and were desirous of negotiating directly with the Mikado, whose real position they had by this time become acquainted with. The hollow-ness of the Jō-i ("Down with the Barbarians!") cry was shown by the readiness with which the successful faction took up the foreign policy of their predecessors, and pursued it with a liberality limited only by the supposed necessity of keeping up the restrictions imposed by the treaties, as something to have in hand for concession in exchange for the abandonment of extra-territoriality.

Since 1868, the beginning of the period Meiji, or Era of Enlightened Rule, the Japanese Government has wandered over the Western world in search of a Constitution. Much has been done in the way of demolition, but little in the way of construction, and we fear that in Japan, as elsewhere, it is not yet the case that "the wicked are inevitably punished according to law, and the just and good are rewarded by the State," as Mr. Lanman, in his enthusiasm, says they are in that happy country. By a recent decree a Parliament is promised in 1891, for the purpose of effecting the gradual establishment of a constitutional form of government. It is said that the German Empire is the model to which Japanese statesmen are now turning, and that a sort of limited monarchy is contemplated, to be upheld by a new aristocracy. If such be the project, it must fail; an aristocracy cannot be improvised, and the old aristocracy of the country has been too utterly destroyed by its own retainers to be capable of revival. Among contemporaneous Japanese statesmen, only two, Sanjō and Iwakura, are of the old Court nobility; and of the former Daimios, or territorial nobles, not one occupies a prominent place in the politics of the day. On the morrow, almost, of the accomplishment of the Revolution, the very heads even of the four clans who brought it about sank into an obscurity from which they have never emerged. Mr. Lanman does not usually give the social rank of the subjects of his biographies, but it may be stated that most of them issued from second or third-rate Samurai families of the four clans we have named. Among the political notabilities, Ōkubo, a Satsuma man, assassinated in 1878, displayed constructive ability of a very high order, and is entitled to be ranked as the ablest statesman Japan has produced since the days of Iyeyasu. He was a man of great learning and singularly fine character. As a councillor of the Regent of Satsuma in 1868, he took a prominent part in the restoration of the Mikado, and became one of the leading spirits of the new Government. To his wise and penetrating foresight Japan owes her escape from Continental complications through a Korean war in 1873, but the crowning acts of his career, curiously enough not mentioned by Mr. Lanman, were the settlement of the great Samurai question, which was a constant menace to the stability of the new system, by the capitalisation of their pensions, and the suppression of the revolt that measure brought about in his native province in 1877. The most interesting figure, however, in Mr. Lanman's gallery is that of Fukuzawa, who under the Shōgunate visited Europe and America, and made himself acquainted with the civilisation and some of the principal languages of Europe. On his return he established himself as a teacher, devoting himself specially to the popularisation of Western knowledge. After the Restoration he took high rank as a lecturer and publicist, but has always shown too independent a spirit for office. He is an ardent exponent of the views of the "Young Japan" party, but freely criticises the defects of his countrymen and the shortcomings of Japanese society. Much, however, as he admires Western civilisation, he cannot find words strong enough to express his detestation of European policy in Japan. Mr. Lanman quotes him with some complacency at considerable length on this head, and it is interesting, and indeed instructive, to read what a well-educated, intelligent, and, on the whole, liberal-minded Japanese has to say on such a subject, even if we are unable to accept either his facts or his arguments. The Japanese know more about foreign countries, we are told, than foreigners do about Japan. Few foreigners associate with Japanese, read Japanese books, or study the national life. Hence the rest can only have "a crotchety idea" of Japan and its people. "At this ignorance," says Fukuzawa, "I feel aggrieved more than at Japanese ignorance of foreign countries." There is some justice in the complaint, which will not be lessened should Fukuzawa light upon the present volume, which is pretty plentifully bestrewn with errors, due chiefly to the kind of ignorance he laments. It is, however, pleasantly written, and, making due allowance for the eulogistic strain that runs through its pages, may be profitably read by such as are qualified to separate the chaff of panegyric from the wheat of history.

A BURGLARY.*

THIS is a very fresh and pleasant story, ingenious in its construction, and, with one great exception, effective in its execution. The exception is the evil character of the book on which the story hinges, and which, had it been painted with the same vivacity as the simpler and more every-day characters, would have made this tale not merely ingenious and fresh, but one of great mark and power. Mr. Sylvester, however, is faintly drawn. We suspect that Miss Dillwyn, though she has a lively imagination, has hardly imagination enough to realise to herself what either the exterior aspect or the interior life of a man at war with society, while wearing the mask of peace, would really be. Of course, the critic who makes this remark is well aware that it would be quite out of his power to supply the deficiency. It is not as in any sense taking a position superior to that of the novelist, but only as noting where it fails to satisfy the expectations of the reader, that we pick out the faintness of Mr. Sylvester's character as the chief fault of this ingenious story. But it seems clear that a life such as his, lived under a mask, and with the full knowledge that no one knew him for what he was, and that if the world around him did but know him for what he was, he would be driven out of it with fear and terror, must have been lived at very high pressure; while Miss Dillwyn never, till the very close, gives us the impression that Mr. Sylvester's life was lived at high pressure at all, or was other than one of easy-going, pleasurable interest. Sylvester is a little cynical, a little inscrutable, a little scornful, and that is all that there is in his demeanour to mark him off from the rest of the world. A man really at war with society, though choosing to adopt the mask of peace, a man full of scorn for every assumption on which ordinary conversation is based, and knowing himself to be a beast of prey, as it were, in disguise, could hardly have enjoyed the social intercourse which Sylvester is supposed to have enjoyed, or have entered into the general amusements in which he seems to have taken his full share, without giving a much stronger impression than he gives us, of the life of constant reserve which he was living. When a man is paying back kindness with plunder, and friendliness with contempt, and does not wish this to be known, there must be a struggle within, and if no reflection of that struggle without, still the sign of some inward state which has none of the spontaneity of ordinary life. Miss Dillwyn gave us no clear impression of this. Sylvester might, for anything we see, be a mere speculative cynic, whose theory of human nature was contemptuous, though his life was not in any way based on that contempt. The consequence is that this important figure makes no powerful impression on us, as such a figure certainly ought to do, and thus the central conception on which the whole story turns is blurred and faint. Take, as an illustration of what we mean, the conversation between Sylvester and Imogen after the afternoon service, as to the hymn which had been sung. That conversation represents rather the intellectual conceit of a man who enjoyed looking down on the ordinary faith of Christians, than the conflict of mind existing in a conscious hypocrite, anxious on the one hand to make a favourable impression on a fresh young girl's nature, and tormented on the other hand by his knowledge of the loathing and dread in which she would hold him, if she knew more.

That is an important criticism, but it is the only unfavourable criticism we have to pass on the story. The plot seems to us very fresh and very clever, and by no means an impossible one. The two heroines, as we may call Imogen Rhys and Ethel Carton, are sketched with a great deal of skill and truthfulness, and there is a buoyancy about the whole book, and especially about the out-of-doors life it contains, which is very unhackneyed and refreshing, after the ordinary drawing-room novel. Ethel's indolent sweetness, benevolence, and high principle are sketched with great delicacy; and Imogen's high spirits, fresh enthusiasm, and awkward attempts to make herself useful in life present a very true and pretty picture. Nor could the sensational incidents of the story be much better managed than they are. The victory of Sir Charles Dover, armed with a lady's shawl, over the mad dog is very spirited, and just the event to make an impression on Imogen's previously untouched heart; while the fire at the Croesus Hoggs' is narrated with great power,—the incident of the thrusting-back of the girl in the flaming ball-dress into the fire is grim enough in its realism,—though we must say that the young ladies and their friends get over the horrors of the evening with extraordinary speed and completeness.

* A Burglary; or, Unconscious Influence. By E. A. Dillwyn, Author of "The Rebecca Rioter," &c. 3 vols. London: Tinsley Brothers.

Miss Dillwyn has a good deal of humour, without which it is hardly possible to make a good novel. We must specially compliment her on the closing half-page in which Imogen accepts the young gentleman whom she had previously refused. Her reply is almost as happy as one of Miss Austen's best touches, and closes a very ingenious and agreeable story with a touch of gentle banter that pleasantly relieves the inevitable sentiment.

THERE is only one thing about this book that is quite satisfactory; it consists of a single volume of modest dimensions. Professor Meiklejohn, who describes himself, not as its author, but as its editor, warns his readers in his preface that, "as in the lives of most men who have given themselves to thought and study, there were in the life of Dr. Hodgson very few events." We should have said that Dr. Hodgson's life was one of activity, rather than of thought. But, letting that pass, why should Professor Meiklejohn, or whoever is really responsible for this book, make such a mystery of the "few events" that actually took place in the life that is here recorded? We are informed that "from both sides of his house" Hodgson "inherited a powerful intellect, extreme sensitiveness of temperament, and almost volcanic passions." He styled his mother a second Mrs. Poyser, and described his father as "a man of a most powerful intellect, and passions of tremendous energy and depth." Yet we are told nothing of the life of these parents; their Christian names, the very occupation of the father, are not given. Then there seems to have been an ogress of a half-sister, who tortured Hodgson in his earliest days; might we not have had some information as to her life after her half-brother escaped from her influence? Dr. Hodgson resembled George Combe in some respects, and was, to a certain extent, the propagator of Combe's doctrines on education. Would that his biographer had imported into his work a little of the minuteness of Combe, who tells us that "his father was George Comb, brewer; and his mother, Marion Newton, daughter of Abram Newton, of Curriehill;" that his father was "six feet two inches in stature, and proportionally strongly formed in the trunk and limbs;" and that his mother was "a short, well-formed woman, with a highly nervous and bilious temperament, a dark, fine skin, dark hair, and fine, dark eyes, and an energetic step!" The years that intervene between a man's leaving college and his settling down to the business of life are generally reckoned as of the highest importance; during these his moral nature, as a rule, is being formed. What would Trollope's Autobiography or Carlyle's Reminiscences be without the "early struggles" recorded in each, dissimilar as these are? But all we are told of this period in Hodgson's life is this:—"For a few years after leaving college, young Hodgson was chiefly engaged in lecturing, education, and phrenology; and he was for a few months at work on a newspaper, as editor. His lecturing and editing were, however, confined chiefly to the county of Fife, where he made many useful and valuable friendships, which he retained throughout his life." If we know every detail of Carlyle's Kirkcaldy schoolmastering, why should we not be given some definite information about Hodgson's editing, "confined chiefly to the county of Fife," the more especially as we are subsequently informed that he was "a born journalist," and had special aptitudes for what some of us will be surprised to hear is "that most seductive of professions."

Dr. Hodgson, it may be presumed, had his money difficulties and his love-affairs early in life. His attachment for his younger brother, Thomas, who was drowned while quite young, was warm and deep. He says in one of his letters (p. 33), "I have loved as deeply as I think it was possible to do, and more deeply than I can do again," and "when I had not a shilling certain in the world, I was careless of money and extravagant." The most enjoyable, because most naïve, thing in the whole biography is an extract from Hodgson's diary when he was sixteen:—"I never saw her look so beautiful. Had a very excellent sermon. . . . Went to church in the afternoon. The ladies were not there. Had a most wretched sermon." We confess to being rather sorry to find that when Hodgson approaches his nineteenth year, "the ecstasy of intellectual insight and appreciation rises up in strong morning light," in this fashion:—"Mr. S— gave a most magnificent lecture on 'The Importance of Intellectual Culture.' The admiration I felt at different parts was so intense that the tears started from my eyes. My delight was inexpressible. I sat on the left of Miss S—. I forgot her presence in the depth of my attention." But Dr. Hodgson's biographer may think that what he terms his "passing love-fits," and early history generally, are not worth giving particulars of. Why, then, does he lift the veil from the sober loves of his hero at forty-seven? Why print from private letters addressed to the lady who became his second wife such Grandisonian sentiments, oddly though mildly dashed with heterodoxy, as these?—

"I am sure that your experience coincides with mine, and that we grow dearer to each other the more and the longer we are together. So may it ever be, my darling, as years go on; and thus old age will have only one terror for us—the fear of an approaching separation. Even that thought, when it does cross our minds, will but make us cling more closely and fondly to each other, so as, at once, to make the most and the best of what time may be granted to us in the order of Providence, and to give the least possible cause for self-reproach to the one whose fate it may be to survive the other. Neither, my beloved, shall we fail to look forward to a reunion hereafter, if not with the certainty of conviction, at least with the fond yearnings of hope, and full faith in the unspeakable goodness of God, who has so strangely, and yet so naturally, united us in love so tender, so blissful, and (I fear not to say) so enduring. Thoughts so solemn will purify and hallow, not mar or sadden, our union. If we do not much frequent churches, we must try to make our house a church, not for weekly ceremonials, but for daily offerings of good deeds and high thoughts, and love which, ever springing in our own hearts, shall run over on all around, near and far."

We have in this book, in short, the portrait of Dr. Hodgson not as a man, living, loving, struggling, and it may even be blundering and sinning, but as one of Providence's automata, getting through an enormous amount of work in the shape of teaching, talking, lecturing, organising, platforming, pamphleteering, and letter-writing. There may have been another Dr. Hodgson than this; some who may have met him in society or have seen him in his pleasant northern retreat of Bonaly may be certain that there was. Yet Professor Meiklejohn, though he testifies to Dr. Hodgson's brilliancy—he was unquestionably a good talker, of a school rapidly dying out—his geniality, and the like, can hardly be said to let us see this other side of his character. A few puns, some readable letters about his travels, and a rather laboured account of a students' breakfast at Bonaly, by one who attended his lectures as Professor of Economic Science in Edinburgh, are practically all the materials we have here given on which to form a judgment as to the inner life of a man who cannot have been absolutely devoted to essentially objective activities. This book is, indeed, a lengthy notice of the kind that appears in biographical dictionaries, padded out with extracts from letters. We learn that Professor Hodgson was born in Edinburgh in 1815, and died in Brussels in 1880; that after being educated in his native city, he did some editing and lecturing in Fife-shire; that he filled in succession the posts of Secretary and Principal of the Liverpool Educational Institute; Principal of the Chorlton High School, Manchester; Assistant-Commissioner in Primary Education; Examiner in Political Economy in the University of London, and finally, Professor of Political Economy and Commercial Law in the University of Edinburgh. For the rest, he was an intense lover of Mr. Gladstone (though he does not seem to have understood Mr. Bright), and an equally intense hater of Lord Beaconsfield. Professor Meiklejohn might, indeed, have refrained from reproducing so many of the epithets that Dr. Hodgson hurled at that deceased statesman. Many of us had to do a good deal of heavy firing, in the days that preceded the fall of the late Conservative Government. But does it serve any good purpose to pick up and preserve the bullets of hot controversy? Dr. Hodgson was, according to his lights, a friend of religious toleration, and his resignation in 1867 of his seat on the Council of University College, on account of the treatment accorded to Dr. Martineau in connection with the vacant Chair of Logic, is not yet forgotten. It is not very easy to say what theological opinions he held before his death. He had been driven from the traditional Calvinism of his country by his early family experiences—"the worst features of my character are due to my never having known as others do the feelings which make home and the family"—and he was critical and almost bitter towards it to the last. He wrote to Dr. Martineau in 1853 that his views most closely agreed with those of the Unitarian body, but that he had been "chilled and repelled by the majority of the Unitarians whom he knew." In his later years he gave utterance to opinions that seemed to to many savour of the popular agnosticism of the day; yet his family prayers, which are given as an appendix to this volume, are essentially Theistic.

Dr. Hodgson was, above all things, an educationist, though in the largest and most liberal sense. Professor Meiklejohn evidently consider him a far-seeing politician and a profound economist as well; but we doubt this very much. He was an omnivorous reader, indeed, and took an intense interest in the political questions and economical problems of his day; he was, in fact, intense, imitative, and industrious, rather than sagacious or original. There is no evidence that he was anything more than a clear expositor of the economy in vogue, when he became examiner in and ultimately Professor of that subject. Professor Meiklejohn sees a proof of his political sagacity in his predicting the fall of the Second Empire; but then he had been in Paris at the time of the coup d'état, and had seen the rottenness of the foundations of the Imperial edifice. He was all at sea about the issues of the Civil War in America; he calculated that Mr. Gladstone would in 1874 come back from the General Election with a reduced majority; and he was doubtful about the result of the Midlothian candidature in 1880. Into education and everything connected with it, however, Hodgson threw his whole heart, and soul, and strength, and mind. It may be doubted if any work in the way of organising secondary and higher education was ever better done than that which was accomplished by him in Manchester and Liverpool. It is to his exertions mainly, his ceaseless activity, and his unflagging enthusiasm, that Scotland possesses even the two Chairs of education it now has. His letters, indeed, show him to have looked at almost everybody he came across from the educational point of view. On his travels on the Continent, he meets with a self-indulgent young blockhead; he does not rest till he traces the unsatisfactory condition of the poor boy to the bad discipline of a private school in Surrey. Although frugal almost to penuriousness, he was generous in a variety of ways, and assisted many struggling persons. Yet when a lady applied to him for help, whose father, although connected with an Insurance Company, had not insured his life, he must, before giving her what she needs, comment on the phenomenon in this style,—“Pardon me, if I say that my already strong conviction is greatly strengthened that our systems of teaching and training at home and at school must be radically defective, in failing to prevent, in not even trying to prevent, the recurrence of such a state of things.” He was didactic, even at the expense of taste. Professor Meiklejohn's account of Dr. Hodgson's work at Manchester is worth quoting, as giving us the man in his true element:—

“His attention to the smallest details is something wonderful. He suggests to one teacher the propriety of showing his pupils how to fold and address letters properly; explains to another how geography may be made interesting; invents and prescribes sets of exercises for many of the classes; shows how difficult lines from Milton's Paradise Lost may be best explained; teaches the French master how to teach French; cuts down the ‘theory’ of a singing-master, and induces him to give his class more practice in the art itself; gives valuable lessons in discipline to masters who are pedantic, lifeless, vexatious, irritable, or too woodenly strict; shows another how to invent and put questions; gives a lesson in the art of reading; maps out a Latin sentence; shows how drill in the accidence may be best conducted; introduces easy and workable pens; is equal to the highest and careful of the very lowest element. Mens agitat molem, totoque infunditur orbi. Nay, he spends even his holidays in studying the profession of teaching and in picking up plans and ideas in other schools. He visits the High Schools of the larger towns of Scotland; and, by careful inspection and diligent questioning, learns what to aim at, to follow, or to avoid. Everywhere he combines in a quite unequalled degree the most orderly business habits with the constant demand that thinking shall permeate every part of the school-work; he makes himself acquainted with each pupil; and takes a real interest in the progress of each member of a school of nearly seventeen hundred.”

Hodgson was an incessant letter-writer; indeed, his warmest admirers must have wished he had written less, and brooded, or even mooned, a little more. In the course of a life full of varied activity, he must have seen many leading men of his time. Yet in this volume there is disappointingly little of a quotable character about his contemporaries. He dismisses Lord Shaftesbury (when Lord Ashley) as a “dandified, fiddle-faddle humanitarian.” He finds Carlyle an “unsatisfactory man,” while he is favourably impressed by Leigh Hunt. His account of Douglas Jerrold is perhaps the most interesting, and it certainly is the most curious, of his London jottings:—

“Douglas Jerrold's house is the further part of a double cottage, with gardens before and behind. It stands on rather a lonely way on Putney Common, but it is a pleasant little place. I sent in my card and Clarke's letter, and in a minute or two out came a little, round-shouldered, sharp-faced man, who offered his hand, and said he was glad to see me, and asked me to come in. I went with him into his library, a pretty little room about the size of mine; one side is lined with book-shelves, with a very nice collection of books; two windows look out upon the common, and over the chimney-piece hangs a portrait of himself, not very like. I told him that I knew of his arrival from Mr. Dickens, whom I had met the day before at the exhibition in Westminster Hall. He said he was going to see it this very day. I immediately proposed that we should go together, and to this he at last assented. So he went into the other room to put on his walking dress, and allowed me a few minutes to glance over the titles of the books. On his return, he looked much improved in appearance. Before we set out, he gave me a copy of his ‘Time Works Wonders,’ and I gave him a copy of our last report. As we walked along to the boat, we talked of the death of Hood and Laman Blanchard. The latter was Jerrold's most intimate friend, and they were to have met at two p.m. that very day when the dreadful suicide was committed. As we passed through the village of Putney, an outrider passed us in scarlet or crimson livery and then another. We stood and saw the Queen pass in a char-à-banc, containing twelve people. Prince Albert sat in the second row and the Queen in the first. My eye was distracted among so many persons, and not knowing which was the Queen, I cannot say that I saw her. The impulse to raise my hat was strong, but as D. J. did not, I too refrained. I was unwilling to be deficient in any usual or proper mark of respect to established authority, though, as you know, I am a pretty staunch republican in sentiment. At the same time, I think that neither has the season come for agitating the question with success, nor would it do any great good at present to destroy the Monarchy. We want many other reforms first; so long as a people are contented under a monarchy, so long is it unfit for a republic. The Queen was naturally the subject of our conversation. D. J. told me she had turned ‘Punch’ out of the Palace, though at first she liked it very well; that she is extremely indifferent to the claims of literary men; that she would not go to see the Belgian Company at Covent Garden, on account of the Anti-Corn Law League's connection with that house, and that they were consequently removed to Drury Lane, where she went to see them the very first night; that she would not go to the theatre to see his play, though she went the very first night after its performance was discontinued.”

AN IRISH NOVEL.*

THE novel before us is an Irish story; its title is taken from a line in a poem by the Irish poet, Denis Florence McCarthy, whose sweet singing ceased but a little while ago; it is an open secret that its writer is a young Irish lady, and the book is “racy of the soil.” It is hardly hazardous to guess that the writer's experience is limited to her own country; but it is plain that there she has studied men, women, and things, with quick intelligence, keen appreciation, and the ready sympathy that gives the last vivifying touch to the characters portrayed and the scenes depicted, and which is absent from even the very best “foreign” handling of things Irish.

The peculiar wit there is in certain Irish sayings and stories—it is very often of a kind that is beyond laughter—the peculiar, piercing, minor wail there is in certain Irish music, the sunny gleams and the sudden glooms there are in certain Irish natures—Carleton has put them into books, and Dion Boucicault has put them on the stage—are all things that perhaps it takes Irish people themselves to feel “in their bones,” as Dickens's Mr. Morfin felt the violoncello, but which even those who, like Mr. Irving, “can't help being English,” perceive, and recognise with pleasure. So it is with the peculiar Irish charm that pervades this book; it may be only to be felt in its fullness by dwellers in “Sloway” (if we mistake not, the River Liffey “right through that city flows”), to whom its types of character, its modes of thought, and its ways of speech are familiar; yet it will not be lost upon the general reader.

The book is altogether interesting, not only on account of its merit, which is considerable, and its unusualness, which is striking, but because it is so strangely fresh, and, so to speak, confiding. It is as untrained, unkempt, and luxuriant as the vegetation in those Irish hedges which are never subjected to shears, and on which English eyes, a little tired of our trim tidiness, are apt to rest with refreshment; and it combines, in an odd, attractive manner, very close, even shrewd, appreciations of things within the author's actual knowledge—clear, practical remarks, and brief characteristic indications that distinctly present the person or the situation to the reader—with very wide-of-the-mark shots at things outside that knowledge. The story has been written with all the writer's heart; there are youthful faith and energy in it, and these are pleasant things, even when they gambol a little too much, at a time when the youngest among our female novelists are the most cynical and the least edifying. This is a girls' novel, and there is patriotism and duty, gratitude, and love in it; a heroine who is as individual and as independent as any of Mr. Henry James's analytical, young American females, but worth a score of them by reason of her wholesomeness, her godliness, and her contentment; a hero who is a good fellow, full of talent and honesty of purpose (the author ought not to have given him the silly pet name "Boy"); and a villain quite manifestly concocted, and not a bit like a real, live villain of the class he is intended to represent. Every reader of these remarks who shall proceed to consult the story will know why we hold the unlikeliness of Mr. Mitford, considering the form his wickedness takes, to be in reality, though a technical fault, part of the charm of the book. Mr. Mitford has been read up, not noted down, and we have had many examples of him before, even to that trick of your true villain, the assiduous paring of his nails in the presence of his victims. This has always been a habit of ladies' villains; but we believe the experience of mankind is that although the virtuous and the villainous alike pare their nails, both classes perform that operation in their dressing-rooms exclusively.

The story is interesting and original, and the same may be said of the characters who work it out; but the author has not known exactly how to manage her plot, and her personages have been rather too many for her. They hustle each other occasionally, and the smaller of them usurp too much place. She is so honestly, so eagerly anxious to give them all fair-play and expression, to tell out all that is in her fancy, that she abounds too much, and gives disquisition its head too liberally and too often. She says nothing—whether it be about Pallas College, the News office, its editor, its staff, its jolly young reporters, the popular M.P.'s, the local politics, and the social features of Sloway—that is not well said and worth reading in itself; but she has not sufficient command of literary method to subordinate all these things to the progress of her story, and therefore she does not give her plot fair-play; it is much more dramatic than she permits it to appear.

Is it an impertinence to refer to certain modes of expression in use in a capital city as provincialisms? If so, we beg pardon in advance, but do not know what else to call such phrases as, "It was Boy took Aileen in to supper, and the girl was silent in wonder if ever she wrote a novel how she would begin a description of the spectacle before her." These colloquialisms are not the slips of ignorance; they should be discarded as provincialisms. Again, we are told that Mr. Mitford, the villain, was thought, "by the opposite sex," to be "a great beauty," and that "about his eyes there roved a disagreeable symptom of a smile." Even if Sloway says "symptom" where the Sassenach would say "indication," that can hardly justify a symptom in "roving." And why does the author use the word "scapegoat," in the sense of "scapegrace"? This would be explicable if she put the expression into the mouth of a peasant, but she makes Mr. Mitford employ it.

These are, however, but trivial faults, and we point them out because blemishes of this kind are easily avoided, while they may obscure real merits of this novel from the eyes of casual observers. There is one portion of this work to which we can give admiration without stint, and commendation without reserve. It is never fair to a novelist to reveal his plot, and therefore we can only say that the circumstances under which the author presents us with the prison scenes of her story are managed with great force and ingenuity; but we may, without prejudice, dwell upon those prison scenes. Nothing could be more true, touching, beautiful, or terrible than the picture of the condemned man and his dying wife. It has the strong simplicity of Mr. Trollope's Mademoiselle of Ballycloran; but far beyond that, it has a piercing pathos and fine delicacy of touch which set this new writer apart. The young husband in the prison, the young wife in the retreat for the "Morituri," each preparing for the appointed hour when the guiltless one shall "go to God," and the tortured survivor shall be released from the horror of "Tom, hanged!" the anguish of the spectators of both scenes, and yet the fine and pious discharge of their duty by all concerned; the hurry, the suspense, the wild excitement of the discovery that undoes the wrong; the yearning, but patient, question of the wife, when her husband is set free, "And must I die now?"—of all this the most successful novelist who ever charmed the public might well be proud. In these chapters the writer of Thy Name is Truth gives us the true measure of her ability, and it affords us sincere gratification to record the accession of one whose aim is both true and lofty to the ranks of our lady novelists.

MR. BEARD ON THE REFORMATION.*

"THE Reformation, in the view which I shall take of it," says Mr. Beard, in his introductory lecture, "was not, primarily, a theological, a religious, an ecclesiastical movement at all." Even in view of the qualifying clause, "in the view that I shall take of it," we cannot but think that this statement is far too sweeping. We readily allow the force of all the considerations which Mr. Beard alleges. That the Reforming movement of the sixteenth century, which mastered the greater part of Tentonic Europe, and struggled hard for the victory in one at least of the Latin nations, was not an isolated fact, that the revival of letters in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries had much to do in producing it, and that the invention of printing was a most powerful instrument in preparing the way for it, it is impossible not to concede. But this need not prevent us from believing that the movement itself, when it did come, was in the main religious. It was a profoundly religious conviction that stirred Luther, who may be taken, as indeed Mr. Beard takes him, for the typical Reformer, to the action which shook the domination of the Papacy. He believed that the accepted theology of Christendom had drifted very far away from the teaching of Christ and his Apostles, and that the religion of the day had suffered a corresponding corruption. It was this conviction that gave him courage and endurance. Whenever it ceased to be the prominent motive of his action, when, for instance, under the pressure of circumstances, he was forced, or believed himself forced, to become political, he became a weaker, inferior, less consistent man. Mr. Beard, it seems to us, estimates the Reformation by its consequences, by the movements which have been, in part at least, developed out of it. We can see plainly enough now that the struggle between the forces which the Reformation may be taken to symbolise, and those to which it is antagonistic, is something much larger than the difference between the creed of Pope Pius and the Confession of Augsburg or the Thirty-nine Articles. But the men of the sixteenth century did not see it. To them, the theological controversy was of predominating importance. They had not a doubt but that the question ought to be settled, they had great hopes that it might be settled by convincing arguments which might be found in Scripture, or in the Fathers. A phase of the controversy in which the disputants would no longer appeal to these authorities must have been altogether beyond their conception.

After all, the difference between Mr. Beard and ourselves may be little more than that he regards the Reformation more as what it was potentially than as what it was actually. With this reservation, we wish to express very heartily our admiration of his treatment of the subject. In his introductory lecture he deals with the theological precursors of the Reformation. In a series of notices which compress into a brief space the results of much careful study, and are distinguished both by acuteness and sympathy, he speaks of the efforts at reform which led to the Councils of Constance and Basle, of the Mystics, with Eckhart and Tauler for their principal names, of the Imitation of Christ, of the Waldenses, of the followers of Wiclif and Huss. At the end of the chapter, he points out that these efforts at reform produced no amendment, that the dominant theology remained unshaken, and that the corruption of morals and of ecclesiastical government was as monstrous as ever. And he asks, speaking of the Reformation of the sixteenth century,—"Why did that revolt succeed, when so many other attempts at reform had failed? Why did Luther and Zwingli do what Wiclif and Huss had not done?" He finds an answer to this question in the subject of his next lecture, "The Revival of Letters in Italy and Germany." Here, again, we have an admirable summary of a great subject, nothing being better, we think, than the notice of Erasmus. This is a very acute remark:—"The Reformation that has been, is Luther's monument: perhaps the Reformation that is to be, will trace itself back to Erasmus; but will even as much of Erasmus's Reformation as of Luther's be entitled to our gratitude?" The succeeding lectures, from the third to the ninth, are more properly concerned with the Reformation itself. Mr. Beard does, we think, substantial justice to its great leaders; and he does also, as, indeed, might be expected from him, even more justice to the men whom their leaders regarded with an hostility not second to that with which they regarded the Papacy. Heretics have, for the most part, been hardly dealt with, both by their contemporaries and by posterity. Mr. Beard's sixth lecture, "The Sects of the Reformation," does something to redress the wrong, as regards men whom the Reformers dreaded as much as Rome dreaded the Reformers. He says, taking occasion by his mention of Sebastian Franck, of some of these men:—

"They were half-blindly reaching forward to something better and more stable than they knew or could firmly grasp. Those seem to us to have succeeded best who stood on the ground of that pure spiritual intuition which is the same in all ages, and not essentially affected by intellectual change; but in proportion as they succeeded, were they out of tune with their own age and that which came after. These ideas of the continuity of revelation, of the Divine in nature and in history, of the inner, which must in the last resort interpret the outer Word, of the unimportance of Sacraments compared with the consecration of the life, even of the kingdom of God as a realisable ideal of human society, are only now, after the lapse of so many years, working themselves clear, and winning recognition as the result of a just interpretation of Scripture, of history, of nature."

We should ourselves have said that on the sacramental question the latest development of thought and feeling had been just the other way, that it had vindicated instead of attenuating the power of sacraments. In the tenth and succeeding lectures we come to the developments of the Reformation. The tenth treats of the "Growth of the Critical Spirit." It contains an interesting sketch of the progress of the "higher criticism," in the times that followed the Reformation. We cannot accept all Mr. Beard's obiter dicta. Wolf's "Prolegomena to Homer" do not stand by any means on the same level as Bentley's "Phalaris," nor is the ballad theory of the Homeric poems "generally adopted." Many competent judges think that the Wolfians have not done more than prove, as a well-known Oxford humourist puts it, that "the Iliad was not written by Homer, but by another person of the same name." But we have read with great interest, and, for the most part, with a general agreement of opinion, the pages which describe the changed aspect which the Bible now bears to reverent students of its pages. The eleventh lecture treats of the "Development of Philosophical Method and Scientific Investigation," and in the twelfth the writer sums up his conclusions. Both contain some things to which we cannot assent, but which we cannot discuss within any limits now at our command. But though this be so, though we doubt whether the standpoint which Mr. Beard has found for his own faith is either as tenable or as steady as he thinks, that he is an able thinker, and as careful as he is able, we willingly admit. We gladly quote the eloquent words in which he gives the conclusion of the whole matter:—

"And so I venture to think that to restore Christianity to the place which it has lost and is more and more losing in the hearts of thoughtful and educated men, still more to give back to it its old victorious energy in dealing with the sinful and the wretched, what is chiefly needed is a prophet of this latter day who, in the keenness and directness of his religious insight, will speak at once a piercing and a reconciling word. Such an one will be deeply penetrated with the scientific spirit, rejoicing in the interpretation of nature as an unveiling of God, and desiring only the plain truth of history, that he may trace in it the working of the Divine Hand. But he will be too full of the awe of direct vision to lose himself in the arid wastes of criticism, or to be led astray by the pedantries of scientific investigation. I dare venture to predict that, like every other true prophet, the future will fill his eye and heart too completely to suffer him to be a bond-slave of the past: present revelations always overbear old theologies, and no living Church ever supplies the model of the New Jerusalem. I have no fear lest he should fall out of the ranks of Christ's soldiers; for I do not believe that religion has anything to offer to man that the Gospel does not hold, and I notice that what is strong and inspiring in newer systems is Christian in essence, if not always in name. I know that when he speaks men will crowd to hear him, and lay their hearts and lives in his hands; for the religious instincts of humanity are ineradicable, and even if they sometimes sleep, wake always to life and energy again. And though his clear and penetrating accents may not fall upon our living ears, and we can do nothing to direct the operation of the Spirit of God, which, like the wind, 'bloweth where it listeth,' yet it belongs to us of this generation to make straight the way of his coming, by living and working in the light of our best knowledge and most intimate convictions. Intellectual difficulties we can to some extent reconcile: hindrances to church-fellowship we can remove: we can go back to the simplicity of primitive piety; we can acknowledge the oneness of the religious life. So, as age follows age, and each pours fresh wealth into the treasury of human knowledge—as men accumulate a riper experience, solving ever more perfectly the problems of life and entering upon wider possibilities—Christianity too will receive a fuller development, and mankind, with the acknowledgment of mystery and the cry of imperfection always upon its lips, will penetrate more and more deeply into the glory and the wonder of God."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Jackanapes. By Juliana Horatia Ewing. With Illustrations by Randolph Caldecott. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. 1884.)—Why this delightful little tale is dated 1884, when it had already appeared in October, 1883, we cannot conjecture, and think that the "Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge" should discountenance such fictitious dates, as it doubtless desires to discountenance fictions of all kinds. Mrs. Ewing has never surpassed, even if she has ever reached, the movement, liveliness, pathos, and general charm of this vivid little sketch, which is admirably illustrated by Mr. Caldecott, though we think that he ought to have given more faithfully the group assembled on the village green to see Jackanapes take his first ride on Rollo. Mr. Caldecott has left out the gipsy, for instance, and has turned the old General into a young man. But to go back to Mrs. Ewing. The dialogues between the old General and his little grandson are as good as it was possible to make them, and indeed the lively transitions from one sketch to the next in the dissolving views of Jackanapes's life are full both of nature and of art. If Mrs. Ewing had shortened her tale by the last twenty lines, which to our minds injure it by inculcating something too much of a positive moral or sentiment, the suppression of which in the course of the story is one of its chief merits, we should have called this tale simply perfect. Were the last twenty lines insisted on by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge? If so, that Society does not fully understand its own business. There is many a feeling which exerts twice as much influence so long as it is only suggested, as it could ever exert if it were distinctly and emphatically expressed.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of a very stately volume, Art and Letters, 1883. Edited by J. Comyns Carr. (Remington and Co.)—There are more than three hundred and fifty folio pages, and a not far inferior number of illustrations, some of them of great merit. The literature is chiefly represented by a tale by Mrs. Comyns Carr, "La Fortunina," the scene of which is laid among the Italian folk whom the writer knows so well how to describe. All this is enclosed between covers gorgeous with colour and gold.

The Satires of Horace. Edited, with Notes, by Arthur Palmer, M.A. (Macmillan.)—Professor Palmer has given us here a most interesting edition of the Satires. It is easy to see the hand of a master in his work, a hand sometimes, perhaps, a little too bold, but possessed of unmistakable power. The text is accompanied by a running critical commentary, which is quite a model of what such a commentary should be in an edition like the present. The more important variants and conjectures are briefly discussed, always in so pointed and intelligible a way as cannot but interest and instruct the beginner in critical science, while it will not fail to commend itself to more advanced students. We may instance his note (although, indeed, this has necessarily to be of such length as relegates it to the body of annotation at the end), on i., 108-9. Here he reads:—

"Illuc, unde abii, redeo, qui nemo ut avarus

construing the qui as "how," with fiat understood. This becomes very probable, when we look back to the point to which Horace, as he says, returns, and find the words, "qui fit, ut nemo," &c. The ellipsis is a little harsh; but the hiatus of Orelli's reading (he leaves out the qui) seems to us quite intolerable. To translate, too, "nemo ut probet" as "how no one," &c., is somewhat harsh. We are a little surprised to find Professor Palmer even "putting on record," though he does not introduce into the text, the conjecture, "fortissima Tyndaridarum harum," "the Tyndarids of our day," for "fortissima Tyndaridarum." The words would be very harsh in any context, and here Horace evidently intends to be magniloquent. In l. 66, "populus me sibilat," Professor Palmer suggests si for me, which, as he remarks, is a solitary instance of an accusative after sibilat. He points out a curious example of how the dictionary-makers follow blindly an original error, quoting all of them, Cic. Att., ii., 19, "populares isti jam modestos homines sibilare docuerunt," as an instance of a transitive sibilare. We cannot, however, approve of si, which seems to be ill followed by at, in "at mihi plaudo." The occasional use of rideo with an accusative in the sense "laugh at" seems to supply a tolerably close analogy to the construction questioned. We note an obiter dictum of the editor that "the genitive with refer is not a good classical construction." The dictionaries quote Sallust, but they do not give Livy xxxiv., 27, "ipsorum referre." We have naturally spoken of points of difference rather than points of agreement, in this brief notice; but we wish to express with emphasis our general appreciation of the great value of this edition. The two Dublin Professors who have contributed to Messrs. Macmillan's series must be allowed to have sensibly raised its already high average of merit.

Black and White. By E. A. Meriwether. (E. J. Hall and Son, New York.)—Mr. Meriwether draws his pictures with very strong contrasts of light and shade. But we should not say that they are exaggerated or untrue. A sæva indignatio against wrong-doing, whether hiding itself under respectable disguises or boasting itself openly, inspires him and gives a vigour to his writing. There are two passages in the story which deserve special attention. Calvin Calyx's method of dealing with an inebriate (the chief specific, we may mention, was water of the hottest, administered internally), and the account of the sale of slaves at a South Carolina plantation. The latter is a very striking scene. We would remind the author, if, as seems likely, he has made Richard Wilmer the mouthpiece of his own opinions, that any unsettling process which Byron's writing effected was not an unsettling of belief—for this may be salutary—but of morals.

Stories and Episodes of Home Mission Work. (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.)—If we felt called upon to criticise this little volume, we might point out that it might have been more effectively arranged. As it is, we would say to our readers—open it where you please; if you come upon what great people, prime ministers, archbishops, and the like have said about the work, pass it by, and go on till you find, as you will very soon find, what the workers themselves say. It must be a very hard heart indeed that will not be touched by some of these pitiful stories of ignorance and misery. No official machinery can deal with the mass of suffering which these pages—and they might have been multiplied tenfold—reveal. The work needed can only be done by the efforts of individual workers; and the object of this volume is to procure the means by which their number may be increased.

Hard Lines. By Hawley Smart. 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall.)—Though Mr. Smart does not precisely relate his theme is not altogether dissimilar. Captain, commonly called Cis, Calvert, though he is not exactly an incarnation of virtue, is a decent young fellow, pursued by fate in the shape of two weaknesses, —a hankering after the excitement of the Turf, and a tendency to become the slave of a woman who chooses to make a fool of him. His fortunes and misfortunes Captain Smart describes with a certain liveliness. We see him successively in a northern garrison town, in an Indian station (where, for sheer want of occupation, he takes to flirting far more zealously than discreetly), and finally in the Crimea, where he plays with tolerable success the rôle of the dandy turned into a hero. The writer's boldest stroke is where he draws the character of Lizzie Daventry, a very dangerous femme incomprise, whom the hero meets in India. But he seems hardly able to make up his mind whether the woman was in earnest, and the very plain-spoken way in which she opens her mind to Captain Calvert certainly comes upon the reader as a surprise. As novels go, there is nothing to which one need very strongly object in Hard Lines; but it lies wholly on a low level of life and thought. From beginning to end, there is nothing elevated about it.

Undine, and other Stories. By Caroline Birley. (Heywood, Manchester.)—These are pretty and well-told stories that Miss Birley has collected in this little volume. Perhaps the best of them is "Yes, or No?" It is not often, we fear, that a man who has once begun to be dishonest climbs again the upward path. There is very little to help him, if he does. But it is done in this story, and the doing of it is told in such a way as to call out our belief and sympathy.

If only some one had thought three hundred years ago of the volume which we have now before us, The Family Register, by A. G. Taunton (W. H. Allen and Co.), we should be in possession of much interesting and valuable information now hopelessly lost. Mr. Taunton has put together in a volume, which, to minimise the chance of loss, he has made of folio size, forms for the entries of births and baptisms, marriages and deaths, and burials. After these comes a blank genealogical table. It is not too late to begin. Most people know something, at least, of their family descent for two or three generations back, though the migratory habits which the scarcity of freehold tenure, among other causes, goes to produce, commonly interrupt such knowledge at no distant period. Let them begin by putting this down, and posterity will not fail, we feel sure, to be grateful.

Professor Henry Morley has our best wishes for his Morley's Universal Library (Routledge and Son),—a title, by the way, which, without the differentia of "Morley's," has been used before for a not dissimilar undertaking. The volume now before us is Rabelais, which the editor has successfully adapted to the tastes of a less plain-spoken generation than that for which the jolly priest of Meudon wrote. We shall be curious to see what he does with Dryden, and still more curious about Wycherley, an Ethiopian whose skin, one would think, it must be exceedingly difficult to change. Dryden and Wycherley, with Fielding and Colley Cibber, are to represent France, in the person of the dramatists whom—so early did our playwrights take to this practice—these writers "adapted." Among the volumes in immediate prospect (it is arranged that they should appear every month, each with a short preface from the editor) are Bacon's Essays, Defoe's Journal of the Plague, and Butler's Analogy of Religion. The critic's task will happily be very easy.

Dante's Divine Comedy: the Purgatorio. A Prose Translation, by the late William Stratford Dugdale. (Bell and Sons.)—Mr. W. S. Dugdale had just finished this translation before the accident which terminated his life. It seems to be fairly literal, and at the same time can be read with some satisfaction. The original is printed below, the text followed being that of Signor Brunone Bianchi, and there are notes explanatory of difficulties and allusions. The book will certainly be useful to students.

Careers from English History: England and Spain. By C. M. Yonge. (Macmillan.)—Miss Yonge tells in her own vigorous style some forty stories belonging to the last period of the sixteenth century, and to the three years of the seventeenth century which brought Elizabeth's reign to a close. "England and Spain" is the title which she gives to her volume, and these two countries are certainly the chief actors in the drama which she describes; but France and Scotland also appear, for we have, among others, the tales of the "Kirk of Field" and of the "St. Bartholomew." The stories are detached, but a sufficiently clear thread of history joins them together. Volumes such as this do not supersede the severer study of history, but they make it very much more pleasant.

Inchbracken. By Robert Cleland. (Wilson and McCormick, Glasgow.)—There is a purpose or sub-purpose of controversy in this story. The hero is a Free-Church minister, a very good fellow indeed, but, we are given to understand, not very wise, and in this respect a contrast to his father, who had seen no reason to follow the Seceders. The villain of the story is a most detestable hypocrite, who acts as clerk—or whatever the official may be called—to the Free-Church congregation. There is nothing especially attractive in this combination; and the story which is built upon it is of but small merit. The minister finds a child upon the sea-shore on the morning after a wreck, and the scandalous tongues of the village take advantage of this incident to fasten upon his blameless life the odium that really is due to the misdoings of his clerk. Happily, there are better beings than this in the book. Some of the sketches of character are happily touched, and the dialogue is commonly well managed. What is "stentorious breathing?" And is it a sign of approaching death? "Stentorous," we say, in these parts.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.—Nothing could be more charming than the Verses books for Children, written by Juliana Horatia Ewing, pictures by R. André. (S. P. C. K.) There are six of them, "Master Fritz," a charming little parable of life, in which Mrs. Ewing cannot resist some sly strokes of satire at masculine selfishness; "Soldiers' Children," in which, among other things, Master Dick invents, with great credit to himself, a "Sunday-game" of soldiers; "Three Little Nest-birds" (which ought to be put by for next spring); "Our Garden;" "The Doll's Wash," wherein certain young ladies learn by experience that "a week's wash isn't all play;" and, perhaps, most delightful of all, "A Sweet Little Dear," a true story, which might be matched in families without number, of a spoilt darling. We must give one specimen of Mrs. Ewing's amusing recitative:—

"If I should fail to be all a mother ought,—oh, how my head throbs when the dear child jumps; and then nurse said, 'Ugh!'"

"When you're worried into your grave, she'll have no mother at all, and I'll have to tumble up as other folks do."

"There's the poor master at his wits' end—a child's not all a grown person has to think of—and Miss Jane would do well if she had less of her own way."

"But there's more children spoilt with care than the want of it, and more mothers murdered than there's folk hanged for, and that's what I say."

A very true and sensible utterance of "nurse," as most fathers, if not most mothers, will allow. "R. André" (for we know not whether we should say "Mr." or "Miss") has carried out Mrs. Ewing's ideas in a most satisfactory manner.—Some little books which make up together "The Holly Series," drawings by Ida Waugh (Griffith and Farran), are pleasing. The drawings are distinctly good, and the verses smooth and flowing. We have three numbers before us, Horatio Hamilton Harris, Little May, and The Christmas Carol; and there are three others.—The Snow Queen, by Hans Christian Andersen, illustrated by T. Pym (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.), comes with an introduction which ensures a welcome. The illustrations, too, though not equal in merit, are not unworthy of the letterpress. The little girl on p. 17 is excellent, while the three figures on p. 21 are somewhat stiff.—Perseus and the Gorgon-slayer. Illustrated by T. R. Spence, the Tale told in English by W. J. Gordon. (Sampson Low and Co.)—The tale opens badly, with a false quantity, "Upon the cliffs of Seriphos," a blunder which is repeated more than once. The verse, indeed, is of the poorest quality, and would with great advantage have been exchanged for prose. The illustrations, though sometimes showing a certain prettiness, want dignity, and are more suitable for the "Red Riding Hood" order of story-book than for a classical tale. "Andromeda Chained to the Rock" is perhaps the worst. The boat on p. 2 is hardly the Adraak in which Danae and her child were exposed. As to the verse, one specimen will suffice :—

"The tooth and eye were passing when Persens seized them tight, And all the three gray Sisters deprived of wits and sight."

—We have also received Play-time, Sayings and Doings of Baby-land, by Edward Stanford. (Chatto and Windus.)—In The Boats of the World, described and depicted by "One of the Craft" (Sampson Low and Co.), the sailing are better represented than the rowing-boats. Where is the "consummate flower" of rowing-boats, the University eight-oar? Generally, too, the rowers do not seem to be rowing.

We have received from Mr. David Douglas, of Edinburgh, each in two volumes of a most convenient size, such as will lie easily on the open hand, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes' Autocrat of the Breakfast Table, and The Professor at the Breakfast Table, the "author's edition, with latest additions and illustrative notes," as the title-pages inform us.

To insure insertion, Advertisements should reach the Publishing Office not later than 12 a.m. on Friday.

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name,

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Government have given out, semi-officially, that the County Franchise Bill will be the first measure of the next Session, and that it will probably be accompanied, rather than followed, by a Redistribution Bill—both applying to Ireland, as well as Great Britain—so that the Conservatives and the House of Lords will not be able to plead that the whole plan of the Government is laid before the country in an inadequate form. This is very satisfactory. It is almost necessary to separate the two measures, not only for the great advantages of method which their separation secures, but in order to give the House of Lords the opportunity of bowing gracefully to the will of the country, as declared at the general election, on the one point distinctly submitted to the country. But it is most important not only that the Conservatives and the House of Lords should be informed of the general lines of the Redistribution measure, but that the Liberals should be satisfied that it is to be a really large measure which may settle the question for a generation or two. It is stated by one journal, which professes to know, that the three-cornered constituencies will be done away with. We are not surprised to hear it, for the minority seat—which has a sort of stamp of inferiority on it, and which, in case of a vacancy, is always filled up by a majority Member—has not worked well. But it is most important that the same principle,—the principle of adequately representing every aspect of political conviction which is sufficiently wide-spread to be entitled to representation,—should be worked out so far as it can be in some other way; and we earnestly hope that the adherents of true democracy will insist that it shall be so.

M. Ferry, during the debate on Tonquin on Wednesday week, read a telegram from M. Tricou, French Chargé d'Affaires in China, stating that the Viceroy, Li Hung Chang, had disavowed the Chinese Ambassador. The statement created much sensation in the Chamber, and is believed to have influenced the division. As Chinese official discipline is strict, and as Li Hung Chang, though an important person, is in no way the superior of the Marquis Tseng, the story was received throughout Europe with incredulity, and has now been officially denied by the Government of Peking. Li Hung Chang made no such disavowal, and the Foreign Office of Peking is entirely satisfied with its Ambassador. A despatch in this sense will be sent to Paris, and meanwhile the Marquis Tseng is authorised to give the story a complete denial. It was expected that M. Ferry would offer some explanation of his well-timed credulity, but none has been forthcoming, nor is it at all clear that the Chamber will insist upon any. The Deputies, apparently, are willing to be deceived; and the Opportunist organ, La République Française, says it is highly unpatriotic to accept a Chinese statement, when it is opposed to one made by a French diplomatist. Nevertheless, no one doubts the comparative authenticity of the Chinese story, which, indeed, is self-evident; and the incident has greatly reduced the moral authority both of the Ministry and the Chamber. If the French Premier cannot be relied on for facts, and if the Deputies will not exact the truth from their own agents, they openly betray the trust they have received from the people. No incident more discreditable has occurred in France since the fall of the Empire.

Rumours have been circulated in London and Paris of great French successes in Tonquin, and other rumours of a final breach between China and France. None of these stories are true. According to all authentic reports, Dr. Harmand, the Civil Commissioner in Tonquin, has been recalled or sent to Hué; and Admiral Courbet, thus left supreme in the field, does not intend to advance yet. His reinforcements are arriving, but the country is still flooded, and he will wait till December before he begins dragging forward the heavy artillery necessary to reduce Sontay and Bacninh. He will not even then have more than 3,000 soldiers available, and the delay enables the Chinese Government to forward regiments to the south. The French Government, meanwhile, though still convinced that the Chinese will not fight, have ordered their Admiral, in certain contingencies, to blockade Canton, and is preparing a second expedition, of 10,000 men. There is no sign, however, of any intention to strike at Peking, where alone China is vulnerable; and the Parisian papers repeat that the credit to be asked for will not exceed £400,000, a ridiculous sum, which will not defray the cost of the coal and transport it is indispensable to provide.

We are often asked where, in the great Empire of China, power really resides, and we believe the best short statement is this. Subject to certain immovable customs, the Emperor, in his capacity of Father of the people, can in theory give any order, and can in practice punish with decapitation or exile any official or person who disobeys it. He is, in all serious affairs, however, obliged to consult, though not to obey, a rather large group of Princes of his dynasty and great Mandarins, who divide the departments and the great Viceroyalties among themselves. The dynasty, moreover, being foreign, is compelled to respect the Army, to some extent; while this Army is, for financial reasons, so limited in number that it is difficult to garrison the Empire, and impossible to hold it down for an hour. It is the tradition of the Court, therefore, never seriously to offend either the Army or the people in such a way as to provoke émeutes, more especially in Peking. At present, the Emperor is a boy, only just twelve years of age, and all real authority belongs to a widow of the last full-grown Emperor, Hien Fung—who is called the Empress-Mother, but is not the mother of the Emperor—to Prince Kung, Li Hung Chang, the favourite of the native Chinese, and two or three less known high officials. They can send out any orders they please, and are obeyed, but they cannot afford to risk the insurrections which would follow any great affront to the pride of the people, such as the cession of Tonquin would be. China, in fact, is a more solid Turkey, with Sultan, Pashas, Army, and mob sharing power in unequal degrees. As in Turkey, too, all four are bound in the chain of a Law which cannot be modified.

It seems to be generally understood that Sir Henry Brand wishes to retire from the Speakership as soon as a satisfactory substitute can be found, and if rumour can be trusted there is some difficulty in inducing men of the first rank to accept the appointment. This is not to be wondered at, but much to be regretted. There is hardly any post in which a man qualified by genius to strike out a new line could render such great services to his country. On the few occasions on which Mr. Courtney has taken the place of Chairman of Committees, he has discharged his duties with a firmness, a tact, and an impartiality which won the admiration of the Irish party and the Opposition, as much as of the Ministerialists. Is not he the man for the post?

Herr von Kallay, the Austrian Finance Minister, on November 6th made a most rose-coloured speech to the Hungarian Delegation, on the condition of Bosnia. The local taxation, he said, was now equal to the local expenditure, and the cost of the garrison was reduced to £730,000 a year. The recruiting had been successful even in Herzegovina, only forty-five having fled out of 3,200. The cadastral survey would be completed by next year, and the administration of justice had been thoroughly reformed. The district magistrates had been empowered to settle three-fourths of all cases summarily, with the aid of two jurors elected by the Commune, and this rough-and-ready plan had found great favour with the people. The effort to protect Catholicism had also been relaxed, and the State had not only endowed a seminary for the Orthodox Greek Clergy, but had established a college for the Mussulman Ulema in Serajevo itself. This is, of course, only an official account; but the new plan for distributing justice looks able, and the Delegation appear to have recognised the new lenity in the Administration. There was, however, a refusal to transmute the tithe, which is levied on the crop and interferes with agriculture, into a land-tax.

It is asserted in Vienna that a serious insurrection has broken out in Serbia, the militia of one district at least being in open mutiny against an order to deliver up their arms to the newly-organised Reserves. The Government of Belgrade deny the seriousness of the movement, but some 7,000 troops have been despatched to put it down, and all the Radical leaders in Belgrade have been arrested. The insurgents proclaimed Prince Kara-georgevitch King of Serbia, and it would seem to be true that the great unpopularity of King Milano makes any rising serious. The European importance of the event arises from the chance that King Milano may be dethroned, and be succeeded by a man of Panalavic tendencies, in which case Austria would occupy Serbia, and the long-expected war with Russia would be precipitated. It is most probable that the movement will be suppressed, but the risk of assassination is never absent in Serbia, and the people have imbibed an idea that a more Radical Government would seriously lighten both the taxes and military service.

The people of Jamaica appear to be tired of absolute government by Anglo-Indian officers, although their advocates admit that under them the Negroes have greatly advanced, and race-hatreds have become less bitter. On Thursday, therefore, a deputation of West Indians waited on Lord Derby, to beg for their old Assembly back again. Lord Derby refused this, but stated that the Government regarded the despotic system as only temporary, and had considered a new Constitution with a much larger infusion of the elective element. He hinted, moreover, that the negroes would be allowed their share both in the election of the Legislature, and in the administration of the island. The wisdom of the change depends, of course, upon its opportuneness; but we imagine the Governor, Sir Henry Norman, will retain an effective veto, and with negroes voting in all the Southern States, it is difficult in the West Indies to base political organisation upon their incapacity. They are at least as forward in Jamaica as in any Southern State, except, perhaps, Maryland.

It is by no means clear that the Democrat Party in the Union will carry the White House next year. They expected to do so, but the "fall" elections, which have just begun, show considerable reaction. Massachusetts has rejected its Democrat Governor, General Butler, and in Pennsylvania and Minnesota the Republicans have been elected by heavy majorities. Even in New York, though it remains Democrat, a Republican has been elected Secretary of State by a majority of 17,000. Should the reaction continue, the fight will be a close one, and will probably turn on the personal qualities of the candidates. It seems to be understood that the Democrats will run old Mr. Tilden, who some years ago obtained a clear majority of the total votes, though not of the States; but the Republicans are undecided as to their candidate. He will probably be a man comparatively unknown, as President Arthur has no chance, and no member of his Cabinet has much hold upon the people.

A meeting was held on Tuesday in St. Pancras Vestry Hall which on the Continent would be regarded with grave alarm. It was intended to advocate State aid to the emigration of the London poor, who, according to Canon Spence, cannot find houses, there being fifty applicants for every vacant room. Mr. Torrens, Member for Finsbury, and Mr. H. Huleatt, Vicar of St. John's, Bethnal Green, strongly supported the project; but the room was filled with members of the Democratic Federation, who shouted that the capitalists ought to emigrate, and that their fathers had been plundered of the land, and they meant to have it again. They moved and carried an amendment in favour of "a reasonable scheme of home colonisation, and State employment of labour at home." None of the speakers on this side defined what they meant by State employment at home, or whether they intended to buy or to confiscate the land. If the former, rent must be paid, and the Democratic Federation is only seeking to turn town labourers into agricultural labourers; but if the latter, credit would receive a shock which would empty the wage-paying fund. We do not suppose that many hold these extreme ideas, but it seems clear either that there is an unusual amount of able-bodied distress in London, or that the distressed are more conscious of suffering.

The Standard publishes an account of the present position of the Nihilists, derived, it states, from "one of the most prominent Russian statesmen now in office." According to this authority, the party has of late become weak and disorganised. Many of their leaders have been condemned, and the police recently succeeded in arresting at Kharkof their executive chief—or supreme Head Centre, as the Fenians would say—a lady of extraordinary endowments, named Vera Philipora. It was she who devised the scheme of a military revolt, and succeeded in winning over some forty officers, principally in Tiflis,—and, the prominent Minister might have added, many officers in the Navy. She has within the last two weeks revealed the entire plot, in a confession which fills a volume, and is much better done, the narrator says, than any official in this Ministry could have done it. The story sounds wild to Western ears, but no Minister would have fabricated the statement that a lady was at the head of the movement, which, nevertheless, is entirely in accord with all we know of Nihilist ways and Russian society. Moreover, Tiflis is just the place to be chosen as the nucleus of a military revolt, for it is the head-quarters of the Army of the Caucasus, which is full of officers sent there as a punishment and for disciplinary reasons. There is ground for believing, too, that discontent in Russia, like population and wealth, accumulates in the southern provinces. We all make the mistake of thinking of Russia as a sort of Arctic Power; while, since the emancipation, the population has been yearly quitting the Northern governments for the pleasanter and more cultivable South.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon presided at Aberdeen yesterday week at a banquet given to Sir R. Cross, and in his opening speech maintained that the Conservatives were not an obstructive Party, that they were quite willing to further progress "within the lines of the Constitution," that the Liberals have no policy except to give sops first to one section and then to another section of their divided Party, and that the House of Lords is very popular in the country, though it is questionable whether the House of Commons is. Sir Richard Cross endeavoured to persuade the Aberdonians that though they might have called themselves Liberals all their life, there would be no inconsistency in their turning Conservative now, as a Conservative now only endeavours to put on a brake to arrest the mad progress of modern Radicalism. That was a very skilful "economy" to preach to Aberdeen alarmists, but, as nowhere in the islands are there fewer political alarmists than at Aberdeen, Sir R. Cross was probably not very successful. In the evening, Sir R. Cross addressed the working-men on the same theme, and made a long speech in favour of the proprietary franchise,—including evidently "faggot-voting,"—one of the worst devices of clever election agents for rigging the electorate.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson is already beginning his canvass of West Cumberland, and made a speech at Parton, near Whitehaven, on Monday, in which he appeared openly as a candidate for West Cumberland at the next general election. We observe with satisfaction that the responsibility of this canvass is subduing considerably the tone of Sir Wilfrid's hostility to the Government. He declares that he is, and will be, a free-lance, and that he intends to be a free-lance to the end of the chapter; but he no longer makes his speeches one long sneer at Mr. Gladstone's supposed derelictions of principle. He made the duty of evacuating Egypt the chief point of his speech, but when he appealed to the country to insist on it in pure justice to Egypt, which suffers, he says, under a grinding tyranny rivetted on her by our troops, he seems to us to have been hardly sincere. Does he really wish to make the life of the Egyptian peasant happy? If he does, he would certainly not advocate giving Egypt back to the old régime.

At the inaugural dinner of the Bristol University College Club, last Monday, Sir John Lubbock, in proposing success to the College, made an interesting speech on the state of education in England, which he commenced by remarking that M. Renan had called our own age the most amusing age that had ever been, whereas he himself thought its rapid scientific progress gave it a right to rank rather as the most interesting age. Perhaps the difference is that M. Renan,—who is apt to take serious things lightly,—is greatly “amused” where Sir John Lubbock is deeply interested. At least M. Renan is clearly as much amused as interested in the progress of science,—to which Sir John Lubbock gives himself up heart and soul,—and is disposed even to regard the religious education of the world as something like a feat in divine irony. Sir John Lubbock’s attitude of mind is much more serious; he is scandalised at the small attention paid to science in our middle-class schools, and pleads warmly and effectively for a fuller and more adequate study of modern languages,—even in the interests of commerce itself, which more and more needs the knowledge of modern languages, and yet finds Englishmen less accomplished in them than the countrymen of almost any other country in Europe. Sir John said that every good middle-class school should give six hours a week to science, six to mathematics, six to modern languages and history, and two to geography, leaving twenty hours a week for classics, with regard to which he urged that Latin should be taught as a modern language—i.e., that it should be spoken. But why does Sir John treat Greek so lightly? For its own sake, it is worth far more than Latin, though not, of course, in relation to the languages of modern Europe.

Mr. Fawcett made a graceful and vigorous speech to his constituents at Hackney on Thursday, in which, as he always does, he stuck to his colours like a man, repeating his old reasons for giving the suffrage to women, for abolishing the faggot qualifications for county constituencies, for securing the representation of minorities, and for exempting India from the cost of such expeditions as the Egyptian expedition of last year. On the subject of the faggot qualifications, Mr. Fawcett was unanswerable, and much that he said on the representation of minorities was very valuable, though he did not suggest how, if the present three-cornered constituencies were to be retained and extended, their anomalies were to be pared away. It is getting high time now to come to details on points of this kind, and if anybody knows how to make the representation of minorities feasible, and not liable to a catastrophe whenever a minority Member dies or resigns, we wish he would state his plan to the country. Mr. Hare’s is far too complicated for success.

Lord G. Hamilton made a speech on Wednesday evening to some of his Middlesex constituents at Kilburn, which, if the Times’ report can be trusted, contained little worthy of his reputation as a speaker. There were two observations, however, of some interest,—one, that if he had lived fifty years ago, he might not, perhaps, have been a Conservative, but a Liberal, since the Liberals of those days promoted national interests; whereas, Liberals of these days promote party interests only. The other remark was that the Prime Minister is “the most disorderly Member of the House of Commons, with the exception, perhaps, of one or two Irish Members.” From these two remarks an acute critic might politically construct Lord George Hamilton, as Professor Owen does a palaeozoic animal from the joint of a toe and a rib. Mr. Gladstone has carried two much greater measures for the good of Ireland than any Liberal measure of fifty years ago was for the good of England, if we except the Reform Bill and the Poor-law reform. And both these Irish measures were far more difficult to pass, in consequence of the lack of English enthusiasm, than the Reform Bill itself. Also, if Mr. Gladstone sometimes transgresses the strict rules of order, it is only as all great Ministers always have transgressed them,—because his is an exceptional position, in relation to which the House does not choose or wish to insist on the commonplaces of its rules. Lord George Hamilton should remember that pertness is not popular amongst Englishmen.

The Rev. Sir Henry Moncreiff, Principal Clerk to the Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, died on Sunday last, at the age of seventy-five. Eminent neither as a preacher nor as a theologian, a fair business debater rather than a popular orator, he yet held a position among the forces of resistance in his Church second only to that of Dr. Begg, whose death preceded his own by a few weeks. In regard to some burning questions, he was even more the drag on the coach than his better-known contemporary. For, if Dr. Begg represented the hopeless Toryism of “No Surrender,” Sir Henry Moncreiff represented the frequently more effective Conservatism of expediency, caution, and dread of change. He approved of the movement for uniting the Free Church with the other Dissenting Presbyterian bodies of Scotland. But he threw cold water on the Disestablishment agitation, and he opposed, sometimes with a bitterness which was in marked contrast to his wonted suavity, the exegetical and theological tendencies identified with the name and writings of Professor Robertson Smith. With his death, moreover, the Free Church loses its most remarkable social figure. The educated peasants, who form the majority of its pastorate, had a curious respect for, and indeed stood rather in awe of, this baronet, in whose veins flowed the bluest clerical blood in Scotland,—who was the nephew of an Archbishop of Canterbury, had had an Oxford training, and had yet thrown in his lot with themselves and their poverty.

The Oxford memorial concerning the physiological laboratory, which asks, we believe, that no experiments on living animals shall be made in the new Oxford laboratory except under anæsthetics, and none at all on the higher domestic animals, will probably be considered by the Hebdomadal Council next Monday. It has received, we understand, 142 signatures,—rather over 100 from members in Oxford and its suburbs, and the rest from a circle of about fifteen miles round. Three Heads of Houses and nine University Professors have signed it, and we are told that Magdalen men have signed it more numerous than any College but one, and, in proportion to the size of the College, far more numerous than any. Now, as Professor Bardon Sanderson is ex officio a Fellow of Magdalen, and as Magdalen has for years past had a physiological laboratory of its own, this popularity of the memorial among Magdalen men is highly significant.

If the members of the Hebdomadal Council really desire to judge the question before them on its merits, we would entreat them to read the paper by Dr. Sydney Ringer and Dr. William Murrell on nitrite of sodium as a poison (or, in the grand language of medical men, “as a toxic agent”), in the last number of the Lancet. There we read how these gentlemen, after poisoning two cats by heavy doses of nitrite of sodium, tried it on human beings, not, of course, in doses heavy enough to kill, but quite heavy enough to cause great pain and suffering. “In addition to these experiments, we have made some observations clinically. To eighteen adults—fourteen men and four women—we ordered ten grains of the pure nitrite of sodium in an ounce of water, and of these seventeen declared that they were unable to take it. They came back protesting loudly, and required no questioning as to the symptoms produced. They seemed to be pretty unanimous on one point—that it was about the worst medicine they had ever taken. They said if they ever took another dose they would expect to drop down dead, and it would serve them right. One man, a burly, strong fellow, suffering from a little rheumatism only” [so that the medicine was evidently not even intended for his benefit], “said that, after taking the first dose, he ‘felt giddy,’ as if he would ‘go off insensible.’ His lips, face, and hands turned blue, and he had to lie down for an hour and a half before he dared move. His heart fluttered, and he suffered from throbbing pains in the head. He was urged to try another dose, but declined, on the ground that he had a wife and family.” “The only one of the fourteen patients who made no complaint after taking ten grains was powerfully affected by fifteen. He suffered from violent nausea, and his head, he said, felt as if it would split in two.” So it is clear that the experiments were intentionally prosecuted up to the point of severe pain. “It must be admitted,” say these very candid experimenters, “that our experiences have not been altogether satisfactory;” but it must be admitted also that they show very clearly one thing of which the Hebdomadal Council are bound to take note,—that the habit of experimenting freely on living animals inspires the very natural and logical desire to pursue the same class of experiments beyond the verge of cruelty, if not of risk, on human beings too.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE PROPOSED REFORM BILLS.

IF the Government are disposed, as is alleged, to defer to the feeling of the Constituencies who returned them to power, by introducing at the opening of next Session a Franchise Bill establishing a uniform residential franchise in towns and counties, and think of accompanying it by a separate Bill, in which their plan for the Redistribution of Seats would be laid before Parliament, it can hardly be too soon to discuss the principles on which such measures, if they are to win the full confidence of the Liberal Party, should be founded. In the present article, we desire only to sketch the ideal to be carried out in these measures, without, of course, in the least suggesting that no Bills could deserve the full confidence of the country in which the ideal was not attained.

First, then, as regards the Franchise Bill, we would earnestly advise the constituencies to insist, as something like a condition of their hearty assent to such a Bill that the faggot qualifications for the county should be absolutely abolished. If every householder in the county is to have his vote in order that the Members elected may at least represent the local opinion of that county, it should not be possible to counteract the drift of local opinion by purchasing for strangers at a distance, without any sort of personal interest in local affairs, the right to rig the electoral market by speculative investments. Even in the interests of Conservatism, even in the interests of the territorial party, this is utterly bad. We cordially admit that local feeling, whether the feeling of squires, or of the parochial clergy, or of the farmers, or of any other genuine part of the resident population, is entitled to be fully represented in proportion to its real influence. But so much the more we assert that it ought to be punishable as one of the worst of corrupt practices, for persons without any sort of natural connection with the county to buy a right to interfere in the election, solely for the purpose of advancing party interests, be they the interests of Tories, Whigs, or Radicals. The County Franchise Bill will not be up to the mark, unless the faggot voting is entirely and finally ended. Of course, when we say this, we do not presume to say with anything like the same confidence, that the only county qualification should be a residential one, and that the right of a proprietor of a freehold, as a proprietor, to vote in a county election should be abolished. That, indeed, is what we should like to see made the ideal of the Bill. It seems to us that for non-resident proprietors to vote in several counties, merely as landowners, and in several other counties as residents, is much more likely to increase the jealousy felt of them amongst the numerous classes who have no property outside the walls of their own houses, than to increase substantially the influence of property at the poll. Democracy is not a system which you can safely cheat or trick by gaining petty advantages over it of this kind. It is far wiser to accept the system frankly, and to try to persuade the people at large to adopt your views, than to attempt to steal a march upon them by handicapping the poorer voters, that is, by weighting them with traditional disadvantages derived from an extinct aristocratic régime. We hold that nothing will tell worse against the influence of rank and wealth than to attempt to keep for rank and wealth rags and tatters of on obsolete political influence, after the main source of that influence has been repudiated and resigned. Still, we are quite aware that in a country as conservative of old habits as England, and where the services rendered to the Liberal Party by the old forty-shilling freehold are so vividly remembered, there will be a very great reluctance to surrender entirely the old popular suffrage of the counties, only on the ground that a new and much more popular county suffrage has superseded it. We are so well aware of the strong historical prejudices to which the friends of the old forty-shilling freehold will appeal, that we are by no means disposed to say that no Bill which does not strictly limit the franchise in counties, as in boroughs, to a residential franchise, ought to receive the favour of the people. But this we do say, that no Bill which does not absolutely abolish altogether—as Sir Henry James has so well maintained,—the faggot-voting, should receive the favour of the people; and next, that the bolder the new measure shall be in approaching the test of residence as the sole qualification for voting in either counties or boroughs, the more will it deserve the confidence of hearty Liberals. If property is to be substantially represented as property, the whole principle of the Act of 1867, and the whole principle of the County Suffrage Bill is wrong. And if property is not to be substantially represented as property, then the attempt to represent it unsubstantially, by availing ourselves of the attachment of the people to the traditions of an obsolete régime, will be a failure, and will cause much more distrust of the proprietary classes than it will secure to them of valuable influence.

In the next place, the Redistribution of Seats must make a fair approximation towards giving equal weight in the Legislature to equally weighty bodies of men,—counting population as the chief constituent of political weight, but not, of course, excluding wealth and energy, as very important elements of political weight. We do not mean that no population numbering less than 50,000 souls should elect a Member, but that where a population of some 25,000 or 30,000 souls is to have a single Member, there should be a good reason for giving to that population more than its proportional weight in the community, some reason derived from the wealth it has accumulated or the characteristic energy that it has displayed. For the most part, we should hope that no county division with a population under 30,000 would be allowed, and that so far as the smaller boroughs are to be retained, the grouping system—which has answered very well hitherto—should be so far adopted as to bring up the constituency of every Member to something like 30,000 at the lowest. It is clearly of no use to bring in a new Redistribution Bill like the homœopathic measure of 1867. As the counties are to be enfranchised, it will be impossible to leave very minute constituencies with the full representative influence of a county division, unless, indeed, it is desired that a new Reform agitation should spring up as soon as the Reform Bills are carried. The opportunity of settling this great question in a more or less durable fashion must not be lost. We should be very sorry to see any disposition to adopt a hard-and-fast line which should disfranchise or swamp really characteristic constituencies, on the sole ground that they do not include a population reaching a given inflexible figure. But some attempt there must be to distribute legislative representation in real proportion to political weight, and we hold that in estimating political weight, population must be the chief element, though various other considerations should be taken into account. For instance, it will be quite fair to make some allowance for the great advantage of the Metropolis, as the seat of the Legislature, over distant localities, and, therefore, to give Scotland and Ireland a considerably larger allotment of Members than the same population as Scotland and Ireland contain, if living in the counties which London contain, would be entitled to. But if the Redistribution Bill is to be satisfactory, it certainly must take a very great step in the direction of increasing the minimum constituency returning even a single Member, to a population of between 30,000 and 50,000 souls. In London, it might be reasonable enough to regard a population of 50,000 as not under-represented, even though it had no more legislative representation than a population of 30,000—representing an equal stake in the country—in Ross-shire or Clare.

Lastly, we cordially hold, with Mr. Fawcett, that great pains should be taken to prevent the virtual disfranchisement of minorities by the adoption of any system which would drown them everywhere in the same predominant majority. But we cannot see our way, either to a very large extension of the present “three-cornered” system—which, without very large extension, is really unjust to the predominant majority,—or to the still more complicated form of Mr. Haro’s system, which Mr. Parker Smith proposes in his letter of to-day. To win the confidence of a democracy, the very first requisite of a system is simplicity. We must not ask the people to accept a plan which they do not understand, and which will be open to a thousand plausible misrepresentations sure to undermine the confidence of the people. It might be possible to apply successfully such a system as Mr. Parker Smith proposes to the Universities of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and we should not be indisposed to see it tried in their case. But to propose a system which would puzzle the heads of all ordinary constituencies, would be absurd. Under Mr. Parker Smith’s plan, constituencies might have to be told that their most popular representative had 10,000 votes, but that as he only wanted 5,000 to secure his election, 5,000 of the votes given to him were distributed amongst those who were the “second favourites” of his supporters. This would raise suspicions of manipulation of the voting-papers certain to excite popular disgust. For instance, under such a system it would make the greatest possible difference whether you determined which votes to select as those seating the most popular of the candidates, by going through the Register from A to Z, or whether you determined them by going through the Register from Z to A. If you went through it in one direction, a very different set of second or third preferences would emerge, from those which would emerge if you went through it the other way; and so we should have candidates complaining that they had lost their election by the mere accident of the order in which the Register was dealt with by the polling clerks. Nothing involving complicated considerations can possibly stand the test of democratic criticism. Your method must be perfectly plain and simple.

Nor do we in the least agree with Mr. Fawcett that there need be any danger at all in such a subdivision of constituencies as would really give us as many different types of constituency as possible. We hold that nothing would be easier than for Parliament to declare that the intention of the Act was to create as many different types of constituency not falling short of a given population and a given rateable value of property, as might be practicable. Then Parliament might create a Boundary Commission so entirely above suspicion that no one could doubt the honesty with which it would resist the temptation to "jerrymander," as the politicians of the United States term the cobbling of constituencies in the interests of party. What could be easier than to appoint a Boundary Commission, constituted of three men of the highest standing on each side, with Sir Erskine May, or some man of equal weight, as President. And who would accuse such a Commission of jerry-mandering? So far as we see, the only plan for securing the representation of minorities consistent with the simplicity needful for a democracy, is to subdivide constituencies so that they shall really represent as much as possible different types of life and political bias, and then to give such constituencies one Member each. There is no need, of course, to call these subdivisions, wards. A Member for Edgbaston would mean as much in relation to Birmingham, as a Member for Kensington would mean in relation to London, and it would be very feasible so to constitute the various constituencies as to get what is wanted,—constituencies with a bias and genius of their own. At any rate, we see no other practicable way of representing minorities, without undermining the confidence of the people at large in the electoral system pursued.

M. TRICOU'S TELEGRAM.

WE scarcely remember a more disheartening incident in French politics than this affair of M. Tricou's telegram. As our readers will remember, towards the close of the debate of Wednesday week, which was followed by the division, M. Ferry read from the tribune a telegram from M. Tricou, Chargé d'Affaires at Shanghai, dated October 28th, but apparently received while he was speaking, and couched in the following words:—"The Viceroy, Li Hung Chang, has appealed to me not to leave Shanghai. He is very anxious and sorry for the turn things have taken, and states that he utterly disavows the Marquess Tseng. I replied that my health made my departure imperative, and I start to-night." The sensation was naturally very great. The French Deputies, who are very ignorant of Chinese affairs, naturally believed that a disavowal of a Chinese Ambassador could come only from the head of the Chinese Government, they understood the request to remain to be equivalent to surrender, M. Tricou's unpopularity with Chinese statesmen being known, and they talked so earnestly of the news that for five minutes the sitting was suspended by disorder. When it recommenced, M. Ferry, the Premier, who had seen the emotion of the Chamber, said emphatically, "I am asked whether we are on the eve of a war with China. After the telegram I have just read, I cannot suppose that China will declare war against us." This clinched the matter, and although the division was not turned by the telegram—for the Government was sure of a majority, on domestic grounds—it was undoubtedly affected by it. The Deputies, whose "sadness and gravity" were noticed by the Times correspondent, were at heart thinking of the war with China, and believing, on the strength of the telegram, that no war would occur, voted cheerfully and almost en masse for the conquest of Tonquin. All this while, the French Foreign Office, and presumably therefore M. Ferry, must have known that even supposing the telegram accurate, the meaning assigned to it by the Chamber was absurd, that the Viceroy of Petcheli could not pledge his Government, and that the disavowal of an Ambassador in that abrupt style by a Court which only two years ago sentenced an Envoy to death for exceeding his instructions, was next to an impossibility. It now appears that the telegram, even if sent, had scarcely any, if any, foundation in fact. The Chinese Foreign Office absolutely repudiate any instructions of the kind, Li Hung Chang denies that he ever disavowed the Ambassador, while both emphatically record their full approval of the conduct of the Marquis Tseng, as well they may. That single man has done more in a few months to raise the European appreciation of Chinese ability and statecraft than his Government has done in two centuries. Indeed, it is clear, from the communications made by the Marquis to interviewers, that he does not believe that M. Tricou, who was at Shanghai, even saw Li Hung Chang, who hates the Frenchman, and who was at Tientsin, three days' journey off. The French Premier gives no explanation, except that the word "disavowal" was not his; and it is difficult not to believe that something of the following kind occurred: M. Tricou telegraphed to Li Hung Chang complaining of the Marquis Tseng for publishing despatches in extenso without the consent of the French Government, which is, no doubt, an unusual, though not unprecedented proceeding. Li Hung Chang telegraphed back that he was not responsible for the Ambassador, civilly adding his regret at M. Tricou's approaching departure from Shanghai. The "disavowal" and the civility together were huddled up by M. Tricou, who knew the debate was coming on, into a single message; and M. Ferry, though he must have suspected or known the truth, could not resist the temptation to throw such a shell among the Deputies, who, as he understood thoroughly, were caring only about the possibility of war. If they only suspected divided counsels in China, that would be a victory for him.

If this is the true explanation, and it is by far the most favourable to M. Ferry which we can suggest, the French Chamber is placed in this position. It claims and exercises sovereignty in France, yet it is deceived, almost befooled, by its own agents, and when it learns that it has been misled, does not seriously care. Nothing serious has been said upon the subject, M. Ferry has remained silent, and there is apparently no chance whatever of a formal censure upon the Ministry. Indeed, the Minister of the Interior, M. Waldeck-Rousseau, who understands the Deputies as well as any man in France, has, since the incident and the exposure, publicly congratulated France on possessing a Government with a homogeneous and immovable majority behind it not formed out of any temporary combinations! We believe that he is right, and that the majority of Deputies are content to be deceived, because the deception is a pleasant one, and enables them to support a Minister they like without acknowledging that they thereby risk a serious campaign. If war does not arrive they will have a pleasant time, and if it does they will make M. Ferry their scapegoat with the constituencies. We cannot conceive an attitude of mind more dangerous for the Republic. Suppose Napoleon III. on the eve of the Mexican Expedition had received a telegram from an agent at Vera Cruz assuring him that a Mexican statesman had promised the submission of his country, and without further inquiry, without even considering possibilities, had sent that down to the Corps Législatif with a message that consequently "French arms would be unopposed." Would not every Republican in France have quoted the Message as proof either of Napoleon's wiliness, or of his incapacity, or of the readiness of despots to believe in pleasant tidings without examination? Yet this is precisely what the Chamber is doing. The most ordinary, or even incompetent Sovereign, if he feels the seriousness of affairs at all, wishes to obtain the truth from his agents, wishes it so strongly that he very often watches them, either through a secret service or through a carefully maintained correspondence with personal friends. The French Chamber alone claims sovereignty without claiming the right to exact honest counsel and true reports from its own trusted agents. It frets under the truth, and like an Oriental Sovereign, must be soothed. This temper is not of to-day, but is visible throughout modern French history. The Reports to the Convention were frequently untrue, and Barrère invariably coloured everything; the Directory put up with Napoleon's bulletins, and in recent Parliaments exposures of facts have repeatedly been denounced as "unpatriotic." Of course, when the disaster has occurred the truth is told without flinching, and the deceiver sometimes punished by ostracism, but it is then too late for the country to prevent the loss.

Whether a Chamber can govern, that is, whether a Democracy can be directly Sovereign, we do not yet know; but of this much, at least, we may be certain. It cannot govern well or successfully if its Ministers are not loyal, if they do not hold themselves bound to treat it as faithfully as they would a King, to offer it unpleasing counsel and tell it disagreeable truths. Some "management," of course, there must be, and will be, nor is such management, within certain limits, more evil than the observance of any other courtly etiquette; but in the long-run, when necessary, the full truth must be told, or the Sovereign is betrayed. The Emperor of Germany would execute or degrade the General of Division who, after a hard-fought battle, understated his losses in his report; and he would be quite right, for without the truth how could the losses be repaired? Untruth under such circumstances is treason. Marshal Leboeuf told Napoleon III. before the Prussian campaign that the "Army was ready, down to its gaiter-buttons,"—and France, finding endless deficiencies, has cursed him ever since; but what is the difference between his conduct and that of M. Ferry, except that the risk to be run is not quite so great? China cannot invade France, but China may weaken France, and will, if in consequence of M. Ferry's speeches France rushes upon a war without calculating the cost. M. Ferry, it seems to us, has failed in his first duty, and this even if he sincerely believes, as he told the Standard's interviewer he did, that China all through is merely gasconading. His duty to his Sovereign, the Democracy, was none the less clear—to give it all necessary despatches, to acquaint it with all essential facts, and then, if it rejected his advice, either to retire from a discredited post, or to accept the Sovereign's orders as final in the matter. Instead of this, he has cajoled his master out of a consent which events may prove to have been nearly ruinous.

THE FRUITS OF THE RECESS.

IN writing a protest, on September 1st, against the exhortation of the Times to our public men to keep silence during the Recess, we pointed out how incalculably a Democracy gains by some real contact with the personnel of the Legislature and the Administration, and how completely the educating duties of public men had been forgotten by the advisers who recommended to them steady silence and reflection as the best preparation for their more active duties. Members of Parliament fortunately took our view of their duties, and not the view of the Times. For the last two months, the people all over the kingdom have been in continual contact with their Parliamentary Representatives, and we do not scruple to say that the result proves the wisdom of such frequent communication between the represented and the representatives. Moreover, the advantage has not been limited to the inculcation of practical, moderate, and intelligent views on the Electorate at large, though it is clear enough that that has been one of the most important of the advantages of this running fire of speeches. Unquestionably, the Government have heard as much concerning the wishes of the people as the people have learned concerning the best modes of carrying out their wishes; and, granted a democracy, nothing can be of more consequence than that the Government should not lose force through any mere misunderstanding of the relative strength of popular wants. A strong government is the greatest of all advantages for a nation, and a strong government is impossible, under a democracy, unless the government and the people thoroughly understand each other,—the government giving adequate expression to the will of the people, and the people showing sufficient deference to the judgment of the government. This mutual understanding can never be attained without frequent and full mutual explanations between the electors and the elected. The Government cannot know what the relative strength of various popular convictions is, without testing the feeling of hundreds of meetings in all parts of the country; and the people cannot know what the objections to their wishes are, what modifications might render their wishes reasonable, and what exaggerations would render them altogether unreasonable, without hearing the opinions of those experienced Members of the Legislature of whom they themselves have the most knowledge, and in whom they feel the greatest confidence. This year—contrary to the wish of the Times—this exchange of mutual confidences between Members and electorates has been carried out with more than usual completeness, and the result, we believe, has been one of more than usual advantage to both parties. The Government have learned, and show that they have learned accurately, what the most emphatic of the wishes of the people are; and the people have learned, and show that they have learned, how necessary it is to moderate their expectations, how complex are the problems of our modern statesmanship, and how advantageous it is to a people, if they would be politically prosperous, to carry the judgment of a responsible Government with them.

We say that both these points have been gained by the many political meetings of the Recess, first because the Government have unofficially announced their intention to take up the Reform Bill, and give it the first place in their programme for next Session, a decision which will unquestionably strengthen them enormously in the country, and give the people at large that confidence in their sincerity of purpose, which any other decision would,—we believe very unjustly,—have shaken. But if the Government have decided in favour of the course which will reassure the constituencies that their desire for reform in 1880 was genuine, it is certain enough that they have been guided to this decision in spite of the very decided disapproval of many able officials,—like Mr. Leonard Courtney, for instance,—solely in consequence of the steady pressure of the people in all parts of the country. Without the Liverpool, Newcastle, and Leeds meetings, the innumerable Scotch meetings, and the discussions and resolutions all over the country, the Government could not have known how thoroughly the people's heart is set on popularising the county constituencies, and on getting rid at least of the more startling of the anomalies of unequal representation. The Government might otherwise have believed reasonably enough that a County Government Bill, or even a Government of London Bill, should precede any such reform. But the people felt that if, in the fifth Session of this Parliament, precedence were given to any measure of secondary importance, there would necessarily be great danger of a Dissolution without any Reform of our Representative system having been reached at all, and that any such result would render probable its indefinite postponement. Nothing, we believe, but the steady political agitation of the Recess could have convinced the Government of the profound dread with which the majority of the constituencies view the further postponement of the question on which, in their opinion, the authority and activity of the House of Commons really depend.

On the other hand, nothing but the steady political agitation of the Recess could possibly have impressed on the people the extreme complexity of the conditions under which our modern Parliament is placed, and the impossibility of carrying any great improvements in those conditions without an amount of sagacity, of self-restraint, of hearty deference to the counsels of their leaders, and of hearty acquiescence in something less than they would really desire, which it is by no means easy for a great Democracy to display, though they evidently can display it when they are well led, and know that they are well led. They cannot, however, know that they are well led without refreshing constantly their personal knowledge of the men who lead them,—a sort of knowledge which adds more than any one knows to the effect produced on the people by the Parliamentary services of their leaders. It is in the presence of these leaders, and not by reading their speeches, that the people learn how far they may trust and how far they must distrust them. It is by their faces, by their voices, by the many trivial indications which carry home the sense of ability and the sense of simplicity and the sense of prudence to an audience, that the people judge how far to trust them when their Members assert that on this or that subject they must be prepared for compromises, while on this or that subject they ought to stand firm. Assuredly, in our opinion, the result of the agitation of this last Recess has been to make the people as much more reasonable than they otherwise would have been, as much more inclined to place confidence in their representatives, even if these representatives do not secure for them all they want, as it has been to make the Government more confident as to the relative importance attached by the constituencies to the different promises made to them in 1880. Everywhere, the people have heard of the unexampled difficulties of getting through Parliamentary business under the present conditions, and with the present constitution of the House of Commons; and everywhere they have been convinced of the reality of those difficulties, only conditioning that a talking Member shall in future be weighted with a substantial constituency on whose behalf to talk or be silent, and that the House of Commons, when placed on a truly popular footing, shall not be afraid to assert the authority of the whole nation over the authority of any particular constituency. Everywhere the people have been told that anything like a revolutionary measure of reform,—such as Mr. Chamberlain expresses his abstract desire for,—is not to be thought of; and everywhere the people have expressed their own acquiescence in the wisdom of that decision. Nothing, indeed, is more impressive than the tendency of such political agitation as we have had during the last few years to sober the English democracy, and tame the natural imperiousness and impatience of the multitude. As the electors come to know, if not the Cabinet itself, at least the various supporters of the Cabinet, the men on whom the Cabinet rely for gaining their information of the mind of the people, they gradually contract the habit of looking at difficulties patiently, and congratulating themselves on any successful dealing with even a few of them. In our time, we have never known a democracy so reasonable and so patient as the English people have shown themselves with regard to the Irish difficulty, and also with regard to one or two of the Colonial difficulties,—so determined to exhaust all the resources of reasonable statesmanship, rather than to have recourse to the old, hopeless methods of mere violence and command. And we attribute that patience and reasonableness chiefly to two sources,—first, implicit trust in the high purposes of their great leader; and next, that constant and habitual intercourse between themselves and their representatives which has made the difficulties of the House of Commons almost as visible to them as if they had been present continually at its debates. We may depend upon it, that nothing pays better politically,—at least with such a people as the English,—than to take a democracy into the full confidence of the leaders of the people.

MR. GOSCHEN ON SOCIALISM.

WE trust that every Liberal who feels interested in the Socialist agitation now rising up on every side of us, will study carefully Mr. Goschen's address of Friday week to the Philosophical Institute of Edinburgh, just issued by Messrs. Spottiswoode in pamphlet form. It is a great deal more than a speech; it is a short and over-condensed, but on some points singularly exhaustive treatise, the separate merit of which is this. Mr. Goschen is, among Liberal politicians, somewhat of a "hard" man,—apt, that is, to distrust conclusions into which feeling enters too palpably. He is a thoroughly-trained economist, and as such, if we do not misread his address, his instinctive thought would always lead him to prefer laissez-faire as a principle, to leave the individual free, and to regard any consequent suffering as only that inevitable set-off which we find resulting from the acknowledgment of any great truth. Self-governed nations, for example, will occasionally be foolishly-governed nations; yet, nevertheless, self-government is good. On the other hand, Mr. Goschen has studied much, has seen much of many peoples, and has cleaned his mind of that most misleading of prejudices, that the great new forces which he distrusts are necessarily evil forces, either because he distrusts them or because they are new. They may be good forces, thrown away by unwisdom in their use. He advances, therefore, to the discussion of Socialism neither as friend nor enemy, and to watch the concessions made by such a mind to a doctrine he dislikes is, therefore, a study of the highest value,—must, indeed, be, to use Madame Mohl's admirably-chosen adjective, to Liberal politicians positively "nourishing."

Mr. Goschen makes many and large concessions to those whom, as you listen, you feel are in some sense his adversaries. In the first place, he utterly rejects all charges against them of wishing to plunder the rich, or of class-hatred, or of a passion for levelling. The actual impulse, he says, which is effecting or proposing such great changes, which is making the State arbiter in so many transactions, which is so extending State Inspection on behalf of the poor, which carried the Factory Acts, and the Education Act, and the Irish Land Act, and Mr. Plimsoll's Merchant Shipping Act, and which proposes to distribute land, and tax the rich exceptionally, and divide rather than aggregate property after death, is, as an effective impulse, essentially a moral one. Enthusiasts or bad men may propose dangerous schemes, but those which the nation accepts, it accepts on moral grounds, because its conscience has become sensitive—it may be, unduly sensitive—to the evils attending the existing system:—"I discern an awakening of the public conscience as to the moral aspects of many sides of our industrial arrangements—rising doubts, less as to the efficiency of existing organisations for producing wealth (though this, too, has been called in question), than as to their compatibility with the humane requirements of improving civilisation. . . . I hold the principle of 'Laissez-faire' to have lost favour, chiefly owing to moral considerations, to the assertion of the claims of other than material interests, and to a growing feeling that it is right deliberately to risk commercial and industrial advantages for the sake of reforming social abuses, and securing social benefits." The impulse is moral, though its effective operation has been smoothed by two little noticed causes, the decay, the extraordinarily rapid decay, of distrust in the State, and the increase, the very rapid increase, in the dangers caused by the jostling which accompanies our civilisation. The Democracy, feeling that it rules the State, has ceased to dread the State, and though it criticises the State's agents, often with preposterous harshness, it will trust the State to do anything it wants done, great or small,—will make the State its teacher and its banker, as well as its protector of climbing-boys. Demos so believes in the impartiality of the aggregate body, that he is always piling upon it new functions, whenever it seems desirable to prevent jostling, and the cruelty arising from jostling. Mr. Goschen gives an instance of the development of this readiness which will be appreciated by every Londoner. It is barely ten years, he says, since London traffic managed itself. The "rule of the road" was considered sufficient, and all drivers passed and repassed as they would. It was found, however, that too many suffered in the jostling, and now traffic in London is controlled by the Police as it is not in any other capital of Europe, and Democracy submits to the control without a murmur of resistance.

The new principle having, then, a moral foundation, and its application being facilitated by circumstances, why should it not be allowed its swing? Mr. Goschen would give it its swing upon one subject, the rehousing of the people. He would go the whole length of forbidding the letting of an unwholesome house as imperatively as the selling of unwholesome food, and would compel the sale of such houses to the Municipality at their "legal value,"—that is, their value considered as unwholesome buildings. He would, that is, we presume, in practice deduct from the value settled according to market price the whole cost of rebuilding in a healthy and, therefore, "legal" manner. That is quite as far as any reformer wants to go, and would give us cheap sites in plenty; but, as regards other applications of the idea, Mr. Goschen would have the people weigh the dangers of their course with more care than they are doing. He dreads the overworking of the Government, of which there are signs already, and which must increase with every new function. He dreads the want of impartiality in Parliament, which is to be raised to supreme social control, yet will represent ultimately the opinion and interests of a single class, the wage-receivers. He dreads the enormous expense, which is already making of the Civil Estimates so serious a burden, and which must be met out of the taxes. He dreads the withering effect on enterprise which State monopolies must exercise, and fears that a Government business must almost always, for the sake of the taxpayer, become a monopoly. He dreads complete failures, such as he says have attended the last great philanthropic effort of the State, the Merchant Shipping Act, which, in his belief, might as well be non-existent. And he dreads grave injury to the national character:—

"Another objection to the extension of Government interference is of a more insidious, but not less real character. Every additional transfer of duties to the State saps the belief of the community in the value of natural liberty. For instance, if the protection of one class of individuals is entrusted to a public Department, no sooner do difficulties beset another class than similar protection is invoked. Every calamity which occurs, every shortcoming discovered, constitutes a case for fresh interference. The conviction that self-reliance and the conflict of interests are elements of power and success, is weakened at every turn, and public opinion discharges individual responsibility from its duties in one department after another of our social life and industrial business. Then, further, new claims are established. If Government have interfered in favour of one set of interests, other interests will clamour for similar favour at the hands of the State. The reality of such dangers can scarcely be denied, and the risk is heightened by the obvious difficulty of retracing steps taken under such conditions. It is one thing to place a trade or a class under State protection. It is a very different thing to withdraw it, especially if moral considerations have prompted the original act. Trade might long be paralysed, capital expelled, wages lowered, and the national interests generally prejudiced, before it would be possible to repeal a system of Government control, even if condemned as a failure, in favour of the restoration of natural liberty. Once pass a moral condemnation on 'Laissez-faire' in any particular case, and its rehabilitation becomes an almost hopeless task."

It is this last objection, and this only, which we consider grave; but then it is to us so grave, that it discredits almost every Socialist project. We oppose free education not on the ground of its cost, nor even for the more serious reason that it would crush out all separate or peculiar modes of education, all schools, however good, withering before the free State school; but because it would destroy all sense of the parents' obligation to secure education for those whom they have brought into the world. To destroy the sense of that and analogous obligations is to destroy the only discipline which can make strong men and women, and to enervate the whole population of the country. If the State is to do all and the individual nothing, what need in the individual of forethought, sacrifice, thrift, endurance, or any of the virtues which make men noble? If Providence will feed us, what need of ploughing, still less of weeding when we have ploughed? Pain and exertion are training forces, and it is for their undue horror of them—their wish to reverse the decisions of Providence, and abolish them—that we distrust the Socialists, even when they keep, as some of their best men do, within the limits of pecuniary morality. The world wants much transformation, but better London with its suffering than a South-Sea Paradise. It is upon this, the moral ground, that Socialism must ultimately be fought, for when it has once caught the statesmen, and become practical, it will conquer the economists; and we are happy to see that Mr. Goschen, who concedes so much by regarding it as inevitable, takes on this a determined stand.

THE TORIES AND OPINION.

IN reading the speeches of the Tory leaders, Lord Salisbury excepted, we are constantly struck by a defect which we should not have anticipated. That they should denounce Radicals and Radical ideas, and accuse men like Mr. Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke of revolutionary projects, is perhaps natural enough, for they live among people who dread change, and they have always, as party tacticians, to try to keep the wealthy with them. But it is a little odd that they should so constantly forget the nature of the present suffrage, and address to the Householders arguments which seem to themselves strong only from their experience of the old Ten-pounders. The two sets of voters are far apart, as anybody might have seen who studied the votes on the Education Bill; but the Tory speakers persist in regarding them as identical. Here is Sir R. Cross, for instance, at Paisley, prosing away through long columns of the Times about the comparative expenditure of the two last administrations. His figures have been answered often enough, but we do not blame him if he still believes them for repeating them once more. But what makes him think, if he does believe them, that the constituencies which he is trying to attract care whether he is right or not? The Ten-pounders would have cared, and we heartily wish the Householders did care,—for State economy means State carefulness in securing good service; but if we understand their minds at all, they do not care. They are interested about rates and any other form of direct tax they may pay, but as to general questions of expenditure they are profoundly indifferent. They leave them to the officials. It is simply impossible that if they felt expenditure keenly they should allow their representatives to pass the Estimates as they do in blocks, and leave the House without a single Joseph Hume, and urge on their members so many projects, all of which cost money. It is the officials now who preach economy, not the Members, and this not only in England, but in America, in the great Colonies, in France, and in the richer Cantons of Switzerland. Till more taxes are needed, expense is not regarded, and we are not sure that it is disliked even if more taxes are required. At least if it is, we cannot comprehend why in the United States the freeholders bear the profligate and almost avowed waste of their money to “deplete the Treasury,” why in France the peasantry say nothing about budgets which frighten great financiers, and why in England the one objection to philanthropic schemes which we never hear from the poor is their pecuniary cost. We need not say we dislike this change, which will end, as it does already end in the larger municipalities, in great heapings-up of debt; but why do the Tories not recognise it at all? Obviously because they cannot set their minds free from a traditional impression that one popular objection to them is their extravagance, which now is only an objection of the middle-class.

Again, the Tories in every speech go on harping on detailed blunders, which, as they believe, or, at least, say, have been made in Foreign and Colonial affairs. They obviously hope to raise an impression that the Government is not quite haughty enough towards France, that it is foolishly disinterested as regards Egypt, and that in South Africa it is perpetually muddling. That impression, if produced, would have affected the old constituency very much, for it had a certain interest in detail; but we question if it moves the new electorate at all. The statement would not be true about the Southern peoples, but in all those of Teutonic origin, Germans, Americans, and Englishmen, we note a remarkable humility upon foreign affairs, and, indeed, upon all points on which their own ignorance is patent to the masses. They wish to be safe, and to be great, and to succeed in any effort they may make; but they trust their Governments on such subjects with a most striking faith. A quiet word from Prince Bismarck rouses or soothes all Germans; Mr. Lincoln averted a war for which his people were quite ready, by telling them not to be imprudent; and we believe that in a case like Mr. Shaw's, ten words from Mr. Gladstone or Lord Granville would outweigh columns of newspaper writing. They did outweigh with the workmen on the Egyptian question a great mass of prepossession. As the Tory leaders must know, the body of the people in the great towns, London excepted, did not like going to Egypt at all, and only consented because a Cabinet in which they believed told them they must. As to details, the Householders know nothing at all about them; and the speakers who talk about Aksabad, and the Soudan danger, and the iniquities of Usibepu, are spending their breath in vain, the Householders looking only to broad results. It is true that if a moral question is seen to be involved, they prick up their ears, and sometimes grow excited, but the details of policy are to their own consciousness beyond them. Some classes, of course, understand, and the Tories may be perfectly right in trying to instruct them; but then they are avowedly not doing this, but essaying to attract the millions below. They will not, we believe, looking at the experience of a wide suffrage in three great Teutonic countries, succeed in that way. The question whether we ought to leave Egypt will either be relegated to the Cabinet, or decided by the people upon some broad, even if mistaken, consideration of right and wrong. We are certainly unbiassed in saying this, for upon this single subject we are slightly Conservative ourselves, and had much rather the Tories reached the people, but they will not. It is precisely the same with all questions of suffrage. The Tories cannot get rid of the notion that they can make the Householders afraid of large extensions and democratic County Councils, and huge Municipalities like that of London, and with the old voters they might have been right. The Ten-pounders were very timid of the future. The Householders, however, know that power, physical power, is with them, and are no more afraid of having it than a man is afraid of being strong. The greater the municipality, the better they will like it; the more democratic the county council, the more they will understand it; and the wider the county franchise, the more they will feel their own hands strengthened. So strong is their self-confidence, that we shall, we believe, see very shortly an almost whimsical demonstration of it. They are getting bitter against the Irish, especially in the Northern towns,—in some places very bitter, on account of dynamite; but we venture to say that eighty per cent. of them will hold it wise and not foolish to reduce the suffrage in Ireland. They will dread the Irish householders rather less than they dread the Irish voters now; and will not see in the least why, if it is good for English householders to vote, it is bad for Irish householders to vote too.

We are, of course, wasting our pains, but we cannot quit this subject without asking Tories of the Duke of Richmond type why they think it useless to talk Conservatism of the old kind to the people. We mean, why they avoid telling them that change is in itself bad, that the existence of any order at all is a wonderful thing, and that the wisdom of our ancestors, being the result of centuries, must be more trustworthy than untried thoughts. They fancy that to poor men it is useless to say these things, and forget that in every country it is the poor who are conservative, and that the Peers would alter the number of a jury, much sooner than the Commons. It is not the rich who cling to “old ways” and find protection in customary acts, and look with dislike on new-fangled ideas, but the comparatively poor. There is a weight of old conservatism among the Householders, a fear of serious change, a reluctance to take leaps in the dark such as never was in the late Lord Derby; but nobody appeals to it, while of the past we now never hear a word. Do men like Sir Richard Cross really believe in the existence of two human natures in England, that they so sedulously keep back from the people the ideas which really influence themselves much more than all their chatter about this or that mistake? Or do they really fancy that the English are separated from all mankind, and can find no happiness in quiet, and monotony, and the slow procession of unexciting events? Can they read nothing in the popular Scotch reluctance to introduce instrumental music into churches but popular want of taste? They are talking, and falsely talking, as if nothing could be attractive but change; and why do they do it? Because, as we believe, they do not understand that they are at last face to face with the English people—a people harder to change than they are, full of tolerance for monotony of life, and full of respect, if not for their ancestors' ways, at least for the accustomed. If the Tories only knew where their strength lay, what a struggle we Liberals should have!

HEREDITARY CONSCIENCE.

MR. ALLANSON PICTON'S very graceful and eloquent reply to one particular point of Miss Cobbe's June paper on "Agnostic Morality," in the new number of the Contemporary Review, is delightful reading; but none the less, it seems to us to miss the main point of Miss Cobbe's powerful argument. Mr. Picton favours the doctrine of "hereditary conscience," and protests against Miss Cobbe's fears of its tendency and significance. But then, he does not notice that while the only drift of his argument is to establish one view, Miss Cobbe's fears and warnings were directed against a quite different view, which really derives no support at all from Mr. Picton's paper. Miss Cobbe denounced the theory of "hereditary conscience" in one sense; Mr. Picton, if we understand him rightly, maintains it in a quite different sense, to which we conceive that no reasonable moralist should feel the least a priori objection. The theory which degrades the conscience, the theory evidently supported and avowed by Vernon Lee's "Baldwin," in the striking dialogue on "The Responsibilities of Unbelief," published in the Contemporary for May, is the theory that the accumulated experience of the race and the individual as to the salutary or prejudicial effects of conduct, constitutes the whole of the moral light of which any particular mind can avail itself. Miss Cobbe expressly defined it as "the theory that our sense of right and wrong is nothing more than the inherited set of our brains in favour of the class of actions which have been found by our ancestors conducive to the welfare of the tribe, and against those of an opposite tendency." Well, that theory Miss Cobbe described, with only the touch of exaggeration needful for an effective illustration, as turning the conscience into nothing better than "the kitchen middens of generations of savages." And she remarked, with no exaggeration at all, that if the conscience were this, and nothing more, the authority which we accord to it would be the authority of "a crowned and sceptred impostor." And so, of course, it would be. Suppose all we had to say for a course of action was that it was the course of action to which inherited bias points, just as inherited bias pointed to the scalping of their enemies by the North-American Indians, or the shooting of their enemies by European duellists,—or, to take examples from actions of a better kind, just as inherited bias points to the public glorification of personal courage or great imaginative power,—then, to declare that such a course of action had the authority of "conscience," would be to assert for that course of action the sanction of nothing better than "a crowned and sceptred impostor," for the crown and the sceptre would be borrowed from one class of ideas, and transferred to another totally different. It is perfectly clear that there is no more dignity in the authority of an inherited bias than in the feature—if feature there be—which expresses that inherited bias in the countenance,—the hawk's eye, or deep-lined mouth, or heavy jaw, which betrays which way the bias goes. After all, bias is nature, and no more. Conscience is either more than nature, something which modifies and alters nature this way or that; or it is, as Miss Cobbe says, "a crowned and sceptred impostor." It is conscience, if we have any conception of its meaning, which, given the inherited set of our nature, asserts what ought to be the momentary action of the individual will which is either to raise or to degrade that nature. It is not conscience which makes a conventional man conform to conventional morality; there is no need of anything but the inherited set of his nature, for that. It is conscience which sometimes makes a conventional man challenge and offend the dictates of conventional morality, whenever a ray of higher light has entered his mind. Nor can we conceive of any answer to the allegation that, so far as a useful and salutary custom has effectually embodied itself in our habits and nature, there is little need of conscience to support it, though there might have been much need of conscience in past generations to start that useful and salutary custom, at a time when it was a strange and alarming innovation.

Well, but what is it that Mr. Picton has to bring against Miss Cobbe's objection to the doctrine of hereditary conscience? Nothing in the world, as it seems to us, except the contention that man's moral progress is as gradual as his physical or mental progress. As a matter of fact, we doubt the absolute truth of this assertion. We should have said that nothing is more remarkable, so far as the lights of history serve us, than the great moral catastrophes of the world,—the enormous influence which particular minds have had in altering morally the course of social evolution, and impressing unexpected tendencies upon it. But, be that as it may, it is quite one thing to say that moral change is as gradual as every other kind of change, and quite another to say that moral change is nothing but the "quintessence of accumulated experiences of the effects of conduct,"—in other words, that it is nothing but the accumulated experience of the bad effects of falsehood which makes men abandon falsehood,—that it is nothing but the accumulated experience of the bad effects of cruelty which makes men abandon cruelty. Mr. Picton refers to two evil practices,—that of Spartan infanticide and that of cannibalism,—to prove, what we do not know that any one denies, that the moral evil of these practices has not always been perceived by men. But does he really imagine that it was the "accumulated experience" of the moral evil of putting to death sickly and deformed children which cured the Greeks of a practice which, for anything we know,—if Agnostic morality should really gain the upper hand,—our posterity may resume and enforce, as the greatest of all duties towards the humanity of the future? Does he really think, again, that it is "the accumulated experience" of the evil results of cannibalism that has cured any single savage tribe that ever existed of the practice of cannibalism? He must be in possession of very remarkable evidence from which all the rest of the world is excluded, if he does. So far as we know, the flowing tide of sympathy and compassion and reverence for human misery, has never been the result of any "accumulated experience" of the evil results of stamping out misery, but has been the offspring of new religious belief, of new gratitude to God, new faith in man,—in short, of the awakening of the human conscience to the consciousness of a new claim. As to the extinction of the practice of cannibalism, there is, we believe, no historical evidence of its disappearance except,—just as in the case of the disappearance of suttee,—through the moral pressure of higher races to whose genius it was intolerable. Neither in the case of Suttee nor in that of cannibalism is there the least evidence of the evil practice having disappeared through the discovery by any of the people who had been brought up to respect the practice, that its consequences tended to the degradation of the race. And even if such a discovery had been made, unless there were some great command spoken out by the conscience to impose on men the absolute duty of ceasing to do what tends to the degradation of the race, and of doing what tends to the improvement of the race, the change would be no nearer at hand than before. Now, if such a command of conscience did thrill through any race, that would be precisely what no accumulated experience could account for. Though an accumulated experience of evil results might possibly in time disgust men with a particular sort of practice, so that it might fall into disuse, it is quite certain that its sudden discontinuance solely because it was found to tend to the degradation of the race, would require a supreme effort of conscience and of will. Practices which in the opinion of the highest minds tend to the degradation of the race are religiously and accurately observed,—and would be observed, if they were believed ever so much to tend to the degradation of the race,—by savage and civilised races without number. Even in our own country, dram-drinking is not left off through any automatic result of the accumulation of experience to show that it tends to the degradation of the race; it succumbs only to the vehement efforts of religious and moral zeal brought to bear early on the young, and then only by appeals to a conscience which, far from representing the inherited habits of their ancestors, engages them in a fierce struggle with the cravings to which those habits have given birth.

Mr. Picton, like all the evolutionists, is very strong upon the analogy between the growth of the individual through all the stages of human development in a single lifetime, and the growth of the race through the same stages in a cycle of thousands or hundreds of thousands of years. But he does not see that this analogy is all against his own view, not in favour of it. He says:—

"I insist upon the manifest fact of the evolution of conscience in the individual. The grown man of average moral development recognises conscience as a sacred monitor. It tells him, as Miss Cobbe rightly desires, not what is safe, but what is right. It tells him instantly, the moment moral relations are presented, and only then gets confused when the man begins to argue with it, and to demand the grounds of its inspirations. Is not this all that can be desired by the most 'transcendental' doctrine of conscience? Yet if the history of that man be candidly examined, it will be found that once he had no conscience at all, and that all the distinctions it now makes dawned imperceptibly upon him in the course of his experience. In fact, as Vernon Lee makes Baldwin say: they have been 'enforced upon him by mankind.' The man inherited from the youth, the youth from the boy, the boy from the infant, the infant from the baby. And the imperceptible germ in the last was evolved through successive stages by experience—yes, experience whether of divine or human influences. But does it follow, therefore, that this man's conscience is 'a crowned and sceptred impostor?' Certainly not, any more than the eagle is a winged impostor, because it was once an apparently lifeless speck within an egg. That speck has come to the 'supreme dominion' of the air through a course of feeble pecking, and clawing, and fluttering. But it is not the less a perfect thing now, a miracle of swift perception and winged power; not the less divine because God has chosen a slow method of making it. Now, why should it make so great a difference if the evolution is continued through a number of generations, instead of being completed in one?"

But what does this show? It shows that a youth growing up in a society penetrated everywhere by moral laws, may imbibe the moral authority of those laws from those who already acknowledge and obey them. But how does that explain why a generation of men who have grown up under a bad set of laws, and who recognise no visible authority which condemns those laws and points out where they do injustice to human nature, should ever come to throw off the evil effect of those laws, and to adopt a newer and nobler standard of conduct? What Mr. Picton fails, in our opinion, to see, is that the power of conscience displays itself not chiefly in enforcing the conventional principles which have passed into the character of a generation,—unless, indeed (as occurs now and then), these conventional principles be challenged and overset by a sudden onset of wild passion,—but in exchanging these principles for nobler and better principles, or in applying them in some higher and more vivid fashion. The young man does not show his mettle by merely accepting the morality of his set, but by aiming at a higher morality. The generation does not show its morality by conforming to the standard of its fathers, but by pushing beyond it. Now, if this be so, whence does this force which, so far from being transmitted by the accumulated experience of our ancestors, definitely transcends that experience, proceed? Where did Socrates get the guidance which so offended the Athenians that they put him to death? Where have the great religions of the world found the impulse which inaugurated, again and again, a new era? Surely not in the "accumulated experience" of previous generations, but in some intimate, divine voice, which, like the dæmon of Socrates, assured him to whom it spoke of the power to encounter the "accumulated experience" of the race, and to vanquish it, even though that experience seemed to have bound the human mind in bonds of iron. For our own parts, we know no analysis of conscience more hopelessly inadequate and inconsistent with the facts of the case than Mr. Darwin's. He analyses remorse into the mere recurrence of the more persistent, amiable emotion, so soon as the temporary, selfish emotion has been gratified and has passed away. But, first of all, this assumes that the more amiable emotions are the more persistent, which is not true,—envy and pride and vindictive passion, for instance, being at least as persistent as any amiable emotion that can be conceived. And next, what is much more important, it implies that any emotion which can make itself felt persistently, will fill us with remorse for the gratification of a more urgent inconsistent emotion, an assumption which is simply erroneous. The child who gives away its bread to another still more destitute, and goes away hungry, has doubtless a persistent feeling of gnawing at the stomach, after its benevolent feeling has been gratified. But does it feel remorse for not having satisfied its own hunger, directly that hunger becomes the uppermost sensation of its life? Assuredly not. Mr. Darwin, in his eagerness to develop conscience from below, left out the consideration which is of the essence of conscience,—namely, the relative rank of the unsatisfied and the satisfied feeling, and the inward monitor which determines that relative rank. Miss Cobbe is quite right. As she has amply shown in her new volume of essays, "Darwinism in Morals,"* Mr. Darwin makes no distinction at all between remorse and regret. Any analysis of conscience which identifies it with the mere accumulated experience of the past as to the happiness or unhappiness—giving results of past conduct, would turn it into "a crowned and sceptred impostor." Indeed, as a matter of fact, the voice of conscience is never really recognised except as the authoritative voice in an inward struggle. And the authoritative voice in an inward struggle never can speak merely on the teaching of accumulated experience. It must either countersign the teaching of that experience, as having a sacred moral claim on us,—which the drift of the accumulated experience of the past need not have at all,—and then it is the conscience which gives it that claim, and not the mere experience; or it must contest the tradition of the past, call upon our faith to defy and reverse that tradition, and to rebel against it. In either case, assuredly Conscience is "crowned and sceptred," but not an impostor, for it determines what value to assign to the bias of experience, or whether rather to ignore and to defy it.

POVERTY AND POETRY.

COLLIERS, it is said, in some districts of Northern England object to wash, because the process, as they allege, "takes the strength out of their backs." That may be a story of the old world before the Education Act, but there are certainly men alive in our day who believe that it is on the same ground bad for the poor to understand Poetry, for they write to the Pall Mall Gazette and say so. The poor, they say, if they allowed their minds to feel emotion sufficiently to appreciate poetry, would perceive the misery of those around them and their own too keenly, and would be unable to bear their situation. They are compelled by the necessities of their daily lives to harden themselves, to close their minds, to attend only to what is necessary, and so to obtain by concentration and induration the strength to bear their lot, and go on working. "Men out of work, too, have to get hardened. There is no use in increased susceptibility, when it has to face a hungry family, and nothing to give to the family to eat. The beautiful crystals of the snowflakes, or the gorgeous tracery of the frost on their windows, ought not to mean anything more to them than increased shivering. If they have deeper meanings, so, too, must the hunger and cold of their children,—that is, maddening emotions." That is so singular an opinion, and involves such far-reaching consequences, that it may be worth while to consider it a little, and ascertain, if we can, whether it is well founded, or whether it is one of those rather sensational opinions to which the Pall Mall Gazette, in its honourable passion of pity for the poor of great cities, is just now fond of giving circulation. We may, we suppose, take it to be true that for the next century or so the majority of the earth's inhabitants will be exceedingly poor, compelled to labour all day and every day at disagreeable and monotonous work, in order to obtain rather less food and clothing than they would like to have, will sleep in narrow quarters, and will be in the cities hideously crowded,—as we may remark the Chinese are, no less than the English. That has been the destiny of mankind in all ages and all climates, in countries like Madras, where there are no rich and where the land is "nationalised," as in countries like Scotland, where, amidst the multitude who toil and the many who are comfortable, a few are rich to opulence. We shall not, we fear, within the century, either teach the birds to dig for us, as Mr. Percy Greg says they do in Mars, or so control electricity as to grow crops without the agency of labour; and the opinion of the writers we quote, therefore, comes to this,—that for the infinite majority of the human race, anything which arouses emotion, and especially poetry, is positively injurious. A fortiori, religion will do them harm, for nothing rouses the emotions like religion; and education cannot be beneficent, for it awakens the capacity for ideas; and even some virtues must be banished, for they—say, for example, patriotism—develop lofty thoughts and unselfish feelings, and do not permit the heart properly to harden. Indeed, we do not see how, in true logic, any mental effort can be permitted, for every such effort must make the mind less hard, more pliable, and more receptive; and we are driven at last to the philosophy of Mr. Trollope's old bricklayer, who, seeing Mr. Crawley in deep suffering, revealed to him his own gospel, and that of these correspondents of our contemporary, in the brief and memorable saying, "It is dogged as does it."

It would be unfair to hold these gentlemen to all the consequences deducible from their argument, for they only intend to say that the mind which has become sensitive to Poetry has become sensitive to so much, that poverty is a harder burden than ever, indeed an intolerable one, but we may, without unfairness, ask of them a little evidence of the effect they ascribe to poetry. Are the minds which can receive poetry thereby unfitted to bear the strain of exceptionally hard lives, or even less fitted than the minds which have been properly indurated by concentration on the daily needs of the body? The Spartans, who did not coddle themselves, thought otherwise, and held the ability to feel the influence of Tyrtæus a source of hardihood in the soldiers, but we have no need to revert to the half-understood disciplinary systems of the past. The "poetical" races—those which, on the whole, understand and feel the influence of poetry—are seen to bear poverty best. There is no poverty like that of the Arab, who talks and hears and loves a transcendental poetry. There are in the South no harder lives than those of the Provençal peasantry, and they all understand their local poetry, and love it. There are in the North no men who have to bear more than the poorer Scotch artisans and agricultural labours, and they are remarkable amongst all who speak English for their appreciation of at least one great poet, Robert Burns, the one man, perhaps, in our time who has sung with the voice of a nation. Do our friends, for we entirely comprehend and honour their savage pity for the poor, really believe that the poor Scotch, who, while living in wynds and hungering for more to eat, remember and appreciate Burns's songs, really bear poverty worse than the stolid English labourers of the cities, who know nothing of ballads, or aught else, though, strange to say, they are sensitive to music? Surely, the evidence shows that the Hebridean, who labours so hard in his terrible climate to get a little oatmeal, is positively happier, moves more lightly under his poverty, than his far better situated brother in the Isle of Wight, who earns in a pleasant climate a little better food, but has no sense of poetry in his soul. The Hebridean is at least as strong to endure as his southern rival; yet for him, ignorant as he is on many points, poetry is almost as full of charm as for the cultured gentleman; and his own ballad literature, the Psalms of David, and if he knows Scotch, the songs of Burns, are full not only of delight, but of relief. Are there men on earth in worse poverty than the Neapolitan labourers, who march five miles to their work before daylight, earn scarcely bread to keep them alive, and sleep amidst foulnesses worse than those of our rookeries, yet are full many of them of songs, and would think non-appreciation of poetry, such as reaches them, simply barbaric. This writer has seen in India crowds of men to whose poverty that of dockyard labourers is wealth—men eating but once a day, because the second meal was unattainable—sit hours under the trees listening to the poetry which Mr. Edwin Arnold tries to familiarise amongst us, poetry of the most emotional kind, and return to their labour for bread with their poverty perceptibly lightened. It is vain to say they were merely performing a religious rite, for with the wonderful courtesy of Asia they sat, lest moving feet should intercept the sound of the reciter's voice, and as the poetry took possession of them, as the emotion grew deeper, swayed in hot excitement, or sprang, uncontrollable even by custom, to their feet. Even among our own people, who are singularly devoid of poetic appreciation, the poorest often reveal its possession, nor do we find that the sailors who sing are those who feel most bitterly the hardship of a night aloft in the Channel in early spring. Yet that is probably the hardest, though it is not the most depressing, life lived among us. There are men in Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Wales who toil as even London labourers do not, and who will talk exultingly of poetry—real poetry, we mean—and find not only that their lives are happier and nobler, but that their capacity for toil is quickened by their ability to feel. The evidence is not with those who consider poetry an enfeebling agent, nor can we see how it should be. Poetry is not all alike, and the capacity for feeling it may be capacity for receiving the most strengthening, the most exciting, or the most quieting of thoughts. There are races whose poetry is a wail—that is said to be true, though we do not know it, of all Gipsies—and they do not bear their dreadful lives the worse. Would "H." and his confrères really assert that the feeling for the poetry of resignation—which we personally know in one district to be a specialty of the very poor old women, leading dreadful lives—makes life more full of torture, or increases its burden in any way whatever? Was any labourer that ever lived the feebler, or the more near madness, for feeling as the Chartist operatives of Norwich used to feel Ebenezer Elliot's song:—

"Pain but appears to be;
What are man's fears to Thee,
God if all tears shall be Gems on Thy throne"?

And if there is in one kind of poetry a charm which can alleviate suffering, and diminish fear, and make all surroundings stand farther off from the real man, why not in poetry altogether, which, if felt, must at least give a pleasure to those who have so few? Would these writers say that any other pleasure weakened? Is it not the very burden of their wail that to the very poor no pleasure comes, that they suffer and toil endlessly, and there is no relief? We believe that they are wholly wrong, wrong from the beginning, that the bodily miseries of life are most felt by those to whom the body is all in all, and that the cultivated can bear when the uncultivated collapse. The wretched man whom Punch draws this week beaten down by a demand for rent, which, nevertheless, Society never contracted to pay for him, would be the stronger, not the weaker, if he could feel Wordsworth, or even know by heart the wild words in which Shelley has scourged the oppressor. To believe otherwise would be to believe that the best intellectual gifts are curses to all but a minute caste, and that man would be the happier for the extinction in him of all that is higher than the animal. It may be "dogged as does it," but there is no doggedness like that of the man who at will is lifted out of himself by his own thoughts, and who can perceive in the very sky above him scenes which lift him out of all sordid surroundings. Our opponents would have had Kossuth in prison think only of the stone walls, and the fetters, and the unworthy rations; but Kossuth asked for a Shakespeare, and lived to see his country free. What is poverty but imprisonment?

A NORWEGIAN PATRIOT.

IT is difficult to say whether Ole Bull was more of a musician or a patriot. In most natures in which the strange gift of music exists to the extent of unmistakable genius, there is no other love or passion that approaches its supremacy; but Ole Bull, though few men have ever been more completely enthralled by the genius of Music, was all his life so fervent a patriot that one hesitates to say whether his deepest sympathies were touched more easily by his fiddle or by the Norse flag. To the older generation of musical Englishmen his name is still familiar, and it is not likely that any one who ever saw him would soon forget his personal appearance; but it is more than twenty years since his violin was heard here, and many of the younger generation have probably never heard even his name. Those twenty years, and indeed the twenty years before them, were years of uninterrupted success—of great audiences wrought to great enthusiasm, of tributes from fellow-workers and gifts from Kings and Emperors, and of the love of every peasant in Norway; but although it is as a musician that his name lives, and that his extraordinary career was passed, the present struggles for constitutional liberty in Norway call him no less appropriately to mind.

Indeed, in the character of Ole Bull it is no more difficult than undesirable to attempt to distinguish between the musician and the patriot. He was born in 1810, four years before the union with Sweden laid the foundation of independent Norwegian life, and almost the first notes of his fiddle recalled the first of the lost sentiments of his native land. For in his youth, Norway was Denmark, and "Norwegian" meant "Dane," as was said by one of those who spoke at his grave; and when he was a mere child he used to seek refuge from unsympathising parents in a lonely spot among the hills of Valestrand, and fiddle away at the Norse folk-songs and dances till the peasants in the neighbourhood were convinced that the hobgoblins and trolls had come to life again, and that the Hulder had returned to their haunts among the mountains. Years afterward, when Frederick VI. of Denmark asked him who had taught him to play, he answered,—"The mountains of Norway;" and thus it is that his music and patriotism are properly inseparable; his music was the path along which Norway was led back to its own. "He brought Norway home to the Norsemen," said Hendrik

Wergeland; and the same secret of the source and influence of his genius is sung by the national poet Welhaven, in the tribute to Ole Bull which Björnson has called one of the most beautiful lyrics ever written:—

"A summer's eve he listening stood,
His strings all tuned together,
While melody burst from field and wood
And rolled o'er dewy heather.
And all his strings the gift repay,
In wondrous echo ringing
Of throstle's love, and elfin play,
And sighs, and birches singing."

What he had learned from Norway and her traditions, that he gave back to her in the shape of a vitalising influence toward national independence and the creation of a national literature, a national music, and a national drama, drawing its life from the glorious achievements of the past. Ole Bull's voice was one of the loudest of those raised to wake the old Norse spirit from its long sleep.

The story of his long life has been told in its completeness, for the first time, in a delightful memoir just published by his widow, and it is doubtful if the century can point to a more remarkable career. He came of a musical family, but, as is almost always the case, his passion was sternly discouraged in favour of a sober bread-and-butter profession, and in his early days the discouragement sometimes took a very vigorous form. Once he had persuaded his father to buy him a bright red violin from a travelling Frenchman. It was laid away in its case, and the young Ole put to bed in his little cot in his parents' room. Telling the story, years afterwards, he said:—

"I could not sleep for thinking of my new violin. When I heard father and mother breathing deep, I rose softly and lighted a candle, and in my night-clothes did go on tiptoe to open the case and take one little peep. The violin was so red, and the pretty pearl screws did smile at me so! I pinched the pearl screws just a little with my fingers. It smiled at me ever more and more. I took up the bow and looked at it. It said to me that it would be pleasant to try it across the strings. So I did try it, just a very, very little; and it did sing to me so sweetly! Then I did creep further and further away from the bedroom. At first I did play very soft. I make very, very little noise. But presently I did begin a capriccio which I like very much, and it do go ever louder and louder, and I forgot that it was midnight, and that everybody was asleep. Presently, I hear something go crack! and the next minute I feel my father's whip across my shoulders. My little red violin dropped on the floor, and was broken. I weep much for it, but it did no good."

But the whip did not prevail, and the little red violin had many successors, among them several of the most famous violins in the world. At the University, his tutor forbade him to play; so he learned to whistle and sing, and by-and-by discovered that he could do both at once, and thus study the laws of harmony. But the University could not hold him, and at last he sailed away to Paris, and saw Norway no more till he was a famous musician. The struggle was a very hard one at first; he was wretchedly poor, and his proud spirit accorded ill with the asking of favours. When he applied for a place in the orchestra of the Opéra Comique, he was handed a piece of music to play. Finding it ridiculously below his powers, he asked ironically at which end he should begin, and was naturally enough dismissed on the spot. It was, too, the year of the cholera in Paris, 1831, and he fell severely ill; but his illness was the means of revealing to him the character of the daughter of his landlady, and she afterwards became his wife. Slowly his genius gained a recognition, and he rose to the front rank. From that time his career is a record of success after success, and his travels became a triumphal progress. In turn he visited Switzerland, Italy, France, England, Belgium, Germany, Russia, Denmark, and Norway, and returned to most of them again and again. In England he began by playing for the Duke of Devonshire, and then in London, where he played in 1836 at a Philharmonic concert, with Malibran and Thalberg, and afterwards with Rubini, Tamburini, and Lablache. "Much as Paganini has done," said the Times, in a highly eulogistic notice, "this artist has certainly opened up a new field on the instrument." "A more perfect performance can scarcely be imagined." After the sudden death of Malibran, he was invited to fill her place, and received £800 for a single night at the Liverpool festival. In sixteen months he gave two hundred and seventy-four concerts in the United Kingdom. In 1843 he went to America, which was destined to become his second home, for it was there that he married his second wife, the lady to whom we owe the present memoir, and there that many eventful years of his life were spent. He travelled through all the principal States, until his name became almost as well known and he himself almost as much beloved in America as in Norway. And not the least of the memorials of him is the picture of the tall musician in the "Tales of a Wayside Inn," who,—

"Walked the room,
With folded arms and gleaming eyes,
As if he saw the Vikings rise,
Gigantic shadows in the gloom;
And much he talked of their emprise,
And meteors seen in Northern skies,
And Heimdal's horn and day of doom."

His memoir is full of strange adventures,—how he was rescued from poverty by Vidocq, the famous chief of the Paris police; how, when stricken with yellow fever in Panama, he had to crawl out of bed and lie upon the floor to escape the bullets of a passing revolution; his feat of strength, when he received the common Western invitation to "drink or fight," from a band of ruffians on a Mississippi steamboat, and chose the latter alternative; how he played his Sæterbesøg on his sixty-first birthday on the top of the Pyramid of Cheops; the enormous sums of money which he earned, and the child-like confidence through which he lost most of them; the gifts he received, the friends he made, and the charities he bestowed; but of all these we have no room to speak.

One incident of his career, however, is too important and too typical to be omitted, typical at once of his patriotism, his self-sacrificing courage, and his business capacities. In 1853 he purchased 125,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania, with the desire to "found a new Norway, consecrated to liberty, baptised with independence, and protected by the Union's mighty flag." Five villages were laid out, three hundred houses were built, colonists came flocking in, and he negotiated a contract to supply the Government with 10,000 cannon. All this was done at his own expense, his whole fortune being risked in it, and he himself working so hard at his concerts as often to be compelled to go without his dinner. So gigantic an enterprise, with no sterner conductor than this simple-minded and trustful musician, could have only one end, but the ruin of its supporter came in a sadder way than from his own Utopian confidence. When the land was bought and paid for, the forest cleared, and 800 settlers at home there, Ole Bull discovered that he had purchased a fraudulent title, and was defied, and narrowly escaped being poisoned, by the man who had sold it to him. By a series of protracted law-suits some thousands of dollars were saved from the wreck; but his health broke down under the strain, and, so far as money was concerned, his life had to be begun again.

In his native land, Ole Bull strove to realise his patriotism in two ways. "My calling in this world is the Norse music," he said, and his calling was far too sure for him to be deceived into inaction by any such doctrine as that of Art for Art's sake; "the desire of my life," he added, "has been to give it strings,"—to give it strings that it might carry the Norse life into the hearts of his countrymen, to reissue thence in all native modes of expression, becoming a drama in the theatre, a literature in the books, a cause on the battle-field, a religion in the church, a love in the home. His first ideal was "a Norse theatre with a Norse orchestra," and after great efforts he succeeded in realising it. On January 2nd, 1850, a date which is now regarded as the birthday of the Norwegian drama, this theatre was opened at Bergen, under the directorship of Bjørnsterne Björnson. The Storching, however, refused to support the enterprise by the yearly appropriation that was subsequently asked, and after two years the theatre passed into other hands. But the seed was sown, thirty years afterwards a wreath was laid on Ole Bull's grave in the name of the National Theatre. His second ideal was a Norwegian Academy of Music, but in this he succeeded only in sowing the seed, and the harvest is still waiting to be gathered.

In 1880 he died, and was buried with such a national mourning as has seldom been seen, and never more deserved. But his influence is strong still, and the spirit of the "Norse Ole," whose little fiddle began by bringing back the Hulder to the mountains of Valestrand, is working to-day in the hearts of those who are struggling in his steps to bring back fullest liberty to Norway.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—You call upon Mr. Goschen to accept the Democracy, and urge him to apply his mind to the great problem of securing under it a fit representation of all thinking men, as well as of unthinking crowds. I would remind you how great the importance of this problem was held by J. S. Mill, who was certainly no half-hearted Liberal. In his "Considerations on Representative Government," a work which has a much closer relation to the practical problems of our own day than to those of the time when it was written, he says that no arrangement of the suffrage can be permanently satisfactory in which any person or class is peremptorily excluded, in which the electoral privilege is not open to all persons of full age who desire to attain it (p. 167).

But he declares that the virtual blotting-out of the minority which is involved in a system of equal electoral districts in each of which the labouring-class would be in the majority, is far from having any connection with democracy, but is diametrically opposed to the first principle of democracy,—representation in proportion to numbers. It is an essential part of democracy that minorities should be adequately represented. No real democracy, nothing but a false show of democracy, is possible without it (p. 137). Accordingly, he advocates most strongly Hare's system of proportional representation. In fact, without such a system, or unless a plurality of votes were given to educated persons, he apparently would not have been prepared to support any wide extension of the franchise (p. 179). Hitherto, minorities have been very amply protected by the anomalies of the representation. Scotland is the only part of the country in which, owing to the greater equality of the constituencies, the majority can be considered to have been over represented.

But in view of the growing agitation for a more logical system of representation and for equal electoral districts, supporters of a minority representation will have to consider whether to rely on the survival of the present anomalies, or whether to formulate and familiarise the world with some proposal that shall more logically attain their object. Mr. Forster, in a speech at Leeds last winter, though inclined even with equal electoral districts to rely on the accidents of locality, has acknowledged that it is becoming necessary to examine closely the schemes of minority representation. The most perfect scheme before the world is that elaborated by Mr. Hare. In the form he gave it, it has repelled almost every one, on account of its unworkable complexity, and for other reasons. But it has been simplified into possibility by a change which at the same time removes some of its other chief objections. Instead of making one vast constituency of the whole country, and giving every voter power to inscribe his voting-paper with a list of a thousand candidates, by this modified plan the constituencies are arranged in groups, each group returning half a dozen Members, more or less. A voter may vote for any candidate standing for any constituency in his own group, but nowhere else. His vote can only benefit one candidate, but he may write on his voting-paper several names, in the order of his preference. If the person whose name stands first has already received so many votes as to be sure of election, the vote is not spent in uselessly swelling his majority, but goes to help the candidate whose name stands on the list as the voter's next choice. In the form of which these are the salient points, the system presents no intellectual difficulty to the voter, though the process to be gone through by the returning officer in distributing the votes necessarily remains somewhat complex. This form preserves the well-known excellences of Hare's system. It insures a proportional representation of opinions much more perfect than can be attained by any arrangement of cumulative voting or three-cornered constituencies. At the same time, it avoids the great faults of excessive centralisation, of giving excessive power to wire-pullers and organisations, and of flooding the House with crotcheteers. It will not be so easy for a crotcheter to obtain the support of a sixth part of the electors in a constituency of sixty thousand, as to collect ten thousand votes out of the whole country.

Further, a strong, practical recommendation of this form is that it can be tried experimentally on a single group of constituencies without the general introduction. In this way the principles of the system could be made familiar to men's minds, and its working put to a decisive test. The English Universities form an excellent subject on which the experiment might be made. They are constituencies based on a different theory and governed by a different law to any others. They are constituencies of similar composition and of special intelligence, and, therefore, fitted for union, and for the introduction of a system mainly objected to because of the difficulty of understanding it. Each of them contains a minority eminently deserving of representation. Moreover, in the opinion of unbiassed friends, such as the Attorney-General and Mr. Goschen, they are doomed constituencies, unless they can establish some greater claim to the consideration of the country than they at present possess. If these fears are well founded, my recommendation becomes a matter of policy as well as of principle for University electors, and for those who wish to see a continuance of University representation. It would ensure their survival as constituencies, and their electors should be gratified by the chance of introducing so eminently conservative a principle into the country.—I am, Sir, &c., Lincoln's Inn, November 6th.

J. PARKER SMITH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I find it difficult to understand the reason of the hatred to the Minority Clause felt by so many honest Liberals, of whom Mr. Bright is the foremost. I suppose it comes from the English dislike of any arrangement that is not simple and easily understood. But before the Party, as a whole, comes to a conclusion about the matter, it would be well to examine what are the precise effects of the clause. Under present circumstances, I shall show that it gives an increase of five votes to the Party. What may the result of the extension of the franchise in the counties can scarcely be foretold with any accuracy.

There are seven counties under the clause,—Berks, Bucks, Cambs, Dorset, Hereford, Hertford, and Oxford. Except Hereford, every one returns two Conservatives and one Liberal, and Hereford election presents the curious feature that of two Conservative and two Liberal candidates, one Conservative was at the top and the other at the bottom of the poll. Omitting, therefore, Hereford as an unintelligible county, we find that the result of the clause in the counties is to give six seats to Liberals, which without it would almost certainly be filled by Conservatives.

Turn now to the cities. There are six of them under the clause,—London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, and Glasgow. Of these, two return three Liberals, two return two Liberals and one Conservative, and two return a minority Liberal Member. Liverpool, like Hereford, may be omitted from the calculation, as parties are pretty evenly divided, and it is not likely that, without the clause, either party could carry all three seats. Witness the last election, when Mr. Smith won a fair, stand-up fight, without any minority clause to help him. The result, then, of withdrawing the clause from the cities would be that the Liberals would gain one seat each in Manchester and Leeds, and lose a seat in London,—a nett gain of one. Taking this from the six seats gained to the party in the counties, it appears that the withdrawal of the clause would, in all probability, lose the Liberals five seats at the next election, equal to ten votes in a division. Observe that I do not assert that a clause is necessarily good in itself, if it adds to the strength of the Liberal Party. I simply say that Liberals, quâ Liberals, are acting unwisely, in my humble judgment, in attacking the clause. It is sometimes said that the clause reduces the representation of great cities to the level of small towns; but let any Member bring in a Bill adversely affecting Manchester or Leeds, and he will soon find three Members assailing it.

One other remark on the clause. Under its operation at the last general election, four counties out of seven and one city were spared the turmoil and expense of an election, the strength of parties being understood, and the candidates arranged by the respective parties. This would not have been the case without the clause, and it seems to me to be no light argument in its favour that it brings about an uncontested arrangement in more than one-third of the cases under its influence.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Apart from the general question of minority representation, there is a special objection to "one-Member constituencies,"—they are liable to be left uncontested. (1.) There may be a Member with great "local influence," quite pure influence possibly, or at any rate moral influence, and not to be reached by the Corrupt Practices Act. Nobody thinks of trying to turn him out, and if there is only one seat, he keeps it for ever; but if there were two seats, there might be a contest for the second one. (2.) The minority loses heart much sooner in the case of a solitary seat. It may not be easier to snatch one of two seats than to snatch a solitary seat from the majority, but it always seems easier. To make contests possible, the minority must have a hope of getting something.

It is needless to point out that our political system rests not merely on elections, but on contested elections. The elector watches politics to see which way to give his vote, and the Member makes speeches to the elector with a view to keep his vote. If there is no chance of a contest, the Member and the electors drift out of relation to each other, and the end is political apathy. An uncontested election is a temporary disfranchisement.—I am, Sir, &c.,

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I had the privilege of hearing the remarkable speech Mr. Leonard Courtney, M.P., delivered here last Monday, and have since refreshed my memory by reading a verbatim report of his remarks. Having done so, I cannot but think that you were misled by a bald summary in a London paper, when you attributed to him dissent from the conclusions of the Leeds Conference "partly because they had condemned the present minority seats accorded to a few great county and town constituencies." Mr. Courtney himself condemned the present system as "a plan of the roughest and worst character," and certainly he would not extend it. His complaint was that the Leeds Conference passed a resolution condemning minority representation as a principle, and he taunted the delegates with contradicting themselves, when, having laid down at the outset the principle—"We want to give every vote an equal power"—they passed a resolution condemning proportional representation, or minority representation, which is, I use Mr. Courtney's own words, "a means of giving to every voter the same power, a means of securing to every voter the same share in the representative body." This is quite a different position, and one with which, if I have read my Spectator aright, you yourself sympathise. In closing your article to-day on Mr. Goschen's speech at Edinburgh, you hint at the undesirability of the views, wishes, and thoughts of the thoughtful being swamped in the sea of votes. Mr. Courtney anticipated you, when he spoke to us here last Monday on the degradation of the character of Parliament, and inferentially of the people of England, which must follow, if there is not found in Parliament a continual representation of independence and originality of thought.

Mr. Courtney has done what the Spectator advises Mr. Goschen to do. He has accepted the Democracy, and, doing so, has applied his mind to securing under it "a fit representation of all thinking men, as well as of the unthinking crowds."—I am, Sir &c.,

HUMAN VIVISECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Vivisectioners of animals are wont to repudiate the accusation of being moved merely by the ardour of scientific curiosity. They assure us that they pursue their odious work from pure enthusiasm of humanity, which leads them to crush their natural impulses of pity to the suffering brutes in the hope of finding relief for the diseases of men and women. The whole literature of Vivisection is a tacit refutation of this claim, crammed as it is with expressions of scientific "interest," and even of "pleasure," in experiments, and void almost totally of reference to the humane longings which ought, on the hypothesis, to breathe through every line. The following extract, from a very important recently published volume, affords, however, I venture to think, a still more direct evidence of absolute disregard of the interests of a human sufferer, when a curious problem of science may be solved by setting him aside. As such cases will not readily find their way to English readers, I shall feel greatly indebted to you if you will give this one the publicity of a place in your columns.—I am, Sir, &c.,

FRANCES POWER COBBE.

In the "Archives Italiennes de Biologie," Tom. II., p. 441 (Turin, 1882), there is a review of a paper by Dr. Ezio Sciamanna, communicated by him to the R. Accademia dei Lincei, Vol. XIII., June 25th 1882. The paper treats of "Phenomena produced by the application of the electric current to the dura mater, and modification of the cerebral pulse" (polso cerebrale). The reviewer writes as follows:—"In making these researches, the author proposed to himself to solve the question whether the excitation of the brain causes the same results in the human subject as are obtained in the case of animals, and particularly in the case of apes." "The individual who served for his experiments was Rinalducci, who entered the hospital under the care of Sciamanna, on March 23rd, 1882, for a fracture of the right parietal bone. Trepanning was considered needful, and a circular opening of 35 m. in diameter was made through the skull. The dura mater was left exposed, and the experimenter was obliged to limit himself to exciting the brain through this membrane." (After this statement, the reviewer, without pause, proceeds in the next paragraph to make the following startling remark):—"The autopsy, carried out four days after the entrance of the patient into the hospital, revealed the exact points of the brain which had been excited during life. The points were marked in black on the dura mater shortly after death, and served for localisation at the autopsy as indicating the corresponding parts in the brain itself." (Reference here follows to the two very remarkable lithographs of poor Rinalducci's head in the Appendix to the "Archives.") "Two words," continues the reviewer, "on the method of excitation. The author used Faraday's current, and the galvanic current. For want of space the author preferred single-poled applications. The positive electrode was held fixed, either on an unexcitable point of the dura mater, or outside the opening on the summit of the head, or on the sternum. The negative electrode, on the contrary, was moved about (on déplaçait) over the dura mater, and notes were taken of the motor phenomena which these displacements produced. The intensity of the current was felt to the end of the fingers. The individual was not asleep; once only, and that ineffectually, chloral, anaesthesia was attempted." After this follow the results. The mouth of the patient closed, each jaw being in tetanic contraction; movements took place of the arm, left hand, rotation of the head to the left, opening of the mouth, &c. It is remarked that "no spasmodic or jerking movements were observed, such as those which Charcot obtains from his hysterical patients, nor the choréique movements noted by Buthalaw."

JUSTICE TO IRELAND.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Firm, even-handed justice, is what Ireland has too seldom got since her connection with England. Arms Bills and Coercion Acts, if unhappily necessary, should be impartially put in force in North, as well as in South. "Disarm the Orangemen; and insist on Lord Rossmore and Lord Ernest Hamilton abstaining from their mad efforts to cause a breach of the peace." That is what straightforward common-sense demands, and with nothing less will she be satisfied. Is England afraid to do this? So long, during the evil days, she was content to ignominiously rule Ireland through a faction, that now she shrinks from treating that faction as common fairness dictates.

Even the Dublin Daily Express is ashamed of the Orange placards, and letters, and speeches. "We cannot endorse," it says, "all that is being done and said. But then," it adds, "it is poor work criticising in cold blood what is done and said under provocations calculated to stir the blood of the North into a flame." Has the South no blood, and has it received no provocations? Yet its speakers have been not only criticised in cold blood, but thrown into jail, while Orange firebrands are allowed absolute impunity. Perhaps Government still clings to the delusion that the Orangemen are supporting "British interests." Surely you are in error in speaking as if the Nationalists at Rosslea were strangers. It was the Orangemen who were marshalled from all parts,—as far off as Belfast; the Nationalists were men from the neighbourhood.

One word more. Why should not Lord Spencer treat Lord Rossmore as Lord Morpeth did Colonel Verner? Is it that Government has gone back, instead of forward, in its notions of "justice to Ireland?"—I am, Sir, &c.,

Great Cressingham Rectory, Norfolk. HENRY STUART FAGAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—"J. W." in the Spectator of October 27th, though a Liberal, thinks there must be something wrong in the policy of the Liberal party towards Ireland, "when we find our measures bearing such disappointing fruits." This kind of feeling is probably very common. The very idea of patience, of waiting for results, of giving time for good influences to counteract evil ones, and for light to get the better of darkness, appears to have disappeared among whole classes of politicians; and there is a widely spread notion that in our times, as a consequence of increased intelligence, or of steam and electricity, political development is, or may be expected to be, indefinitely more rapid than in former ages. I believe this to be mainly, if not altogether, an error. Political development depends on change of mental habits and character, which is a vital process. Steam and electricity can do nothing to hasten it, and education and the increase of knowledge can act only to a very limited extent. Remember Herbert Spencer's saying, which I regard as one of the most luminous ever uttered, though I have nowhere seen it quoted,—“The social mechanism does not rest on opinions; but almost wholly on character.”

It is only fourteen years since religious equality was established in Ireland, and only thirteen since the first attempt was made by Parliament to reform the worst and most unjust agrarian system existing in any country that did not permit slavery. And there is a special reason why it takes a long time for justice to produce its effect in Ireland. Scientific archaeology has made us familiar with the idea of survivals. The period of stone hatchets survives among the Eskimos. The glacial period survives in Greenland. Sir Wyville Thomson maintained that the chalk period survives in the depths of the Atlantic. And in the same way, that worst period of European history, the seventeenth century—the period of the religious wars—survives in Ireland. Ireland is two hundred years behind Great Britain in political ideas.

Another hindrance to the work of pacification has been the infatuated conduct of the Irish Conservatives, or at least of their organs in the Press, which, during the recent troubles, thought of nothing but making points against the Government, and—at least during the earlier part of the troubles—were never tired of telling the public that the Government looked on the crimes of the Land-leaguers with secret favour. Conservatives said this till they believed it, and it is reasonable to infer that Land-leaguers and Fenians believed it also.

I admit that all this is but cold comfort. But no one is fit for politics who cannot endure to wait. “Let patience have her perfect work.”

“Wait;—my faith is large in time,
And that which works it to some perfect end.”

BEARDS.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”)

SIR,—The triumph of beards over English ecclesiastical prejudice has been more complete than you suppose. There are two English Bishops who were appointed and consecrated when they were bearded men,—the Bishop of Liverpool and the Bishop-Suffragan of Colchester.

A word upon another branch of the subject. Is not the prejudice against gentlemen's coachmen wearing beards a particularly absurd and unreasonable one? Are not they the men whose throats have the greatest need of such protection, because of their constant exposure to night air and to weather of all kinds?—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE ILBERT BILL.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”)

SIR,—Though I look upon the Ilbert Bill as the inevitable sequel of the admission of Natives into the Covenanted Service—in fact, as the natural consequence of a humane and enlightened policy, which, to quicken civilisation, held out prizes to deserving Natives—I cannot help thinking that there is much truth in the following lines, which I take from a letter of one of the leading Native statesmen, at the head of a semi-independent State:—

“The Native Magistrates' Jurisdiction Bill—the Ilbert Bill—has convulsed the whole of India, and from the home papers I can clearly see that it has now become a party question there. Eminent men, official and non-official, have sent in their opinions. Some object to the principle of the Bill; others call in question the expediency, or rather opportuneness. Many Europeans consider it as the invasion of their privileges, but it appears anomalous, as a question of privilege only, that they should surrender it in the Presidency towns, and object to be tried by the same magistrates or one of still higher qualifications while beyond their limits. My own opinion is that the agitators on both sides have blundered egregiously, the result of which has thrown us back some fifty years, by widening the gulf between the two races. No doubt, the Bill, though correct in principle, has been inopportune; while it confers no real benefit on the natives, it has been the cause of hurting the feelings of both communities. The local-self-government scheme is also looked upon with disfavour by many European officials, and though this is a question really affecting the interests of the people, officials who hitherto had everything in their own power will maintain an unyielding attitude.”—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

LYRICS OF PERICLES.—II.*

IV.—EPITHALAMIUM.

EVEN as the Gods plant stars upon the way
Of wanderers distracted and belate,
So shineth fairly on our lord's estate
A starry bride to bless his bed to-day.
Great Hymen, be thy happiest vassals these,
The fair Thaisa and King Pericles.

V.—THAISA'S DIRGE.

Thaisa fair, under the cold sea lying,
Sleeps the long sleep denied to her by Earth;
We, adding sighs unto the wild winds' sighing,
With all our mourning under-mourn her worth:
The white waves toss their crested plumes above her,
Round sorrowing faces with the salt spray wet,
All are her lovers that once learned to love her,
And never may remember to forget:
Shells for her pillow Amphitrite bringeth,
And sad nymphs of the dank weed weave her shroud;
Old Triton's horn her dirge to Ocean singeth,
Whose misty caverns swell the echo loud:
And, while the tides rock to and fro her bier,
What was Thaisa lies entomb'd here.

VI.—PIRATES' SONG.

Our bark is on the rolling sea,
Our prize is on the shore,
In caverns dark the treasures be,
Wrung from the deep before:

The keen keel lave,
Propitious wave,
And yield thy choicest store.

The merchants' argosies may groan
With weight of golden grain,
They toil and spoil for us alone,
That rule the generous main:

Who rob the poor,
Their rede is sure;
We only rob again.

The pirate's is the higher law,
And his the higher power;
The booty of the land-shark's maw
Is forfeit in an hour:

The landsman's greed
May sow the seed,
The seamew plucks the flower.

VII.—MARINA'S DIRGE.

Weep for Marina, plucked too soon
By surly Death;
Robbed, ere her sun reached afternoon,
Of pearly breath:
Forefallen flowers about thy grave we twine;
Alas, Marine!

BOOKS.

SOME WOMEN OF LETTERS.†

THESE two interesting volumes may conveniently be classed together, for the author of the Memories is a grand-daughter of Dr. Aikin, and a great-niece of Mrs. Barbauld. She has something to say, also, of the Edgeworth family, of Mrs. Opie, of Joanna Baillie, and of other personages more or less attractive, who appear in A Book of Sibyls. It may be as well to say a few words about each book separately, and then, with the help of both, as well as from other sources, to recall a few striking characters who, if remembered at all, are known chiefly by name to the present generation.

Of Miss Austen nothing will be said. She stands altogether apart, both in social intercourse and genius, from the women of letters known to each other when living, and now once more presented as literary comrades in Mrs. Ritchie's pages. But even Jane Austen, incomparable though she be in her own way, gives us in her delightful stories no mark of the prophetic strain; and why such women as Miss Edgeworth, Mrs. Opie, and Mrs. Barbauld should be called "Sibyls" is beyond our power to divine. The title, although most unfortunate, is, however, forgotten in the pleasure afforded by these literary portraits. They are drawn with delightful ease; but if we may hint a fault, there are more verbal errors and indications of carelessness than we should have expected to find in the essays of a writer so accomplished. These faults are on the surface, and can be readily removed when the second edition of A Book of Sibyls is called for.

Mrs. Herbert Martin, who edits her mother's Memories, and adds to them a striking but brief account of Gilbert Wakefield, observes that the writer does not lay any claim to literary ability. The statement is a modest one, but the reader will not think that it is required. Beyond a few needless repetitions common to authors of more literary pretension, there is scarcely a page in the volume which we could wish away. We may add, that several incidents and stories are recorded by both writers, and that both have something fresh to say of a period prolific in what Miss Edgeworth quaintly called "female literature."

The names of Mrs. Barbauld, of her niece, Lucy Aikin, "who by no means hid her light under a bushel," and of Joanna Baillie, are all intimately associated with Hampstead. When they flourished, in the early years of this century, it was a charming country village, with many old houses standing in large grounds, and with scenes of exquisite country beauty visible on all sides. There was no London suburb equal to it in rural charm, and the purity of the air made it a favourite resort of invalids. With the literature of the last century also its associations are numberless, for hither came Steele and Gay, and Arbuthnot and Armstrong; here Johnson wrote his Vanity of Human Wishes, and here his "Tetty" is said to have indulged herself in country air and nice living, while her husband was drudging in the smoke of London. And do we not all remember how, three or four years before the publication of that satire, Clarissa Harlowe vainly escaped to Hampstead to hide from her tormentor, which made Mrs. Delany write to Richardson, "I am loth for going to that ugly Hampstead. I have never loved it since Clarissa suffered such persecution there?" And then later on, with the new century, what a number of literary memories are associated with the village! On its "breezy Heath," Wordsworth walked with Crabbe; there Shelley stayed with Leigh Hunt, whose pretty cottage in the Vale of Health is the site of the hideous hotel which, with its surrounding abominations, has now utterly deformed that once rural spot; there Keats wrote his loveliest poetry, and, sitting on the bench at the top of Well Walk, told Hunt that his heart was breaking. Public officials know nothing of such memories, and the old seat, we understand, has been only recently removed by the Board of Works. And Walter Scott, too, came to Hampstead, to visit his beloved Joanna Baillie, whom the writer of this paper, then a boy, remembers seeing in her old age at the parish church, singing the Psalms with cheerful voice, in company with her sister. What a happy-looking, neat-looking couple they were! and neither age nor sorrow seemed to have left a mark of pain on their faces.

The Memories include a recollection of the sisters, dressed in grey silk, with pretty lace caps, listening to a reading of one of Joanna's plays, before a fashionable audience, at the "Holly Bush." "She told us, in her quiet, droll way, that some of her old friends in Scotland were shocked at the line of writing she had taken to, and said she had seen a letter from one. 'Have ye heard that Jocky Baillie has taken to the public line?'" Her house is still standing, near the "Holly Bush," where plays are sometimes read now-a-days, but not Joanna's, and from that house on the hill, with all the love that should accompany old age, both she and her sister were carried to Hampstead Churchyard.

It was in 1786 that Mrs. Barbauld went to Hampstead, her husband having been appointed Unitarian Minister of the chapel on Rosslyn Hill. She describes the village with evident enjoyment, but thinks that, with the exception of Avignon, it is the most windy spot she ever was in. And she pities the young ladies, since there is not a single young man to be seen in the place. "But of widows and old maids, such a plenty!" Hampstead has changed greatly in this respect, as well as in others less desirable. The builders have taken possession of it, and houses, almost gardenless and wholly ugly, are let at absurdly high rents. The fields that separated London and Hampstead are fields no longer, and before many years have passed, it is probable that no green spot will be left, except the Heath, now less than half its original size:—

"I can hardly bear to think of the change," writes the author of the Memories, looking back half a century. "Besides the lovely Heath, there were field-walks and lanes in all directions, and none but the old houses, in nearly all of which we had friends living. I think hardly any one occupied in daily business in London then lived in Hampstead, as there were no omnibuses and, of course, no railroad. . . . The road to town ran between fields for nearly three miles, and except 'Steele's Cottage,' said to have belonged to Sir Richard, there were no houses from Camden Town to Downshire Hill."

The author stayed with her grandmother and her Aunt Lucy Aikin in Church Row, and Aunt Lucy, being then a celebrated writer, was invited, of course, when her publisher, Mr. Longman, gave dinners to "our authors" in his large house close by. One day the poet Moore was a guest. "He was placed next to Mrs. Longman, and there was something said about his carving some poultry for her. He looked alarmed, and cried out, 'I cannot carve. I would not sit next Venus herself, if she asked me to carve her doves.' Poor Mrs. Longman, a matter-of-fact lady, looked perfectly bewildered by this flight."

The eccentric, benevolent, and, so far as his marriage projects were concerned, selfish Thomas Day, Richard Edgeworth's greatest friend, spent his honeymoon and several moons besides at Hampstead, "in inconvenient lodgings," in order to carry his principles about matrimony into immediate practice. His poem of "The Dying Negro," says Maria Edgeworth, "will last as long as manly hearts exist in England,"—a prophecy which, if true, leaves it to be feared, few manly hearts in the country. The History of Sandford and Merton, on the other hand, like some of Miss Edgeworth's own delightful stories for children, is still a favourite with the readers for whom it was written. It is no common achievement to write books for the young which, after a hundred years, have not lost their flavour; but this has been accomplished by Day, and by two of Mrs. Ritchie's Sibyls, Maria Edgeworth and Mrs. Barbauld. As for Mrs. Opie, her tales, once popular, are now forgotten, although they may be still met with in old libraries, and win sometimes a stray reader. Enough honour for her, that one of these stories drew tears from the eyes of Sir Walter Scott.

As a girl and as an elderly lady, Amelia Opie gained all hearts. Mrs. Ritchie's sketch of her is charming. A happy and beautiful young woman, she was the life of the society in which she moved at Norwich; then came nine years of married life with the Royal Academician, John Opie, a man of noble character, and with far higher conceptions of Art than powers of execution. "He was a lover more than a husband," writes his wife. On his too early death, Amelia returned to her father's house at Norwich, and "by degrees she resumed her old life, and came out and about among her friends," retaining until long after middle-life her interest and capacity of enjoyment." Under the influence of Joseph John Gurney, she became a Quaker, but she still loved bright colours and a little worldly excitement. With the kindly, generous qualities of the Friends with whom she now associated, she did not always combine their calmness of demeanour and moderation of expression. "I have heard a lady," says Mrs. Ritchie, "who knew her well, describe her late in life laughing heartily, and impetuously thrusting a somewhat starched-up Friend into a deep arm-chair, exclaiming, 'I will hurl thee into the bottomless pit.'"

In the Hampstead Library stands the first edition of Lovell Edgeworth's Memoirs, begun by himself and concluded by his daughter Maria. The date is 1820, and the old volumes, worn with sixty years' service, were probably placed upon the shelves soon after the day of publication. Edgeworth was an extraordinary man, with boundless spirits, not wholly unneeded, seeing that he married four wives and had eighteen children. His anguish as a widower seems, in two instances, to have been sincere, but he found the surest relief by marrying again in a few months. This may appear eccentric, but it was his way; and that he had a thousand estimable qualities and many rare gifts both of character and intellect, is evident from the Memoirs. Maria Edgeworth was a calm-minded woman, and her admiration of her father is that of a daughter who does not love blindly. The book bristles with interesting points; about Ireland before the Union; about science and mechanism—Edgeworth's inventive faculty was extraordinary—about education, which was one of his early hobbies; about the complicated domestic affairs in which he was of necessity involved; and about the literary occupations which he shared with his eldest daughter:—

"Mr. Edgeworth's life," says Mrs. Ritchie, "was most extraordinary, comprising, in fact, three or four lives in the place of that one usually allowed to most people, some of us having to be moderately content with a half or three-quarters of existence. But his versatility of mind was no less remarkable than his tenacity of purpose and strength of affection, though some measure of sentiment must certainly have been wanting, and his fourth marriage must have taken most people by surprise. The writer once expressed her surprise at the extraordinary influence that Mr. Edgeworth seems to have had over women, and over the many members of his family who continued to reside in his home, after all the various changes which had taken place there. Lady S——, to whom she spoke, said, 'You do not in the least understand what my Uncle Edgeworth was. I never knew anything like him. Brilliant, full of energy and charm, he was something quite extraordinary and irresistible. If you had known him, you would not have wondered at anything.'"

Miss Beaufort, the last of the four wives—depend upon it, there would have been a fifth, had she not providentially survived her husband—was about the age of Maria herself when introduced to Edgeworthstown, and there is something wonderfully unselfish in the way the new inmate was received by the eldest daughter of the house. "You will come into a new house, but you will not come as a stranger," she writes; and Mrs. Edgeworth states that Maria more than fulfilled the promise of her letter. In common with Mrs. Barbauld and Joanna Baillie, Miss Edgeworth appears to have been wholly unlike what we commonly understand by a blue-stocking. She was thoroughly domestic, and her capacity for business was extraordinary. She neglected nothing, was like a second mother to her brothers and sisters, and seems to have had a large capacity for work. All children discovered that she was a woman to be loved. "Some one asked Miss Edgeworth how she came to understand children as she did, what charm she used to win them. 'I don't know,' she said kindly; 'I lie down, and let them crawl over me.'"

"If Maria's tales fail with the public, you will hear of my hanging myself," Mr. Edgeworth wrote. They did not fail in her father's life-time, and many of her shorter stories have the look of permanence about them. But her novels, although well worth reading, are, it is to be feared, not much read in our day. A popular novelist has, indeed, recently adopted the title of one of Miss Edgeworth's fictions, unaware, apparently, of the Belinda to which Miss Austen alludes, when defending her own calling as a novelist in Northanger Abbey:—

"'And what are you reading, Miss —?' 'Oh, it is only a novel!' replies the young lady, while she lays down her book, with affected indifference or momentary shame; 'it is only Cecilia, or Camilla, or Belinda,' or, in short, only some work in which the greatest powers of the mind are displayed, in which the most thorough knowledge of human nature, the happiest delineation of its varieties, the liveliest effusions of wit and humour, are conveyed to the world in the best-chosen language."

If worth secured popularity, Miss Edgeworth would still retain her place, in spite of the great names which have followed hers in this wide domain of literature. With the greatest of them all her name is inseparably linked, since it was the reputation she had won as a novelist of Irish life that roused Scott's ambition to do something similar for Scotland. And we have recently been told that the great Russian novelist, Ivan Turguénief, was himself also an unconscious disciple of Maria Edgeworth. He did not understand English, but his brother translated passages from her Irish Tales and Sketches, and it is probable, said Ivan, if she had not written about the poor Irish of the County Longford, "that it would not have occurred to me to give a literary form to my impressions about classes parallel to them in Russia." To have inspired two such men is an honour of the highest kind. We may ask for more sensational fiction in this age of excitement, but in proportion as we love fidelity to nature shall we return with fresh delight to Maria Edgeworth and to her far greater sister, Jane Austen. It is pleasant to remember that the lives of these true women were worthy of their writings.

SONGS UNSUNG.*

THIS new volume, by the author of Songs of Two Worlds, would be disappointing to us, but for the power and, we might almost say, stateliness, of one of the longest poems it contains,—"The New Creed." We do not think that the narrative poems are successful. "Clytemnestra in Paris," a poem on the Fenayrou trial of last year, does not seem to us a vivid or luminous picture of the interior mind of that mean murderess. "Niobe" cannot be compared with many of the delineations in "The Epic of Hades." "Saint Christopher" fails in clearness. "Odatis" is graceful, but a little wanting in that majestic setting of Oriental detail which the subject seems to need. But "The New Creed" is, in some respects, the most striking poem which Mr. Lewis Morris has ever written. He puts before us with singular simplicity and solemnity of effect the startling amount of diffusion which the belief in a mere blank, both above and beyond, has obtained even among those whom we should describe as the innocent and the happy; he delineates the icy conviction with which this marvellous superstition of unbelief has struck them; the insensate certainty that everything is the work of blind force, and that in blind force it must all end; then he paints with calm distinctness, in the beautiful rhythm he has chosen, the monstrous character of the creed; the far higher claim even of a spiritual Pantheism on the pure intellect than any which this materialism can urge; and finally, the grand spectacle of the Universe as it appears in the light of a profound belief in God, and the upward growth of everything capable of submitting to his will. The poem is one well suited to the mind of Mr. Lewis Morris, but we are not aware that he has ever before written anything at once so impressive, so solemn, and so self-restrained. The opening stanzas, in which he narrates a girl's frigid denial of all hope beyond this earth, the denial that suggested the poem, strike us as singularly powerful, and even in their serene way penetrating and thrilling:—

"THE NEW CREED."

"Yesterday, to a girl I said—
'I take no pity for the unworthy dead,
The wicked, the unjust, the vile who die;
'Twere better thus that they should rot and lie.
The sweet, the lovable, the just Make holy dust;
Elsewhere than on the earth
Shall come their second birth.
Until they go each to his destined place,
Whether it be to bliss or to disgrace.
'Tis well that both shall rest, and for a while be dead.'
'There is nowhere else,' she said.
'There is nowhere else.' And this was a girl's voice,
Who, some short tale of summers gone to-day,
Would carelessly rejoice,
As life's blithe springtide passed upon its way
And all youth's infinite hope and bloom
Shone round her; nor might any shadow of gloom
Fall on her as she passed from flower to flower;
Love sought her, with full dower
Of happy wedlock and young lives to rear;
Nor shed her eyes a tear,
Save for some passing pity, fancy bred.
All good things were around her—riches, love,
All that the heart and mind can move,
The precious things of art, the undefiled
And innocent affection of a child.
Oh girl, who amid sunny ways dost tread,
What curse is this that blights that comely head?
For right or wrong there is no further place than here,
No sanctities of hope, no chastening fear?
'There is nowhere else,' she said.

'There is nowhere else,' and in the wintry ground
When we have laid the darlings of our love—
The little lad with eyes of blue,
The little maid with curls of gold,
Or the beloved aged face
On which each passing year stamps a diviner grace—
That is the end of all, the narrow bound.
Why look our eyes above
To an unreal home which mortal never knew—
Fold the hands on the breast, the clay-cold fingers fold?
No waking comes there to the uncaring dead!
'There is nowhere else,' she said.

Strange; is it old or new, this deep distress?
Or do the generations, as they press
Onward for ever, onward still,
Finding no truth to fill
Their starving yearning souls, from year to year
Feign some new form of fear
To fright them, some new terror
Crouched on the path of error,
Some cold and desolate word which, like a blow,

* Songs Unsung. By Lewis Morris, of Penbryn. London: Kegan Paul Trench, and Co.

Forbids the current of their faith to flow,
Makes slow their pulse's eager beat,
And, chilling all their wonted heat,
Leaves them to darkling thoughts and dreads a prey,
Uncheered by dawning shaft or setting ray?

But you, poor child forlorn,
Ah! better were it you were never born;
Better that you had thrown your life away
On some coarse lump of clay;
Better defeat, disgrace, childlessness, all
That can a solitary life befall,
Than to have all things and yet be Self-bound to dark despondency,
And self-tormented, beyond reach of doubt,
By some cold word that puts all yearnings out."

The last two lines,—

"And self-tormented, beyond reach of doubt,
By some cold word that puts all yearnings out,"

have all the happy energy of the highest poetry. It is a curious state of the world in which it is possible to speak of certain unbelievers as "self-tormented beyond reach of doubt," but it is the state of the world in which we actually live, a state in which doubt, far from expressing the deepest sort of denial, expresses comparative peace, the state from which hope is not excluded, though fear is not excluded either. And the force of the couplet goes beyond this. It is not only that the denial of some unbelievers goes far beyond doubt, but that this denial is sealed, as the poet with curious force expresses it, "by some cold word that puts all yearnings out," that extinguishes not only belief, but even the desire for belief. Such, for instance, is the condition reflected in Vernon Lee's powerful dialogue, a few months ago, on The Responsibilities of Unbelief, wherein the stern unbeliever is represented not simply as denying, but as having lost all wish to affirm, either the existence of God or the prospect of a future life. The advanced guard of the negative party have found not only, if we may trust their own account, the talisman for extinguishing faith, but the talisman for extinguishing those universal "yearnings" from which they suppose that our religious illusions spring.

We must not quote the whole poem, but we cannot refrain from taking one more fine passage, which delineates the view of the author:—

"For let the doubter babble as he can,
There is no wit in man
Which can make Force rise higher still Up to the heights of Will,—
No phase of Force which finite minds can know
Can self-determined grow,
And of itself elect what shall its essence be:
The same to all eternity,
Unchanged, unshaped, it goes upon its blinded way;
Nor can all forces nor all laws
Bring ceasing to the scheme, nor any pause,
Nor shape it to the mould in which to be—
Form from the winged seed the myriad-branching tree,—
Nor guide the force once sped, so that it turn
To Water-floods that quench or Fires that burn,
Or now to the electric current change,
Or draw all things by some attraction strange.
Or in the brain of man working unseen, sublime,
Transcend the narrow bounds of Space and Time.
Whence comes the innate Power which knows to guide
The force deflected so from side to side,
That not a barren line from whence to where
It goes upon its way through the unfettered air?
What sways the prisoned atom on its fruitful course?
Ah, it was more than Force
Which gave the Universe of things its form and face!
Force moving on its path through Time and Space
Would nought enclose, but leave all barren still.
A higher Power, it was, the worlds could form and fill;
And by some pre-existent harmony
Were all things made as Fate would have them be—Fate, the ineffable Word of an Eternal Will."

The only lines which seem to us, not, indeed, lower in poetic force, but lower in moral force than the rest, are those in which the poet expresses his willingness, if need be, to go back again to some lower form of life:—

"Content, if need, to take some lower form,
Some humbler herb or worm
To be awhile, if e'er the eternal plan
Go back from higher to lower, from man to less than man."

It is true he protests at once that this is not his own view, but even the suggestion of it strikes a lower note. It is impossible that a creature who has once risen into true adoration of God's will could ever again pass into the stage of purely unconscious existence, without losing all the significance of personality, all continuity of consciousness, and, therefore, all moral identity with both the actual human past and the possible human future. An interposed degradation to the condition of a vegetable, would be a final extinction of the being so degraded; while its future development into a new life of consciousness would imply a totally new personality. But this poem, as a whole, is to Mr. Morris's best poems what the organ is to poorer instruments.

There is another striking poem, of much less pretension and force, called "Confession," in which, however, there is a passage difficult to interpret. After a powerful delineation of the attitude of doubt, Mr. Morris goes on:—

"Oh, doubting soul, look up, behold
The eternal heavens above thy head,
The solid earth beneath, its mould
Compacted of the unnumbered dead.

Here the eternal problems grow,
And with each day are solved and done,
When some spent life, like melting snow,
Breathes forth its essence to the sun.

As death is, life is—without end;
Wrong with right mingles, joy with pain;
Forbid two meeting streams to blend,
'Twere not more hopeless, nor more vain.

Though Death with Life, though Wrong with Right,
Are bound within the scheme of things,
Yet can our souls, on soaring wings,
Gain to a loftier, purer height,

Where death is not, nor any life,
Nor right nor wrong, nor joy nor pain;
But changeless Being, lacking strife,
Doth through all change, unchanged remain.

Should wrong prevail o'er all the earth,
'Twere nought if only we discern
The one great truth, which if we learn,
All else beside is little worth.

That Right, is that which must prevail,
If not here, there, if not now, then,
Is the one Truth which shall not fail,
For all the doubt and fears of men."

We do not see the connection between the verses in which Mr. Morris delineates something like the mental condition which Buddhists call Nirvana, the condition in which life and death are both absent, in which joy and pain are both absent, in which change is merged in immutability, and the belief in the victory of right over wrong which he goes on to paint. Surely, it is not the loss of all self-consciousness in "the unconditioned" which can ever be supposed to prepare the mind for absolute faith in the victory of Good over Evil. We do not pretend to understand the connection between the fourth and fifth stanzas of this last passage, and the drift of the remainder. It is not the imaginary flight of the soul into such a state as this which will prepare it for victorious faith.

Some of Mr. Lewis Morris's "pictures" are very vigorous, and remind one of the pictures in Tennyson's "Palace of Art." But he should not scatter his pearls on the ground in this way without a string. These fragments of poems, uncombined in any whole, are hardly worth separate preserving; they are the materials of poetry, not poems, and the materials of poetry should be kept till they can be moulded into poems.

MERV.*

THE Special Correspondent is the true modern representative of the knight-errant. It is he who blows the magic horns, notwithstanding the dragon guardians of the gates, and enters the enchanted castles, and reveals to the outer world all that there is of strange and mysterious within. It is he who passes scatheless through encounters with windmills and giants, who heals the poor captive, and can on occasion eat poisons and swallow deadly meats without wincing. Amongst Special Correspondents, none has had a stranger experience or told a more exciting tale than the hero of Merv, whose career, so prematurely cut short by death, is told by himself in the volume before us. The volume is a compression into a handy book which one can take comfortably on a railway journey of the two huge volumes in which the tale was first told. A good deal of political discussion, which, however interesting at the time, has now become rather stale, has been cut out, and the story, as a story, has been considerably improved thereby. It is told in an easy, flowing style, without any attempt at fine-writing or startling effects of literary composition. A hazardous ride for life is described as coolly as a dinner party, and a grand council in no more gorgeous language than a vestry meeting.

* The Story of Merv. By Edward O'Donovan. London: Smith, Elder, and Co.

The author started in 1878 from Trebizond on his hazardous travels, with the object of penetrating to the mysterious regions of Central Thibet, but when he arrived at Elizabetopol, finding that a Russian expedition was just about to start for the Caspian against the Tekke Turcomans, he determined to accompany it, General Lazareff, an Armenian by birth, who was to command the expedition, giving him leave to do so. He went with the General on a reconnaissance, during which the most memorable incident was a supper which they partook of sitting on drums lighted by bayonets stuck point downwards for candlesticks, in company with a Khivan clad in "a silk tunic of the brightest possible emerald green, with lavish gold embroidery, sky-blue trousers of semi-European make, a purple mantle profusely laced, his fingers covered with massive rings of gold, a gold embroidered skull-cap on the back of his head, and perched forward, the brim almost upon the bridge of his nose, was a cylindrical cap of black Astrakhan fur." This gorgeous individual was, however, nothing more than a caravan Bashi. After pushing on to the front by himself with an Armenian merchant, and nearly being cut-off by a Turcoman raid, O'Donovan returned to the Russian camp, where he was even more nearly being carried off by dysentery, due to the absolute want of sanitary precautions shown by the Russians. General Lazareff himself succumbed to the disease. The General who succeeded knew not Joseph, and ordered him to quit the camp; and he accordingly proceeded to Asterabad, a Persian town. After many months, spent there and among some neighbouring Yamud Turcomans and at Teheran, in vain endeavours to get permission to accompany the Russian columns, at last receiving a flat refusal from General Skobelev, he telegraphed to him an "Au revoir à Merv," and started on his adventurous quest of that city two years after his first start from Trebizond. Scarcely had he begun his journey, before he was bitten by the "bite-the-stranger," or Persian bug, a beast whose venomous bite is often fatal, and the remedies for which were even worse than the disease. Amongst the cures proffered, a priest wanted to tie him up in a net like a hammock, the head protruding, and hang him on a tree. "When I had swallowed a large quantity of new milk, I was to be turned round until the suspending cords were well twisted, and then, being let go, to be allowed to turn rapidly round. This operation was to be repeated until sickness was produced, when other measures were to follow." He declined the cure, however, having heard from a friend that he once saw it "tried on an old woman, who, when taken down for supplementary treatment," was beyond need of any, being already dead.

From the "bite-the-stranger," our hero went, in the quite as unpleasant company of a band of pilgrims, towards Meshed. The account of the journey, made under dread of Turcomans, bears a strong resemblance to Mr. Keane's account of the pilgrimage to Mecca, under dread of the Bedouins; and what with robbers without and quarrels within the caravans, the wonder is that in either case the pilgrims ever reach their destination. At Kuchan, a dinner with the Governor proved even more dangerous. It began with large glasses of arrack, drained at a draught, continued with Bordeaux, then came soup and dishes ad libitum, accompanied and followed by the white wine of the country and more claret, and returned again to arrack. As the Emir was talking wildly before dinner, and rolled on the ground embracing his friends and relations during dinner, and finally dismissed his Christian guest that he might proceed to further revels, orthodox Mohammedanism does not seem strongly developed in Persia. We are not told the effect of the dinner on the host, but on the guest it produced a three weeks' fever, of which he was finally cured by a dose of opium and renewed applications of arrack. Then came fresh delays from Persian opposition until the Derguez was reached, where every village and house is fortified for protection against Turcoman raids, and the author had the pleasure of seeing one perpetrated while riding with the Governor, in which some sixty oxen and over one hundred sheep were carried off. But the Governor was not at all anxious to see the raiding system put down, as he thought his people rather gained than lost by it, and it transpired that his income would have been diminished by three thousand tomans yearly, if the brigandage were suppressed, a fact which is probably not without its parallel amongst Turkish Governors nearer Europe. Meanwhile, Geok Tepe fell into the hands of the Russians, and it was only by putting their Agent on a false scent that O'Donovan finally evaded the vigilance of Persians and Russo-Turcomans, and got a clear start to Merv, with only a couple of Kurd servants. He threw himself on the dangerous friendship of a couple of Turcomans on the look-out for prey, and was by them safely conducted to Merv. The "Queen of the World" turned out to be a mere collection of wattled huts, in the midst of which the stranger was accommodated with a tent, which at once became the centre of attraction for the whole settlement. As Miss Bird found in her travels in Japan, the European became the object of the ceaseless curiosity of staring eyes. Waking or sleeping, the tent was filled with sightseers, who at last became so numerous and excited that they brought the whole structure down on the occupant's head. Meanwhile, O'Donovan had the pleasure of hearing it keenly discussed whether he was a Russian, or only a Black-Russian, or Englishman, and whether his throat should at once be cut as a spy, or whether he should be put to ransom. At length, after a fortnight's incessant inspection, he was brought before the council of chiefs, and it was decided to let him remain alive; and when his identity was established by communication with the British Native Agent at Meshed, he was allowed to remain as an honoured guest, subject to a kind of police supervision.

He found the Mervli fortifying themselves against the apprehended attack of Russia behind a tremendous earthwork, forty feet high, but unfortunately thrown up only in the direction in which the Russian advance was expected, the hinder part being only protected by a musketry trench, the Turcomans, like the Chinese in the first China war, being seemingly of opinion that an enemy was bound to attack in front, and not try any underhand methods of walking round a place to get at a weak point. The artillery which was to protect the rampart was equally primitive, consisting chiefly of some twenty-eight brass cannon captured from the Persians, mostly unmounted, and with no gunpowder provided; while the shot was to consist of what the Persians had fired at them, when it had been dug up again. But the Turcomans were no despicable engineers in their way, a great part of their territory, some fifty-five miles by thirty-five, being watered by canals, drawn from the River Mergab, which is dammed up by a gigantic weir, on which 100 men are kept constantly at work repairing damages. All around were the ruins of ancient cities, built of stone and brick, no fewer than three Mervs close to each other, yet quite distinct, and all deserted, being visited by Mr. O'Donovan, the present inhabitants dwelling only in scattered villages of wattled huts or tents. But little cultivation is done beyond a certain amount of corn and fruits, which last mostly grow spontaneously. In fact, the Tekke Turcomans seem to have advanced but little in civilisation, if at all, since the days of Zenghis Khan. Their favourite pastime is robbery, and when not on a raid, they spend their time in sleeping, smoking, and eating. Their raiment is gorgeous in colour, but the precious metals are rare, and they are inveterate beggars.

How their chief executive officer was deposed, in view of the Russian advance, and the young hereditary Khans assumed power in his place; how O'Donovan, from being a quasi-prisoner, was elevated into the chief of the ruling triumvirate as the representative of British power, which was to come to the aid of the Mervli against the Russians; how he assumed the Turcoman dress, was offered Turcoman wives, and was supported, after his own money had all gone in presents, on Turcoman tribal contributions; and how he eventually got away from Merv, under the pretext of attending a meeting of European Ambassadors at Meshed,—these things give an excitement to this book of travels which raises it to the rank of a romance, and can only be enjoyed by reading it at large. There is one defect in the book, and that is the absence of any maps. They would have enforced more strongly the practical conclusion to be drawn from the whole story, that if Russia has an appetite for the Turcoman artichoke, there is no earthly reason why England should try to interfere with her digestion of a very tough and unprofitable fruit.

THE "REAL" LORD BYRON.*

MR. JEAFFRESON has given his book a wrong title. He should have followed his own example, and called it, more modestly, a "Book about Lord Byron." As such, it would, perhaps, have met the wants of a certain public, a public that makes up its Lord Byron from the poet's writings and vulgar tradition, and knows nothing of the biographies and quasi-biographies of

* The Real Lord Byron; New Views of the Poet's Life. By John Cordy Jeaffreson. 2 vols. London: Hurst and Blackett. 1883.

Moore and his successors. But the actual title implies that now for the first time is portrayed the true Lord Byron, and that nearly all past Byronic literature may be cast aside as of little value by those who desire to know what manner of man the poet really was. Those who have written about Lord Byron hitherto are characterised as charlatans composing arrant nonsense, or aristocratic toadies perpetrating tedious flatteries. Yet Mr. Jeaffreson's own volumes consist of little more than a compilation from the very writers he condemns. For Tom Moore he has not a good word to say; but there is a great deal of Tom Moore, nevertheless, in Mr. Jeaffreson's pages. There is, however, very little that is new in them; there are some guesses founded on asserted facts, given without reference to authorities or any means of verification, and hints of further facts which the author seems to know, more or less vaguely, but to be precluded from revealing.

The fact is, the external life of Byron—at all events, up to the period of his joining the cause of Greek independence—was of a very ordinary and uneventful character. Nobody who has considered his career with any attention to the circumstances of the time, and the conditions of his youth and adolescence, can suppose him to have been “a man of mysteries, tortured by remorse for crimes too terrible for confession, and guarding secrets too terrible for avowal.” Neither, it may be added, is any such view of Byron to be gathered from the extant biographies, and Mr. Jeaffreson appears to have spent much time and pains in evoking a spectre from the depth of his own consciousness, in order to prove its unreality. As a Peer, Byron was neither more nor less than an ordinary young lord of the period, of an abnormally passionate temperament, and more troubled than most of his fellows by straitness of means. His differentia was that he cared little about politics in the concrete, hated field sports, and cordially disliked the civilisation that surrounded him. It was this Bohemianism, rather than any taste for adventure or traveller's impulse, or even such restlessness as tortures the modern “globe-trotter,” that drove him abroad. He had no classical fervour, no inclination towards science, but he was a keen student of history, and this latter circumstance in great measure explains his wandering up and down the historic shores of the Mediterranean, from the blue waters of which he was never far distant. Lastly, among the facts that, though personal, may be considered as appertaining to his external life, were his lameness and his tendency to grow fat. So great was his horror of obesity, which threatened him all through life, that he ruined his health by the rigour of the means which he adopted to avert it, and suffered from a constant gnaw at the stomach, which, like Carlyle's dyspepsia, had something to do with his cynicism, though that was, however, more moral than physical in its origin.

It is, however, with the poet, much more than with the peer or the man, that posterity is concerned, and the story of his inner life is admirably told in his correspondence—to which, by the way, Mr. Jeaffreson makes no addition—as well as in his poetry, which in this sense is very often of an autobiographical cast. An aristocrat by birth, and despite all that has been said on the subject, undoubtedly an aristocrat at heart, his sympathies were, nevertheless, with the people, whose sufferings his clear intellect compelled him to recognise as frequently due to the hypocrisy, cowardice, and smug self-complacency of the oligarchy that held England in bondage during the latter half of the reign of George III. For practical politics he had little bent, and possibly would have shrunk from a conversion of his political theories into facts; but in the Vision of Judgment—that strangely powerful reversal of Southey's tame hexameters—he condemns the whole policy of the Georgian era with marvellous power. Waterloo he terms a “crowning carnage,” that caused the recording angels to “throw their pens down in divine disgust,” while Satan—and this is the poet's consolation—has “both Generals [Blucher and Wellington] in reversion.” In a couplet, bad in metre and rhyme, but a stinging epigram in substance, George III. is disposed of for ever:—

“A better farmer ne'er brush'd dew from lawn,

The victim of Southey's praise had but one virtue, “constancy to a bad, ugly woman.” Mark the “ugly;” in such a case, constancy would doubtless appear to Byron a virtue so stupid as to be almost an offence against Nature. The pretensions, narrow exclusiveness, and indolence of the Church are unsparingly ridiculed; but Christianity is not assailed, and it ought to be remembered that Byron never attacks formally faith, virtue, or piety, but only their hypocritical show or pharisaical display. When all the well-to-do and respectable classes were eager to visit the excesses of the Luddites with the severest punishment, he wrote a song for the starving framebreakers, and made in Parliament a most effective speech on their behalf; and when all Europe was execrating Napoleon, he composed an ode to the banished conqueror. From the beginning to the end of his career, he despised the dull, make-believe policy that alone had any chance of acceptance in his day. Partly through circumstances, but mainly through his own vices, Byron was a sufferer. Goethe says somewhere that none but sufferers can be poets, and Maxime du Camp, in his recently published Souvenirs, says finely, speaking of Musset, Chateaubriand, and Byron:—“La souffrance était en eux, tout choc extérieur la fit résouner; la mélodie fut la voix de leur mal, cette mélodie retentira d'un immortel écho parmi les hommes.”

Byron's great fault was his cynicism, and his cynicism was the natural fruit of his own selfish and sensual life. He had, and could have, but small faith in humanity, little hope of society freeing itself from the evil and wrong which enthralled and brutalised it. He seems, indeed, to have felt but a slight interest in the fortunes of his contemporary fellow-men. In the mouth of Satan, in the Vision of Judgment, he puts the terrible words, “I think few worth damnation save their Kings.” But he was a reformer without distinctly willing it. He tore away the veil that hid the selfishness of the time from men's eyes, and the world will never forget the sight. The days of the Holy Alliance will never return.

Mr. Jeaffreson's “real” Lord Byron is an infinitely more diabolical personage in his relations with women than even the contemporary legend painted. Byron wrote truly enough of himself,—

“My blood is all meridian, were it not,
I had not left my clime,”

but he was no deliberate seducer. It is no unfair statement to say that women met his advances half-way. His liaison with “Claire” was perhaps the worst, though not the grossest, of his many gallantries, seeing the position he then stood in with regard to his wife; and we are inclined to agree with the view taken by Mr. Jeaffreson, who holds it to afford an explanation of the great mystery, as it is called, of Byron's life. Upon the elucidation of that mystery, however, we do not care to spend ten minutes' research; it was probably, as Byron said, too simple a one to be found out. But to Mr. Jeaffreson's sermon on the duty of Lady Byron, under the circumstances, we must enter our most emphatic protest. That she was not very judicious in her treatment of her husband generally is probably true, but it is quite certain that he behaved to her with abominable cruelty and insolence.

Of Byron's earlier love-affairs, the most important was the one with which the name of “Thyrza” is connected. The maid of low degree on whom Byron bestowed the name was certainly not Margaret Parker, as Mr. Jeaffreson seems to suppose. Whoever she was, Byron could never hear the name mentioned without showing signs of strong emotion, but he steadfastly refused to disclose her personality. It is odd that Mr. Jeaffreson should be puzzled by the date (October 11th, 1811) of the last six stanzas of the second canto of Childe Harold, addressed to Thyrza. It was on that day, as we know from a letter to Dallas, preserved in a note to Moore's Life (Vol. IX., p. 16), that he received the news of her death. Byron never lost the memory of what he somewhere refers to as the purest (!) passion of his life.

As we have already said, these volumes will find a public, and that is their justification. But they form no addition of value to Byronic literature. The style is voluble, diffuse, and sometimes a little vulgar; but Mr. Jeaffreson is rarely dull, and the book is far from being unreadable or uninteresting. On the whole, however, we must pronounce it unprofitable, and much more of the “real” Lord Byron, to our mind, is still to be found in Moore than in Mr. Jeaffreson's pages.

DR. EDITH ROMNEY.*

THE writer of this novel is manifestly very much in earnest. There is an unmistakable reality, a ring of genuine passion, in her complaints of the folly and caprice which deny to her heroine her legitimate career. That she writes from actual experience we do not, indeed, suppose. She finds her subject in the alternations of success and failure which befall a lady-doctor. Lady-doctors are but few, and those few, we hope and believe, too well employed, to have to expose their sorrows to the public. Still, we do not doubt but that the book is the outcome of genuine feeling. The writer is acutely conscious of the disabilities which law in some degree, and tradition, custom, and prejudice or feeling, in a degree far greater, impose upon her sex. She imagines a woman who has overcome the obstacles which beset the entrance to the Medical profession, who is possessed of every qualification for her work, who is able, enthusiastic, devoted, who even is permitted to taste for a time of the sweets of success, and then finds herself passed by,—not because she has failed, but because she is a woman. The situation is tragic. How tragic it may be, under different circumstances, we have lately seen in real life, in the case of the unfortunate Afghan physician who found himself debarred by his colour from the employment for which he was excellently fitted both by ability and education. We have seldom seen anything more touching than the story of how Dr. Edith Romney, in the very height of her powers, when she is most devoted to her work, and most capable of doing it, sees it hopelessly taken out of her hands by a foolish caprice of fashion. It is with a positive pain, which fictitious narrative has not often the power to produce, that we read of the fear gradually growing into despair, with which this woman, conscious that she has done her duty to the utmost, hears of the successive defections which at last reduce her to compulsory idleness, the conventional bondage of her sex, from which she had made, as she hoped, a final escape. But what, it may be asked, is the upshot of it all? Does the story help to clear the outlook, an outlook on which, doubtless, many eyes are fixed, the future of woman in the professions, especially in the profession of medicine? It will help the reader to judge, if we give an outline of the story.

Dr. Gallagher, the chief practitioner of Wanningster (surely a hybrid sort of name), finds himself deserted for a lady-doctor. To him in his wrath there comes a certain Dr. Fane, who having spent some years in travel and in just as much work as suited his pleasure, finds himself compelled, by a diminution of income, to settle down to some regular employment. He is able, handsome, of attractive manners, and single,—a recommendation, it would seem, in the judgment of the author, though it is commonly considered a bar. It is agreed between the two that Dr. Fane is to succeed to the practice, or what had been the practice, of Dr. Gallagher, and to oust, if he can, this interloper to whom fashion has given a position which she ought never to have thought of occupying. Dr. Fane sets to work, and succeeds. He sets up an establishment in a style of the severest medical orthodoxy, with everything cut to the most rigid pattern of conventional respectability, and has the pleasure of seeing all, or nearly all, the patients returning to their former allegiance. All this, we are bound to say, sounds very improbable. There are people, we understand, who find it pleasant, and we presume easy, to change their doctors. To most of us it is, or would be if we had to do it, a most difficult and painful business. A doctor is commonly more or less a friend, and nothing but supreme necessity—with some hardly that—can bring about the breaking of the tie which binds the patient to him. It is quite incredible that nearly the whole of the wealthier class of a town should make this change twice in the course of a year or two. A few months suffice to transfer nearly all the practice of the town from Dr. Edith Romney to Dr. Fane, and during that time the two have never met. This is a considerable demand upon one's faith. In a moderate-sized town, such as we understand Wanningster to have been, two persons, employed at about the same hours and in the same quarter, must have encountered each other, one would think, pretty nearly every day. So, however, it was in this particular town. And thus it came to pass that Dr. Fane had no notion—or, rather, we should say, a wholly false notion, due to his prejudiced imagination of what lady-doctors must be—of his defeated rival. He thinks of her as loud-voiced, self-asserting, masculine, without any of the attributes of the womanly character. But there comes a time when he is undeceived. They meet under circumstances which are most painful to the lady. She has just been dismissed from one of the few families that had remained faithful to her. The mother had died in spite of all her care, and in her she had lost not only a patient whom she earnestly desired to save (no loss, we take it, is so painful to a doctor as those that follow upon childbirth), but a very dear friend. The widower, who is rector of the parish, a somewhat weak-minded man, is not able to resist the change of feeling; and when his children fall ill of some prevailing disorder, calls in Dr. Fane. At his door the two meet; and then the man discovers his mistake. This woman, whom he has been doing his best and with only too much success to injure, is the very ideal of her sex:—

"Fane's quick eye took in the tall, graceful figure, in its heavy, fur-trimmed jacket, the pale, beautiful face, in the frame of shadowy hair and dark fur, with every feature finely cut, the mouth slightly compressed and drooping, the eyes darkened and widened by the expression of almost appealing despair."

Then follows a quick repentance. And it so happens that the man had not only his success, which was legitimate in all save the motive which had inspired his energy, but a definite wrong to repent of. He had been called in to attend a poor patient, and had been shown the medicine which Dr. Edith Romney had prescribed. This he had poured away with an expression of disgust, an action on which the husband, an ill-conditioned fellow whom Dr. Edith had rebuked for cruelty to his wife, had put the worst interpretation, even to the length of saying that his wife had been poisoned. We shall not follow the story any further. It takes the course and is brought to the ending with which we are familiar in the ordinary novel. But whatever merits it may have as a love-story, it cannot be said to give us what we naturally look for. The woman's wrongs are redressed, not because her ability and her devotion are discovered, but because she is found to be beautiful. This beauty had not saved her with her patients, but it brings a successful rival to her feet. Her shadowy hair and becoming furs set right the grievous inequalities which society imposes upon woman. Had she been less fair, and he less susceptible, or married (he is engaged, and never in fiction was a young woman more rudely treated than Violet, his fiancée), right would never have been done. We certainly find no solution to any social difficulty in Dr. Edith Romney. The general merits of the novel—apart from the very strong point of which we have spoken—are not remarkable. It is weighted with a great deal more of a quite ordinary love-making than most people will care to read about, and with tedious descriptions of society in Wanningster which convince us only too thoroughly that the people in that town were more than commonly stupid. But it is relieved by some bright and effective sketches. Such are Miss Mona Melward, one of Dr. Edith Romney's few faithful friends, and Sibyl Fane, the Doctor's sister, a lively and independent young lady, who, as her brother finds, very much to his surprise, can give vigorous expression to the heresies about woman's right to work. And there is also not a little vigorous and picturesque writing. It is a trenchant, if not a just criticism, of a great contemporary poet, that he is "a sphinx in a garrulous mood." It is no conventional compliment when we express the hope that the author of Dr. Edith Romney will give us soon, but not too soon, some more of her work.

THE GRAVER MAGAZINES.

THE Fortnightly Review has some excellent papers, the one which has interested us most being Mr. S. Laing's "A Month in Connemara." The Member for the Orkneys strongly supports the best informed view, viz., that in Western Ireland the Land Act has been felt to be a great gain, but that it has scarcely gone far enough, rent being still too high—Griffith's valuation, says Mr. Laing, would be about a fair average—and that in congested districts nothing but emigration can benefit the people, who could not live off their land if they held it in freehold. Migration he does not believe in, as the reclamation of land on a large scale costs more than it is worth; but emigration succeeds, more especially the emigration of women. This has been greatly aided by Mr. Vere Foster, and as a result, 19,000 girls between eighteen and twenty have been helped to new homes, at a cost of £35,000, or less than £2 a head. All have done well, and it has been ascertained that they have already remitted home upwards of £250,000 to their families in Ireland, in many cases to assist brothers and sisters to join them. Emigration is most popular with the people, though it is not liked by the agitators or by the priesthood, whom it leaves absolutely without means of living. Mr. Laing, who thinks well of the priests' influence, contends that the richer Catholics ought to form a Sustentation Fund for them, on the Scotch model, and thus make them more independent, a recommendation in which we heartily concur. It is to be noted that the priests approve the emigration of girls, and do their utmost to stimulate education. Mr. Laing's opinion of the poor folk of Connemara is distinctly favourable, and should be remembered at a time when the crimes of a few are so disturbing the English estimate of Irish character. The authors of "The Radical Programme" deal this time with the agricultural labourer, who is to be raised in the social scale by compelling landlords to build two cottages per 100 acres, and to let them, with a piece of ground, to the labourers on a yearly tenure. The Inclosure Acts are to be revised, and all instances of past stealings from the community to be examined, with a view to restitution. The authors, though well-intentioned, disregard prescriptive rights too completely. Mr. A. Forbes essays, in a rather slashing and over-confident style, a vindication of Marshal Bazaine, which in the end really rests on his assertion that after Sedan, Bazaine could not leave Metz. The tribunal which tried him thought he could, though he might have sacrificed half his army in the attempt. Mr. Forbes does not deny that Bazaine treated with the enemy, but holds that he was not bound, as a soldier of the Empire, to recognise the Revolutionary Government. The plea is vigorously written, but it brings no conviction to our minds that Bazaine did not place the Empire above France. Mr. A. Beaman argues that as yet our occupation of Egypt has done nothing but injury to the people, and that a clean sweep ought to have been made of all the old officials, who are incurable. That was impossible without annexation, and annexation was the one policy barred by our pledges. Mr. Gorst, a most competent witness, rather to our surprise defends the 'Corrupt Practices' Act most heartily; declares that it will not work oppressively, that it will restrict expenditure, and that it will not greatly lower the class of candidates. He thinks candidates will henceforth be more freely chosen, rich men not being wanted, and that they will be seated by Associations, unpaid, and not tempted to spend. As was shown in the Spectator last week, the regular expenses will still be too heavy for any but well-to-do candidates, unless they are so popular that expenses are paid by subscription:—

"Instead of having a large majority of the constituencies open to almost any wealthy candidate who chooses to go down and 'nurse' them, the access to every constituency may be guarded by a powerful and influential association, whose support is essential to success and whose choice is not curtailed by the necessity of looking to the purse of its candidate for the means of carrying on the contest. Such associations would exercise an influence upon the composition of the House of Commons, would curb the selfishness of party leaders, and would compel a strict fidelity to broad lines of principle and policy. The vested interests of those satellites of political parties who look to gain something in the periodical scrambles for office might be interfered with; but the subjection of the Members of the House of Commons and their leaders to a larger amount of control on the part of organised associations sensitive to the influences of public opinion, would not be without advantage to the interests of the country at large."

We do not see that Don L. Figuerola tells us anything new about Spain, except that she is rapidly increasing in material resources, and pass on to Mr. Healy's speculation upon the party alliances of the Parnellites. It is cynically clever. He contends that with a new suffrage Irish Toryism will disappear, that the Nationalists will return 70 Members, and that the Tories should buy them by conceding a measure of Home-rule. The Nationalists would then support them, for the peasantry do not care for general politics, and would soon find that, as the Liberals could not oppose Liberal measures, the Tories would give them much more than their rivals. The usual resisting force would in fact be the advancing force, and the House of Lords in particular would be out of the way. If politicians had absolutely no principles, Mr. Healy's advice might be accepted; but as things are, he forgets that its acceptance would cost the Tories all their English votes, and reduce the two parties in the House to Radicals and Whigs. We very much doubt if the Nationalists, when so numerous, will hold together; but if they do, the great parties must arrange to render their vote of no importance. It would not be impossible, if the danger became extreme and a solid Government could not be formed, to find thirty-five Liberals and thirty-five Tories who, for a Session, would form a group, and would vote steadily on all occasions in the opposite direction to the Parnellites. Matters will not be driven so far, but the British, if too much pressed, could suspend all questions in defence of unity as easily as the Irish can in defence of Nationalism.

The Rev. Dr. Charles H. H. Wright sends to the Nineteenth Century a paper on the charge of human sacrifice brought against the Jews, which most readers, before they have read it, will pronounce unnecessary. It is, however, a very learned and curious statement of the reasons for the charge which, it appears, has been formally brought forward by one or two learned Professors, in especial by Dr. A. Rohling, Professor of Hebrew Antiquities in Prague, and by Dr. Justus, a Jew converted to Catholicism. They declare that the imputed practice of killing a non-Jewish virgin, and mixing her blood with the Passover bread, is taught in Cabalistic works revered by the Jews. This statement has been very widely circulated, and is, Dr. Wright contends, the origin of the prejudice, both in Germany and Hungary, which culminated in the recent trial and acquittal of Joseph Scharf. The texts quoted exist, but as Dr. Wright shows, they refer to a totally different subject, one of the old Levitical laws of purity, and have either been misconceived by prejudice or misrepresented by malice. The article is full of incidental evidence as to the extent and depth of this strange belief, which has reappeared in so many countries at such widely separated points of time. We honour Mr. Barnett's courage in his suggestions for improving our great cities more than his judgment. He wishes the Town Councils to rehouse the people almost by force, and regardless of expense:—

"Wise Town Councils, conscious of the mission they have inherited, could destroy every court and crowded alley and put in their places healthy dwellings; they could make water so cheap and bathing-places so common, that cleanliness should no longer be a hard virtue; they could open playgrounds for the children, and take away from a city the reproach of its gutter-children; they could provide gardens, libraries, and conversation-rooms, and make the pleasures of intercourse a delight to the poor, as it is a delight to the rich; they could open picture-galleries and concerts, and give to all that pleasure which comes as surely from a common as from a private possession; they could light and clean the streets of the poor quarters; they could stamp out disease, and by enforcing regulations against smoke and all uncleanness, limit the destructiveness of trade and lengthen the span of life; they could empty the streets of the boys and girls, too big for the narrow homes, too small for the clubs and public-houses, by opening for them play-rooms and gymnasias; they could help the strong and hopeful to emigrate; they could give medicine to heal the sick, money to the old and poor, a training for the neglected, and a home for the friendless."

Mr. Barnett does not tell us where the money is to come from, but intimates that ultimately it must come from the rich. We fear he will find, if he consults a financier, that to carry out his ideas fully, taxes must be imposed which would empty the cities of the rich as completely as some parishes of London have been emptied of them. The cost would then fall either on the poor householders, or on the State, which would shrink from a never-ending task. Money must be expended, no doubt, but the object to be secured must be rigidly limited, or nothing will be done. If Mr. Barnett will inquire at Bruges, he will find it possible for a population to be even splendidly housed, and yet steeped in misery and want. There is no housing so perfect as the housing in a decaying city. The paper on the French Army, by Captain Norman, is a little too full of statistics and technicalities, but its general conclusions should be noted. They are, that the Army is too large for its officers and non-commissioned officers, and that discipline is therefore still lax, though every now and then strengthened by the infliction of death for insubordination. It is, however, difficult to read Captain Norman's figures without the thought that if a Republican General with a genius for war ever got hold of those masses of men and matériel, Europe might after one French victory still have cause to tremble. Lord Lynton, on "Land as Property," argues that unless peasant-proprietorship can be rapidly established through State loans, tenant-right will be claimed in England, and that wherever it is claimed proprietorship ceases to be desired. That is, we think, as a general rule, true; but we question whether it would not be well to try first the sweeping-away of all difficulties in the way of the acquisition of land. When Smith can buy an acre at its price, plus sixpence for a transfer as perfect as the transfer of Consols, we shall at least know clearly what the people want. Mr. G. Brodrick's essay on "The Progress of Democracy in England," though it contains little that is strictly new, is well worth study as a thoughtful sketch of the forces now at work. He is probably right in believing that the decaying strength of conviction on any point helps on Democracy, by paralysing resisting forces, but he hardly allows enough for the temporary character of the decay. Convictions will grow strong again, whether they be scientific or religious, and with them will revive the means of resisting the popular rush. It would be possible even now to organise very desperate resistance to an anti-vaccination movement, or a movement for preventing the celebration of the Sacraments; and convictions of that sort tend, amid universal and free discussion, to deepen rather than die away. We doubt a little if promotion by merit is as democratic as Mr. Brodrick thinks. The system gives a tremendous "pull" to hereditary culture, and, but that they are too rich to work, would restore power to the privileged classes, who can learn two languages well before they are twelve years old. And we are quite sure that Socialism does not, in a Teutonic people, help on democracy. It rouses alike the individualism of a people who at heart would hardly care for Heaven if they thought they were to live in phalanstères, and the desire for sole property, which is probably the strongest, among those who feel it, of earthly sentiments. Nobody in England wishes for a right of commonage in Salisbury Plain. He wants a half acre, off which he may kick anybody he does not desire to see there. We question, also, if democracy will prove contemptuous of experience. The leaders of the masses often take that tone, but the masses themselves hesitate, and in countries which have adopted the "referendum," always vote for the usual. Let Mr. Brodrick just try, as Lord Coleridge tried, to reduce the number of a jury. That the Government of England, as a democratic community, will take ability not required in the Pitt days, is probably true; but, then, the Pitt of 1900 will have tenfold force behind him. We are writing, however, from the critical point of view, and have omitted to give our impression that Mr. Brodrick's paper is singularly thoughtful, free from prejudice, and full of white light. Its single defect is that its author is thinking aloud, and has not arrived, as the rest of us have not arrived, at definite conclusions.

Lord Lorne's essay on "Canadian Home-rule," in the Contemporary, deserves attentive study. It is not very well written, but there is one clear thought in it fairly supported by evidence. The thought is, that the instinct of Englishmen, left alone, is not to exaggerate Home-rule, but to reduce the claim of the Provincial against the Central Government to matters upon which contest—or, at least, armed contest—can hardly arise, a proposition illustrated from the whole history of the Dominion, as well as of the Union since the war. It is, therefore, only necessary to prevent any province from becoming too strong to make Federation work smoothly,—an idea the Australian Colonies will do well to bear in mind. They might, under certain circumstances, find too much of the national energy and wealth concentrated in Victoria. Mr. Sheldon Amos's discourse on "The Copts as a Political Factor" (in Egypt) is rather curious than convincing. He believes the Copts could become in some sort a ruling class, or at least an enlightened class, in a land of darkness. Quite acknowledging that they are the old Egyptians, and that they are Christians, and that on both grounds they are a most interesting people, we ask why, during the centuries, they have done nothing, and see no answer except inability to do anything. Dr. William Barry describes "The New Birth of Christian Philosophy" with singular eloquence and force, his thesis being that in avowed Agnosticism—the assertion that the supernatural is unknowable—is the germ of new-born faith, and in the undeniable reverence for the person of Christ, as of one above the contests even of philosophers, the beginning of a revival of religion. He expects the birth of a new philosophy, or rather the reinvigoration of an old one, the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas, who, in the essayist's judgment, reconciles thought with faith, or, as we now-a-days put it, science with religion. Probably no reader will quite agree with Dr. Barry; but very few will leave his paper without a feeling that he has indicated a coming truth, though he may not have seen it accurately. Mr. Godkin's account of the Southern States since the war is interesting, though not very satisfactory. He thinks that slavery is dead in the South, on economic grounds, that education is increasing, that violence still prevails, that dishonesty among Whites has distinctly increased, that the Negroes have shown great capacity for free labour, but that the morale of the Negroes, especially in the matter of chastity, has by no means improved. The general result would seem to be that all the impulses have come to the top, which is precisely what one would expect at first from emancipation. We wish, however, that Mr. Godkin, when he next writes about the South, would tell us a little more exactly what has been the effect of emancipation on a class more important than the negroes,—the lower white population of the South, the "white trash" who filled the armies. Are they getting civilised, or emigrating, or perishing of competition and despair, or what? S. Giovanni Boglietti's account of parties and politics in Italy, though grave and thoughtful, amounts to very little more than this, which we all knew before,—that S.

Depretis, with his adroit, and, in its way, quite honest Opportunism, has formed an effective majority, at the cost of making the Radicals almost openly Republican. What Englishmen want to know is whether cool Italian observers think the Republicans can win; or whether, as many fancy, Italy will pass through a period of Cæsarism, the House of Savoy, after a dangerous commotion, decreeing and supporting the social reforms, especially in the tenure of the soil, which are nearly indispensable. The danger of Italy is the suffering of half its population, which S. Depretis, with all his ability, does not deal with, wisely or unwisely.

The publication of Lord Salisbury's article on "Labourers' and Artisans' Dwellings" has been a great success for the National Review, as his project has been quoted and discussed in every journal in the kingdom, and almost every house. There is, however, no other distinctive article in the number, though many quite equal to the average of other magazines. The one which interests us most is an essay by S. Villari, on the differences which wall off Italians from Englishmen. It is far too short, but seems to us full of insight, especially in the remark that Italians cannot even comprehend why Englishmen, who study their country, its history, and its politics so assiduously, do not study them. Blackwood has nothing marked, the author of the clever sketches from Galilee underrating the knowledge of his readers; while Macmillan's best paper, an admirable one, is a translation of Turgenieff's prose poems. Some of these are exquisitely dreamy. Mrs. Oliphant, too, has in these chapters of "The Wizard's Son" recovered her curious force in managing the supernatural, and is developing her Wizard into a perfectly new kind of Mephistophiles, a being to whom neither good nor evil is attractive, but both are as red and blue.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Colburn's United Service Magazine.—It is not easy to see what Captain C. W. White, in his article, "Our Military Position," proposes, except it be that our Army is to be put under the government of soldiers. A Civil Secretary at War and a civilian establishment in the War Office are, it would seem, mischievous institutions, with which military efficiency cannot co-exist. Credit is given to praiseworthy intentions on the part of Army reformers, but everything that they have done has been wrong, except, indeed, the abolition of Purchase, to which an assent, that probably some fifteen years ago would have been an emphatic dissent, is given. Short service is, of course, denounced. But what we miss is the suggestion of a remedy. Perhaps one might be found in spending fifteen millions on making the Army a soldiers' and not an officers' army. Some interesting particulars are given by Mr. W. H. Cromie about the "Military Forces of Russia," and Lieutenant-Colonel W. W. Knollys advances an emphatic plea on behalf of "Machine Guns."—The most interesting article in The Army and Navy Magazine is, "What I Saw in the French Manœuvres," by Lieutenant H. Chawner. The writer fulfils the promise of his title most exactly, and tells us some facts which it is certainly worth while to know. On the whole, his impression of the French soldier seems to have been favourable. He is anything but smart in appearance and drill, but he seems serviceable, and shows generally a good physique. The manœuvres themselves do not seem to have been particularly well managed. Among other articles may be mentioned Colonel Malleson's "Battle-fields of Germany—Nördlingen;" and "Our Field Artillery," by Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Ford.

Society's Queen.—By Ina Leon Cassilis. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—Miss Cassilis has invented for herself a very magnificent hero indeed, "Vivian Chandos-Deveraux, Lord of Rougemont, &c." He is returned to Parliament, makes a maiden speech almost immediately on taking his seat which is a prodigious success, even winning several votes—mirabile dictu!—and would probably have been a Cabinet Minister—for what party could afford to neglect so great a political power?—when he is arrested for murder. The murdered man is his brother, and the two were known to have been enemies. Then follows a curious complication of incidents. The young lady whom Vivian loves gives herself up to justice, as having struck the blow which deprived Marmaduke Devereux of life. But she does not suffer very much from this self-devotion, for the accusation is, as the reader soon perceives, a fiction. The magistrate, culpably indifferent to law in the presence of so interesting an accused, admits her to bail, and after a trial in which certainly, for once, fiction must be allowed to be stranger than truth, she is sentenced to six months' imprisonment as a first-class misdemeanant. Even the imprisonment was mitigated. To quote Miss Cassilis's eloquent words:—"Around that bowed, graceful form, kneeling by the table, with the beautiful head bent on the clasped hands, fell the rich, sombre folds of velvet; on the slender finger still flashed the cherished diamond." At the end the truth comes out, all is set right, and Vivian Chandos-Devereux crowns the edifice of his fame by a masterly exposition of the Eastern Question. We hope that this marvellous politician has his double in real life. Who can he be? Is it possible that he is the eminent statesman whom we know by the name of (to revert to the asterisks of other days) A d B ?

English Lyrics. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—That this volume, one of the "Parchment Library" series, is of a comely look (though it is not improved, to our mind, by the gilded top-edge), and that it contains many beautiful things, and, indeed, scarce anything that is not beautiful, need hardly be said. But we cannot quite follow the editor's principle of selection. He distinguishes between an ode and a lyric. Gray is not a lyric poet; he does not contribute a single specimen to the collection. Horace, therefore, is not lyric when he is in his highest mood,—in the best things of his third book, for instance. Alcaeus was not, if we may conclude from what little we know of him. This is all somewhat strange, and it is no less strange to find that some things are lyric which we certainly had not thought so, Dr. Johnson's "In Memoriam" to Robert Levett finds a place in the volume. We are glad to see it. It is a genuine, though somewhat formal expression of feeling, but it has nothing, so far as we can see, of the lyric spirit. Nor has "The Burial of Sir John Moore." The term, perhaps old-fashioned, which we should have applied to these, and, indeed, to some other of these pieces, is elegiac. Then there is surely something capricious in the way in which Milton is treated. Perhaps the "song" to Sabrina is to be counted pedantic, with its Tethys, and Glaucus, and Ligea, though we should hold the two lines,—

"In twisted braids of lilies knitting
The loose tresses of thine amber-dropping hair,"

worth at least as many pages of Lodge, and even of Herrick; but why not the "Virgin daughter of Locrine," and still more, why not, "To the ocean now I fly"? But it is ungracious to complain of a goodly feast that it does not contain all the dishes which we might have chosen. And, indeed, there are not a few things, especially from the dramatists, here which are quite fresh and unbackneyed.

We have received the "twenty-first annual edition" of the Royal Guide to the London Charities. By Herbert Fry. (Chatto and Windus.)—A very interesting volume this, though there is need, we fancy, of fuller information, if we want to appreciate rightly the facts that relate to any one institution. Here, for instance, is "Alleyne's College of God's Gift." The total revenue is £19,644, and after £9,509 is paid for the support of the school (where, by the way, upper-school boys pay £15 to £21 fees, and lower-school boys £5), it seems that the balance supports twenty-four poor men and women, sixteen out-pensioners, and twelve scholars, clothed, fed, and educated. Clearly, there is something not accounted for here, that is probably explained for in the full accounts. We see that the Peabody Fund amounted at the end of 1882 to £804,611, and that 3,533 families were housed in its buildings, something less, that is, than 20,000 persons. Why does not the Fund mortgage its buildings, and go on building till it has reached the smallest possible margin that prudence permits? The three great hospitals have about £120,000 between them, St. Bartholomew's being the wealthiest. The impressions left by the whole are, first, the vastness of the sums available; and secondly, the need of organisation, to take care that these sums should be spent to the best advantage. The amount wasted on the machinery of distribution must be enormous. But it is also clear that criticism of this kind may be carried too far. There is, as Mr. Herbert Fry pointedly remarks in his preface, a modern philanthropy "whose chief study seems to be how not to give, and how to prove to the world that the less it gives the better." It is true that we have a most elaborate machinery, which should be a substitute for giving, and which, indeed, is expensive enough to have every excellence; but this machinery did not prevent fifty-eight persons dying last year in London of starvation. Mr. Fry's volume is one that should be studied.

POETRY.—Poems. By J. B. Selkirk. (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—Songs of Yarrow, Love Poems, Miscellaneous Poems, and Marah, are the four divisions of Mr. Selkirk's volume. The first, we think, are the best. In the "Reiver's Ride," especially, we have a really spirited ballad, though it is not improved by the iteration of two rhymes, "weather—together," which we had hoped Mr. Calverley's ridicule had banished, if not from verse altogether, yet certainly from such a prominent place. "Autumn Leaves" is a pretty, pathetic piece of verse. We see nothing as good as these in the Love Poems, and when the poet essays a more serious theme, as he frequently does in the third and fourth divisions of his volume, he achieves but little success. He pours out a not very polished invective against the things which are the customary bugbears of young writers of verse. Churches and priests and creeds fare ill at his hands, and science is treated with equal disdain. Here is a specimen which shows that Mr. Selkirk has a certain command of language, but that he needs a good deal of mental discipline, before he can expect us to take his serious utterances seriously:—

"Can we give our hearts' compliance to this fate-bound creed of science,
With its sneer of cold defiance, holding prayer a wasted breath, While deaf to all appealing, every stroke the wheel is dealing Sends its crowds of victims reeling into dust of dreamless death?"

Or, shall we seek soul-quarter in the miserable charter
Of a low, degrading barter—joys of heaven and pains of hell?
As if the god-given banner of a man's immortal honour,
With a price affixed upon her, were a thing to buy and sell!

Shall we bow beneath the preaching of the church's garbled teaching,
With its faros of heavenly reaching over lines it must not pass?
With its multiform complexion; every fierce and wrangling section
Self-asserting a perfection that's denied it in the mass.

Quacks that pour their paid-for thunder through the gates of fear and wonder,
Shall we tear their creeds asunder, toss the fragments to the skies?
Priests and preachers leave behind us, with the windy words that blind us, Till the light can hardly find us through the mesh of twisted lies?"

The simpler, the closer to nature Mr. Stirling can keep his muse, the better. Above all things, let him avoid imitating Mr. Browning.—The Love Poems of Louis Barnaval. Edited, with an Introduction, by Charles de Kay, (Appleton and Co., New York.)—Mr. de Kay tells in his introduction the painful story of the poet's life and death. He was a young native of Louisiana, who, going to seek his fortune in New York, fell in love with a lady of that place, was rejected by her for another suitor, renewed his acquaintance with her after her marriage, and was wounded, as it turns out to the death (for so we understand the expression of the introduction), in a duel which proved fatal (by the deplorable accident of the bullet glancing from a stone) to the lady's husband. There is a most distinct and striking originality about the poems. They are often defective in form; they never reach the highest level. But they are not common-place. They are as different as possible from the smooth flatteries and sugary compliments which are commonly found under the title of "love poems." Every line of them is manifestly addressed to an actual person. Probably a woman never had such language addressed to her before, even by a poetical adorer. We can but regret that a passion so genuine had so deplorable an ending, and wrecked a life that could not but have achieved, had it but been prolonged, no common excellence in poetry. Here is a strange little poem, with an image which we venture to say was never used in verse before:—

"I worship three ways, upward, side to side
And to and fro; and if a fourth extension
Inheres in things within this world described
I worship likewise in that fourth dimension.

But what! there is a fourth dimension, showing
Neither in lines nor cubes nor surfaces!
You catch it in the eyes of violets blowing,
You know it in the silent souls of trees.

O fourth dimension thou art Love, a land
Most talked of and least trodden. From thy garden
Circe the ruck of beasts who scoff has banned
And nevermore will these thy lovers pardon."

And here, again, is something in a more ordinary strain, but yet with a vigour of its own:—

"O gold-cup moon, brimm'd high with generous wine, Pour, pour on her your wealth
Of amorous health,

On her I call, but with what folly, mine!

O thyme-steeped wind, with your fine feathery broom

For rare new perfumes seek

Each hidden creek

And sweep them through her cool and shadowy room!

O treacherous tide swirling along the cove,

From China spices rare

And rich silks bear

To cast them at the feet of her I love!

O fringing trees that sing to her in sleep,

Stretch, stretch your green nets wide

On every side

And seize miasmas that should near her creep!

O bashful feet and foolish trembling hands,

Be firm, be hardy each

To aid his speech

When next her lover by his true love stands!

O stammering tongue which each warm word outstrips,

O timorous heart that now like dolphin dips,

What though ye fail to serve?

There still is nerve

For one mute passionate pleading of the lips."

IMPERFECTLY ADAPTED SPECTACLES are the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Mr. H. LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, 1A OLD BOND STREET, has made the Adaptation of Spectacles his special and sole study for upwards of 30 years. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Similar testimonials from Earl Lindsay, F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P., Thomas Cook, Esq., the well-known Tourist Agent, &c.—Pamphlet containing valuable suggestions, post free. City Branches—6 POULTRY, and 22 FENCHURCH STREET.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Government of Germany is most desirous of conciliating Spain, and the Emperor, therefore, wished to return the visit of King Alfonso in the stateliest fashion. A personal visit to Madrid is impossible, on account of the Emperor's great age, but he has sent the Crown Prince as his substitute, and invested the journey with every possible ceremonial observance. The Crown Prince, of course, cannot pass through Paris, and therefore sails from Genoa on Sunday in a despatch-boat, escorted by three men-of-war, to Valencia. He was originally to have landed in Barcelona, the chief city of Northern Spain; but the French colony there assumed so menacing an attitude, and the Republicans of the city were so cold, that Valencia was substituted. The reception will, doubtless, be cordial, especially in Madrid, as Spanish pride is deeply gratified by the visit; but it is doubtful if the people entirely approve. The Liberals among them are reluctant to offend France, which they regard as the vanguard of Republicanism among the Latin races; while the Conservatives retain a Clerical tinge, to which the alliance of the great Protestant Power is not acceptable. The Court would, of course, be graciousness itself, even were the Queen not, as she is, an Austrian Archduchess, and intent on maintaining the policy of her family, which is, and for years to come must be, amity with Germany.

The Delegates from the Transvaal now in London have presented their demands in writing to the Colonial Office. They are marked by the one-sidedness which usually distinguishes requests from South Africa. The Boers ask that the Sand River Convention shall be restored to its full validity, or, in other words, that the Transvaal shall be acknowledged as an independent State, with full control over its coloured population. They also ask that the Debt, some £230,000, shall be written off; and, finally, demand the control of Bechuanaland, which, they say, was unfairly separated from the Transvaal by the Convention of Pretoria. On their own side they offer nothing, and are apparently full of the idea that Great Britain is unable to contest the position. Great Britain is most unwilling to waste energy in South Africa, where no victory is a gain, but the Boers abuse the privileges of ignorance. They are welcome to their Debt, which they have made no effort to pay, and to their independence, which releases Britain from responsibility for their conduct; but they cannot be allowed to extend their borders at their own discretion. The Government must insist on protecting the natives, so far as is possible, and on defining boundaries, and should make these objects the conditions of recognising independence. We greatly doubt whether, in the long-run, the Boers will consent to be forgotten without another expedition, which next time must be on the Egyptian scale; but if so, it will be far better to fight the fight out with a foreign and independent Power, than to act on the false theory that we are chastising rebellious subjects. It may be taken as certain that Lord Derby, who dislikes ill-defined claims, will not grant too little.

The Paris correspondent of the Times states on "good" authority that the general basis of an agreement between the Suez Canal Company and the British shipowners is to be as follows:—A second Canal is to be cut, the British Government lending the Company £8,000,000 at 3 per cent. for that purpose. That Government is also to consent that the 44 per cent. of all the shares which it now holds, but which receive no dividend till 1894, shall never receive more than 5 per cent. In return for these large concessions, British trade will be benefited by the second Canal; 44 per cent. of the administration will be English; English tribunals will settle differences; and the whole management of the Company, after dividing 20 per cent. among the shareholders, will be devoted to reducing tolls. We are, though this is not mentioned, that the project of the Canal will be placed under a British Naval officer, as that was conceded before, and is a cardinal point. The offer seems a greedy one, as the British Government stands a great sum obtainable in 1894 by the sale of its shares, but it will serve as a basis for negotiation. The Government does not desire trading profits, and, indeed, ought not to take them, but greater facilities for the Eastern trade.

The Lord Mayor's Day, yesterday week, had its remarkable aspects, but they were hardly aspects involving any political surprise to the nation. It was remarkable for the interposition in the procession of a van of frozen meat from the Antipodes, which somehow contrived to make itself a principal feature of the Lord Mayor's Show. It was remarkable, again, for the presence at the Lord Mayor's banquet of a French engineer so famous and so jealous for his own country as M. de Lesseps, and for his cordial reception of the compliments showered on him on all sides by "perfidious" Englishmen. It was remarkable for the circumstance that France was represented by an Ambassador who spoke English like an Englishman, and who, while treating the French Republic as a great experiment of only thirteen years' standing, appeared to regard the alliance between England and France as no longer an experiment, but a policy necessary to the welfare of both countries. It was a remarkable thing to have a Lord Mayor—Mr. B. N. Fowler, M.P., one of the Members for the City of London—who quoted both Greek and Latin, both Homer and Horace, to his audience, though he condescended sufficiently to give them a poetical translation of the Greek. And it was remarkable that of all the foreign Ministers present, the one who attracted most interest was perhaps not even M. Waddington, in spite of his English descent and education, his ability and his cordiality, but the Chinese Marquis Tseng, who has attained so suddenly a reputation for diplomatic skill almost beyond the standard of Europe. But the announcements of policy made were not remarkable, and Mr. Gladstone's speech, happy and graceful as it was, was happiest in its way of announcing that there was very little to announce, and that the newspapers had prophesied (truly or falsely) the purposes of the Government, rather than disclosed them.

Mr. Gladstone's speech commenced with a cordial acknowledgment of the Lord Mayor's personal compliments to himself, —namely, those Homeric and Horatian passages to which we have already referred, with the kindly commentary in which they were applied to Mr. Gladstone,—whereon Mr. Gladstone remarked, "You and I have had as good opportunities as any two persons in this hall of making accurate studies of one another,—of one another's features and personal appearance, from which, by an intelligent eye, it is well known that so much is to be learnt." After thus humorously and respectfully indicating the indelible characters in which the present Lord Mayor's dispositions and convictions are engraved upon his open countenance, Mr. Gladstone went on to speak of M. Waddington's cordial speech as the event of the evening, and to anticipate the greatest possible advantage from the free communications which were about to take place between M. de Lesseps and the ship-owners and traders of this country. And then Mr. Gladstone bantered the newspapers for their premature knowledge of intentions to which the Cabinet had not come, and of which he would only say that he "doubted very much the policy of being too soon, indeed he doubted it as much as he did the policy of being too late in the determination of legislative measures."

On Wednesday was celebrated the twentieth anniversary of Mr. Shaw Lefevre's election as M.P. for Reading, and the dinner, at which 350 guests were present, was followed by speeches of unusual interest. First came Mr. Lefevre's review of his political career,—a review of curious interest,—since it reminded us that at the commencement of it, Lord Palmerston thought the policy of Reform already exhausted; while Lord Russell preached to his supporters the doctrine, "Rest, and be thankful," and this though, after twenty years of active, and, as some think, violent progress, we appear to be only on the threshold of the sort of reforms in which the masses of the people feel the deepest interest. Mr. Lefevre enumerated as the direct results of Mr. Disraeli's Household Suffrage Act, the Education Acts, the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, the Irish Land Acts, the Burials Act, the Agricultural Holdings Acts, the Ground-Game Act, the Married Women's Property Act, the Artisans' Dwellings Act, the Abolition of Purchase in the Army, and the opening of the Army and Navy to general competition, with several other changes of minor importance,—a really remarkable catalogue of reforms, of hardly any one of which even the strictest Conservative would now venture to dispute the beneficent character.

He reviewed also the remarkable change which had taken place in the popular view of foreign affairs, under the influence of what Mr. Disraeli used to sneer at as the "cosmopolitan" ideas of the Liberal party,—in other words, the idea that we should take into account the interests of other nations as affected by wars, treaties, and international disputes, before deciding too positively on the policy which is demanded by the interests of the United Kingdom. Mr. Lefevre concluded by a striking passage, in which he admitted that, as Commissioner of Public Works, he had destroyed more than he had constructed, but justified this by saying that if he, like Liberal legislators, had cleared away much, and had founded comparatively little, it was only because there was so much that was ugly and noxious which needed clearing away before the higher constructive work could go on successfully, and because construction was so slow as compared with destruction, that you hardly saw the good fruits which you were to reap from the seed you had sown. Undoubtedly, of the Liberal work above enumerated, much more than half is constructive, and not destructive, and though much of the fruit is still unripe, much has been actually gathered in.

After Mr. Lefevre, Lord Selborne made a very gentle Liberal-Conservative speech; Mr. Walter a very safe one, insisting on the love of constituencies for their old Members; and Mr. John Morley a vigorous Radical speech, of which the key was that if, as Mr. Goschen hinted, the progress of Radical measures under a democracy was "killing," it was only because it is "killingly slow." Is it, he asked, a very "killing pace" to be only on the threshold of extending household suffrage to the counties, seventeen years after its concession to the boroughs of England? Mr. John Morley did not suppose "that the Liberals of Reading or Berks, any more than the Liberals of anywhere else, would reduce their party to the condition of that famous monument to the Duke of Wellington, which Mr. Shaw Lefevre was for many months at his wits' end to know what to do with. The material was excellent, the steed was colossal, the figure heroic, but the charger had no inside,"—with which sarcasm on the stand-still Liberals Mr. John Morley sat down amidst great applause.

The Reading celebration was continued on Thursday, when Mr. Shaw Lefevre made another speech, in which he gave a very clear and interesting review both of the Rookeries evil and of the serious condition of agricultural labour at the present moment, and of the remedies for both evils. He pointed out that Lord Salisbury had been quite ignorant that an Act founded on the Report of the Committee of Inquiry into the Rookeries question did become law last Session, and he showed that its provisions would enormously diminish the cost of buying up rookeries. He held, too, that there was no remedy for the deteriorating condition of agricultural labourers, except directly interesting them in the soil by enabling them to buy their own cottages and gardens, and so to gain a personal pride in agriculture.

Mr. Fawcett, who spoke after Mr. Lefevre, and who bore testimony to Mr. Lefevre's admirable administration of the Post Office during his own serious illness last year, made some criticism on our own columns in relation to the representation of minorities. He hardly, however, seems to have understood us. What we said was that the present "three-cornered" system, though it gives a better representation of opinion in the particular constituencies to which it is applied, positively injures the representation of English opinion as a whole, and will do so, unless it be enormously extended to the representation of minorities in small places as well as large,—and that it is simply hopeless to ask for such a large extension as this, without remedying the defects which make it so annoying to the constituencies to which it is applied. On the Socialist question,—on the taxing of the industrious and able to remedy the evils which the indolent and the slovenly have brought upon themselves,—Mr. Fawcett spoke with very great vigour and effect. Radical as he is, Mr. Fawcett will never be found on the side of increasing the difficulties of life to the good, in order to diminish their pressure on the bad.

It is a great pity that orators in English meetings are not allowed by etiquette to swear. We are quite sure that if Mr. Lowther, at the Tory Colston Dinner at Bristol on Tuesday, had been allowed to swear at Mr. Gladstone and Lord Granville for five minutes, he would have made a much better speech. As it was, he was obliged to relieve his feelings by statements, of which the best that can be said is that they betray in him unexpected luridness of imagination. He declared that in Ireland the loyal subjects of her Majesty "were first deliberately robbed by the Government, and then handed over to the knife and bullet of the assassin." Mr. Gladstone turned round upon those whom he had robbed and driven out of the country, and murdered or allowed to be murdered, and complained that they did not support the Government. As for poor Lord Granville, "The Members of her Majesty's Government who were most intimately connected with the Administration of our foreign affairs, allowed it to be known that if this country had maintained its rights with respect to the Suez Canal, and run counter to what happened to be for the moment the popular proclivities in France, we should have been in imminent danger of war with that country." The Suez-Canal arrangement was, in fact, dictated by fear. Whatever the sin of swearing, a point on which volumes have been written, it can hardly be greater than the sin of slandering in that style.

The English are beginning in a vague way to realise the magnitude of India, and to comprehend that it contains some fifty millions more people than all Europe west of the Vistula. Few, however, are quite aware of the number of its cities, or believe that it includes sixty-two with more than 50,000 people, and twenty-two with more than 100,000, namely, Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, Hyderabad, Lucknow, Benares, Delhi, Patna, Agra, Bangalore, Umritsur, Cawnpore, Lahore, Allahabad, Jeypore, Rangoon, Poona, Ahmedabad, Bareilly, Surat, Howra, and Baroda. We give them in order of population, but, properly speaking, in the English way of counting, Howra, the Southwark of Calcutta, should be included in the capital, which with it contains above 866,000 souls, and is the greatest, as it is by far the wealthiest, city in the Empire. Below the limit of 50,000 the towns become much more numerous, and there are hundreds with populations above 20,000. The majority of the latter are quite unknown to Europeans, an active magistrate or two excepted; and, so far as we are aware, there is no book in English which gives the slightest account of their organisation, or of the life and people in them. Yet many of them have histories of two thousand years, and in all flourish families which think themselves noble, and have long pedigrees, and stirring tales to narrate. We hear every now and then much of Indian Princes who in India are hardly mentioned, and of "educated natives," a scarcely perceptible class, but of the true "British India" as little is known at home as of the eastern provinces of Peru.

M. Tirard, the French Chancellor of the Exchequer, is, we fear, not a safe financier. The French economists complain strongly of his budgets as concealing deficits, and he has now made to the Budget Committee a most insidious proposal. The Bank of France is at present allowed to issue £128,000,000 of notes, which it must cash on demand, either in gold or silver. It is not, however, compelled to hold a certain proportion of metal to notes, but may provide for its obligation to cash them as it pleases. M. Tirard now proposes to abolish the limit of issue, his idea evidently being, if he wants a loan, to borrow, say, £20,000,000 of the Bank, and take it in new notes. This method would be so quick and easy, that it would tempt the Government to expense, and diminish the hold of the Chamber on its outlays, as it could not repudiate the loan when borrowed and spent. The Budget Committee, therefore, reject the proposal, but agree to raise the limit by £20,000,000 above the present actual issue, which is 120 millions sterling. They, in fact, grant permission to the Treasury to raise one loan from the Bank of France, but not more.

The difficulties of the historian are well illustrated in the discussion in the Times on turtle soup. Sir Henry Thompson, who is an eminent authority on food and cooking, as well as surgery, writes to say that turtle soup is "never" made of turtle, but is a conger-eel soup, flavoured with bits of turtle, "miscalled" turtle fat. Another authority, "J. P.," supports Sir Henry, but does not believe in the conger eel. It is, he says, the common eel which is used for "stock." To this the proprietors of the "Ship and Turtle Tavern" retort that both are wrong; that they never use any eels, conger or other, but make their soup of the flesh of the turtle, killing eight a day for that purpose. They offer to submit to any test, and are supported by "Restaurateur," who points out that turtle flesh is cheaper than eels. We suppose the truth is that some "turtle soup" is made of turtle, and some is not; but the flat contradiction of testimony is a curious proof of the difficulty of arriving at the truth. The matter is of some importance, because, though it does not matter what aldermen eat, turtle is frequently given to invalids.

Mr. Chamberlain made a most able speech at the Trinity House on Wednesday upon the losses of British shipping. He quite acknowledged the failure of Mr. Plimsoll's Act, under which the losses have steadily increased. In 1882, the losses rose to the astounding number of 1,310 ships, or nearly twenty-five a week, with a tonnage of 378,000 tons. This was the greatest loss ever sustained, as also was the loss of life—3,372—if we deduct one year, in which two coolie ships went down. This is equivalent to the destruction of three full regiments of able-bodied men. He considered it indispensable to prevent such loss of life and property, and as the Act had failed mainly from the impossibility of providing adequate inspection, he proposed to go to the root of the evil, and invalidate insurances on unseaworthy ships, besides giving, as we interpret him, to the relatives of the drowned a claim against the owners. This will prevent the reckless use of rotten vessels, as well as their wilful destruction. The suggestion is excellent, if Mr. Chamberlain can only provide for details. Can he prevent a Marine Insurance Office from charging high rates and paying without inquiry?

From a letter by Dr. Murrell to this week's Lancet, it appears that Dr. Sydney Ringer had no share in the responsibility for the experiments, of which we gave a brief account last week, on the poisonous effects of nitrite of sodium. As a matter of fact, Dr. Ringer, we believe, had never read the article in which Dr. Murrell's experiments are recorded, having contributed only some of the literature of the subject in relation to the past use of nitrite of sodium as a drug. Further, Dr. Murrell maintains that considerably larger doses of nitrite of sodium had been given, with no harmful and even with good effect, in former cases, to patients suffering from the affections for which he treated them, and that he had no means of knowing that the nitrite used by him was much purer and more potent than the nitrite formerly prescribed and taken without hurt in these still larger doses. All this, however, Dr. Murrell should have stated clearly. No one could have read his former article, and not supposed that he was deliberately urging his patients to take doses of nitrite of sodium which, if not dangerous, were, at least, most painful and alarming.

Dean Cowie is to be translated from Manchester to Exeter, and to fill the Deanery vacated by the death of Dean Boyd. The appointment is a good one. Dean Cowie is, in the first place, a Senior Wrangler, and so considerable an authority in mathematical and physical science that he was chosen Principal of the College of Civil Engineers at Putney, and subsequently

Professor of Geometry at Gresham College. His experience as a Government Inspector of Training-schools makes him an authority on educational questions. As Vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry, in London, he showed the use to which the City churches may be put by starting short week-day services, with short addresses of a kind to draw popular audiences. At Manchester, he has been successful as administrator of the Cathedral, and so popular with the clergy of the Northern Province, that the Lower House of Convocation made him their Prolocutor, on the death of the late Dean of York. We trust that some one will be appointed to succeed him who will carry on his work at the Cathedral in the same spirit. It will be remembered that the Bishop of Manchester was so well satisfied with the ritual of the Cathedral, that he held a special synod with the view of recommending it as a model for the rest of the diocese.

The Dean of Carlisle has, it appears, been offered the Deanery of Manchester, but has not yet made up his mind to abandon his present sphere of work, so soon after he had entered on it. We trust, however, that he will accept the larger sphere of usefulness open to him. There is no city in England where his broad and manly type of Christianity would find more acceptance than amongst the hard-headed and laborious people of Manchester.

The statement of the Echo that nearly all Mr. Gladstone's ecclesiastical appointments have been of a High-Church character is not only false, but ridiculous. What do they think of Dean Bradley? of Dean Connor? of Dean Davidson? of Dean Plumptre? of Dean Kitchin? of Canons Barry, Butler of Winchester, Melville, Rowsell, Holland, Cadman, Driver, Boyd-Carpenter? And even of the Bishops, the only Bishop who can in any sense be considered a High Churchman is Bishop Wilkinson, whom Belgravians used to call a High-Church Methodist. The Archbishop of Canterbury, again, has always been considered by Dr. Lightfoot, the present Bishop of Durham, as belonging to his own Broad-Church school. As for all the important livings to which Mr. Gladstone has appointed, we believe that not one of his nominees is a High Churchman.

Mr. Forster, in presiding on Wednesday over a large public meeting at St. George's Hall, Bradford, in connection with the Luther Commemoration, described Luther as "the most courageous man, for both physical and moral courage, that he knew of in history," and as having said the great word of the Reformation when he declared, in the presence of the Emperor, "My conscience binds me." This is true; but when Mr. Forster went on to speak of Luther with almost pure admiration, we cannot follow him. Luther was a man of marvellous courage, but his courage was sometimes the courage of great passions, as well as of deep convictions. His treatment of the terrible subject of the Peasants' War alone proved this. First, no doubt, he mediated between the Sovereigns and the insurrection, trying to make the peasants moderate, and to make the princes just; but when the peasants would not obey his counsels, he said they ought to be "slaughtered like mad dogs,"—and that saying was not the saying of courage, but the saying of resentful violence. Afterwards, again, he endeavoured to moderate the severity of the princes; but, in the social, as in theological disputes, you hardly ever get the piety of Luther free from his passions, or his soul without its taint of bodily crudeness and coarseness. To Luther may be traced not only the new freedom of the conscience, but no small part of the lawlessness of the modern naturalism. His was a fiery nature, strongly mixed of evil and of good.

A most regrettable error crept into our reviews last week. The reviewer of Mr. O'Donovan's new edition of his book on Merv spoke in feeling terms of the "premature decease" of the author, who is alive, and sending to the Daily News most picturesque letters from the Soudan. We hope no relative or friend has been harassed by an error which arose from some confusion between two correspondents, and which would not have escaped ourselves in revising proofs, but that we naturally thought the death had been mentioned in the book itself. We can only trust that the blunder may not prove a prophecy, and that this singularly bright and daring explorer has not shared in the defeat which we begin to fear has overtaken the army of Hicks Pasha. The absence of intelligence about that army is nearly inexplicable, and gives colour to the rumours that its communications are cut off.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE SPEAKERSHIP.

TO our mind, the Speaker ought to be a much more important figure in the Democratic House of Commons of the future than he has ever been in the Middle-class House of Commons of the past. We do not mean that we wish to see a sudden and revolutionary change made in the interpretation of the duties of that office. On the contrary, such a change would be most unadvisable and mischievous. But we do think that if the House of Commons elected by a democracy in the interests of a democracy, is to be as efficient for democratic purposes, as the House of Commons elected by the middle and higher class in the interests of the middle and higher class was for the purposes of the well-to-do classes, the Speaker of that House must gradually develop the office into one of greater significance and greater responsibility than it has hitherto involved. Sir Henry Brand has made an admirable Speaker, and on one occasion displayed an energy and originality in the discharge of his duties which properly won for him the gratitude of the whole Empire. But Sir Henry Brand was appointed Speaker before the effects of the recent democratic change had developed themselves, and quite rightly took his chief precedents from the examples of such Speakers as Mr. Denison and Mr. Shaw Lefevre; nor could it have been fairly expected of him that he would strengthen the whole conception of the duties of the office, even though he did rightly strike one coup d'état, when it became evident that a small party had determined so to conduct themselves as to make legislation of which they disapproved wholly impracticable. But, unless we are much mistaken, the Speaker of the Democratic House of Commons of the future must regard himself more or less as the trustee of the whole House to prevent the reckless waste of time and energy; and must display, therefore, not only impartiality,—which all our Speakers have displayed,—but a steady resolve to keep speakers to the point they are discussing, and to resist any attempt to prolong talk for the sake of delaying action. He must exercise the full rights of the Speaker to put down individual encroachments on the patience of the House, and so prepare the House for such a use by him of the right of closure of debate as would express the general resolve of the nation that debate is to be practical, and not a machinery for retarding the execution of a legislative purpose. We believe that the Speaker would be supported in gradually applying the rule of closure so as to stop redundant debate, though it would be obviously necessary to use the greatest impartiality in the application of the rule, and to take every care that it should not be even liable to the imputation of being used as a party instrument. But with the enormous competitive pressure on the time of the House which democracy necessarily involves, it is certain that the Speaker ought to be more and more invested with the power to winnow away the chaff of mere verbosity, unless the House is to prove a very inferior instrument in the hands of the people to that which it has proved in the hands of the aristocracy and the middle-class.

Holding these views about the Speakership of the future, we cannot but think that the choice of a successor to Sir Henry Brand is one of the most important of the political duties which devolve on the present Administration and the House of Commons. We desire to see a man of something like special genius for the place chosen,—a man whose first quality, of course, would be impartiality, but whose secondary and equally conspicuous qualities would be decision, tact, and sympathy with the public spirit of the House. We have already mentioned Mr. Courtney as having shown indications of exactly such qualities as are needed on the few occasions on which he has replaced the Chairman of Committees in difficult and exhausting crises. He is comparatively young, and has that self-confidence, that promptitude, and that pleasure in showing his superiority to party considerations, which may make an able man either a snubbing Government official, or a great servant of the House. If a man of much greater experience than Mr. Courtney were wanted, it is only justice to a very shrewd and very resolute Member, of whom the public knows far less than it ought to know, to mention Mr. Dillwyn, with his long experience of the House, his iron frame, his keen eye, his complete indifference to praise or censure, his excellent judgment, and his indomitable strength of purpose, as one who would not be afraid to serve the House as the House now most needs serving, by interpreting with perfect impartiality, as regards its various sections, its impatience of anything like waste of time. Such a nomination would excite some surprise in the country, but hardly any in the House itself.

It has been said, however, that the House and the Government look to the class of Cabinet or passed Cabinet Ministers for the authority needful to give a new significance to the Speaker's functions. If so, there are several men to whom we might with some confidence look, though we should not count Sir William Harcourt as even a possible candidate. With all his great qualities, Sir William Harcourt is just the very type of man of whom it would be impossible to make a good Speaker. In the first place, the Irish party already regard him as their implacable enemy, and no condition could be more unfavourable for success than that. We should say that one of the great conditions of success in a new Speaker, would be a disposition on the part of the Irish Members to believe in his fairness, in his disposition to deal with them as he would with any other section of the House. But what is more important than even the deep-seated prejudice of the Irish Members, is Sir William Harcourt's strong bias towards the wishes of the majority, an almost fatal tendency in a Speaker, who ought to feel even a more jealous sympathy with the minority, as a minority,—unless that minority were engaged in subverting the purposes of the whole body to which they belonged,—than with the majority itself. Sir William Harcourt is a great party leader, but he has never shown, and never could show, that almost jealous indifference to popular bias wherever justice was at stake, which is one of the first requisites of a great Speaker. There are men whose self-respect shows itself in defying a majority where equity requires that a majority should be defied; and both Mr. Courtney and Mr. Dillwyn have, we believe, this kind of self-respect in abundance. But Sir William Harcourt has not. His tendency is to trample on a minute party which he happens to deem at once dangerous and weak, and to scorn their resentment. No quality could be more fatal to the success of a great Speaker. Sir Henry James, whose name has been mentioned in this connection, would have far greater claims on the consideration of the House. He is very able, and has plenty of tact, but whether he would not take too historical a view of an office which needs "evolution," is, we think, open to great doubt. Besides, we need him as a statesman, a capacity in which the public estimate of him grows daily.

Both Mr. Childers and Mr. Goschen have been spoken of as possible Speakers, and if either of them were inclined to give up yet higher prospects for the sake of taking an office which undoubtedly needs something of "evolution" in the interests of democracy, either of them has great qualities for the post. Mr. Childers has a great and just reputation for fairness of mind. Neither the Irish Members nor any other Party in the House would anticipate anything but perfect fairness from him,—indeed, the Irish Members have every reason to regard him as a friend. Moreover, he has had his experience of the working of democratic institutions in Australia, and with his perfect equanimity, his "sweet reasonableness,"—as Mr. Arnold calls it,—and his strong sense of duty to the State at large, he might well hope to make a great office of the Speakership. Mr. Goschen is younger, and has established a reputation for entering into Conservative feeling which would give him a considerable claim on Conservative support. And with his great weight of character and reflective impartiality, he might give a quite new efficiency to the Speakership. His conduct of the mission to Constantinople showed that decisiveness which is one of the essentials of the Speakership of the future. The man who could deal effectually with a shifty Sultan, is just the man to deal effectually with a shifty Bashi-Bazouk of debate. But we cannot but doubt whether either Mr. Childers or Mr. Goschen would give up the more attractive career of a powerful Minister for the comparatively inconspicuous one of a Speaker.

Whoever the next Speaker may be, however, the one thing needful is that he should have the tact, the impartiality, the promptitude, and the energy requisite to magnify his office,—to make of the Speakership a more positively directing power than it has hitherto been, a power exerted in the interests of the State at large, and in the full confidence of popular support. The aim of the new Speaker and his successors should certainly be to economise the time, to increase the legislative efficiency, and to raise the dignity of the House of Commons, without derogating in the smallest degree from the absolute impartiality of the Chair.

LORD RIPON.

THAT Lord Ripon should be attacked by those who disapprove the Ilbert Bill is natural enough, for the dispute which underlies that question rouses very fierce antagonisms, as well of modes of thinking, as of caste, creed, and colour. But that the Viceroy of India should be attacked, as he has been in the Times of Wednesday, as almost an imbecile, on the grounds put forward in that journal, is positively monstrous. Our acquaintance with English journalism is now, unhappily, a long one, but we cannot remember an article at once so irreligious and so cynically unfair. Lord Ripon, as everybody knows, felt impelled, six or seven years ago, to join the Roman Catholic Church. He lost by so doing all that it is possible for a man in his position to lose,—a secure place in English politics, the favour of the majority of his countrymen, scope for a natural ambition, the support, though not the regard, of most valued friends, and the approval, though not the affection, of his closest connections. Being, however, a firm as well as a conscientious man, he faced all those results calmly, and for the sake of what he believed to be truth gave up, as it seemed for ever, all hopes of public life. This act of self-abnegation the Times of Wednesday describes in these words:—

"He had obtained as a Whig magnate a position in the party which his abilities would assuredly never have won, and as there were no more rewards for him at home, and he was not fit for the Cabinet, he was sent to govern India. When he was appointed, we had numerous protests addressed to us from all parts of the country, on the ground that a man who changes his religion in middle-life is not fit to govern an empire. Though sympathising with these protests, which came, not from fanatics, but from their antipodes, we were unwilling to take up an attitude that might have seemed invidious. But, had we done so, no one would now be bold enough to say that we had been unjust. A man who, at the mature age of fifty or thereabouts, apostatises from the religion of his fathers, on the ground of 'grave doubts' as to the validity of English Orders or the views of the Anglican Church about the nature of the Eucharist, certainly does not possess the strength and solidity of intellect required in a ruler. A man who, at that age, passes a crushing vote of censure upon his own private judgment by handing it over to a priest, deserves no more confidence from others. Men of sense make up their minds on these subjects at an early age, and it is only rather poor and narrow-brained persons who are troubled at thirty with any question about the form of religion they have lived under. To have gone over to Rome is not Lord Ripon's offence, but rather that he is of the type of man who thinks of going over at all to any new Church in middle-life. The Romans had a contempt for those who deserted the faith of their fathers, and it was well founded. A man who at forty or fifty has not found some way of reconciling his religion and his life is a weak creature, no matter in what trappings he may be decked, or on what pedestal partiality may place him."

Only the day before, the Times had declared Martin Luther a hero for doing at thirty-seven precisely what Lord Ripon did, and proclaiming to all the world that he had failed to reconcile his religion and his life, and must go out finally and for ever from the Church in which he was bred up. If ever a strong man lived, even a brutally strong man, it was Martin Luther; yet, in the judgment of men whom the Times will allow to be hard-headed, there was yet a stronger, and John Knox first acknowledged his "apostasy" when thirty-eight, and did not finally break with Rome till he was forty-one. Cardinal Newman, whose ability even the Times would hardly question, though probably a Catholic in feeling at forty-two, did not enter the Roman Church till he was forty-five, and Cardinal Manning was a clergyman in English Orders till he was forty-three. If we were to wander farther afield, and include either converts from Paganism, like Mahommed, or those who have quitted Christianity for some form of disbelief, we could fill columns with lists of strong men who have "apostatized" after forty, and have never been deemed, even by theological opponents, wanting either in courage or brain-power. In truth, if age has anything to do with the matter, it tells the other way. It would not be unreasonable for a cynical onlooker to say that a lad of twenty-one, bred up in the tradition of a great faith, should hesitate to quit it before he had gained a wider experience and a deeper learning; but to say that a man of fifty, who, in opposition to every worldly interest, changes his faith, thereby stamps himself a fool, is to deny that religion can have any importance at all, to assert that the problem of the Whence and Whither ought to have less hold upon men's minds than even a question of politics, upon which men of mature years and undoubted capacity abandon old convictions every day. If it was imbecile in Lord Ripon to quit the Church of England in mature years, why was it a sign of strength in Peel, then in his fullest manhood, to declare against Catholic Disabilities, or when his mind had further matured, to reject his hereditary faith in Protection for the gospel of Free-trade?

It is useless to strive with an opponent who can use such arguments, but there is one intellectual puzzle in the situation which greatly interests us. A large number of those who are irritated by Lord Ripon's policy in India as a policy of Indophilism are undoubtedly of opinion that the Viceroy favours the natives because he has become a Roman Catholic. Now, what is the explanation of that singular impression? What is there in the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church, as opposed to the tenets of the Protestant Churches, which should make Lord Ripon as a Catholic like Mahommedans, Pagans, or Theists better than as a Protestant he could have done? We should say that as against Mahommedanism, Catholicism was on the whole a little the more bitter of the two; while as concerning Paganism, the views of the two creeds, though somewhat differently expressed, are practically identical, both believing that Pagans are either finally lost or saved by invincible ignorance. Certainly, nothing in Catholicism tends to induce Catholic rulers to promote the unbaptised, or to acknowledge that equality between believers and misbelievers can be a dogma of the faith. Catholic Kings have not persecuted heretics more determinedly than they have persecuted Mahommedans, Jews, and the strange varieties of Paganism which once covered the whole of Portuguese and Spanish America. The suspicion is, in fact, absurd, and is due to two causes,—one, that Englishmen dislike unpopular converts to Catholicism with additional intensity because of their conversion,—and another, that prominent Catholics are usually Irishmen, who either feel or profess unusual sympathy with all conquered nationalities. To suppose that a great English noble trained to statesmanship guides his policy upon purely religious grounds, even if those grounds existed, is nonsensical,—just as nonsensical as it would be to say that Sir George Jessel's judgments as Master of the Rolls were deflected by his adherence to the Synagogue. But then we are told Lord Ripon is a popularity-hunter. He may be, for what we know, though going over to Rome is not exactly the way to secure popularity; but, at any rate, he is not hunting popularity in India. He is getting himself cursed by those who can give him reputation, in order, as he thinks, to benefit the silent. The truth is, Lord Ripon is a sound, honest Radical, a little too much inclined, as Radical nobles usually are, to apply his principles with too little deference for opposing circumstances. Nine times out of ten he will be right, but the tenth time he will be wrong. In theory, the Ilbert Bill, as it is called, cannot be attacked, unless, indeed, we lay down the principle that Mahommedan or heathen Judges cannot be trusted, which we do lay down as regards all independent Asiatic countries, but have abandoned as regards India by subjecting all classes to them in civil cases. But in practice it is so important that the only progressive class in India should feel pleasantly towards the Natives, and should confide in the Courts, that to introduce a Bill which roused race-hatred and destroyed confidence was, unless the necessity was grave, an error of judgment. The necessity is not pleaded, and Lord Ripon should have waited until the real people made a grievance of a privilege which, as a community, they do not even know, and care nothing whatever about. The mere fact that it was necessary to exempt all cantonments from the operation of the Bill should have warned him of the danger ahead. He would, however, never have brought in the Bill, if he had dreamed of the feeling it would rouse; and he has modified it, as Lord Northbrook informed his audience at the Colston Dinner, on Tuesday, till it can do very little harm, only a few most experienced Native Judges receiving the new power, and the accused European, if he suspects unfairness, being allowed to apply for a change of venue. For the rest, Lord Ripon is quite right. The Bengal Tenure Bill, whatever its demerits, is a recurrence to the old Indian principle that the ultimate ownership of the soil resides in the tiller of it, and was as strongly supported by Lord Dalhousie and Lord Lawrence as by Lord Ripon; while the Local Self-Government Bill is absolutely necessary, if local taxation is to be made sufficiently heavy. It is nonsense to say that Natives of India cannot govern their own cities, when they created, enriched, and managed them for thousands of years. Calcutta is a camp of huts compared with Benares, and no white man has ordered the stately splendour of Jeypore. Whether election is a good mode of getting native governing committees together is a disputable point, the true native method being government by a self-elected, yet representative junta; but it is a fair experiment to try, and one which gives the lower householders something like fair-play. The Ilbert Bill injures, because it frightens, a most useful class, but the other Bills directly benefit whole nations; and it is by them, and not by one accidental measure, still less by his personal religious creed, that Lord Ripon should be judged.

THE CHEERFULNESS OF POLITICIANS.

THE celebration of Mr. Shaw-Lefevre's twenty years connection with Reading has not only plenty of special political interest of its own, but it gives a brighter impression of political life in general,—of course, particularly, though not exclusively, on the Liberal side,—than any recent political event. Mr. Shaw-Lefevre's two admirable speeches are full of the record of hard work, dull work in the study, wearisome work in committees, disappointing work in the House of Commons, plodding work on platforms; indeed, there is hardly any work of the simply exciting and fireworks description referred to in them. Yet what an impression of deep-seated cheerfulness, of the enjoyment which that work has given him, of the modest sense of having really been of use in the world, these speeches produce on us! In them you seem to read the story of a life of heavy labour, which has been almost all enjoyed, almost all useful, and almost all effectual. More than this, it has been almost all work of a healthy kind,—of course, we mean in the moral sense, for the late night-work in the House of Commons cannot be called physically healthy for any human being. There has been no passion in it, no bitterness, no sentimental self-consciousness, no vaulting ambition that overleaps itself, no sense of weakness. Mr. Shaw Lefevre seems to have pursued no dreams, and to have gained a great part of almost every political end he has aimed at. He has had none of the agonies to bear of which artists and literary men, however successful, always run the gauntlet. He has had a steadily fruitful career, without any of the painful crises through which men of equal mark in other walks of life have usually been required to pass. And Mr. Shaw Lefevre's career has not been unique in this respect among politicians. The reminder which he gave us that at the opening of his public life Lord Russell wanted the Liberal party to "rest, and be thankful," while Lord Palmerston confided to the young politician who was to move or second the Address, that Reform had gone far enough, and that further changes in our domestic institutions were to be deprecated, gives a very strong impression of the deep satisfaction with which these eminent men regarded what they had achieved, seeing that they really believed that, for the time at least, it exhausted the requirements of the age. What poet, what theologian, what novelist, what philanthropist, ever contemplated his career with a satisfaction so profound as that? There was evidently a depth of appreciation for what they had effected in Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell which we should seek in vain in the greater figures of extra-political life. And yet, who cannot see that the same note is visible in the retrospective speeches of the late Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright? Where is there a more remarkable phenomenon than Mr. Bright's profound and just satisfaction in the result of his own Free-trade labours? He sees of the travail of his soul, and is satisfied. This is rare with any class of men, but rarest of all with men of genius like Mr. Bright, who are very generally given to depreciate the work they have done, and to think highly only of what they vainly sought to do. Mr. Bright rests, and we think justly rests, on the satisfaction of the comparative comfort and plenty which he has brought to millions of homes, with far more peace than even a Catholic saint rests in "works of supererogation," as the Church calls them. There is something of similar serenity and peace in the reproof which Lord Selborne, as a righteous peace-maker, administered to his "noble friend" Lord Salisbury, for charging the Government with having set class against class in Ireland. Lord Selborne is conscious of good works in Ireland, and of good works only. He is so peacefully conscious of them, that he does not even take offence at the violent man who says "Fie upon thee, fie upon thee!" He is ready to turn the other cheek to the adversary, and to recompense him with good for all the evil which has been poured into his bosom. Nor is this profound cheerfulness as the result of labour, limited to the Liberal Party, though, of course, as the Liberals have done so much more than the Conservatives, it is much commoner in the Liberals than in the Conservatives. It is impossible to read the speeches of Sir Richard Cross, for instance, without feeling that his legislative labours as Home Secretary, —which were in many cases both great and beneficent,—are often reviewed by him with the same feeling of serene self-approval, a self-approval certainly not undeserved. Nor can Lord Cairns refer to the changes he has made in the Land Laws without evidence of the same complacency. We believe that political work, so far as it bears, or appears to bear, the test of time, is really some of the most satisfactory work to the conscience that man can achieve. It benefits a great number; the merit of it is shared amongst many; there is no intolerable conceit or self-righteousness in claiming to have shared in a great work done by a great joint effort, for the benefit of all. If "good works" may be relied on at all, these are certainly the kind of good works which seem to bring most healing to the consciences of the doers. They take them more out of themselves, and yet increase the sense of personal efficiency. Again, they are works which train the temper and restrain the passions, which teach patience and equanimity, while they lend significance to life. Look, for instance, at Mr. Fawcett,—how simply and yet gladly his mind rests on the number of commons and open spaces he and his friends, including Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, have saved to the people. You can see that if ever he is compelled to be shut up in himself, if ever he loses,—as we hope he never may,—his aptitude for work, he will reckon up the good works of the Penny Stamp Deposits, the Parcel Post, the Sixpenny Telegraphs, the burdens saved to India and the open spaces saved to England, as so many passports to the Book of Life. If Moore had written a poem on the salvation of a politician, he would have made the Peri take up to Heaven not a tear of penitence, but a resolution in Committee or a useful Act of Parliament.

On the whole, we think the politicians quite right and very reasonable in deriving so much satisfaction from the genuinely useful labours in which they exhaust their strength and spend their leisure, as well as their working hours. The late Mr. Bagehot used to say that the young Peers had never found out how much more really amusing a life of genuine work is than a life of what is called amusement; and of all kinds of hard work, political hard work, so long as it stands the test of time, is in some respects the most gratifying. Not, indeed, that any kind of work is more wearisome and vexatious than political work during the long, slow process of instilling conviction into the minds of hundreds of indifferent Members whom you have to convince, not so much that your object is good, as that the country desires it and will resent being thwarted; but when the object is achieved, and turns out as good or better than it was thought, there is something really satisfying in seeing it produce the result predicted, and remembering that you yourself were part of that result, that in some sense it represents your own will and your own life. At all events, there is certainly no more cheerful and no more reasonable class of men than successful politicians; and in no other work of our age does the benignant aspect of merit seem to show itself with so much simplicity, and so little of priggishness or conceit. What men have striven for long, in concert with a host of others, and on behalf of a whole nation, seems, when it is gained, to have a reality and durability of value which hardly anything else in life possesses; and yet to involve the praise and merit of so many others, that it cannot be either unseemly or conceited to feed yourself on the consciousness of having personally contributed to the victory.

GERMANY AND SPAIN.

KING ALFONSO of Spain recently visited the German Emperor at Homburg, received at his hands the highest honour he could confer, and was treated in all respects as the Sovereign of a great and most friendly people. Moreover, he was assured that his rank in Europe should be acknowledged by the elevation of the Ministers representing Germany and Spain in Madrid and Berlin to the rank of Ambassadors, a promise which is to be carried out immediately after the Prince's visit. And now the Crown Prince has been directed to return King Alfonso's visit as his father's direct representative, and to travel to Madrid in Royal state, crossing the sea under the escort of a German squadron. It is not likely that a Court like that of Berlin pays elaborate honours like these without a political motive, if only because it fully understands that a political motive will be ascribed to them; and it is not difficult to guess what that motive is. Prince Bismarck does not dread France, but he does dread a coalition with France for its centre; and the first object of his policy is to convince French statesmen that their country is isolated, that it is surrounded by hostile or calculating Powers, and that France must perforce abstain from any attempt at revenge. The Prince does not believe that Frenchmen have either forgotten or forgiven the invasion, or that they despair of reversing its results; but he does believe that they will make no movement, unless they have fair grounds for expecting reasonable success. He overrates, rather than underrates, French prudence. He sets himself, therefore, deliberately to make his strength and the isolation of France as visible as possible, and is especially anxious to secure the countries which border upon the object of his fear. He has secured Italy, and if he can secure Spain, France will be ringed-in with Powers who could invade or threaten her from the north-east, from the south-east, and from the south-west all at once. She is in fact throttled, and unless she could secure the alliance either of England or Russia, could not without folly attempt a war with the ever-prepared German Power. England, the Prince thinks, probably with truth, would not intervene on the Continent, where armies are now so huge; and Russia is reluctant either to run such risks as war would involve, or to trust a Government so hostile as that of France to every form of Monarchy,—another reason for the preference felt in Berlin for a Republic in France. Europe, therefore, is separated from France, and so long as that is the case, the German Chancellor calculates on peace.

It is an astute calculation, and it is not for us to say that the most successful statesman of the age can commit blunders, but Prince Bismarck seems to us to be running very great risks. He can hardly obtain much from Spain, for he does not want a fleet, certain if it threatened France to be destroyed, and Spain has no army mobile enough to cross the Pyrenees in force. She has not adopted universal military service. Twenty thousand men could defend the Passes from the French side, and it is not from want of men to collect at separated points that France will ever be in any danger. The diversion to be created by Spain could not be a formidable one, while in arranging for it, or seeming to arrange for it, Prince Bismarck is rousing a rage in France which, far more than any diplomatic combination, may threaten peace. The peasantry dread war, but all signs combine to show that French politicians, together with the people of the cities, are rising to a dangerous height of irritability. They see insults everywhere, detect in every newspaper article a tendency to menace, and may yet, under some sudden impulse, lose their heads, and decide to risk all rather than endure longer what they think humiliation. In such a temper, nations will promise much and give up much, and Prince Bismarck may find that he has not yet quite realised what France "raised to the height of circumstances," as Danton put it, could offer to the enemies of Germany, open and secret, for their alliance, and even for a slowness in mobilisation which would have many of the effects of neutrality. It is dangerous by such steady pressure to drive a nervous and susceptible people into a condition of mind in which they may take counsel of despair, and decide that if war is suicide, suicide is preferable to life under such conditions. Prince Bismarck should remember, if his real object is peace, that he is not immortal, and that his successor will not inspire that personal awe, either in Paris, Vienna, or St. Petersburg, which is now so visible among the factors that make for peace. We have repeatedly condemned French susceptibility as unreasonable, but even Englishmen would fret if they saw a victorious enemy calmly marshalling country after country into rank against them, and France is not an island. She is in real danger, if defeated, of losing provinces, or even of a dismemberment, which might terminate her national existence.

Nor is it quite certain that the King of Spain, even if desirous, can give Germany any effectual assistance. His people are very insular, little disposed to profitless war, and apt to calculate that whatever comes, they will for centuries have but one important neighbour, and that is France. They are proud, and may be delighted with promotion in European rank; and they are dignified, and will be sure to show honour to so highly placed a visitor, who, moreover, has in no way injured or affronted them; but if they are to do more, they will want a quid pro quo, and what has Germany to give them? She might conceivably, if victorious, give Portugal; but do the Spaniards wish for Portugal as an unwilling dependency, an Ireland in which every discontented party would find friends? Their statesmen have hitherto hoped to gain Portugal as we gained Scotland, not as we gained Ireland. Germany could also hold the ring while Spain conquered Morocco; but Morocco, though every Spaniard thinks of it as his reversionary heritage, is hardly worth the permanent hostility of France. Germany could give effective guarantees against an invasion from the North, but the Spaniards do not dread one, and have an even exaggerated idea of the inviolability of their country. In their own judgment, they drove out Napoleon I. There are no colonies to be obtained by German aid, nor are Spaniards seeking an extension of their colonial dominion. It seems as if Germany had little to offer to the Spanish nation, and she has nearly as little to promise to the King. Prince Bismarck is very strong, but he could not prevent a revolution in Madrid, or debar the French from secretly encouraging it, or shoot the Generals who led a pronunciamiento. Already it is reported the Spanish Republicans stand aloof from the grand reception of the German Crown Prince, and to the Republicans must be added that important party, strongly represented even in the Cabinet, which holds that the friendship of France is the one permanent interest of Spain. We shall see very shortly to which side the body of the people incline; but it is most improbable that in a country like Spain the support of a foreign, a Northern, and a Protestant Power will help to consolidate the throne. It is difficult, therefore, to avoid a doubt whether this new stroke of policy will produce great results, and whether Prince Bismarck may not pay too dearly for a great diplomatic success. That he does not think so is evident, for it is now thirteen years since he accepted the throne of Spain for a Hohenzollern; but even he, within his own special domain, may be capable of mistake.

THE FRANCHISE IN IRELAND.

WE do not understand the sort of rage with which not only Tories, but some moderate Liberals regard any proposal for reducing the Irish Franchise. That men like Lord Hartington should distrust propositions to create Provincial or County Governments in Ireland is intelligible, for they fear that such Governments will ultimately control the Police, and may serve as centres of insurrection. We do not agree with them, because we believe that power will create the sense of responsibility—always too feeble in Ireland, where the populace never quite expects success in its movements—and that granting the worst, men intent upon insurrection become better than men intent upon assassination; but the objection is reasonable and statesmanlike. The reduction of the franchise, on the other hand, can in no way facilitate insurrection, rather it makes it less easy. Insurgent leaders want only men to lead and arms to give them, and there will be no more men or arms in Ireland under one franchise than under another. A peasant with a rifle and no vote can shoot just as straight, and march just as fast, as the same man turned into a full elector. He will be no braver, no better drilled, and a little less full of hatred, because he will possess a larger power of giving civil expression to his antipathies. It is dumb rage which is dangerous, not rage which flies to a telephone. The power of insurrection will remain just where it is, whatever the franchise, even if it should be universal; that is, it will not, in the judgment of the most extreme Irish leaders, exist at all, unless, indeed, the material resources of Great Britain are previously crippled in some universal or long-continued war. To plead danger of that sort as a reason for refusing the demand, is to put forward an argument which every soldier in Europe, even if he is affiliated to the Secret Societies, knows to be perfectly futile. If there is any truth in history, voters do not readily take up arms; and when they do, are just as easily defeated as if they had never seen a ballot-box. Even the Paris Communists who were voters did not fight well, and every second man who turned out under the Commune had either passed through the regular military mill, or had been trained to use his arms during the six months' siege.

But then think of the Parliamentary difficulty. These new voters will all, it is said, vote as Mr. Parnell bids them, his party will be largely reinforced, and what will be the result? We fully acknowledge the Parliamentary difficulty, which has been a preoccupation of this journal for three years, and which it is quite conceivable may become even worse. But we cannot see why it should become worse because a householder franchise is introduced in Ireland. The hold of the Extremists over the householders will not be stronger than their hold over the farmers and small shopkeepers, who now form the majority of the constituencies. On the contrary, it will be weaker, because the agricultural labourers and skilled artisans who are now kept out have different interests, and on points different views, from those who now monopolise the franchise; and will, moreover, be more amenable to ideas, and less to purely sordid influences. If anything in politics is clear, it is clear that the dissolving force which will one day break up the Parnellites must come from within, and that force will be generated much sooner among large popular constituencies than among the small and narrow oligarchy which now, owing to defects in distribution as well as franchise, forms the constituency of Ireland. For, be it remembered, if the franchise is not lowered, the difficulty of including Ireland in a Redistribution Bill will be indefinitely increased, as the seats must be assigned on some principle differing from that in force in England, and sure to be denounced by one party or another as unjust. That Tories should believe in limited constituencies we can understand, though Tories are losing that faith; but for ourselves, we hold that the principles of liberty are true, even in Ireland, and that England, so long as she tries to do justice, has more to hope from the solid body of the Irish people with household responsibilities, than from any smaller class which may be thoroughly penetrated with hatred or discontent, or the dreamy hope that an independent Irish Republic would become an island Switzerland. The very principle of democracy as a working-power is that a large community has instincts, at least in great crises, which help it to decide aright; and, for all that has come and gone, we do not believe that Irishmen differ radically from all mankind. Is it in boroughs like Dungarvan that we find the most practical of Irish Members?

We do not wish to say much of the difficulty of carrying any Bill at all, if Ireland is left out, and her entire people irritated, for that argument, though it is constantly pressed by Liberals and must be attentively considered by the Cabinet, rests upon the theory that the present electors of Ireland desire to give up their monopoly, of which, recollecting the differences between labourers and farmers, we are not quite sure; but we may press another and much stronger argument. If we refuse to include Ireland in the reduction of the franchise, we place, for the first time, a moral argument in Mr. Parnell's hand. The moral basis of the Union is that it is a Union, that the Three Kingdoms are governed on the same principles by their own representatives. That basis is not quite perfect, because, as a matter of fact, the Peers, who are in a great majority British, do reject measures desired by the Irish more often than they reject measures desired by the English or Scotch; but that is the theory, and if the new franchise is granted to Britain and refused to Ireland, it is openly abandoned. Parliament proclaims openly that it distrusts the people of one of the Three Kingdoms, and enables Mr. Parnell at once to declare that even in the matter of representation, Ireland is treated as a conquered State. It may be retorted that the distrust is genuine, and has ample justification; but the argument will only be valid with those who are already convinced. When England was utterly discontented in 1831, ripe, as the closest observers believed, for revolution, when the very Monarchy was in danger and a Republic within measurable distance, that was held to be a reason for granting, not for refusing, the reduction of the franchise. Why is it not a reason in Ireland also? Because the people will not be conciliated, but only made more hostile? That might be a reason for refusing the franchise altogether, and governing Ireland on other principles, through a Government intent only on solving the social question, and so preparing the way for self-government; but it is no reason for keeping up unequal franchises, and so entrusting England to its people and Ireland to a class, while still professing to govern both in the same manner. We do not remove the discontent in Ireland by limiting the franchise, but only pro tanto silence its expression in Parliament. If the Parliamentary government of Ireland is to continue at all, let it at least be real and honest, and let those whom in England we consider "the people" for governing purposes, elect in Ireland also the representatives they prefer. If they choose bad representatives, that is a misfortune for all Three Kingdoms alike; but it is not so great a misfortune as it would be for Ireland to believe that we were only cheating her with an appearance of freedom, and that in reality we so managed the suffrage that she could not send up the party she wished to represent her in its just voting strength. The extent of that strength may furnish hereafter a great and difficult problem for a statesman to solve, but we shall at least be grappling with a reality, and not with a sort of cloud, which eludes every effort either at fighting or at courtship. Let us accept even the unproved theory that Ireland will return Parnellites, and ask ourselves coolly if much has been gained by the Parnellites being so few that their leader can control them as if he had a right to their allegiance. He thinks he can control seventy followers as easily as twenty, and forgets that a people when enfranchised is never of one mind, and that every fresh group of followers contains fresh minds and fresh potential rivals. We had rather be forced to deal with Ireland than with any class within her, for then our measures will at least be effective; and even on the Tory theory, Ireland with a lower franchise will be more truly represented than she is now. Ask any diplomatist in Europe whether he would rather deal with a hostile Envoy, or with an Envoy who represented just half of the hostility of his Court.

THE FAILURE OF MR. PLIMSOLL'S ACT.

ONE of the most frequent of Tory fallacies is that which represents the Liberal Party as a destructive one, and a Liberal Government as a company of Destroying Angels, whose sole mission is to smite, and spare not. If, however, we look at facts, instead of fancies, and substitute the realities of the upper air for the idols of the Cave, it is easy to see that the characteristic work of the Liberal Party in office is construction, or reconstruction. If England wants a thing done, she must set the Liberal Party to do it. The Army was in need of reconstruction. Mr. Gladstone had to throw the career of an officer open to talent, instead of gold. Viscount Cardwell and Mr. Childers had to construct a Reserve, and to reinvigorate the Standing Force by the introduction of short service. A Liberal Government reconstituted our Judicial system, and a Liberal Lord Chancellor and Lord Chief Justice have remodelled their procedure to suit the increasing demands of the country. It required a Liberal Government half a century ago to create the Penny Post. It needed Mr. Fawcett to give us the Parcels Post. A Liberal Lord Chancellor passed the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, the bankruptcy provisions of which worked so well that they have been preserved as the foundation for the new Act, which a Liberal President of the Board of Trade was required to get passed, by way of remedying the abuses which had grown up under the liquidation provisions of the old Act. In 1876, that ardent Liberal, Mr. Plimsoll, coerced a Conservative Government into passing the Merchant Shipping Act. Now it requires the energies of a Liberal President of the Board of Trade, not content to rest on his achievements in the Bankruptcy and Patent Acts, which would have satisfied a Conservative Minister for a six years' term of office, to set to work and construct new machinery for increasing the efficiency of Mr. Plimsoll's Act, and saving life and property from destruction at sea.

Statistics go to show that the Act of 1876, though it has, no doubt, acted as a preventive to many possible causes of disaster, has not reduced the list of losses so much as was expected or hoped. There has been a gradual growth in the number of lives lost, which amounted in 1881-82 to no less than 3,372, or 644 more than it was in 1876-77. There is also a considerable increase in the number of vessels lost, which last year amounted to 1303,—a few less than the year before, when the number lost was 1310. It is true that both the sea-going population and the sea-going ships, though they have remained about the same in point of numbers, have practically, for the purpose of estimating the average of loss, largely increased during the interim, owing to the increased number of voyages done by ships and men since steamers have been more largely substituted for sailing-vessels. But the fact remains that the losses have increased also, and probably more than proportionally to the risks. Plimsoll's Act placed a check on the carelessness and incapacity of the ship's officers in the inquiries of the Wreck Commissioner's Court. These inquiries are far more potent as a check than any which exists on the carelessness and incapacity of land carriers, such as railway officials. An inquiry, the result of which may be, and as experience has shown often is, to deprive a man of the possibility of professional employment, even for a short time, is much more efficacious than an inquiry which must result in a verdict of manslaughter or nothing, and which accordingly generally results in nothing. But when you have added an additional incentive to the British sailor to do his duty, you have not thereby removed all or the chief causes of sea-loss.

The Act of 1876 was aimed far more at fraudulent or careless shipowners than at inefficient or careless masters. But though Plimsoll's mark is to be seen on the sides of all ships to this moment, many is the tall ship that has gone to the bottom with it. Though it is a misdemeanour to send an unseaworthy ship to sea, and though penalties are heaped up against overloading, and against lading grain except in bags or with proper boards or bulkheads to prevent the shifting of the cargo, and against carrying deck-loads of timber during winter; yet, somehow or another, ships have been lost, in ways that rouse suspicion whether the Act has been more than a brutum fulmen. Even the power of detention in cases where unseaworthiness is suspected, though it has in a few cases probably prevented danger, if not disaster, has yet been but seldom called into action. The temptation to shipowners to send ships to perdition, or to sea with a very good chance of going there, has proved stronger than the deterrent effect of the penalties.

These were the reasons which at the beginning of last year moved Mr. Chamberlain to issue a Memorandum to those interested in shipping, suggesting the formation of a Merchant Shipping Council. The answers received were not favourable, and the Council has now been dropped, in favour of a new scheme put forward in a Circular issued this month. Two kinds of reform, are suggested in this document,—reforms in the substance of the law which relates to shipowners, and reforms in the procedure by which the already existing laws can be enforced. The Circular points out that, in many cases, “the loss of a ship is a profitable transaction to its owners.” “The ship may be insured for more than its value; the freight may be insured out and home, and recovered without deduction for expenses which will not have been incurred if the vessel is lost; the cargo may be insured above its value, or at a speculative value.” Charles Reade, long ago, gave utterance in a novel to the suspicions of “foul play” to which such temptations give rise. A case now pending in the Criminal Courts may serve to show, at least, what things are looked upon as possible, if not what actually happens, under the present state of the law of Marine Insurance. The Circular also points out that the liability of shipowners as carriers is unduly limited by bills of lading, and that their liability as employers is less than that of any other class of employers. Further, “his responsibility, both to servants and passengers and to other owners, in case of collision, is arbitrarily limited; and in the case of single-ship companies under the Limited Liability Acts it may be, and sometimes is, absolutely extinguished.” This statement of the evils of course suggests in what direction the remedies are to be sought, but as no specific detailed suggestions are made, but, on the contrary, are invited from those to whom the Circular is sent, it is premature to discuss them now, though Mr. Chamberlain has this week expressed his own opinion. The bill of lading, with its long strings of exceptions, is a marvellous document, to those who are not hardened to it by custom; and if it were not for our experience of railway companies, we should wonder that any one who was paid for his work should thus be allowed to disclaim liability in case of loss to the employer. It is, however, no light matter to lay hands on documents which have been expounded in the Courts for centuries, and we shall, no doubt, have an outcry raised by the “hide-bound” formalists. But the forms of conveyances, which descend from quite as great an antiquity, have been remoulded in accordance with modern needs by Act of Parliament, so there is no reason why the bill of lading and the policy of marine insurance should not be overhauled by the same omnipotent authority. Life and property, are, after all, more sacred than forms, and even than freedom of contract, falsely so called. It is better, and easier, too, to put down crime by preventing its being profitable, than by increasing the stringency of punishments and the chances of detection.

These last objects are, however, also aimed at by the suggested establishment of Local Marine Courts in each principal port. These Courts are to consist of an officer of the Board of Trade and a person named by the shipowners or the Local Marine Board. Their duties will be to settle questions arising with regard to the detention and survey of ships in a summary way, and if that Court once decides in favour of detention, even though its decision should be reversed, the owner cannot recover damages. This Court will also fulfil the duties now performed by the Wreck Commissioners and Wreck Inquiry Courts, and will hold inquiries into all shipping disasters and report to the Board of Trade thereon, and if necessary recommend criminal prosecution or the suspension of certificates.

There is to be an appeal from these Courts to Shipping Commissioners, who are to consist of a lawyer, a retired shipowner, and a specialist in shipbuilding, &c. If in any case the Local Marine Court disagrees, the case goes at once to the Commissioners; cases of damages for detention are also to go to them; and in any cases before them, they have power of punishment, in withholding certificates, and so on. They are also to have semi-administrative duties in deciding, on complaint made, whether any proposed new rule made by the Board for the guidance of their officers as regards survey of ships shall come into force or not.

Whether this last provision would work, or not, is doubtful. It may, indeed, be justified by the analogy of rules of procedure made by the Judges who have to administer them, but they are rules of procedure of their own officers, or of proceedings before themselves. Here the Commissioners are to judge on rules made to guide officers of an independent authority, and in matters not before them, but on which they will, nevertheless, have to decide between those officers and other persons. This is, however, a matter of detail. The Local Marine Court is the main feature of the scheme. It aims at getting the force of the shipowners as a class on the side of honesty and efficiency, and so creating an esprit de corps in the better members of the class which will pervade the whole, and also at invoking local feeling in favour of the good name and fame of the port. The scheme, in fact, invokes the two great principles of English life,—local self-government and class self-government. A scheme so designed ought hardly to fail of success.

MARTIN LUTHER.

IT is no wonder that the estimates of Luther differ so widely as they do. Even the keenest Roman Catholic must often be bewildered by the passionate intensity of his faith, the unfathomable depth of his hope, the tenderness of his love. Even the most ardent Protestant must be revolted by the fury of his controversial language, his utter scorn for the notion that the will counts for anything in the religious life, the coarseness of his morality, the private sanction which he gave to polygamy, his violent exaggeration of the contrast between nature and grace, and his exhortation to “sin strongly” that grace may the more abound. Yet Luther wins admiration from the most unexpected sources. No one could have been more heartily opposed to Luther’s moral and religious philosophy than Coleridge, yet almost everything Coleridge says of Luther is said in admiration. “Luther is, in parts,” he said, “the most evangelical writer I know, after the Apostles and Apostolic men;” and qualified as this praise is, by the expression “in parts,” nothing could be truer, though nothing could be falsier, if it had been applied to the whole of Luther’s teaching. Luther was at home in the circle of Scriptural ideas wherever his own strong personality had not revolted against those ideas, as few men have ever been at home in them, and there was a naïveté and a simplicity in his mode of expressing these ideas which hardly any other religious teacher has equalled. Again, Luther’s words had a natural life of their own—hands and feet, as he himself said of the words of the Bible,—which gives him a singular advantage in dealing with the spiritual life. Coleridge has well contrasted Luther with Erasmus, when he said, “Erasmus’s paraphrase of the New Testament is clear and explanatory, but you cannot expect anything very deep from Erasmus. The only fit commentator on Paul was Luther—not by any means such a gentleman as the Apostle, but almost as great a genius.” Yet Luther undoubtedly more or less misunderstood St. Paul, when he explained his teaching, as he always did, in the sense of the positive predestination of the elect to eternal life, without any question of the part taken by the human will. “The law does not endure grace,” said Luther, “and in its turn grace does not endure the law.” No wonder that at the end of his life he had to make almost as great a fight on behalf of “the law,” in order to save the best leaven of civil society, as he had ever made against it in his theological ardour for the doctrine of justification by faith; and no wonder that, hampered as he was by his own deeper teaching, his comparatively superficial struggle on behalf of “the law” was but vain. The truth is that Luther embodied a great insurrection on behalf of nature and grace against all the conventions of an artificial ecclesiastical system, and that everything which tended to mediate between nature and grace, everything which, like the Sacramental principle, pointed in the direction of reconciling nature and grace, i.e., of making grace natural or nature gracious, was to Luther repulsive and artificial,—unless he thought he had for it some positive text, from the literal wording of which he could not escape. He could not endure the discovery of anything like reason or adaptation to our nature, in revelation. He loved to exaggerate the paradoxes of nature and grace in their most unmitigated form, though he delighted, in a way, in both,—delighted in the earthliness of the earthly nature, and in the supernatural feat by which—that earthliness notwithstanding—human nature was to be redeemed. Some one the other day, writing in the Times, said truly enough that any one who wants to see the repulsive side of Luther should read his sermons upon Marriage. From those sermons one understands how Luther came to commit the worst act of his life,—the disgraceful theological sanction given to the Landgrave of Hesse to live in polygamy. For Luther took the lowest possible view of marriage, and denied its sacramental character; indeed, he would probably have got rid of every Sacrament, if he had but seen how to dispute a few express commands of Christ. In justifying, for instance, marriage between Christians and people of the most anti-Christian faiths, he says, with his own peculiar rudeness, "Know that marriage is an outward bodily affair ('ein äusserlich leiblich Ding'), like other worldly occupations. As I may eat and drink, sleep, walk, ride, buy, speak, and trade with a heathen, Jew, Turk, or heretic, so, too, may I marry with him, and remain married to him." Marriage to Luther was nothing but an outward transaction, involving no mutual transformation of the inner life by the persons joined in marriage, at all. And just what he taught in relation to marriage, he taught in relation to the natural life generally. It had nothing to do with the spiritual life, except to stand over against it, and increase the wonder and marvel of it. And yet Luther was a man of tender affections, and often expressed himself with wonderful beauty concerning the domestic side of life. For example, he commented one day on the text, "Serve the Lord in fear, and rejoice with trembling," thus, "There is no contradiction involved in this text, at least for me. My little boy, John, does exactly this in respect of myself." But I cannot thus act towards God. If I am seated at table, and am writing or doing anything, John sings me a little song; if he sings too loud and I tell him of it, he still sings on, but with some fear, and to himself as it were. God wills that we also should be constantly gay, but that our gaiety should be tempered with fear and reserve." And yet he could also say,— "Human nature is so corrupt that it does not even desire celestial things. It is like a new-born infant, who, although you may offer it all the wealth and pleasures of the earth, is heedless of everything save its mother's breast."

In truth, Luther felt profoundly the attractions of the natural life in the rude and coarse form in which a nature of gigantic force and of the homeliest possible breed would be sure to feel them, and he felt equally powerfully the mystic solicitations of the supernatural life, and seemed to care not at all for a reconciliation between the two. He was raised up apparently to embody a protest against the elaborateness, the artificiality, the systematised casuistry, the technical subtleties, the empty theological discriminations of the degenerate Church of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; and most powerfully, if also most coarsely, he discharged his mission. Partly as the consequence of the contradiction ever surging up in his mind between nature and grace, his mind was always alive and bubbling up with wonder and awe. Hence, there is no table-talk in the world like his, the table-talk of a most natural man, to whom the supernatural was, nevertheless, near and dear. Dr. Johnson's table-talk, indeed, surpasses it in wit, but falls far short of Luther's in the weight and massiveness of the subjects treated, and in the vividness of the natural feelings which these weighty and massive subjects elicit. We have often quoted before, and probably may often quote again, that striking saying of Luther's which brings out the contrast between the Roman system and the Lutheran revolt in all its force:—"We tell our Lord God, that if he will have his Church, he must uphold it, for we cannot uphold it; and if we could, we should be the proudest asses under Heaven." The Roman conception of the Church was that of a mighty institution, to which God had indeed promised indefectibility, but the indefectibility of which was to be produced through highly elaborate and artificial means,—through the checks and balances and delicate regulation of a most complex ecclesiastical machinery. Luther's conception of the Church was that of an association of men hearkening to and waiting upon the voice of God as best they could, and living by every word that proceeded out of his mouth. "The poor, miserable appearance of the Church, and the many crosses and failures and sects to which it is subjected, in order that it may be troubled by them, offend the worldly wise, for they let themselves dream that the Church is pure, holy, blameless, the dove of God, &c. And this, indeed, is true for God; with him, the Church has this dignity, but for the world she is like her bridegroom the Lord Christ, hacked and torn, despised, scoffed at and crucified." It was the attempt of Rome to elaborate a majestic ecclesiastical system, equal to all emergencies; almost as much as the gross failure of that attempt witnessed by the age in which Luther lived, that excited his displeasure. He felt to the very bottom the coarseness and weakness of human nature, and of the Church so far as it was human, and his delight in contemplating the marvels of divine grace only made him exaggerate that coarseness and weakness. In any other age, Luther would have rejected wholesale the Sacramental principle,—that principle which is, indeed, part of Christianity itself, though Luther did not perceive it, so intent was he on the profound contrast between the human beings to whom the Gospel came, and the God who gave the Gospel. As it was, though he retained two of the Sacraments, the whole tendency of his creed was to depreciate the earthen vessels in which the grace of God was to be received, till it almost came to this,—that God by a miracle promised to transform ultimately these vessels of dishonour into vessels of honour, but so long as they remained in this world, they must remain vessels of dishonour still, not so much as even effectually receiving God's grace into them, far less as being transmuted by it into something nobler than themselves, but only as destined to be so transmuted whenever their terrestrial career came to an end. A mind of Luther's gigantic stature, which spent itself in exposing the technicalities, conventionalities, and artificialities of the Roman Catholic system, could not but produce a tremendous effect on the world, an effect partly good and partly evil,—good in a very high degree, so far as it brought men's minds back to God from the mere ecclesiastical machinery which had been confounded with the divine agency; profoundly mischievous, so far as it undermined men's faith in the possibility of true sanctification on earth, and left them to make their own compromise between the human works which were "filthy rags" at best, and the divine faith which reserved all its mightiest alchemy for another world.

AN EMANCIPATED MIDDLE-CLASS.

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD has either been scolding the Americans afresh for their Philistinism, or his arrival has revived discussion about his former lectures in England, in which he implied that Americans were very like the English Middle-class—wanting in sweetness and light, and given up to "Dissenting" religions, and the pursuit of material interests. At all events, the American Nation thinks this a good opportunity for answering him, and telling him in effect that he spoke in ignorance. Mr. Arnold is quite right, the Nation thinks, about the English, but quite wrong about the Americans. He "had never seen a middle-class which had no class above it, nor Dissenters who had no Established Church to dissent from." Americans have neither, and when Mr. Arnold has seen more of them, and found Methodists who think their Church as good as any cathedral, and "Dissenting" Ministers who look down on Anglican culture, and traders who smile at the social pretensions of the idle rich and hardly understand distinctions based on occupation, he will, the Nation thinks, revise a good deal of what he has written both about his countrymen and Americans.

The article is kindly written and full of appreciation for Mr. Matthew Arnold, but the thought penetrating it is obviously that a Middle-class without an aristocracy above it must of necessity not only differ from a middle-class with such an aristocracy, but must be superior to it, must have not only more independence, but more sweetness and light, and a great deal less of that narrow, conventional habit of mind usually denounced as Philistinism; and we shall be curious to see, when Mr. Arnold comes home, what he has to say on that subject. Are the Americans of a corresponding class less bornés than their compeers at home? We cannot answer the question, except from a study of American literature, which certainly makes us think that, in the older States at least, denunciations of Islington must be quite intelligible; but a priori, we can see no reason whatever why the assumption should be true. An aristocracy may impel, nay, does impel, a middle-class to waste strength on a false or unattainable ideal, but it cannot make that class more limited or more stupid. That a middle-class with no class above it may be socially a little more independent, and less tempted to fall down before social distinctions, is, no doubt, true, but this gain is of itself very small. The natural tendency of an English middle-class so situated would not be towards equality, or simplicity of life, but towards introspection, with the result that it would discover a thousand minute differentiae in its own component parts, and would revere or condemn them, instead of broader social distinctions. Having no standard to quote, it would set up one of two, and either worship the distinction which can never be absent, wealth, or regard the usual as the divine, and resent any deviation therefrom as a disregard of the inherent fitness of things. Moreover, partly from this worship of the usual as being the fitting, and partly from the instinctive desire of men to find a "sanction" for their laws, it would elevate the opinion of the majority into a tribunal, and socially sentence every one who deviated from what "our folks" thought becoming. There would be, in fact, a pressure on the emancipated middle-class from within itself, quite as severe as the old pressure from the aristocracy; and it would be the pressure of at least as base a material, while it would be far more irresistible. The aristocracy has in social matters no physical force behind it, while the middle-class majority would have. Distinctly unpopular opinions would, therefore, be far more summarily suppressed; while distinctly unpopular ways would create a certain risk of ejection. If a middle-class man in Islington chooses to be a teetotaler, the superincumbent aristocracy, though it regards teetotalism as fanatical, can do nothing to him; but if the middle-class man in Salem persists in drinking wine with his food, the middle-class majority can condemn him as a hopeless castaway, and he will find himself, if so condemned, very unpleasantly situated. Evangelical as Islington is, a man need not go to church unless he likes; but if, in an equally religious place in New England, he declined to go, he would find that "our folks" could show him that he was departing from the usual in a very unmistakable way. The compression, in fact, from middle-class opinion acting on itself would be at least as severe as the compression from the existence of an aristocracy; and though, no doubt, the one pressure is vertical and the other horizontal, that difference could not make the latter less fatal to the freedom of thought and action which Mr. Arnold first of all desires. There is no middle-class so fettered, and, therefore, so borné and incapable of appreciating light, as that of a town in England which the upper classes have quitted; and unless we misread all American literature, that is the case also in the Eastern and Middle States. Everybody there seems to be fairly comfortable; but outside the great cities, everybody seems to live in a sort of slavery to an opinion the key-note of which is that the customary is to be believed, to be approved, and to be done. There is no appeal from opinion, and originality is crushed out till we have heard clever American women say that the art of the American novelist was more hampered by the expectedness of everything than by any other single cause. Of course, in such a society, material prosperity becomes the pleasantest thing attainable; and it is sought with a steady, earnest persistence which gradually leavens society with sordidness, just as a society in which "pleasure" is the only thing pleasant gets leavened through and through either with frivolity or vice. We should expect to find in America millions of men and more millions of women utterly cramped and, so to speak, spoiled, by the most undeared and sordid conventionalism; and though we cannot, as outsiders, say we find them, that which we expect is certainly described in American literature. The only differences we as outsiders can see between Islington and Salem is that the emancipated Middle-class in America has accepted an etiquette making the intercourse of the sexes more free, has established complete liberty of religious opinion—though this exists now in England—and owing, we presume, to the difference of temper produced by greater freedom from care, has become in a somewhat marked degree fuller of kindness. A certain kindness, which is not "sweetness" exactly, but is a constituent of it, will, we feel certain, be described by Mr. Arnold when he comes home as the feature in American social civilisation which most impressed him.

Nor do we see that the emancipated Middle-class would tend towards culture more than the unemancipated. On the contrary, it would tend slightly less. The dislike of culture which is a feature of the class, as producing "dangerous" views and inattention to the business of life, though not necessarily intensified, would be much more operative, because the majority which would then rule would be so much stronger than the aristocracy which now rules, and there would be so much less criticism. Criticism begins to be born when a leisured class begins to survey things, and see what is and what is not perfect and enjoyable of its kind, and to be a little weary with the ordinary and a little blasé with the habitual. Ultimately, no doubt, a class more studious, and therefore more cultivated, than an aristocracy usually is, assumes the function; but the impulse originally comes from above, and it is the influence of the higher class, whether higher socially or higher from study, which filters down and excites the spirit of culture, so far as it is excited, in those below. That influence makes for studiousness, if not for righteousness, as two illustrations will help to prove. In England, it is the aristocracy which has succeeded by direct pressure in keeping the classical culture in the forefront of education, in spite of the pronounced reluctance of Islington to waste time over study so obviously unremunerative. And in America, where no aristocracy presses, there is little, if any, true criticism. The testimony of the Nation to this effect is singularly distinct and, to us at least, entirely new:—"American audiences will find Mr. Arnold interesting also because he is really the first genuine critic of note who has visited these shores, and there is nothing which the American public find it more difficult to comprehend than a critic." The art of criticism, as such, does not stand very high with us. Our conception of a critic is apt to be that of a man who, as Doctor Johnson said, "sees that the Whig dogs get the worst of it,"—that is, who gives the enemy, whoever he may be, his due, and who, every time that he opens his mouth, strives to advance some 'cause.' The man who lets his mind play round phenomena, who sees them from all points of view, and notes what he sees with scientific indifference to consequences, or who, in other words, mainly cultivates open-mindedness, is a personage to whom Americans still find it very difficult to do justice, or give any definite place in the moral world. Mr. Arnold is not this kind of a person exactly—the type is rarely found in perfection out of France—for he has ideas for which he strives earnestly, and a cause (the cause of 'culture') which he seeks in season and out of season to advance; but he is the nearest approach to it we have yet seen." That is a remarkable statement, and certainly strengthens our doubt whether among English-speaking peoples emancipation would of itself strengthen the tendency towards "light," even if it did in some faint degree strengthen that towards sweetness. The existence of an aristocracy has its evils, but it is not to be confounded with an aristocratic system of government; and among its evils, that of crushing originality and intelligence out of the Middle-class is certainly not to be reckoned.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE REPRESENTATION OF MINORITIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—After your appeal to any one who knows how to make the representation of minorities feasible to state his plan to the country, I hope you will allow me to state in more detail the scheme whose salient points I indicated last week, and to endeavour to meet your criticisms on my former letter.

The plan I advocate is not a new one. It owes its principles to Mr. Hare, and agrees in all its main features with the Proportional Representation Bill brought in by Mr. Fawcett and others in 1872, though it differs from this scheme in some of its details. According to this plan, the constituencies are divided into small groups, returning, on an average, half-a-dozen Members; more or fewer, according to convenience. These groups would, of course, be local. Each of the smaller counties, with the towns in it, would form a group by itself; the larger counties would be divided into two or more groups; each of the largest towns would form a separate group, and so would the Universities of each country. Candidates would stand for some special constituency, either county or town (county and borough franchise being, of course, identical). An elector could give his vote for a candidate standing for any constituency within his group, but his vote could only be counted in favour of one candidate.

In this way the local quality of the representation would not be lost. The practical result would be felt to be that a man had become free to vote for a Member either for his county or for the town in or near which he lived. At the same time, minority representation would be ensured. In a group returning six Members, any minority which could command more than a seventh of the votes could secure representation by one Member out of the six. The larger the group, the smaller the proportional minority necessary to ensure the return of a Member; the smaller the group, the better the local character of the representation is maintained.

But to ensure the fairly proportional representation of majorities, without need of the elaborate discipline which now gives Liberals the monopoly of the representation of Glasgow and Birmingham, a power of preferential voting forms part of the scheme. A voter may write on his voting-paper the names of several candidates, in the order of his preference. The vote can only be used to support one candidate. If it is applied to assist in the return of the person whose name stands first upon it, the insertion of the subsequent names will have no effect whatever. If, however, that person is found to have more votes than are necessary to ensure his return, each of his surplus voting-papers is passed on to the candidate named on it as second favourite. It is obvious that the process of vote-transferring must be guarded against suspicion of unfairness. This, as you point out, is the real difficulty of the scheme; for if a returning officer were able to shuffle the votes as he pleased, he would often be able by judicious manipulation to largely vary the result. But this danger may be avoided, by laying down exact rules to govern the process.

In Denmark, where the system has been in use for many years, the matter is left to chance. The voting-papers are put into an urn, drawn out successively, and used in the order in which they happen to be drawn. It is better, however, to lay down reasonable rules and a method capable of subsequent verification. First of all, those papers should be exhausted upon which the name of only one candidate is marked, no alternative choice being suggested, for otherwise these votes would be wholly useless. It would be reasonable to use, next, votes given for each candidate in the constituency for which he was standing; and, finally, votes coming from the rest of the group. To determine the order in which the separate votes in each class should be used, numbers might be printed on the voting-papers, and those papers which bore the highest numbers—that is, which were given in latest in the day—might be used first. This gives a simple and perfectly definite code of rules. Except the first, they carry no special conviction, but their merit is that their observance could be enforced at the time by agents of the candidates, and could be subsequently verified, if necessary, by a scrutiny.

Other rules may, perhaps, commend themselves as likely to give a better result; but so long as the rules are certain, their form is of small importance. There need be no fear that a different set of preferences would emerge with each variation of the rules. So long as wilful unfairness in selection is excluded, the results of any arbitrary method of treatment would be almost identical. The numbers of the votes to be dealt with would be so large that the law of averages would have its full effect, and chance and accident would favour every candidate equally. To give an illustration suggested by your article, take the first name and the last name in the "London Directory," the heights of the individuals they represent will very likely be quite different; but take the first thousand names and the last thousand, and the average heights of the two sets of men will be precisely the same.

After the surplus votes of all candidates who have obtained more than the necessary number of votes have been redistributed, there will generally remain several places still to be allotted amongst various candidates who have not obtained the number of votes that makes their return certain. This is done by declaring the candidate who has obtained fewest votes excluded. His name is then struck off his voting-papers, and they are transferred to the person named upon them as an alternative. The same process is then repeated, until there remain no more candidates than there are vacancies, and the candidates so remaining are declared elected.

This is the whole of the scheme which you reject as impractically complicated for any but University constituencies. All its complexity lies in the description of the process to be gone through by the Returning Officer and his clerks. To the ordinary elector, the problem would present itself in the most simple form. When he received his voting-paper, he would see a list of names before him, not so long as that which meets him at a School-Board election. Instead of putting crosses opposite two names, as at a Parliamentary election, or figures expressing the amount of his preference, as at a School-Board election, he would have to mark the names with figures in the order of his preference. This would be the sole difference to the ordinary elector. He would no more trouble himself about the machinery by which his vote was counted than he does at present. He would leave that to the persons concerned, and if they told him it was all right, he would be fully satisfied. If he were smitten with a thirst for knowledge, the details would be as easy to explain to him as any other piece of scientific machinery round him,—say, the Bankers' Clearing House or the Terminable Annuities Act.

You say that nothing involving complicated considerations can possibly stand the test of democratic criticism. I think you do not sufficiently discriminate between complexity of end and complexity of machinery. The Democracy must have some simple and intelligible end in view, but it does not concern itself about the machinery by which that end is to be attained. On such matters, as you well point out in your article this week on "The Fruits of the Recess," it frankly accepts the judgment of the experts in whom it has confidence. What could be a more complicated piece of machinery than the Irish Land Act, or the new Rules of Procedure, and how much did an average constituent concern himself to understand the details of either? Yet without strong support from the Democracy neither would have passed into law.

You state, as a matter of first-rate importance in any scheme, that it must provide for a continued representation of the minority in case of the death or resignation of the Member elected by them at the general election. This is possible under open voting, but incompatible with the ballot. Mr. Hare avoids the difficulty, in a manner that does not seem to me satisfactory, by proposing that the House should itself fill up casual vacancies, waiting till four or five have accrued, and then making use of the preferential method of voting.

I submit, however, that you lay too much stress on the point. It is not an important one, and may be left to take care of itself. There is a great counter-advantage in the expression of currents of opinion by free bye-elections, and if the duration of Parliament is shortened, the grievance will become still less serious. Perhaps it may be considered that a sufficient power is given to the minority, under such circumstances, by allowing them to choose between two candidates of the majority. This would be a frequent effect of the scheme in the form in which I have stated it. As to its desirability, there is room for difference of opinion. It was objected to by the promoters of the Bill of 1872, and partly got rid of by a provision that no elector should mark on his paper the names of more candidates than there were vacancies. This would, in general, limit him to the expression of his preferences as between candidates of his own party.

I do not know what the Postmaster-General now thinks of Mr. Fawcett's Bill, but I hope that by this description I may satisfy you in what quarter the plan you seek is to be found, and that I may convince some even of those whom I fear I must call the orthodox Liberals, that schemes of representation can be proposed, which are logical and practical, and which transcend the Procrustean simplicity of their own suggestions.—I am, Sir, &c., Lincoln's Inn, November 14th. J. PARKER SMITH.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the Spectator of this week you say, "If any one knows how to make the representation of minorities feasible, and not liable to a catastrophe whenever a minority Member dies or resigns, we wish he would state his plan to the country." Encouraged by that invitation, and further stimulated by the remark in your leading article that the "method must be perfectly plain and simple," I venture to propose a plan which appears to me to fulfil all your requisites. I have never been able to understand why a person who lives in one place should have one vote, and one who lives in another two or three, under the present system of constituencies; and it is not probable that, under any circumstances, constituencies can be so exactly balanced as to make the system equitable. Why, then, not leave it altogether, and give each person possessing the franchise, wherever he may have a right to exercise it, one vote, and no more, leaving, as at present, two Members as the normal, and one, three, or four as the exceptional numbers of representatives of constituencies? Adopting your own standard, it would give to all constituencies of 50,000 inhabitants one Member, and to those of 100,000, two Members; extend these limits over a considerable margin, and we have all places of less than 25,000 disfranchised as separate constituencies, but only merged in a larger one actually, places between 25,000 and 75,000 returning one Member, between 75,000 and 150,000 two, places between 150,000 and 300,000 three,—probably, that would, except in exceptional cases, such as the existing constituency of the City of London, be found large enough for any single constituency.

In most, but by no means all, of the normal two-Member constituencies, parties would be sufficiently equally divided to return one Member each, who would be selected not for the length of his purse, or for his capacity for swallowing "fads," but because his own party deliberately considered that he best represented them politically and locally. After a trial of strength, the number of contests would diminish, and in cases where there was no contest at the general election, and no "burning question" before the minds of a constituency at a bye-election, the general spirit of fairness would prevent a contest for the vacant seat. At the same time, the single-Member places and the odd Member in three-Membered places would serve to give a very thorough working majority to the party who, on the whole, for the time being, represented the state of feeling in the country; and, moreover, the country would not be liable to the sudden changes of opinion and policy which exaggerate and caricature any gradual change which may be operating. No doubt, there is this great objection to such a plan as here proposed, that under it, supposing constituencies to remain geographically, as at present, the junior Member of two-Member constituencies would lose his seat; but, on the other hand, when, as in the near future, their geographical limits must in very many cases be largely changed, there appears to be no time like it for carrying out such a scheme. It would, moreover, interfere less with municipal, historical, and local associations than any other. One word as to Hare's or Parker Smith's scheme. I cannot help thinking that in any such system, or in any adaptation of the cumulative vote, a voter should have the right to vote minus as well as plus. At a recent election for the School Board at the West End of London, there were four or five unexceptionable candidates, who, from divergencies in general politics, varied slightly in acceptability to the mass of the constituency, yet not so much as to create any great enthusiasm about the election. There was, on the other hand, one candidate who, for his opinions on the subject of religious education, was most obnoxious to the overwhelming majority, who, however, had no direct power of keeping him out in the result. A section of the acceptable candidates was returned, together with the obnoxious one, who succeeded by the cumulative votes of a very insignificant minority. Had the majority been able to vote minus, there would have been no difficulty in getting them to take an interest in the election, and the expression of opinion would have been shown by leaving the gentleman whose opinions I have called obnoxious with a far larger minus quantity than any one else could get plus.—I am, Sir, &c., Temple, November 10th. F. W. RAIKES.

[We fear our correspondent has not solved the problem. The minority Members would be just as much unseated at a bye-election on his plan as on any other. But the proposal to give electors power to use their vote negatively, if they so prefer, is one well worth consideration.—ED. SPECTATOR.]

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It has often been said in the discussions on minority representation that the methods by which it is proposed to secure it are wanting in simplicity, and not easily understood by ordinary people. May I mention a small fact which seems to show that the best-known form of the minority clause would be more likely to be understood than the old-fashioned plan of plumping by suppressing a vote?

In the last Middlesex election I and some others were canvassing, in a somewhat poor district, for Mr. Herbert Gladstone. We found that the minds of some of the electors were much exercised by the fact that, though the law allowed them two votes, the Liberals only asked them to use one of them. So much had this vexed them, that some Conservative agent or canvasser had persuaded them that they were bound to use both votes, and that, consequently, they must give one to Mr. Cooper or Lord George Hamilton. Does it not follow from this, that if the minority clause, as used in School-Board elections, had been extended to constituencies returning only two Members, the electors could have better understood the plan of giving all their votes to one person, than they now understand the much more difficult proposal that they should gain a vote for their friends by merely abstaining from the use of one of the votes which the law allows them?—I am, Sir, &c.,

Sydney Cottage, Roslyn Hill, Hampstead. C. E. MAURICE.

[We quite admit that the common cumulative vote is intelligible enough, but the peculiar mischief of the cumulative vote—besides the anomaly that a minority member has no chance at bye-elections,—is that it frequently puts at the head of the poll the man who has comparatively few but very enthusiastic supporters. Would this be tolerated in Parliamentary contests?—ED. SPECTATOR.]

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Fully agreeing that no representative system can be satisfactory which does not provide for the representation of important minorities, I would suggest that, until the classes to be protected by minority representation can be brought to feel its value and demand its benefits, minority representation lies outside the range of practical politics. It would be flying in the face of all experience to expect that minority representation of any effectual kind can be brought about by the unaided efforts of political philosophers, even be they writers like Stuart Mill, or speakers like Mr. Fawcett and Mr. Courtney.

Now, the classes really interested in minority representation are undoubtedly the well-to-do classes. (I do not accept the expression "thinking" classes, used by your correspondent, Mr. Parker Smith, because, in my own belief, quite as many thinking men—upon political questions, at all events—are to be found amongst 500 carpenters as amongst 500 members of a London club.) But if anything effectual is to be done in the matter of Minority Representation, the well-to-do classes must bestir themselves. At present, there is apathy on the one side, and plenty of zeal and energy on the other. It is not to be expected that men who, like Mr. Bright, have spent their lives in advocating the claims of the unenfranchised should show much favour to any qualifications and safeguards which ought to accompany enfranchisement. The minds of men of action, earnest in great causes, are not often thus dispassionately balanced.

Now, the bulk of ordinary, well-to-do people belong to the Conservative party. It would not be very far from accurate to describe the Conservative party as wholly formed from the well-to-do classes. But the Conservative party as a party has never shown, and does not now show, any inclination to throw itself with any heartiness into the demand for minority representation. That it should not do so, is a surprising illustration of the hand-to-mouth sort of leadership the party is accustomed to. Every reflecting man knows perfectly well that, be it for good or be it for evil, democracy is advancing, and that the permanent exclusion of any large class from the franchise is simply impossible. Yet, instead of any exertion of the vast power of the Conservative party to give to the coming Parliamentary reform a shape in which, with very general acquiescence, a most substantial share of the representation might be preserved to the well-to-do classes, we hear of nothing but short-sighted devices for tripping up the Ministry, or for staving off the inevitable change for a Session, or perhaps a Parliament. And that, too, though all experience hitherto has shown that the longer changes in our representative system are deferred, the more sweeping they become.

There seems, then, too much reason to fear that the Conservative party, after struggling to keep an undue share of the representation, will find themselves left in the end with less than their due share of it. If so, they will, I think, have established one more claim to be deemed the Stupid Party. Certain it is that minority representation will not be thrust upon minorities who express no hearty wish for it. For good and for evil, our Legislature is accustomed to measure men's needs by their importunities.—I am, Sir, &c., M.

BEARDS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—May I point out that the writer of the article on "Beards," in your paper of November 3rd, has mistaken the force of the sayings which, according to William of Malmesbury and Wace, were exchanged between Harold and the English spy before the great battle? They have nothing to do with the beard strictly so called—that is the hair on the chin—but with the hair on the upper lip, now called a "moustache," but which in

Sir Roger de Coverley's day still kept its true name of "whiskers."

I have explained the matter in two or three places in my "History of the Norman Conquest;" but nothing is needed but to look at the Bayeux Tapestry. The notion about beards as a distinction between English and Normans comes, I imagine, from the romantic account given by Matthew Paris of William-with-the-Long-Beard, in the time of Richard I., an account widely different from that given by the contemporary writers, and which Thierry naturally improved into a wilder version still.

In the Tapestry, William and Harold, and the mass of their respective countrymen, are all alike beardless. The difference is that the English, while shaving the rest of the face, left the hair on the upper lip; the Normans cut off that also. The spy therefore says:—"Pene omnes in exercitu illo presbyteros videri, quod totam faciem, cum utroque labio, rasam haberent." "Angli enim superius labrum pilis incessanter fructificantibus intonsum dimittunt, quod etiam gentilitium antiquis Britonibus fuisse Julius Caesar asseverat, in libro Belli Gallici." The words "pene omnes" are to be noticed. While the Tapestry shows that the generation represented by Harold and William shaved both in England and in Normandy, it seems to show further that the fashion was a new one in both countries. A few elderly men on each side wear their beards. Conspicuous among them is King Edward, who, as we know from his biographer, had a white beard, and who most likely represents a Norman rather than an English fashion. And "Barbatus" is an occasional nickname in the days of the Conquest, showing that the beard, though it was marked as singular, had not wholly gone out of use.

As for "the conquerors of Senlac imposing their custom of shaving upon the conquered," as for its being "one of the grievances of the English under their new masters that they were compelled to shave," there is nothing like it in any contemporary writer. Moreover the English were not "compelled" to do anything in such matters. They were largely influenced by Norman fashions, as the Normans were largely influenced by English fashions; but there was no compulsion either way.—I am, Sir, &c., Abbots Langley, November 8th.

CHILDREN AND THEIR DINNERS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—My attention has just been called to the letter of your correspondent "J. G. F.," in last week's issue, in which it seems that those of us who are engaged in the work of supplying free dinners to some of the poorest Board-School children are given very little credit for any judgment in the matter. I think it is right that your readers should know that this movement has not been commenced without all "definite and right principles," as is suggested by this writer. It is unfortunately too true, as stated, that "there is nothing exceptional in the condition of Lisson Grove, or in the prospect of the coming winter;" but is not this the best of reasons why some effort should be made to remedy an evil which is admitted to be general and chronic? Exception also appears to be taken to our dealing with this question otherwise than by a fully comprehensive scheme, including all elementary public schools in every district. Nothing would give us more pleasure than to see the "giving of gratuitous meals" to children on this "large scale." We await only the growth of public opinion, to make our operations all-embracing; but, meanwhile, should it not rather be some consolation to your alarmed correspondent that what he designates our "somewhat perilous experiment" is at present on a limited scale.

In commencing this movement, let me also state, we were anxious, though it was a work entirely outside its functions, to have the approval of the School Board; and on our plans being laid before the members of the Board for our district, in the informal way which was alone possible, we received, in two cases at least, the most hearty encouragement. The distribution of the tickets for the dinners, I am happy to state, is based on the "very full and accurate knowledge of the circumstances of the parents," that your correspondent was anxious should not be wanting. This is gained, not from the hard-worked masters—who, however, most kindly assist us in distributing the passes to the table, and in giving us the benefit of their advice—but from personal visitation of the homes of the children by ladies of our committee, who investigate the cases individually, and decide respecting their degrees of necessity. Much valuable information is also afforded by the zealous City missionaries who labour in this district. The "pleasure and gratitude of the little ones," it is certainly our good-fortune to see; but we also see the squalid home, the demoralising surroundings, the apology for meals, the beneficial effects of a little well-timed help, and the efforts made by the parents to do their part in the work. Nor is the much-dreaded possibility of pauperising the poor sufficient to frighten us from the path we have taken. Actual contact with these classes shows that this danger is not so great as it looks theoretically. Cases come to our notice of parents who, while expressing themselves as thankful for past help given their children, state that they are now in work, and ought no longer to avail themselves of the help of others. And if there is a danger of some occasional undeserving parent deriving a little advantage from the help given by others to a half-fed child, we are prepared to run it, in order to give a chance to the future generation of rising, through an education duly profited by, to higher things. These, then, are some of our "definite," if not "right principles,"—personal investigation into cases of suffering childhood by voluntary workers, direct help to the child in its educational work, and immediate action in a sphere limited only by the number and means at the disposal of the workers.

With regard to the publication of the accounts of our Society, I am rather at a loss to understand whether your correspondent is of opinion that our honorary secretary was remiss in not including a balance-sheet in the brief letter in which she drew attention to our existence. Such a course would have been somewhat novel, and perhaps premature, as the end of the financial year has not yet come. The full accounts, duly audited, will undoubtedly be published at the proper time, together with a Report of our doings, which I trust will have the widest possible circulation.

As to the composition of our Committee, it is not for me to attempt to show either that it is "thoroughly representative," or that it consists of "responsible persons who possess the public confidence."

The doubt suggested as to our responsibility by "J. G. F." comes somewhat oddly, surely, from one writing under the cover of initials. Some of our names you have been furnished with already, and in answer to this suggestion, I fear I must ask you to publish the names of the full Committee, as appended. And this, especially, as we are about to open a third dining-room (and, we hope, a fourth) in the neighbourhood of the Strand, for which we shall be thankful for further proofs of the public confidence in the shape of subscriptions.—I am, Sir, &c.,

HENRY E. ALLEN,

Treasurer of the Board-School Children's Free Dinner Fund.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE AND THE PHYSIOLOGICAL LABORATORY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—A paragraph appeared in the Spectator of last Saturday on the Oxford Memorial concerning the University Physiological Laboratory. That part of it which affects Magdalen College appears to me to rest upon erroneous information, and as it is certainly calculated to spread an entirely false impression of the attitude of this College in the matter, I think it right to inform you of the actual facts, and to rely upon your sense of justice to publish the following account of the real state of the case:—

You appear to have been informed that the signatures were drawn from members in Oxford, and "a circle of about fifteen miles round." The fact is, that the signatures are not drawn exclusively from either the smaller or even the larger area, one of the so-called Magdalen signatures being that of a member of the Hereford Cathedral Choir, and that they are representative neither of the governing body of the College nor of the resident members.

The governing body of the College consists of the President and twenty-four Fellows; of these twenty-five, three alone have signed the memorial. The resident members, as shown by the list of Congregation, number 22; of these 22, only six have signed.

Finally, as regards the last paragraph, it is true that Magdalen College has for years past had a physiological laboratory of its own, and it is further true that the University teaching of physiology has been carried on there, previous to the advent of Dr. Burdon Sanderson, for years past under a Government licence, with the full and express consent of the whole governing body of the College; a fact which is indeed significant, but, hardly in the way you appear to have been informed.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EDWARD CHAPMAN,

Fellow and Senior Tutor in Natural Science of Magdalen College, Magdalen College, Oxford, November 14th.

[We are sorry to find we have been misinformed, if we have been misinformed; but we had high local authority for our statements; and we wish Magdalen College had deserved better the credit we gave it.—ED. SPECTATOR.]

THE NON-RESIDENTIAL COUNTY FRANCHISE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The non-residential county franchise has a value which the Spectator is not likely to depreciate as merely sentimental. It provides a kind of political anchorage in the old home; and in this aspect it is directly recognised by the existing law. The freehold qualification devolving by inheritance or bequest admits of earlier registration than that acquired by purchase.

Cases may occur in which the franchise derived from bequest may bear some resemblance to faggot-voting; but these are exceptional and temporary, as when a testator bequeaths his freehold to his children share and share alike, with power to his executors to hold or sell at their discretion. The ordinary non-residential franchise is, however, generally that of the inheritors of real property whose callings or circumstances oblige them to live elsewhere. In less frequent, but not unusual, instances, fathers provide their sons with a county qualification at home, for the maintenance of which nothing more is required than attention to the Register.

Rightly or wrongly, most men would hold such a franchise in higher value than a householder's vote, say, for the old, undivided Tower Hamlets when I was on the Register, at the elections of 1857 and later years. The bond of home, or county, association was then, as I know, and is still, as I believe, strong in London life; and Liberals may cling to the franchise on personal, as well as on historical grounds.

It is probable that any proposal for the abolition of the non-residential franchise would allow some limit of residence beyond the county boundaries, and that thus my own vote for West Worcestershire would be safe, even though I live (to quote your Waterford correspondent) in the "unintelligible county" of Hereford. (We had imagined the tenant-farmers' return of Mr. Duckham in 1880 to be very distinctly intelligible.) But I also hold the franchise for North Warwickshire, by an inheritance a hundred years old, and I do not see that sound Liberal principles require me to sacrifice this.

The distinction between bona fide freeholds and faggot-vote manufactories is evident, and is admitted in the Spectator article of this week. With the abolition of payment for travelling expenses, a sufficient security will have been obtained against the mere party manipulation of non-resident county votes; and even Mr. Fawcett, I trust, may allow us to retain our historical rights in peace.—I am, Sir, &c.,

F. SIMCOX LEA.

Tedstone Delamere Rectory, Worcester, November 12th.

[The abolition of payment for travelling expenses does not in the least interfere with the manufacture of faggot votes. The rich, who chiefly enjoy these votes, would cheerfully travel far at their own expense to record them.—ED. SPECTATOR.]

POETRY.

POETS, AND POETS.

I KNEW a poet,—one with eyes of laughter,
A face like a sun-smile, eager as a boy,
Singing as the birds sing, trusting the Hereafter:
I knew a poet, and his name was Joy!

I knew a poet, who had eyes for beauty,
Piercing the cloud-mists, reaching over Death,
Sounding the world's song, like a hymn of duty:
I knew a poet, and his name was Faith!

One there was also, gentle as a woman,
Walking the sunless alleys of the city,—
One all-compassionate, eloquently human:
I knew a poet, and his name was Pity!

But these with their loveless tissue of fair weaving,
These with the joyless musical refrain;
These letting life go, blind and unbelieving;
These looking earthward only, and in vain;
These that have lain in the poppy flowers waving,
Grown where the fields turn wilderness and bare;
These with the look-back, and the lotus-craving;
These with the thin, self-echo of despair;
These ever straining after days that were not,
These with their reckless abandonment of youth;
These that restrain not, wonder not, revere not,—
These are no Poets, or there is no Truth.

LYRICS OF PERICLES.—III.*

VIII.—ODE TO NEPTUNE.

God of the steed and the spear and the Ocean,
Speed thou our barks o'er the wandering foam;
Steer us by reef, and by headland and island,
Outward and onward, and inward and home;
Hail to thee, Neptune! great Neptune, all hail!

Shaker of Earth and upheaver of Water,
Father of Triton and brother of Jove,
Thou at whose bidding Troy rose as a palm-tree,
Under whose branches her warriors strove,
Hail to thee, Neptune! great Neptune, all hail!

Saturn begat thee, and Saturn devoured thee,
But to restore thee to mystical birth;
Neptune some style thee, some call thee Poseidon,
Many thy names as the races of Earth:
Hail to thee, Neptune! great Neptune, all hail!

Deep in the sea lies thy palace at Ægæ,
Whence thou arisest to ride on the wave,
Yoking thy golden-maned, brazen-hoofed coursers,
Mighty to ruin, but powerful to save;
Hail to thee, Neptune! great Neptune, all hail!

Clouds as thou biddest them gather and scatter,
Come at thy whisper and fly at thy nod;
Look then on us that bow down at thine altars,
King of the Ocean, the Mariners' God!
Hail to thee, Neptune! great Neptune, all hail!

IX.—THE DREAM OF PERICLES.

I am called, so thou would'st know,
Dian of the silver bow;
And, while slumber seals thine eyne,
Bid thee list the voice divine:
Seek out mine Ephesian shrine;
And, before mine altar set,
When my maiden priests are met,
Tell them all that happed to thee,—
How Thaisa died at sea,
Tell,—and leave the rest to me.
Dream-like then thy woes shall seem;
So arise, and heed the dream!

X.—THANKSGIVING ODE.

Enthroned upon a silver beam
Of perfect light,
Our lady reigns as doth besem
The Queen of Night!
Whate'er thy pastime is,
Dian or Artemis,—
Whether as huntress fair and free,
With strong limbs bared in symmetry,
On sylvan heights the chase thou followest,—
Or veiled, and cold, and pure,
Distillest moonlight for the thirsting flowers,
Receive this hymn of ours,
Offered to thee, our sorrow's royal cure,
In that thou pitiest!

* Written for a proposed musical production of Shakespeare's play of Pericles, arranged by Mr. John Coleman.

To thee the grace, white friend of men,
 For life restored,
 And wife and daughter given again
 To sire and lord;
 To thee the glory is,
 Dian and Artemis!—
 Reigning a goddess chrysolite,
 Encentred in thy palace-light,
 Through thy fair moon the tides thou governest;
 And from thy radiant throne,
 All woman, bending to our passionate prayer,
 Hast sent some spirit rare,
 To give us back our jewels for our own,
 Plucked from the spoiler's breast.

ART.

"PHIZ."

THERE is an unpretending little exhibition, at the Rooms of the Fine-Art Society in Bond Street, which should be seen by those who are interested in English art. The works exhibited are all by the late Hablot K. Browne, better known as "Phiz," and consist of oil paintings, water-colour drawings, and studies, mostly in monochrome, for the illustration of various books. For the oil paintings and water-colour drawings but little can be said, and they may be dismissed with the remark that in neither medium did Mr. Browne attain to any great skill of workmanship or beauty of colour. Certain qualities of grace, gentleness, and pleasant fancy may, indeed, be found in these, as well as in the monochrome designs; but, speaking generally, the moment that Mr. Browne began to work upon a large scale, and to attempt to give his work the solidity and importance of a finished painting, his failure was complete. About six inches by four was his favourite size, or, at least, it was within such narrow limits that his best work was done. How good that work was, especially when we remember the state of art at the time that it was executed, has seldom been recognised; and it is probable that the very popularity of the works of Dickens, to the illustration of which Mr. Browne devoted his chief labours, in some measure swept out of sight the delicate power and vivid imagination of the artist.

Book illustration must almost inevitably (when the book dealt with is a story) resolve itself into a choice between the surrender of the artist or the author—of the two, one must ride behind; and in a case like that of Dickens and "Phiz" there could be no doubt which of the two that would be. It is curious to notice how, throughout these illustrations (Dombey, Bleak House, David Copperfield) the artist's vision seems to have been dependent entirely upon that of the author, and that where Dickens has presented a feebly conceived, priggish, or conventional character, "Phiz," too, has only been able to draw a puppet of a similar kind. Compare, for instance, the portraits of Captain Cuttle and Lady Dedlock and Miss Flite, with those of Florence Dombey and David Copperfield, and it will be seen at once how extreme was the dependence in which Mr. Browne stood to his author, and how instant a recourse he had to the most conventional types, when Dickens had failed to make his characters stand out clearly.

But this by the way; it is more necessary to point out in what lay the chief artistic power of Mr. Browne's illustrations, only bearing in mind that their great value quâ illustrations, was the perfect equality with which they kept pace with the mind of the author. For it seemed to be equally natural to "Phiz" to be grave or gay, lively, pathetic, or even terrible; and for an artist who habitually lived in an atmosphere of slight and, we had almost said, trivial fancies, it was little less than marvellous to be possessed of such tragic power as there is in the drawings of "On the Dark Road," "Found," and (finest of all) "A New Meaning in the Old Roman."

Looking at "Phiz's" drawings as a whole, their great merits appear to us to consist in the union of two qualities which are rarely found in combination,—the dramatic and the tender, and all his finest work can be traced to its origin in this combination. It is not our intention in saying this to overlook his technical excellence as a suggestive draughtsman, any more than we intend to enter upon a disquisition against the frequently conventional types of his faces and figures, against their impossibly small feet and hands, their marvellously long, thin legs, or any other similar details. It must be always remembered, in thinking of such matters, and of his work done for purposes of illustration (and mainly humorous illustration) at this period, that the border-line between caricature and humour was by no means so broadly marked as it is at the present time; that the old caricaturists of the early part of the century had left traces of their presence in the theory that to be funny it was necessary to be grotesque, if not monstrous; and if all other means of exciting a laugh should fail, recourse must be had to an impossibly big head on an absurdly under-sized body. He who forgets this, loses the key to the right understanding of the drawbacks in the art of all such men as Seymour, Cruikshank, and "Phiz," and would be apt to attribute to personal deficiency what was merely the result of unfortunate tradition.

It seems to us that against this tradition "Phiz" was always struggling, and very frequently struggling in vain. His comic illustrations, broadly speaking, are failures. They are exaggerated beyond a degree to which we are in this age accustomed. Mr. Kenwigs weeping over the little Kenwigses, on the celebrated occasion of the marriage of Mr. Lillyvick, for example, does not strike us as funny, because it is so incredibly burlesque, the action is exaggerated beyond the bounds of reason. But it is worth while to note that this very illustration is a splendid example of "Phiz's" power,—his dramatic power we mean, though it turns drama into burlesque. Take any of the finer drawings to Dombey or Bleak House, and the same dramatic instinct will be found in each, coupled with a gentleness and almost tenderness of feeling, such as we can hardly estimate too highly. It is not that the illustrations are only well composed from the pictorial point of view, they are also well "set" (if we may use a technical stage word) from the theatric point. Almost any one of these pictures might be placed upon the stage without altering one piece of furniture, one action or combination of the figures. In many of them, even of the best, this dramatic quality, in which resides much of their power, goes far to render that power unavailing, or at least to weaken its effect. An unkind critic might say, with a good deal of truth, that the glare of the footlights was "over them all;" that at best it was but a spurious, second-hand nature that "Phiz" depicted. To a certain extent, this would be true, but not altogether, for frequently it seems to us that where his dramatic power is beginning to degenerate into mere staginess, his instincts of grace and tenderness step in, and save the work. His female figures are, no doubt, in shape and feature conventional to the last degree, and their actions of surprise, abandonment, or disdain, smack of the "Surrey Side;" but they are very certainly and fully women, and are touched with so gentle a hand that we forgive them their almost imbecile prettiness.

We will not dwell here upon what was undoubtedly the great defect in "Phiz's" illustrative work, i.e., its frequent vulgarity. This speaks for itself, and the only interesting question with regard thereto is, to how great an extent it arose from the artist's sympathy with the mind of the great writer in the illustration of whose works he spent the best part of his life. Certain it is that, as we have hinted before, the artist was very dependent for his point of view upon the author, and where Dickens was mawkish, sentimental, affected, or genteel, "Phiz" was apt to reflect his shortcomings in an exaggerated degree.

It seems almost absurd to speak of "Phiz's" work, without comparing it in some way with that of his great rival, George Cruikshank; but this notice grows over-long already, and we have but space for a word on this subject. Cruikshank was a great artist, and "Phiz" a great designer,—that is the difference, the ultimate difference between them. The one could create a character, the other could arrange it. Fagin and Bill Sykes are as perfect in their pictures by Cruikshank as they are in the words of Dickens; but just think for an instant of what an entourage "Phiz" would have given us for Fagin and Sykes, as compared with the bare scenes in which Cruikshank has placed them.

And again, in their chief excellencies these men supplied one another's deficiencies, rather than rivalled each other. Cruikshank was funny, grimly, it is true, but still with a broad, vulgar, English fun, which left no bad taste in the mouth, and savoured of the pantomime and the red-hot poker. But "Phiz" was burlesque without being funny, and though he was sometimes droll, as a rule his humour is of the satirical kind, and rather withers those upon whom it is directed. And the tragedy of the one man was also of a wholly different kind to that of the other. Cruikshank's was an intense personal tragedy, in which one felt almost as if the artist were akin to George Eliot in his power of realising and analysing character; but "Phiz's" tragedy was of an outside, impersonal kind, and related to the scene and the subject, rather than to any special actor therein. He neither cared for Lady Dedlock nor Mr. Tulkinghorn in the way that his brother-artist cared for Fagin and Sykes, but he cared very much for the chances which the lady and the lawyer gave him, of sketching one dead at the gate of the miserable City churchyard, and the other beside his library-table, with the old allegorical figure pointing down upon him from the ceiling, with a new meaning in its outstretched finger.

MR. FLINDERS PETRIE ON THE PYRAMIDS.*

No one interested in Egyptian archaeology can fail to profit by the study of the exact, sober, and luminous account of the Pyramids of Gizeh, which Mr. Petrie, with some aid from the Royal Society, has recently published. Professor Piazzi Smyth, whose theories have been so much laughed at, was the first to explore the Pyramids in a truly scientific manner; and Mr. Gill's geodetic survey is justly characterised in the present volume as surpassing all previous work in its accuracy. But Mr. Petrie's own labours have been on a scale hitherto unattempted. Piazzi Smyth left the serious task of triangulation untouched, and Mr. Gill's operations were begun and concluded within the scanty space of three days. Mr. Petrie spent nine months at Gizeh, living in a tomb, contented with the hardest fare, and in almost complete seclusion from intercourse with Europeans. Ten hours of the twenty-four were occupied with theodolite and measuring-tape, or in superintending the excavations, and the subsequent paper-work of each day was not usually completed until midnight. The result is the present exhaustive treatise, which cannot fail to give a powerful impetus to the study of Egyptian archaeology in this country, where, for the last two or three decades, it has fallen into a neglect which does us little credit.

The pathetic anxiety of the ancient Egyptians that the body should be preserved from decay, and the tomb be within easy distance of home, was amply met by the situation of the vast necropolis of the Memphic nome. Occupying the tract of desert bordering upon the cultivable district that stretched north and south of the capital of the third dynasty, no part of it was more than a few miles distant from the towns, villages, and homesteads that dotted the broad, fertile plain. The line of counterscarp of the great plateau of the Libyan Desert, running almost true north, served as a barrier against the penetration westward of the annual inundation. Along its base the traveller may still walk with one foot in the green berسيم of the irrigated fields, and the other in the loose sand that has blown over the edge of the plateau, to accumulate in shifting masses below. In such a resting-place the dead knew no change, and the soul could await without dread the moment of its reunion with the body.

The Great Pyramid stands upon a limestone pavement, extending from 529 to 627 inches beyond the foot of the smooth-surfaced casing which originally covered the four faces. The pavement itself rests upon an uneven foundation of somewhat larger area, excavated out of the underlying nummulitic limestone, which, with alternating tracts of sandstone, forms the basis of the great Libyan Desert beneath the ridges of wind-driven sand, separated by broad, hollow valleys, that give it its peculiar character. Hitherto the measurements of explorers had not shown the base of the Pyramid to be a perfect square, but Mr. Petrie's profounder researches and exacter measurements enabled him to determine it to be practically a true square, with a side of 9,068·8 inches, exhibiting the wonderfully small mean error of '65 inch in length, and 12" in angle. Upon this extraordinary accuracy of these primæval builders, in conjunction with other considerations, Mr. Petrie has demonstrated the falsity of the accretion theory, which holds that the Pyramids were designed upon a smaller plan, to be afterwards gradually added to. The whole discussion is well worthy of perusal, and affords an admirable example of the means and methods of the author. The theory never had probability to recommend it, for to an Egyptologist the idea of an early monarch purposely half building his tomb in order that it might be indefinitely enlarged by his successors (who would have their own tombs to look after), is nothing less than an absurdity. Mr. Petrie estimates the number of stones accumulated in the Great Pyramid at 2,300,000, weighing, on an average, 2½ tons each. The granite beams of the Kings' Chamber weigh between 50 and 60 tons. No representation of the mode in which these huge and huger masses were lifted into position is afforded by the monuments, and ancient authors are silent upon the subject, save so far as they refer to a machine made of short pieces of wood. Mr. Petrie's ingenious supposition that the allusion is to a method of resting the stones upon piles of wooden slaps, and "rocking them up alternately to one side and the other by a spar under the block, thus heightening the piles alternately, and so raising the stone," is a legitimate explanation of the mystery; the more so in that, as Mr. Petrie shows, even the fifty-ton beams could be dealt with in such a manner that only five tons' weight would have to be raised at once, which could easily be done by ten men with crowbars, so that sixty men might raise the whole of them in one year. Almost every stone is carefully dressed and levelled; so accurate, indeed, is the workmanship, that very commonly the joints, filled with cement, are not more than one-fiftieth of an inch in width. In addition, the proofs are numerous that every block was marked for position while on the ground, not trimmed after having been got into place, showing how carefully and exactly the whole structure must have been planned before a single block was "rocked-up" into its proper niche. As to the time occupied in the building of Khufu's Pyramid, Mr. Petrie's calculations go to substantiate the account given by Herodotus, that 100,000 men were employed twenty years during three months of each year in bringing over the materials from the Mokattam and Turra ranges, on the east side of the Nile. The three months, no doubt, would be those of the inundation, beginning about the end of July, when the stones could be brought over on rafts. No great hardship, as Mr. Petrie acutely points out, would be involved in a requisition of labour during a portion of the year, when all agricultural operations in ancient Egypt were at a stand-still, and when the means of transit were afforded by the inundation which, in the days of the fourth dynasty, probably almost touched the base of the Gizeh plateau. His examination of the extensive remains of masonry that lie hidden under the sand behind the Pyramid of Khafra, hitherto regarded as a mere heap of waste and rubbish, shows them to be the débris and ruins of the thick rubble walls of a series of galleries, that were doubtless roofed over with straw and mud to serve as barracks for the masons, some three or four thousand of whom may have been thus housed. These men, with the attendant labourers, would represent the permanent charge imposed upon the population by the building of the Great as well as of the Second Pyramid; and if the masons received wages as well as their food, the theory that the Pyramids were the outcome of a vast and cruel oppression would vanish. The accuracy of the base-contours and of the angles of the Pyramids of Khufu and Khafra leads to the expectation of equal accuracy on the part of the builders in the orientation of the faces. And Mr. Petrie's observations, in effect, show that the orientation of the Great Pyramid, like that of the second, is only about 5' west of north, a difference amply accounted for by the change that has taken place in the direction of the earth's axis since the date of their construction. Both architect and masons knew their business and did their work faithfully.

The importance of the precision with which the survey recorded in this volume was made is constantly brought home to the reader. It has always, for instance, been a favourite theory that the so-called Queen's Chamber was intended to hold the blocks which, it was supposed, were required to plug the ascending passage. Mr. Petrie's measurements, however, render the theory wholly untenable, and his conclusion that the Queen's Chamber was the sepulchre of the co-regent of Khufu is probably the right one. In fact, it is more than doubtful whether the passages were ever plugged up at all. The device is a priori a somewhat coarse one to attribute to the builders of such structures as the Pyramids. Strabo's account of the entrance to the Great Pyramid, cited by Mr. Petrie, is as follows:—"The Greater [Pyramid], a little way up one side, has a stone that may be taken out, which being raised up, there is a sloping passage to the foundations." Mr. Petrie's researches place this description in a new and instructive light, and render it almost certain that a stone door or portcullis is alluded to, like the one of which he examined the traces in the South Pyramid of

* The Pyramids and Temples of Gizeh. By W. M. Flinders Petrie. London: Field and Tuer. 1883.

Dahshur. On the eleventh of the plates appended to the volume, diagrams will be found of both doors. The stone, which a pull of five hundredweight would suffice to turn, would form part of the casing, and, on being replaced, would leave no sign of the passage. To the Romans in Strabo's time the secret of the door was known, but the Arabs could not discover it, and Mamun, in consequence, was obliged to force an entrance below.

With Mr. Petrie's valuable and interesting discussion of the various numerical theories that have been propounded in connection with his subject, we have no space to deal. They in no way affect the tombic theory of the Great Pyramid, which is accepted as the only possible one. We are equally obliged to content ourselves with a mere reference to the instructive chapter on the mechanical methods of the Pyramid builders, while we must leave the three appendices, treating of the discrimination and elimination of observational error, to the criticism of mathematicians and metrologists.

The Great Pyramid is the oldest and the most perfect of all. Mr. Petrie has made it quite clear that it was planned as a whole (save, possibly, some portions of the interior) before a stone was lifted into position. How are we to account for so magnificent an idea starting into being, in all its perfection and grandeur, as it were at a bound? We cannot account for it in the present state of our knowledge. When Memphis could boast of the grandest necropolis the world has ever known, Egypt was not in her youth. An intricate social hierarchy held together the various classes of her people. She had reached a high pitch of civilisation, shown, if by nothing else, by the honour in which the art of writing was held, and by the minute accuracy of her records, from those of the State down to those of a farm. Perhaps a dozen feet, perhaps two dozen feet, under the existing surface of Nile mud the clue to the solution of the mystery will some day be found, profounder and earlier strata of Egyptian history will be explored, and in the vestiges of a period long anterior to that of the Memphite Kings, we shall be enabled to read the very beginnings of a civilisation the grandeur of which becomes more manifest as our knowledge of it increases in fullness.

MR. CLARK RUSSELL'S NEW NOVEL.*

THERE are two novelists of the day who, while they do not resemble each other in any other respect, equally possess the power of blending romance with reality, and whose works consequently stand apart from the mere mundaneness and materialism that are growing characteristics of modern fiction. These exceptional writers are Mr. Walter Besant and Mr. Clark Russell. The student of "all sorts and conditions of men" is the most realistic of our writers, and also the most purely and brightly romantic. The author who made his mark by The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor', and has deepened it by his subsequent works, puts the lives and the ways of seamen before us with unadorned plainness, while he interprets the awful voice of the ocean, and presents its wonderful pictures with force, poetry, and fancy. It is not surprising that a writer who puts his heart, soul, and conscience into his work, as Mr. Clark Russell does, resents the handling of his theme, under its sublime or its humble aspects, by writers who have no real knowledge of either, and insists upon the claims of the true sailor to be studied and understood by us—an island people, with an ocean empire—and "no longer to be confounded with the cockneys, and tailors, and fresh-water shell-backs, who clap on his overalls and sicken their stomachs with his quids, and scrape to us, from the stage or in novels, under the patronage of largely-advertised reputations." It is not surprising that he dislikes and despises the summer-sea and white-wings line of would-be nautical narrative, with its flavour of flirtation and French wines, and its feebly-imitative sea talk, as much like the real thing as the men who utter it are like Tom Bowling. He offers to healthier appetites stronger food; to the few who are still susceptible to the charms of romance, a story which will take hold of them, as the Red Rover took hold of its readers in its time; to those who like to get at the outcome of true knowledge and long experience, a narrative that will make them realise the lives, the responsibilities, and the risks of our merchant seamen, in a way that ought to be acceptable to all.

The story of A Sea Queen is told in the first person, with success that rarely attends that form of narrative, and is due to the simplicity of the style and also to the fine avoidance of self-consciousness on the part of the supposed narrator, whose share in the quick succession of events is contrived with skill and boldness. We acknowledge that we do not know whether Mr. Clark Russell does or does not intend us to believe that his Sea Queen had any real existence. He says, "The lady who has told you her story resided, up to a recent period, in South Shields. As for her narrative, I had it from her lately and in small bits at a time, and my memory may have failed to give it all the colour and exactness I found in her relation of it. . . . We have been praising sailors so long, that some may think it is about time that we gave their wives a turn." All this may be only the artfulness of the author, and he may smile at our credulity if we profess faith in a real Jessie Fowler; we may, at least, say that we hope, for the sake of some such men as the father and the husband of the author's Sea Queen, there once was a woman who did these deeds, or the like of them. She is a heroine of romance, to stir the fancy, a heroine of reality, to elevate the mind and cheer the heart; from first to last we follow her story, —with its homely tone, its frank simplicity, its true, honest, matter-of-course affections and straightforward views of duty counterbalancing its wild and wonderful incidents of peril, terror, and daring,—with unflagging interest. The tale begins admirably; the writer giving us a taste of his finest quality in the grand description of the mouth of the Tyne in a gale, and the simply pathetic episode of the death of Jessie's mother,—killed by the 'long-shore agony of suspense so bravely borne, and when the husband is safe by her side, and the daughter whose youthful terror she had soothed with such loving self-repression, is rejoicing. The talk of the old sailors and fishermen—the "sea-porkypines," to quote Peggotty—is quite convincing; we have never heard it, but we recognise it just as we recognise George Eliot's peasants' talk at the "Red Cow." The gathering of the gale, the ways of the place and the people, are all drawn with a masterly hand.

Of course, we know that Captain Richard Fowler, Jessie, his brave and loving young wife, and the barque 'Aurora,' which is described with admiring minuteness, are to come to and out of terrible grief, and from the first the grim shadow of mutiny at sea is forecast upon the voyage that is to realise the dream of Jessie's childhood. Before that voyage is undertaken, however, Jessie undergoes a more ordinary trial. It is only a baby's death; but the incident is so simply told, the relief of the bereaved mother, when her husband returns and she can tell her grief to him, is made so touching, that the reader feels the author's power as keenly in the following passages as in the grander scenes of trouble and danger that come apace and again:—

"If ever I had dreaded telling Richard of our loss, I had now no other sense of that fear than to reproach myself for having felt it. It soothed me unspeakably to pour out my heart to him, as I sat nestling at his side, earnestly and tenderly watched by his loving eyes. For in spite of my father's touching, simple, consoling sympathy, I had felt myself alone with my grief. There was only one person in the whole wide world who could truly share it, and he had been away when my anguish was greatest. . . . I could not expect that Richard should feel as I did. . . . Yet there was deep disappointment in his face, and such a sorrow as must arise in the heart of a man who could see with his son's eye the love that had come and vanished in his absence, that had been as real as life and beauty could make it, and yet no more than a dream to him either. . . . The baby's resting-place was marked by a cross, with that sweet sentence, 'Jesus called a little child unto Him,' carved on the steps. . . . When my husband came to the spot where our baby lay, he stood looking without speaking, touched to the heart by the littleness of the grave and the sight of his and my name upon the cross, and the age of the lost one, 'Five months and one week.' He then took his hat off, and knelt down, and said a prayer, by the resting-place of his child whom he had never seen, whom he loved, yet could only think of as a spirit. Never did death appear to me so great a mystery and miracle as at that time."

Mr. Clark Russell enlists his readers' sympathies for the Sea Queen long before she earns that title by revealing her true womanliness, her sweet, loving, pious nature. There is no harshness in her heroism; there is no repellent boldness in her resolute good-sense and fearlessness; the feminine aspect of her character is only elevated by danger and hardship, it is never obscured. In the delineation of Jessie the author has achieved a greater literary success than he has hitherto had to score; while the story of the voyage and loss of the 'Aurora,' with the subsequent adventures of the captain and his wife on board the fever-stricken ship, is equal in interest and superior in construction, to The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor'.

Shipwreck, fire at sea, and mutiny, are materials with which a skilled artisan of fiction may work over and over again, without fear of exhausting the interest of his readers; those who feel the thrill and the excitement of such themes will not tire of them; those who do not, will not read sea stories—real sea stories, we mean—at all. Of these three terrors of the sea, we have examples in Mr. Clark Russell's present work; and the third is invested with peculiar dread by the presence of a solitary woman in the doomed ship. It seems to us that the one weak point in this powerful story is the motive of the mutiny. It may be our own 'long-shore dullness' makes us fail to see the author's full meaning—in that case, the fault is ours—but we certainly do not perceive what the villainous mate and his rascally associates had to gain by their mutiny, that would have compensated for the risk at which only they could have forced the captain to return into port, had not the fire that led to the abandonment of the 'Aurora' broken out. The villainy of Heron is too much of a parti pris, the hints of his character are premature; his light-red beard and moustache, his pale-blue shifty eyes, his face "without an atom of weather in it," are all danger-signals, indications as plain and as stagey as the scarlet cloak and the cock's feather of Mephistopheles.

From first to last the interest of the story steadily rises, and the noble nature and gallant conduct of the Sea Queen take an increasing hold upon the reader's admiration. And then how delightful is the seamanship to us who know nothing at all about it. How doubly delightful it must be to readers who do know, and therefore get out of it much more than the general sense of breeziness and bustle, dash and danger, combined with practical promptitude and all-thereishness, which it conveys to our ignorance. There are chapters in this book of extraordinary beauty, full of the music and the majesty of the sea; descriptions that are pictures and poems, to which the reader will turn back when he has read the story, and felt the truth and quaintness of the sketches of sailor-life and character. Putting all the rest aside, he will study these chapters with deep delight, like that which is brought to him by the wind and the waves, when on a lonely shore he looks and listens.

THE AUTHOR OF "TULLOCHGORUM."*

This is not the first biography that has appeared of the modest, scholarly, genial, but withal sagacious, Episcopalian divine, who found time, in the midst of varied labours and in spite of an almost life-long fight with poverty, to write what Burns has styled "the best Scotch song Scotland ever saw." The pious affection of his son, Bishop John Skinner—himself a worthy and even in some respects remarkable man—raised a cairn to his memory in the publication of his miscellaneous works accompanied with a memoir two years after his death, in 1809. In 1859, also, Mr. H. G. Reid, then of Peterhead, now of Middlesbrough, published an edition of Skinner's songs and poems, with a biography. But this new work will be warmly welcomed by all who appreciate this fine, old Christian Horatian who contrived to be happy and even gay on the scantiest stock of Falernian, and who, when his little experiment in the way of a Sabine farm came to grief, wisely made merry over his misfortune. The Rev. Mr. Walker, its author, does justice, not only to the man, but to the singular struggle of Episcopalianism in the North of Scotland, in which Dean Skinner took a courageous part. He presents, as he says, "the spectacle of a poor, disestablished, and disendowed Church engaged in a death-struggle with a great and powerful State, each encroaching more or less on the province of the other; the State refusing full toleration to religion, and the Church refusing full toleration to politics; the State requiring 'forced prayer,' and the Church forbidding free-will prayers." Commendably free from provincialism, this biography may be found by lay readers a trifle too professional. Mr. Walker enters at unnecessary length into Skinner's exegetical writings, his views on the Schekinah, the Shem-al, Jehovah Tzebâôth, the Roes and Hinds of the Field, and the like. It is no doubt remarkable that a man of Skinner's strong sense should have embraced the fanciful system of Biblical interpretation broached by John Hutchinson—who, by the way, must not be confounded with his contemporary, Francis Hutcheson, of "moral sense" celebrity. Mr. Walker very happily compares the Hutchinsonians, who held that certain "capital words" of the Hebrew Bible, considered in their root-meaning, and apart from the modern and authoritative apparatus of vowel points, contained a key to "all religion and all philosophy," to the alchemists. But the less said about an eminent man's Cock Lane ghost, the better. No doubt, as Mr. Walker points out, Hutchinsonianism exercised a powerful influence on Skinner's life and pursuits, and through him on the views of most of the Northern Episcopal Clergy of the latter half of the last century. But how many readers of this biography can be affected by, or even interested in, Hutchinsonianism now? We have noticed one or two clerical and printer's errors in this volume; and one of the latter, the description (p. 37) of Skinner's poverty immediately after marriage as res augusta domi, would have tickled the fancy of the author of The Stipendless Parson, whose own creed and practice are thus expressed:—

"In what little dealings he's forced to transact,
He determines with plainness and candour to act,
And the great point on which his ambition is set,
Is to leave at the last neither riches nor debt."

But, on the whole, Mr. Walker's biography of Skinner is an admirable one, and as carefully executed as it is admirable. He is attached to his hero, and, indeed, proud of him. He demurs to Professor Geddes's description of him as "a far-off second to Burns,"—a description which is indeed to be objected to as involving a fundamentally unsound view of Skinner's position and speciality as a Scotch poet. At the same time, Mr. Walker does not overrate Skinner, nor is he guilty of the bad taste of depreciating Skinner's contemporaries, in order to do justice to his own favourite. Mr. Walker has also shown much discrimination in giving anecdotes of Skinner. There must be thousands of stories afloat about so genuine a humourist, who lived nearly threescore years and ten in one place, and who liked conviviality in moderation. Yet Mr. Walker has published only stories that are either thoroughly verifiable, or, which is the next best thing, are thoroughly good in themselves.

The story of the poet-parson of Linshart is well worth telling in any case. It is all the more deserving of record that Skinner's is one of those morally successful but essentially anonymous lives, of which only rather special circumstances enable the world to know anything whatever. In one of his charming letters to Burns, he tells the true story of his poetical celebrity thus:—"While I was young, I dabbled a good deal in these things; but on getting the black gown, I gave it pretty much over, till my daughters grew up, who, being all tolerably good singers, plagued me for words to some of their favourite tunes, and so extorted those effusions which have made a public appearance beyond my expectations, and contrary to my intentions." This is typical of the man. Scotch and English verses were "squeezed out of him," to use his own phrase, by his daughters, or by brother-parsons. He wrote Latin poetry which some authorities have declared to be second only to Buchanan's, to amuse himself, or, as when his wife died at the age of eighty, to give expression to his feelings. It was owing to circumstances, including his own sufferings, that he became an ecclesiastical historian. From the beginning to the end of his long life of eighty-five years, John Skinner figures as the impersonation of courage and consistency. He was born in 1721, in a wild mountain parish about thirty miles from Aberdeen. His father was a Presbyterian schoolmaster, of the good old northern school of "dominies" that looked upon it as their chief business to train boys for the Aberdeen Colleges, and at one time it seemed likely that he would follow in his father's steps. He was educated at Marischal College, and did a little schoolmastering after leaving it. It was at this time, too, that he "dabbled" in verse-making. The most ambitious of his efforts were imitations of Pope, then all the rage. But he also wrote in Scotch, of it must be allowed, an archaic and even unintelligible kind. The best poetical relic of this period of Skinner's life which Mr. Walker gives us consists of two lines:—

"Say, Mercury, thou pretty little goddy, Since e'er thy speckled wings bore up thy body."

"Pretty little goddy" is very nearly as good an example of the quaint, peculiarly northern diminutive, as the ultra-Carlylian peasant's contemptuous description of the governing class in Scotland as "wee bits o' Scotch peerikies," or the lines of the Catholic priest Geddes, a contemporary of Skinner, beginning,—

"There was a wee wifeikie, was comin' frae the fair,
Had gotten a little drappikie, which bred her meikle care."

Skinner, however, for some reason which is not quite clear, abandoned Presbyterianism for Episcopalianism, knowing perfectly well the sacrifice he was making. As Mr. Walker says:

* The Life and Times of the Rev. John Skinner, M.A., of Linshart, Longside, Dean of Aberdeen, Author of "Tullochgorum," &c. By the Rev. William Walker, M.A., Monymusk. London: W. Skeffington and Son, 1883.

—"The parish school, with the parish church in the distance, vanished from his prospect at once and for ever. There was nothing to look to now but a tutorship in a family, to be followed in due time by the charge of an Episcopal congregation, furnishing congenial labour, but only a bare subsistence." Skinner became a tutor in Shetland, and married the daughter of the single Episcopal clergyman there. Nothing could have seemed more imprudent than such a marriage, but it brought Skinner the greatest happiness of his life. It even brought him promotion. The Bishop of Aberdeen, thinking that a man who was able to endure poverty was one worth giving a charge to in a troubled time, appointed him to the vacant charge of Longside, in 1742, and there he remained for sixty-five years, living in a thatched cottage named Linshart. Skinner's character was soon tested. The Rebellion of 1745 led to a persecution of the Episcopalian Clergy, then largely Jacobites, which was partly political and partly Presbyterian. Skinner was no Jacobite, but he suffered with and fought with tongue and pen for his brethren. His chapel was burned. His house was, in his absence, and while his wife was in child-bed, entered into and plundered by soldiers. Finally, having lampooned his chief enemy, a fanatical "lady of rank," and her tool, a legal officer, he was in 1753 thrown into Aberdeen prison for evading the tyrannical Penal Act of 1748, which prohibited the Episcopalian Clergy from performing public worship in any house but their own, their audiences being limited to four persons beyond their families. Six months in gaol seems to have taught Skinner caution. At all events, when he came out of prison he was not openly persecuted; and evasions of the Penal Acts became more and more common. He was still under a cloud, however; and, with an increasing family, his struggle to make both ends meet out of his poor professional pittance was keen. But he had a heart and a wit above all misfortune. He threw himself with vigour, but without bitterness, into the Episcopalian controversies of the time, such as the forgotten one about "The Usages." He wrote for the Encyclopædia Britannica. He became known as a writer of good verses in three languages, almost in spite of himself. He was famed as a delightful companion at dinner; the frugal hospitality of Linshart became the proverb of the country-side. He developed into the solicitor and doctor, as well as the preacher of his flock. He had the wisdom never to strain for more than a competence, and he never attained more. When he was in his eightieth year, a landed gentleman of his acquaintance desired to be permitted to add to his comfort. His reply was a rhymed epistle, with these lines as the key-note:—

"Death at my door, and Heaven in my eye,
From rich or great, what comfort now need I?"

Skinner lived to see the penal laws against his Church relaxed, and his favourite son Bishop of Aberdeen. In the house, and in the arms, of that son, surrounded by "three generations of his house," he passed gently away, on June 16th, 1807, at the ripe age of eighty-five. He was laid in the churchyard of Longside, by the side of her who had been his partner for fifty-eight years.

Skinner's correspondence with Burns was one of the most interesting episodes in his life, perhaps in the lives of both. It began in 1787. Burns had been rambling in the North, had been at Gordon Castle, and, without knowing it, had passed within four miles of "Tullochgorum's" residence. But in Aberdeen, and in the office of Mr. Chalmers, a printer, Burns met his son, the Bishop, who, with a naïveté which is a remarkable comment on the habits of the time, writes to his father,—"There was no help, but I must step into the inn hard by and drink a glass with him and the printer. Our time was short, as he was just setting off for the south; but we had fifty 'auld sangs' through hand, and spent an hour or so most agreeably." The Bishop, who described Burns as "a genteel-looking man, of good address, that talks with much propriety, as if he had received an academical education," duly transmitted to his father the junior poet's encomiums on "The Ewie wi' the Crookit Horn." To these Skinner responded in a rhymed letter, which Burns acknowledged as "the finest poetical compliment he ever got." It is more than that. It is, in a nutshell, one of the best criticisms on Burns that has ever been published. From both a literary and a religious point of view nothing better than this on "The Cottar's Saturday Night" has ever been said, though, unfortunately, Scotchmen only will thoroughly understand it:—

"A piece so finished and so ticht,
There's nae o' a'
Could preachment timmer cleaner dicht,
In kirk or ha'."

The question of the morality of Burns's poetry is thus disposed of with a kindly man-of-the-worldliness:—

"You've naething said that looks like blun'er
To fowk o' sense."

There is a world of meaning in the word "blun'er" as used here, and especially as coming from a man like Skinner, who could speak his mind on questions of morality freely enough when necessary, as when he told a friend of whose conduct he disapproved, and who apologised for shaking hands with his glove on,—"It's maybe the honestest leather o' the twa." In the prose correspondence which followed between the poets, Skinner's letters look decidedly better than Burns's; perhaps poor Burns was too "passion-driven" at the time to write well. Skinner never sank the moralist in the writer of unconsidered trifles, and so urged Burns, while not neglecting Scotch song, not to "sheath his own proper and piercing weapon," and on this ground:—"One lesson of virtue and morality, delivered in your amusing style and from such as you, will operate more than dozens would from such as me, who shall be told it is our employment, and be never more minded; whereas, from a pen like yours, as being one of the many, what comes will be regarded." Then, again, was ever kind hint conveyed more artistically or with less of "the preaching cant" than in these words, with which Skinner closes one of his letters,—"Wishing you from my poet-pen all success, and in my other character all happiness and heavenly direction, I remain, with esteem, your sincere friend?"

Skinner is known to the world mainly by his "Tullochgorum" and his "Ewie wi' the Crookit Horn," and surely it is not necessary at this time of day to recommend the manly philosophy of the one, the gentle pathos of the other, or the unaffected directness of both, that went to the heart and the head of Burns. We are rather glad to find Mr. Walker calling an overwhelming host of witnesses to prove that Skinner's Ewie, so tragically done to death, was a real Ewie, and not a whiskey-still captured by an exciseman, as was wickedly believed when it first appeared, and as even Professor Minto seems to have believed in 1880, when writing on Scotch minor song-writers for Mr. T. H. Ward's English Poets. Our present purpose has been to deal with Skinner chiefly as a man; his best poems are to be found in every Scotch collection. Next to "Tullochgorum" and "The Ewie" comes "John o' Badenyon," a very good example of the Christian Horatianism, which we have already referred to as Skinner's differentia as a Scotch poet. Less known is his "Lizzie Liberty," a political poem, describing the courtship of "that black-eyed wanton witch" by "Dutch Mynheer," "John Bull," and "Donald Scot." Skinner's pawky humour, practical Conservatism, and directness of style all come out in his recommendation to Donald Scot:—

"Now Donald tak' a frien's advice,
I ken fu' well ye fain wad hae her;
As ye are happy, sae be wise,
And ha'd ye wi' a smackie frae her.
Ye're wooin' at her, fain wad hae her,
Coortin' her, will maybe get her,— Bonny Lizzie Liberty, there's ow'r mony wooin' at her."

RUSSIAN LITERATURE.*

WITH this book Mr. Turner has supplied a want which has long been keenly felt by the majority of the English-reading public. For this good deed he deserves thanks. Now, at any rate, the Englishman who knows nothing of the Russian language may obtain at least a partial insight into the Russian character, and may acquire some real knowledge of Russian literature. Inasmuch, however, as the book is the only one on the subject, it becomes a duty to draw attention to its faults,—faults due, for the most part, to what might be called the author's imperfect sense of perspective. Mr. Turner has not considered sufficiently the readers for whom he writes; or, it may be more just to say, that in his selection of Russian authors he follows Russian critics with a too unhesitating confidence. To exemplify our meaning by a parallel case, we would say that Klopstock occupies a far larger place in German histories of German literature than it would be well to give him in a history meant for English readers. Yet, as Mr. Turner has read widely and attentively, seemingly, too, without bias, and has given the reasons which determined his choice of authors, his position must be considered.

* Studies in Russian Literature. By Charles Edward Turner. London: Sampson Low and Co.

Inasmuch as Peter the Great was "the first to destroy the barriers that had so long isolated Russia from the rest of Europe," Mr. Turner begins his work by tracing the influence upon the Russian nation of Peter's civilising reign, and, accordingly, his first "study" is furnished by Lomonosoff (1711-1765). Further, from the time of Peter to that of the late Czar, the great Slav people has been engaged in assimilating the fruits of the civilisation of Western Europe. Cities have been built, canals dug, railways laid, trade extended; the legislative reform which Peter inaugurated by repealing the laws which condemned woman to a position of Asiatic inferiority to man, was crowned by the law which in 1861 gave freedom to the serf. Accordingly, Mr. Turner intended "to close this volume with the name of Lermontoff (1814-1851)." This is in outline a fair statement of Mr. Turner's conception, and when we add that he intends to devote a second volume to the Russian novel-writers of the present day, to Dostoevsky, Tolstoi, Tourgénéïeff, and the others, the plan he formed may be discussed in its entirety.

In the premiss itself, we are compelled to disagree with him. Although it seems correct to say that with the reign of Peter the Great, and with the leaving-off of the caftan, Russia severed her connection with Asia, and began her career as a European nation; yet, as a matter of fact, the civilising influence was felt only by the nobility, and showed itself, even in the highest circles, only in a servile imitation of foreign habits, chiefly those of France. The nobles spoke French better than they spoke Russian, and some of them made it their boast that they did not even understand their mother-tongue. When this is considered together with the state of education and the conditions of life of all the other classes of the people, it is manifest that no literature worthy of the name could have come into being under such circumstances.

Now, this conviction of ours of the unimportance of Russian literature in the last century was only strengthened by reading Mr. Turner's book. It would have been a mistake, we think, in any case to have criticised writers who, at their best, merely reproduce the ideas of Western Europe, and who, at their worst, loudly proclaim themselves superior to their teachers; but to do this in a book meant for the general public—and that public one of a different nationality—is to commit a serious error of judgment. For this error in the plan necessitates a similar disproportion in the treatment of the individual writers. For instance, we cannot agree with Alsakoff, whom Mr. Turner quotes approvingly, when he writes that "Lomonosoff is the one true source of Russian literary activity." Even Poushkin, the greatest Russian authority, acknowledges that "in the poetry of Lomonosoff there is neither feeling nor imagination;" and an Englishman may therefore be pardoned for saying that a bombastical expression of commonplace morality is anything one may choose to call it, but is not poetry. Again, Mr. Turner speaks of Derzhavin's Ode to God as world-famous. Now, this adjective would be out of place were it applied to Wordsworth's Ode on Immortality, but when verses are said to be world-famous which are hardly better than those of Mr. Robert Montgomery, the truth of the saying, "Qui dit trop, ne dit rien," is exemplified. In short, the first hundred-and-thirty pages of this book might have been compressed into ten with advantage.

From the present point of view, Russia belongs to Europe since the campaigns of Napoleon. With the national triumph, a pride in all things Russian sprang up; the despotism of French culture was thrown off, and the Russian language gradually took the place of French even in polite society. Now, for the first time, the stilts are discarded, the Russian trusts himself upon his own feet; the writer dares to be natural. True, he does not yet know his peculiar powers, has not yet discovered the real bent of his genius,—which may, indeed must, lead him to quite other tasks than those of artistic or literary production; but now at least the Slav writer, in revealing frankly his own nature, finds something characteristic to say, and we can afford to listen. In the life of one man we can follow this change. Everything written by Kriloff in the eighteenth century is worthless; the dramas he then wrote he himself afterwards burlesqued in Prince Trumpe, and Pletneff showed critical acumen when he wrote, "Krilloff was first born to us in his fortieth year." Kriloff was forty years of age when, in 1809, he published his first volume of fables, and with these fables Russian literature begins. Now, too, several men whose talents cannot be denied, and one or two of whom may be said to possess genius, came to the front as writers. Kriloff, Poushkin, Gogol, Kolzoff, and Lermontoff were contemporaries, and the period of their literary activity lies between 1810 and 1850. As a critic of these authors, Mr. Turner leaves less to be desired; yet while desiring to give him all credit, we must, against our will, revise some of his verdicts, and place some of the writers in a different light. We have already done this in part as regards Kriloff, and it remains for us to draw attention to the distinguishing feature of his fables; many of them embody social lessons. One instance of this may be given:—"In 'The General Assembly,' the fox persuades the lion to install his relation the wolf as guardian of the sheep. With this arrangement all the other animals are satisfied, except the sheep, who were not consulted, although their opinion should first of all have been asked." This, Mr. Turner rightly says, is "the happiest of Kriloff's compositions," and from this it can be seen that the worth of these fables is chiefly relative. Yet it is no small merit to have been the first of Russian writers who was neither bombastical nor sentimental; it is noteworthy, too, that as soon as national feeling awoke in Russia, literature came to be looked upon as the means to a social reform. After Kriloff, we should wish to consider Poushkin, instead of taking Gogol, as Mr. Turner does. For Poushkin, like Kriloff, was an innovator, although a far more powerful and successful one. In Poushkin "the return to nature" is best exemplified. He has been called the Russian Byron, and the comparison has much to say for itself, although the Englishman is incomparably the greater. Both were of high birth, and both are memorable chiefly because of their personal initiative. Byron, we know, always praised Pope and Dryden, and his favourites exercised an unhappy influence upon all his earlier writings. So, too, in Poushkin the "return to nature" was not quite complete. As regards the expression, nothing more could be wished,—easy, natural, vigorous, his style is still a model; but, as regards the spirit, he does not—we say it with all respect for Mr. Turner's different opinion—he does not represent the centre current of Russian feeling and thought as completely as does Gogol. For an analysis of Poushkin's works, versified romances, dramas, &c., we must refer the reader to Mr. Turner's book.

Gogol we take to be the most characteristically Russian writer of this period, the best representative of the Slav genius. Whoever wishes to see what life in Russia was like before the abolition of serfdom, must go to his works. The best criticism of his novels may be found in an exclamation made by Poushkin after hearing Gogol read the first chapters of his Dead Souls (a serf was called a "soul" in Russia). "God, how miserable life is in Russia!" Gogol drew from life, and left portraits not likely to fade; the gloom of his pictures is relieved by touches of exquisite tenderness and no less perfect humour. His humour was delicate and tender at the same time; its value can scarcely be exaggerated; herein Gogol surpasses Dickens, to whom he has, with some reason, been compared.

There is yet another side of Gogol's character, which, reflected as it is in his writings, makes him, perhaps, the most interesting figure in all Russian literature to the English reader, we mean the nature of his religious enthusiasm, for "belief" were here too weak a word. It is this quality of his nature which is so distinctively and peculiarly Russian. Note how Gogol, when without a dinner for three or four days together, still denied himself in order to aid the destitute. Nor did riches when they came change his temper; he always found it "more blessed to give than to receive." Now, this is a strange creed to put into practice, and it is not to be wondered at that Mr. Turner speaks of the Russian's "unhealthy sensitiveness," of his "want of moderation in belief," of "unreasoning excess in thought and action," &c. The critic here betrays his English origin; he will not or cannot see in this immoderate and passionate longing for self-sacrifice anything good; yet this is the peculiar power of the Russian mind. The Englishman finds much to approve of in an immoderate and unreasoning love of what he is pleased to call "freedom," but his strong selfishness condemns self-sacrifice. His ideal is ever a Greatheart, who "takes the kingdom of Heaven by storm," rather than a St. Francis. It may seem strange to say it, yet it must be said that the true expression of the Russian genius will be found either in a new form of society or in a new birth in religion. For the Slav knows no hesitation in converting theory into practice; the ideal is to him the only reality. From this ecstatic love of the ideal springs a scarcely less passionate self-contempt. Gogol burns the manuscript of the latter portion of his greatest work, and prays that his writings may be forgotten as "the products of a pitiable vanity." Now, when this feeling is manifested, as in Gogol's Correspondence with My Friends, Mr. Turner "can only regard the book as the production of a disordered and enfeebled intellect." Well, here are the two poles of feeling; may not the critic add that the Englishman, if he desire perfection, will yet have to learn of the Russian, or better still, will yet have to assimilate the New Testament as he has already assimilated the Old?

Want of space forbids us to speak of Kolzoff, who has been called the Russian Burns, and with Mr. Turner, we refer those who wish to know of him to an article in the Fortnightly Review for September, 1866. As for Lermontoff, we can only say that Mr. Turner has on the whole done him justice. With the freeing of the serf in 1861 a new era began, the outcome of which cannot yet be seen. The poetry of Nekrasoff—for an analysis of whose works we must refer the reader to Mr. Turner's book—belongs to both periods, and for this reason he might be compared to Kriloff. The best writers, however, of to-day in Russia are all novelists, as was Gogol, and the works of Dostoevsky, Tolstoi, and Tourgénéff bear witness in every line to the influence of the master. Had Mr. Turner considered this, he would have made Gogol rather than Poushkin his chief study. It would, too, have been better had Mr. Turner handled Russian literature in one volume, beginning it with Kriloff and ending it with Tourgénéff or Tolstoi. Yet his book as it stands is no unimportant contribution to the knowledge of a subject too frequently neglected in England, and we can do no less than thank its author. We shall look forward with increased eagerness to the forthcoming of the supplementary volume Mr. Turner has promised us, if he will but bear in mind that saying of Goethe—no doubt, well known to him also—"The extraordinary man alone is of real benefit to mankind." This canon, at any rate, should guide the literary historian.

POLAR EXPEDITIONS.*

WHEN the history of the nineteenth century comes to be written by an impartial Lecky of the twenty-fifth century, it is a matter of curious speculation to think what he will say about Polar Expeditions. For they stand apart from other geographical researches. A Livingstone travels through Africa, an Audubon and an Agassiz through South America, and they bring back, at the cost of some labour and risk to life and limb, records of countries which may, at some time, serve as outlets for colonisation or commerce. At all events, science is enriched by the discovery of unknown plants, and animals, and natural phenomena. But when the cost and the gain of expeditions to the Poles have been weighed, what will be the estimate of our historian of the future? Will he class them with the Crusades, the Alpine adventures of Whymper and Freshfield, and the ballooning expeditions of Captains Powell and Burnaby, or will he compare them with the voyages of Vasco de Gama, Columbus, and Magellan? To our minds, since the time that the East and North-West Passages have been proved to be practically impassable, these attempts to reach the Pole have involved a reckless waste of valuable lives. It may be answered that the value of knowledge is not to be measured by its usefulness, and that the discovery of the fact that thousands of square miles are covered by hummocks of ice is worth the lives of such men as Franklin and De Long. But we maintain that there are others whose interests ought to be considered as well as those of the men who are tempted, by a love of the unknown and of peril for its own sake, to brave the awful climate, and the terrible suffering which is almost inevitable in Arctic exploration. What of the mothers, the sisters, and the wives who are left behind, and who have to wait with patient anxiety for years without a word from those whom they love? It seems that the only way by which a minimum of sorrow could be ensured, would be to pass a law that none but orphan widowers without children should be allowed to start for the Arctic or Antarctic Pole.

In the volume called Icepack and Tundra, we have the experiences of a ship's crew who were sent from San Francisco to search for the survivors of the ill-fated 'Jeannette.' An object such as this secures our sympathy, which is not lessened by the discovery of the remains of De Long and his party, and the fragments of a diary, in which these are the closing entries:—

"Friday, Oct. 14.—Breakfast, willow-tea. Dinner, half-teaspoon of sweet oil, and willow-tea. Alexia shot one ptarmigan; had soup. S.W. wind moderating. Sat., Oct. 15.—Breakfast, willow-tea and two old boots; conclude to move at sunrise. Alexia broken down also. Lee came to an empty grain-raft. Halt and camp. Signs of smoke at twilight. Alexia dying. Doctor baptised him. Read prayers for sick. Collins's birthday, 40 years. About sunset Alexia died; exhaustion from starvation."

"Friday, Oct. 21.—Lee died. Kaach found dead about midnight, between doctor and myself. Read prayers for sick when we found he was going. Sat.—Too weak to carry the bodies of Lee and Kaach out on the ice. The doctor, Collins, and myself carried them round the corner out of sight. Then my eyes closed up. 133 day.—Everybody pretty weak. Slept or rested to-day, and managed to get enough wood in before dark. Read part of divine service. Suffering in our feet; no foot-gear."

"138th day.—Iverson died during early morning. 139.—Dressler died during the night. 140.—Boyd and Gaertz died during the night. Mr. Collins dying." "There," says Mr. Gilder, "the diary stops. When I had read it, I tried to tell the Comack what it was, but I could not speak. In many passages of the narrative I recognised experiences of my own. For the first time in my life, I found it impossible to restrain my emotion before strangers, and buried my face in my hands for 10 or 15 minutes."

It is after the discovery of these remains that the real interest of Mr. Gilder's volume commences. The first three chapters are occupied with a description of the voyage from San Francisco to Petropaulovski, on the Kamtschatka coast. It is not generally known that an attempt was made during the Crimean war to take possession of this far-off seaport by the combined fleets of England and France, consisting of six frigates. It is difficult to see what the English Government expected to gain by this foolish attempt, which resulted in the defeat of the allies, with a loss of 120 men and most of the officers. The result of the Rodgers expedition was hardly more successful. After exploring Wrangel Island, which lies to the north-west of Siberia, and which contains nothing of any interest to the geologist, the botanist, or the naturalist, the captain had the misfortune to lose his ship by fire, while anchored off Behring Straits, and the remainder of the expedition had to be performed by means of sledges and boats.

Beyond a few touches of humorous description, we find but little to notice in Mr. Gilder's narrative. The Tchouktchis, as the people on the northern coast of Siberia are called, resemble the other folk of the Polar regions in their appearance and habits of life. We seem to have read about the bears and the seals and the reindeer tents before; yet a word may be said for the illustrations, which are rough, but suggestive, some being taken from photographs and others from sketches by the author.

With chapter nineteen the journal of De Long begins, and though it has no scientific interest, one cannot help admiring the undaunted perseverance and courage of the crew, who, after the crushing of the 'Jeannette' between masses of ice, found themselves on a barren island, with many leagues of broken ice and water between themselves and the mainland. How the sledges were packed, how the camp was formed, how one after another fell sick and had to be helped by his companions, how again and again the treacherous ice-floes gave way and all but engulfed the whole party, is told with the direct simplicity of a Defoe, and one feels ashamed to ask, cui bono? in the face of such heroism and unselfishness.

There is deep pathos in the account which Mr. Gilder gives of Ninderman and Norss, two men who were sent forward by De Long in the faint hope of procuring assistance. They arrived with great difficulty at Kumak Sera, on the mouth of the Lena, where they tried in vain to explain their errand:—

"Sometimes it seemed as if they understood him [Ninderman] perfectly, and at others he felt convinced that they had not understood a single thing he had told them. During the entire day, he kept talking to them by signs and illustrations on paper, but without avail. The next day he renewed his efforts, and resorted to every expedient to make them understand him. He did not ask them to go alone, but wanted them to go with him. Prostrated by famine and exposure, and weakened by dysentery, he was in no fit condition to undertake such a task, but his anxiety was so great that he felt constrained to go. This day, as on the day previous, he at times thought he had been understood, and again that it had been all a blank to them. They would sigh and look distressed when he described the sufferings and condition of the party on the delta; but when he urged that assistance should be sent to them, the faces of his hearers were totally devoid of expression. He then thought of his companions as dead or dying, looking to his return as their only hope of deliverance. Weakened by fatigue, exposure, and famine, and feeling how utterly powerless he was, when so much depended on him, the terrible strain was too much for him, and this strong, brave man, who had faced death and endured unknown hardships without a quiver, sank into a corner and cried like a child."

On turning from this sad narrative to the map at the end of the book, it is difficult to realise that such scenes of desolation could be found within such easy reach of civilisation.

Mr. Gilder relates his return journey, viâ Irkutsk and Tomsk, in a pleasant way, and we take leave of him at Nishni Novgorod, with thanks for his interesting volume.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

Coleridge's Ancient Mariner. Illustrated by David Scott, R.S.A. With Life of the Artist, and Descriptive Notices of the Plates, by Rev. A. L. Simpson, D.D. (Nelson and Sons.)—The memoir of David Scott is an interesting, but melancholy biography. Scott was not appreciated in his life-time. His art, in truth, was of a kind that seldom is appreciated. The patrons who foster High Art are, and indeed, must be, few, and it was to this that Scott was devoted. Dr. Simpson thinks that the Scottish public were peculiarly blind; but the life of Haydon, though Haydon was probably inferior to Scott, affords a curious parallel. "The magnificent picture of Vasco di Gama . . . was exhibited in the Calton Convening Room. Very few went to see it, and its exhibition entailed a pecuniary loss of nearly £80." This might be an extract from Haydon's life. The designs for the Ancient Mariner were executed at the age of twenty-six. Finely imagined they are, and some are remarkably effective; but we can imagine that they would not please a very large public, especially more than thirty years ago.

Gray's Elegy, Artist's Edition. (J. B. Lippincott and Co., Philadelphia, U.S.; John Stark, London.)—This volume is adorned with some twenty illustrations of landscape and figures, not unworthy in design of the poem of which they are the companions, and engraved with all the skill and effect in which the art of America is, in this respect, pre-eminent. We may mention two excellent samples of the illustrations, two that occur on successive pages,—“How jocund did they drive their team a-field” (though the faces are scarcely English), drawn by Harry Poore and engraved by H. Heineman; and “The paths of glory lead but to the grave,” drawn by F. S. Church and engraved by Arthur Hayman.

Prince Pertinax: a Fairy Tale. By Mrs. George Hooper. Illustrated by Margaret L. Hooper and Margery May. (Field and Tuer.)—Mrs. Hooper's tale, first published, though not quite in its present form, twenty years ago, in the Monthly Packet, is excellent. It has its moral, as one might guess from the name, but it is gently suggested, and never obtruded. And it is full of delicate fancy; altogether, in fact, a really good fairy tale,—not an easy thing at all to write, if we may judge from the many unsuccessful attempts that even clever people make. The illustrations, executed in sepia, and skilfully reproduced, are very pleasing, and, indeed, something more than pleasing. The “Enchanted Forest,” which is the head-piece of the tale, is particularly good. The effect of depth in the wood is an admirable piece of perspective, and the figures are effective. The “Diversion of the Fairy King and Queen,” on p. 19, is equally good, and indeed, considering the grasping of the numerous figures, even better. We may also mention the landscapes on pp. 63 and 81, one with its weird, and the other with its cheerful effect, as worthy of praise.

Crawhall's Chap-Book Chaplets (Field and Tuer) is a quaint revival of the ballads, with their rude coloured engravings, which delighted an older generation. Of these ballads there are eight, “The Barkeshire Lady,” “Jemmy and Nancy, of Yarmouth,” “Blue-cap for Me,” and “George Barnewall” being among them. Mr. Crawhall has been wonderfully successful in giving us an imitation of his models. As he finds a public which appreciates his pains and skill, we shall not be ungracious enough to inquire whether they are wisely expended.

When is Your Birthday? A Year of Good Wishes. A Set of Twelve Designs, by Edwin J. Ellis, with Sonnets by the Artist. (Field and Tuer.)—Mr. Ellis has given us twelve female heads, illustrating the months of the year, naturally unequal in merit, but some of them, notably “May,” very pleasing. “June,” on the other hand, is scarcely satisfactory. The sonnets we like much, and take leave to quote the one which is set as preface:—

“We cannot wish away the wings of Time,
Nor bind them by the power of our hand,
Nor bid the Sun and Moon to hear and stand;
But we can welcome change with merry chime,
And bid each other hope from prime to prime,
And turn Time's hour-glass pile of rising sand
By labour into light and fruitful land,
And lighten labour with a laughing rhyme.
Then shall each month begin a change desired,
For saving to desire him is no way
To take the sword from Change, the never-tired,
Who loves us never; while from day to day,
Over the noise of work our voice above,
Wording weak wishes may declare strong love.”

A word of notice must be given to the quaint and, we should suppose, quite novel binding.

The Butterfly's Ball and the Grasshopper's Feast, by Mr. Roscoe; and The Elephant's Ball and Grand Fête Champêtre, by “W. D.” (Griffith and Farran), are fac-simile reproductions of the editions of 1808 and 1807, published by “J. Harris, successor to E. Newbery, at the Original Juvenile Library, the Corner of St. Paul's Church-yard.” Mr. Charles Welsh, who gave to the public a similar reproduction of “Goody Two-Shoes” last year, and met with the appreciation which his work deserved, tells us in his introduction the story of these two little books. The “Butterfly's Ball”—a poem of graceful fancy by an eminent man who did great services to his country—was the first and most famous of the series, which had for a time a great success (even in these days forty thousand copies would be thought something). It is interesting to learn that the illustrations were early works of William Mulready. Mulready, indeed, began, Mr. Welsh tells us, to draw very early. Some of his work done at three and four years of age was published.

Told in the Twilight. By F. E. Weatherly. Illustrated by M. E. Edwards and J. C. Staples. (Hildesheimer and Faulkner.)—Both verses and illustrations are pleasing. “Minnie Counting her Chickens,” on p. 27, and “The Unappreciative Kitten”) she declines to admire a sunflower) may be mentioned; but we like the borders of the pages better than the coloured full-page pictures.

The Little Birdies, by Agnes Giberne, with drawings by Robert Barnes (Religious Tract Society), is a touching little tale of a family of orphans, fitly illustrated by some well executed wood engravings.

The Maids of Lee, written by F. E. Weatherly, illustrated by W. I. Hodgson (Hildesheimer and Faulkner), is decidedly good. The various suitors are depicted with pleasant humour in some good drawings, to which the verse supplies a suitable accompaniment.

From Messrs. Routledge we get R. Caldecott's Hey-Diddle-Diddle Picture-Book, containing the four rhymes, “Where are you going, my Pretty Maid?” “Hey, Diddle, Diddle,” “The Fox Jumped over the Parson's Gate,” and “Froggie's Wooing,” illustrated in the style which has had such a well-deserved success.

From the same publishers we also get “Phiz's” Funny Alphabet, “Phiz's” Funny Stories, and “Phiz's” Baby Sweethearts, the last not being much to our taste.

The Nodding Mandarin: a Tragedy in China, edited by Lewis F. Day (Simpkin and Marshall), is a tale in verse, somewhat after the manner of Hans Christian Andersen, of two china figures, a chimney-sweep and a shepherdess, that sought to escape from a third, “a nodding mandarin.” We did not find either pictures or verse particularly amusing.

Three Blind Mice, with music and words from an early edition, illustrated by C. A. Doyle (George Waterston), sufficiently describes itself.

From the same publishers we have Robin! Robin! a song by the well-known writer of songs, Alfred Scott Gatty.

The Truant Hares and their Friends, by Arthur S. Gibson (Griffith and Farran), is another moderately successful book, the illustrations being, perhaps, better than the letterpress.

We give a hearty welcome to Miss Kate Greenaway's very pretty illustrations of Little Anne, and other Poems. By Jane and Anne Taylor. (Routledge and Sons.)—“Little Anne” and its companions have held their place in many nurseries, and this volume will give double pleasure to the little ones, when it comes to refresh, with its charming designs and finely-harmonised colouring, these familiar rhymes. They will hear with new pleasure, more or less, as the case may be, of the happiness of “The Good-natured Girls” and the fate of “Meddlesome Matty.”—We must not forget to mention the prettily designed Kate Greenaway's Calendars for 1884, of which we have three before us, ornamented with two, four, and twelve figures respectively, representing Summer and Winter, the Seasons, and the Months.

POETRY.—A Volume of Poems, by G. W. Bettany (London Literary Society), is perhaps best criticised by an extract. Here are two stanzas from the “Battle of Tel-el-Kebir:”—

“On they go to death or glory,
Trampling on rebellious sand—
Moving phalanxes of soldiers,
Mystic in a mystic land.”
“Close to where the deadly trenches
Threaten dire destruction round,
There, these gallant British fellows,
Lay themselves upon the ground.”

“Mystic in a mystic land” is fine, though appropriately obscure, but scarcely harmonises with “gallant British fellows.” Mr. Bettany essays Latin also, and among other elegancies has “Casum de superis decus,” intended apparently for a “glory fallen from heaven;” and even Greek, which we would reproduce, if the eccentricities of his pointing did not forbid. From the same publisher we get another volume, Poems, by Howard Deazeley, M.A.

This is certainly of somewhat better quality. The first poem, "King and Widow," is an exercise in the heroic couplet which might take a school prize, but is not up to the University level, (may we conjecture that it is part of a larger poem on the subject of "Elijah?") and throughout the volume Mr. Deazeley shows some facility of expression and sense of melody.—Two Fancies. By William Graham (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.)—The subject of the principal poem of this volume is the vagary of a poet who breaks the heart of a country girl who loves him, and then falls in love with the statue of Ariadne. The statue tells her story, thus raising a curious resemblance, which we must own does not reach far, between the Two Fancies and Catullus's "Epithalamium" of Peleus and Thetis, in which also the loves of Ariadne are an episode of somewhat disproportionate length. Mr. Graham calls himself a "Byronian," and he has studied his model with this good effect, that he constructs his verse with tolerable skill. But he wants the vis viva ingenii which no study will give. Here is a specimen:—

"Yes, once I loved and trusted; my reward
Was such as women ever reap from those Whom best they love,—first false, sweet, passionate words,
But only words; then passion wanes, and then Comes coldness, weariness, desertion, death,
Or, worse than mortal death,—'tis death of all Noblest in man or woman, death of all
Faith, hope, and love,—a cruel, blasting blight
Of all the affections, turning flesh to stone
As this, my image now; and thus I died
When Theseus left me lone, ere yet I learned To scorn both him and thee and all mankind."

—The Blind Canary. By Hugh Farrar M'Dermott. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.)—This is a second edition, "revised, with additions." Surely, the second line in the following couplet savours of addition, rather than revision?—

"And her thoughts have silent nursing, and her soul a silent grief, But her tear is the bier on which her sorrow finds relief."

Tears perform many functions in poetry; but they can hardly in any region of thought, be biers. Of Mr. M'Dermott's ordinary mood, this is a sample:—

"In souls a-lull
The light burns dull,
Nor fires consume the peaceful breast;
But thoughts at strife
With this dark life
Supply the flames that never rest."

—Poems and Ballads, by Pryce Gwynne (T. Fisher Unwin), have so little that is remarkable about them that we are fain to ask what is meant by a "temptress" (p. 32). "Temptress, you have done me wrong," exclaims the poet, confusing, it would seem, in his passion, a "temptress" with a "sempstress."—Laurence Hardiker, &c., by John Harrison (Cornish Brothers, Birmingham), consists of a tedious story in irregular metre, and a play which we have not had the courage to attempt. It was impossible, after a thousand lines or so of this kind:—

"And after many a vain endeavour
From one another's heart to sever,
And many a softly lingering sigh,
And hesitating, fond good-bye,
And loving look, whose magic power
Exceeded the language of an hour:
And one more kiss—and yet one more,
Sweeter the last than that before—
The loving pair, so joyful-hearted,
At length from their embraces parted."

From whose embraces?

The Land of Fetish. By Captain A. B. Ellis. (Chapman and Hall.)—Captain Ellis has nothing very complimentary to say about African kings, or colonial governors, or missionaries. These last are indeed his special abhorrence. The negro Christianized is a negro spoilt; converted, on the other hand, to the faith of Mahommed, he is changed very much for the better. In fact, our author thinks, Christianity does not suit the negro. Of course, evidence of this kind, coming, as it does, from one who has been on the spot, deserves attention; but it does not come with any strong a priori claim to belief. Missionaries, like all other enthusiasts—for a missionary, to be worth his salt, must be an enthusiast—are commonly hated and slandered. Apart from this doubtful point, there is plenty of information, and some possibly good information, in "The Land of Fetish."

NEW EDITIONS.—We have received the following:—The ninth edition of Professor Craik's Manual of English Literature, with a chapter on "Recent Literature," by H. Craik, M.A.—Words and their Uses, by R. Grant White (Sampson Low and Co.), the sixth edition, revised and corrected.—A fourth and enlarged edition of W. R. S. Ralston's translation of Krifol and his Fables, containing nearly the whole of the original ones.—A new edition, in two volumes, of Sir Bernard Burke's Vicissitudes of Families.—Second editions of Links and Clues, by the Hon. Lady Welby-Gregory (Macmillan and Co.); and Parker's Index and Digest of the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts and Rules.—Cheap editions of Mr. F. G. Heath's Peasant Life in the West of England (Sampson Low and Co.); and Burnham Beeches (Rider and Sons).—A new edition of W. Clark Russell's story, Little Loo.—Christmas Entertainments, an addition to the reprints, &c., published in the "Vellum Parchment Series," by Messrs. Field and Tuer.—The Culture of Vegetables and Flowers, by Messrs. Sutton and Sons, (Hamilton, Adams, and Co.)

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A DISASTER which may prove of most grave importance, both to England and France, has happened in the Soudan. Colonel Hicks, a retired Bombay officer in the employ of the Egyptian Government, was recently made Commander-in-Chief in the Soudan, and ordered to defeat the Mahdi, or False Prophet, and take El Obeid, the capital of Kordofan. Ten thousand men, relics of the old Egyptian Army, supplied with Remington rifles and Nordenfeldt cannon, were assembled at Khartoum, and with them he ascended the Nile Valley to Duem, whence he struck westward into the Desert, intending to reach El Obeid by a route reported to have some water. He is reported to have marched for about thirty days under incessant attack from cavalry, and with his animals dying, until on November 2nd he was attacked by the Mahdi's whole force, known to be large, but preposterously stated at 300,000 men. No such number could be fed, but the attack lasted three days, the Egyptians could get no water, and on the 4th inst. the worn-out squares were broken, and the whole Army put to the sword, or carried away into slavery. The remaining detachments of Egyptians scattered over the huge province fled to Khar-toum, and as a small force near Suakim is known to have been destroyed a few days before, and the British Consul killed, it is certain that the whole Soudan is lost to Egypt, and in arms for the Mahdi, who has thousands of followers in and near Khar-toum itself.

The Egyptians apply the rather absurd name of "the Soudan" to the whole of their dependent Empire, stretching from the Third Cataract for an indefinite distance towards the Lakes, and from the Red Sea to the western border of Darfur. The empire comprises much of Nubia, all Sennaar, all Kordofan, and all Darfur, and though lightly held, is a subject of great pride to Egyptians. It is really of any length and any breadth that the Pashas can reach; but if we consider it to be 1,000 miles by 1,000, or as large as India, we shall hardly exaggerate. There are probably 12,000,000 of people within it, most of them Mussulmans of a sort, with an "upper class" of Arabs, and "mulattoes," that is, descendants of Arabs and negro women, who have a quite exceptional daring and ferocity. They charge in particular, as the rather mythical "Ghazees" are supposed to do, with the intention of earning Paradise. If the Mahdi has any skill, he may make a formidable army of these men, for muskets are forwarded to him from the great Mussulman monasteries, and he has now secured at least 12,000 Remington rifles and thirty Nordenfeldt guns. His difficulty will not be means of transport, for by using and expending hordes of slaves he can carry all that a moderate army eating only flour will need. His name is Mahommed Ahmed, and though probably a half-caste Arab, he claims to be of the Prophet's direct descendants. He will be held to have proved his claim by victory.

General Hicks was accompanied by nine English officers, holding different commands; by Mr. O'Donovan, the able correspondent of the Daily News; and by an artist employed by a German illustrated paper, who is, we have some impression, an Englishman. This artist has escaped, but the fate of the remainder is nearly certain. We would fain not extinguish hope, but the ride of a European in flight from El Obeid to Duem would be almost a miraculous feat, and the Mahdi has ordered the slaughter of all Christians, including, we suspect, all Copts. The only chance for any European present in the battle would be that he might be taken before the Mahdi, and used by him as an interpreter in communications with British officers. The fear, however, of Europeans is excessive, the slave-traders are wild with hatred, and we fear the hope, if there be one, of any white men escaping, is wretchedly slight. Still, men of resource and energy have survived worse dangers, and an Arab never quite ignores the fact that a captive may be worth a sum of money.

M. Ferry is unlucky. We have just mentioned elsewhere the great stake held by France in this affair, and may add here that Mahommed Ahmed was reported months ago to be in full communication with the chiefs of the great monastic societies whose stations extend south of Tunis to an indefinite depth into Africa. If that is true, and it is most probable, the defeat of General Hicks will arouse the fanaticism of all North Africa, and probably bring the tribes at once into the field. The French will do well to expect a general and a formidable insurrection, and especially an invasion of Tunis from the great tribes which retreated a year ago into Tripoli, there to await their chance. It is by no means impossible—it is rather possible, so closely is the world bound now—that General Hicks, in resolving on his audacious march into Equatorial Africa, saved Tonquin to the Chinese Empire and the Hovas from subjugation.

Mr. W. E. Forster presided yesterday week at an aggregate meeting of the Metropolitan Liberal Councils at the Cannon-Street Hotel, and made an excellent speech on the necessity for a reform of the present government of London, which he characterised as absolutely intolerable, and proved to be inconsistent with all those municipal changes most urgently needed, such as the proper organisation of the water supply and the rehousing of the poor. Mr. Forster believed that both the County Franchise Bill and the Government of London Bill would be introduced on the first night of next Session, the one by the Prime Minister and the other by the Home Secretary, and he thought that the Government of London Bill might very well be submitted to a Grand Committee. He asked for a fair representation of London under the Redistribution Bill, and explained that by a fair representation he meant nearly tripling its representation,—that is, raising it from 22 to 64; but surely that is a "counsel of perfection." Considering the enormous indirect influence of London on the House of Commons, London might well be contented with double its present representation. Mr. Forster was strongly in favour of the representation of minorities, but not of the present three-cornered system. He appeared to incline, as we do, to the subdivision of great electorates, at least, in such a place as London.

The Tories are evidently going to resist the Municipal Bill for London with their whole strength. The Lord Mayor, a typical Tory, on Monday made to the Turners' Company the bold and foolish speech criticised elsewhere, in which he denounced any project for fusing London into a whole; and on Thursday Lord Salisbury, at the City Carlton Club, said nearly the same thing. The Marquis declares that London is not a city, but an agglomeration of towns, and that there "is scarcely any community of interest between the extreme East and West ends of the Metropolis,"—a very rash assertion, as he will see, if ever the "ugly rush" comes. He repudiated altogether the idea that a Municipality would be powerful in proportion to its bigness, and held that unpaid members would not attend to such a mass of work. "When you rely, as you must rely in the main, on unpaid labour, it is a great mistake to tax it with too vast an area of duty. Men who have other occupations can only devote a certain portion of their leisure to the performance of these public duties. Give them a small amount to do, and they will do it well. Give them an excessive amount to do, and they will delegate it to their professional advisers." Why does not Lord Salisbury show the courage of his opinions, and propose to revive the Heptarchy, like a man? Members of Parliament are unpaid, and, on his showing, if England were divided into seven, the business of each division would be seven times as well done. We can understand the argument that the London Municipality will be too strong for the safety of Parliament, but not the one that it will be too weak to do its work. What is its work, compared with the work of the United Kingdom?

Lord Salisbury, after condemning the course taken by the Ministry in the matter of the Suez Canal, which he said left not only a financial monopoly, but a political monopoly to M. Lesseps (who does not, nevertheless, own the Cape route), devoted the rest of his speech to the danger to property arising from Liberal legislation. He maintained that the Irish Land Act was a robbery, that it had stopped the flow of capital to Ireland and the flow of emigration out of Ireland, and that it had produced an outbreak of those doctrines which are hostile to the existence of property. "You have heard of them in Scotland; you have heard of them in England; you have heard of them from the mouths of the Ministers themselves. You have heard Sir C. Dilke telling you that the whole population of this country were adverse to the rights of property. You have heard Mr. Chamberlain speaking of the owners of property as people who 'toil not, neither do they spin,' comparing them therein to the lilies of the field, and bestowing upon them a compliment which, I am bound to say, they do not deserve." Mr. Chamberlain's speech we remember, though we fancy his lilies were the Peers; but the allusion to Sir Charles Dilke is absolutely unintelligible. Did he ever say that Englishmen wished to abolish punishment for theft? Lord Salisbury denies that the defence of property is the only business of Tories, but obviously, when he himself looks abroad upon politics, "Proputty, proputty, proputty, that's what he hears un say."

The Nationalist candidate was returned for Limerick yesterday week by a crushing majority over the Conservative. The poll was,—Mr. M'Mahon (Nationalist), 922; Mr. Spaight (Conservative), 473; majority, 449, or very nearly a majority of two to one. It seems clear enough that Mr. Parnell can beat the Conservatives in almost any part of the three Southern Provinces of Ireland, and very probable that in most parts of those Provinces he could beat the Conservatives and Liberals combined. But it is not in many places that Conservatives and Liberals will combine. Why should a steady supporter of the present Government vote for a Member who would try to turn the present Government out, and to enforce a Tory policy in Ireland? And how could a supporter of Lord Salisbury's policy for Ireland honestly vote for the Government which has passed the Irish Land Act? The only reasonable hope for Ireland is that the Nationalist party will gradually give up its dreams, and accept defeat on that policy of dismemberment on which it can never prevail against the unanimous feeling of Great Britain.

The Liberals have lost York by a narrow majority. The vote for Mr. Milner (Conservative), was 3,948; for Mr. Lockwood (Liberal), 3,927; majority, 21. The poll of the Conservative is eleven less than that polled by Mr. James Lowther at the general election. The poll of Mr. Lockwood is 578 less than the poll of Mr. Creyke,—the highest Liberal,—at the last election. In other words, the Liberals have lost much ground, the Conservatives hardly any. York has never been a very pure constituency, and the falling-off in the Liberal vote is chiefly due, we believe, to the irritation of the publicans, the canvassers, and so forth, at the stringency of the Corrupt Practices Act.

Mr. R. Murray Smith, Agent-General for Victoria, has made an able attempt to "draw" Lord Derby upon the annexation of New Guinea and the Western Pacific Islands, but has not quite succeeded. Mr. Murray Smith asked to be informed on what conditions the Queen's Government would permit annexation; whether, if the Australian Colonies became federated, annexation would be allowed; and whether an estimate could be made of the cost of strengthening the hands of the High Commissioner in the Western Pacific. Lord Derby declines to estimate the cost of that measure, and for the rest, his reply is summed up in the following statement:—"If the colonies should decide either upon confederation or upon united action, in regard to this particular question, there would undoubtedly be much less difficulty than at present in arranging for the transfer to them of the obligations of this country in respect of neighbouring native communities; but it is not possible to say, without full consideration of the manner in which the confederated colonies would propose to discharge their obligations, whether annexation could be agreed to." Australia may, we think, rely upon it that, if she becomes a Dominion, she may pursue any foreign policy she pleases, subject only to the rider that it shall not involve a certainty of war with a European Power.

M. Challeml-Lacour has at last resigned the Foreign Ministry of France, and has been succeeded by M. Jules Ferry. There never probably was a Minister about whom opinion was so unanimous. M. Challeml-Lacour, by the consent alike of friends and enemies, is a man of great or even splendid gifts, a philosopher and investigator of high rank, whose powers are rendered useless by an irritable arrogance of temper, and an inability to understand that men are governed by other things than logic. Wherever he has been stationed as diplomatist, he has made enemies; and whenever he has been Foreign Minister, France has been embroiled with weak Powers. His failure is attributed to temper; but we greatly fear the weak point of the men of science in the practical business of life will be found here. Their conclusions are always too absolute. If M. Paul Bert thought church-going unhealthy, he would close all churches, in the face of an insurrection; and if M. Challeml-Lacour thought the Malagasy inferior people, he would treat Envoys from Madagascar as if they were animals, never heeding that he was doubling the risks of war. The old "doctrinaires"—the men who believed in systems like political economy—were pliable by the side of the new men of science, who absolutely cannot believe that it may be unwise to treat men as if they were merely forces expressible by mathematical signs, and to be used in the "wise" way, without reference to their wills. The strength of France being x^4 , and the strength of Switzerland x , what could the manner of a French diplomatist towards a Swiss Minister signify to the result? One might as well consider the colour of the ink used in the calculation?

The war between France and China appears to be drawing very near. Admiral Courbet has received his reinforcements and very decided instructions, and the French Government fully hope to receive a telegram to-morrow announcing that he has taken Bacninh. At the same time, all accounts agree in stating that the Chinese Government has agreed to consider an attack on Bacninh as a declaration of war, and has officially informed M. Ferry that it has decided upon that course. A secret decree has, moreover, been issued calling out the militia in South-Western China for the defence of the Empire, and ordering that assistance should be given to the Black Flags, or Tonquinese. Opinion in Paris is represented as earnest for war, but the Chamber is obviously uneasy, and the reporter of the Committee which is considering the credit for Tonquin is a man, M. Ribot, entirely opposed to war with China. M. Ferry, however, still disbelieves in the war, and trusts that the first victory will overawe the Cabinet of Peking. He will be roughly undeceived, but we question if his dates are right. Nothing moves quickly in Tonquin or any Asiatic delta, and we expect to hear for another week of repeated but ineffectual tentatives, preparatory to the grand attack.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre should look still more narrowly into the proposal of the Metropolitan Railway to connect Praed Street with Westminster. The line would be invaluable, if it could be made without too much destruction, but it is to cross Hyde Park and Saint James's Park, and we fear for the trees. The First Commissioner of Works has jealously guarded against the construction of ventilators in the Parks, and has demanded powers to regulate the depth of the tunnels, but has he ascertained exactly the effect of a great disturbance of the drainage? When the Metropolitan Railway passed under the open space between the Swiss Cottage and Hampstead known as "The Fields," all the trees died, and it was understood that the tunnel acted as a new and colossal drain-pipe, which sucked all moisture from the roots. New trees will grow on the space now built over, but the old ones could not endure the changed conditions. It is quite possible that this was not the cause of the destruction, but we can personally testify to the withering of the trees, and a similar catastrophe in the two Parks would almost destroy a Government. The progress of hurry-scurry cannot, of course, be resisted; but it would be better to pay almost any price than the extinction of the Park trees,—which might, perhaps, die out of spite. They are not Radicals, trees, but slow-growing, time-consuming things, apt to think that an inch a year is quite as much as they can afford to rise into the air, and to regard any innovation affecting roots with shivering disgust.

The prospects of a Liberal victory in West Surrey are evidently improving. Last Wednesday week a Conservative meeting, held under the auspices of the Godalming and Witley Conservative Association, and presided over by Viscount Midleton, was attended by so many more Liberals than Conservatives, that after the Members had addressed their constituents at some length, a working-man proposed a vote of confidence in the Government, which Lord Midleton, for some mysterious reason of his own, declared to be out of order, but which the Conservatives were so little able to resist that they oozed away from the platform through a side door, amidst loud cheers for Mr. Gladstone, for the Government, and for Mr. Lane-Fox, the Liberal candidate of West Surrey at the next election. At Egham, on the contrary, last Wednesday, a most harmonious and enthusiastic Liberal meeting was held, to hear an excellent lecture by Mr. George Whale on the principles at issue between Liberals and Conservatives, after which a masterly and humorous speech was made by the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, concluding with a vote of confidence in the Government, which was supported by Mr. Eadie, and carried unanimously amid general cheering. Mr. Cubitt and Mr. St. John Brodrick must look out for their seats, whether the County Franchise Bill is passed or not before they next meet their constituents.

On Monday, Mr. W. H. Smith,—the Conservative First Lord of the Admiralty,—made a curious speech on Ireland, in which he said that what the present Government had done during the last twenty years had gravely injured the character of the Irish people; that for all that, he would not repeal any Act that had been passed or pass any fresh Act, because Ireland wanted rest from legislation; but that he was most anxious as soon as possible to assist the purchase by the peasantry of their properties, since at present there was no one whose interest it could be to invest capital in the soil. He did not explain why—with security of tenure—it is not as much the peasants' present interest to invest capital in the soil, as it would be after they had purchased their farms. And still less did he explain how, after using up all their spare money for the purchase of their farms, they would have more of it left to invest in the improvement of the land, than they have now. Mr. Smith is an excellent man, but much too practical to feel disturbed at uttering the most glaring self-contradictions.

Lord Overstone died this day week, at the great age of eighty-seven, the possessor of wealth which is supposed to have exceeded even the great sum of twelve millions sterling. He was the son of the Rev. Lewis Loyd, a Unitarian minister, who abandoned the ministry for the profession of a banker on his marriage with the daughter of Mr. Jones, a Manchester manufacturer and banker. Mr. Loyd was sent to London to found the bank of Jones, Loyd, and Co., the germ of the great bank that is now called the London and Westminster. Mr. Samuel Jones Loyd (who in 1850 became Lord Overstone) was born in 1796, and educated at Eton, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he acquired a great love of the classical type of education, of which he was always a strong advocate. As the head of the banking company founded by his father, he inherited great wealth, which he steadily increased, and became a pillar of the bullionist school of Bankers. He was also a great opponent of decimal coinage for England, and an active supporter of the Volunteer movement. When asked before a Committee what he would regard as the probable financial effect of an invasion of England, he answered sententiously, "It must never happen," an answer which has become historical. He was perhaps the only millionaire living to whom enormous money wealth seemed to give almost as much dignity and status as the possession of half a county and a lineage dating from the Plantagenets.

A meeting of the Council and friends of the Association for Promoting the Reform of Convocation was held on Monday last, November 19th, at the Palace, Exeter, the Bishop of Exeter in the chair, when various resolutions were passed, the general scope of which is reflected in the language of an address to be presented very speedily to the Queen, which has already received the signatures of twelve of the Bishops, and of many of the leading laymen and dignitaries of all schools within the Church of England. The address urges that it is highly desirable that the Bishops, clergy, and laity of the English Church should meet together in some manner recognised by law to discuss the best means of promoting the well-being of the Church of England; and asks the Queen to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire and report on the best method of creating a body of lay members of the English Church, which, in conjunction with the Convocations of Canterbury and York, duly reformed and for that purpose combined, might prepare and submit to Parliament from time to time such measures as they may deem best calculated to effect these objects. We heartily concur in thinking that by moving in this direction the Church of England can best be developed into a living power. It is requested, we understand, that all adhesions to this address should be forwarded, as soon as possible, to the Rev. James Bandinel, 3 Mont-le-Grand, Exeter.

The Echo of last Saturday, in remarking on our refutation of its ridiculous charge that Mr. Gladstone's ecclesiastical appointments had been unduly favourable to the High-Church party, tries to attenuate the force of our statement by saying that it is notorious that Dean Connor and Dean Davidson owed their appointments to the Queen, and that Dean Bradley was designated by his predecessor. We know nothing of the kind. It is quite certain that the Queen neither could nor would force her own judgment on a responsible Minister. As for Dean Stanley's designation of his successor—of which we know nothing—what in the world could compel a Prime Minister to accept it? Besides, the Echo conveniently ignores much more than half the evidence we had produced. Did the Queen force Dean Plumtre, Dean Kitchin, Canon Barry, Canon Butler (of Winchester), Canon Melville, Canon Rowse, Canon Holland, Canon Cadman, Canon Driver, Canon Boyd-Carpenter, on Mr. Gladstone? Canon Driver's case is the most remarkable of all. As Regius Professor of Hebrew, he occupies a most influential position in the University of Oxford, which he has already begun to use with great effect. Is that influence described by any one as an influence dedicated to the High-Church party?

Yesterday week, Sir Stafford Northcote delivered a very interesting address at Birmingham to the Suburban Institutes Union, on Literature as the greatest monument of human activity which the earth contains. We have commented sufficiently on the leading idea of this address elsewhere, but may add here that Sir Stafford Northcote distinctly expressed his belief that, since the death of Milton, there had been no great development of literary force in this country which could compare at all with the development of scientific force. We cannot agree with him. Surely, Sir Walter Scott represents a literary force even greater, taken in all its aspects, than Milton himself,—certainly a force that has affected the other Continental literatures much more powerfully than ever Milton did. In any case, the remarkable outburst of literary activity which began with Cowper and Burns, and ended with Keats and Shelley, and which included not only Sir Walter Scott, but Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Byron, must be regarded as having added more to the literature of England than any other period of equal length since the death of Shakespeare.

Sir F. R. Sandford has addressed a very interesting letter to the Secretary of the National Union of Elementary Teachers, in which he points out that though in the 18,000 Elementary Schools of England and Wales instances of over-pressure on the children occasionally occur, the new Code is not in any way responsible for that over-pressure. Sir F. Sandford's circular proves that in every respect the new Code favours good teaching rather than much teaching, and that the pressure on children which is due to the irregularity of their attendance, is inevitable, and can only be remedied by preventing that irregularity, not by assuming irregularity as the rule.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE CATASTROPHE IN THE SOUDAN.

THE stars in their courses fight against the evacuation of Egypt. General Hicks, Commander-in-Chief of the Egyptian Army in the "Soudan," has obviously committed the two mistakes to which the most experienced Indian officers are liable. Habituated to victories gained by a few men over many, they learn to regard audacity as the supreme military virtue, and, warring in a richly cultivated country, they disbelieve in a total failure of supplies. General Hicks had orders to carry El Obeid, the fortified capital of Kordofan, and to defeat Mahommed Ahmed, the pretended "Messenger" of the Prophet, who was known to have made that city his headquarters, and to be levying tribute throughout the vast dependency of Egypt which is called in Cairo "the Soudan," and in modern geographies the States of Nubia, Sennaar, Kordofan, and Darfur, covering, say, 1,000,000 square miles, and inhabited, according to the guesses of the best explorers, by 12,000,000 of men, of whom, perhaps, a fourth are Arabs and Arab half-castes, the latter as brave as Zulus. Collecting his army, 10,500 Egyptian and Nubian soldiers, with 2,000 camp followers, in August, at Khartoum, the junction of the two Niles, and teaching them, as Mr. O'Donovan reported, some elementary manœuvres, General Hicks marched up the Nile to Duem, 150 miles from Khartoum. So far, he was safe, for the Nile was with him; but at this point, about September 25th, he resolved to strike westward, and reach El Obeid by a circuitous route of 250 miles through the Desert,—a march of thirty or more days. It must have been an awful march, for the country is a treeless, waterless, verdureless plain; the only drink attainable was from surface pools of stagnant rain-water, the few cattle were swept off by the enemy; and all day, the Army, always marching in close order, ready to form square, was surrounded by clouds of cavalry, who come out of the horizon, reach fighting distance in fifteen minutes, and disappear as fast. The animals dropped, says poor Mr. O'Donovan in his last communication, from the first; but General Hicks, with his ships burned behind him, pressed on gallantly, and arrived on November 1st within a short distance of El Obeid. There the Mahdi ordered him to be stopped, and his fierce followers, who are said to number 300,000 men, and may number 80,000, and who are known on direct European testimony to fight like martyrs, dying in heaps at the muzzles of the Remington rifles, made their final attack. It lasted three days, November 2nd, 3rd, and 4th, relays of men coming up incessantly from El Obeid; and on the last day, as we believe, the exhausted Egyptians, who during the fighting can have had no water, found that their ammunition had given out. They had been firing more or less for twenty-five days, with no fresh supply from any base. Whether that was so, or whether the thirst, which is a certainty, had done its terrible work, the Egyptian squares described by Mr. O'Donovan were broken, the Mahdi's best troops, inflamed to madness by victory, rushed in, and the whole Egyptian Army were either massacred, made slaves, or taken as recruits. Only one European, an artist employed by a German paper, is known to have escaped; and as the Mahdi's orders were to slaughter all Christians and Pagans, and as he would be egged on by the slave-dealers, who know how formidable Europeans are to them, we have little hope for any of the white men with the expedition. All have, we fear, perished, and as the army has been annihilated, as the district between the Blue Nile and Suakim is in arms, as the Abyssinians are in Sennaar, and as the scattered Egyptian detachments still remaining are flying to Khartoum, the whole Soudan is lost to Egypt, and Mahommed Ahmed, the Mahdi, who claims descent from Mahommed, and, say those who have watched him, is revered by every tribe, is absolute master of Ethiopia. A victory of this kind will, to every man in the Soudan, appear to reveal the Divine Will; and, till defeated, the Mahdi may expend a thousand men a day without shaking his followers' confidence one jot. And, worse than all, it may be doubted whether the Mahdi, having defeated an army commanded by Englishmen and defended by the artillery of Europe, will not believe in himself and his own mission, and rush forward with a speed and a self-confidence which he has never hitherto displayed.

There is an end of the conquest of Tonquin; for either we misread Arabs altogether, or in a month the French will be fighting for their lives from Gabes to Morocco, and must pour 50,000 men into Tunis and Algeria; but we cannot stop to discuss French misfortunes just now. The point for us is whether the Mahdi will attempt to descend the Nile. It is a formidable enterprise, for though he is master down to Khartoum, and may win that post by treachery, and though there is literally no force between him and Egypt Proper to be relied on for an hour,—every second Fellah by this time doubting if he is not divine—Khartoum is eight hundred miles from Cairo, and the Mahdi's Army as it advances north will eat the narrow strip of cultivated soil as bare as if locusts had passed over it. Still, the cavalry of the Desert can move fast, a conqueror like Mahommed Ahmed cares nothing about human life, and the Mahdi will be compelled, by his spiritual claim—which is to the mastery of the whole Mussulman world—to move forward as rapidly as means will allow. He may wait even for months to organise, but he cannot give up his enterprise; and through all that time, be it shorter or longer, the cloud will overhang Egypt, and the Egyptians will be excited by terror and hope of the most extreme kind. That they can defend themselves by themselves may be gravely doubted. The seven or eight thousand men remaining of the old Army in the Soudan are already showing want of heart—they threw their arms away when Captain Moncrieff was attacked—many of them are probably ready to join the Mahdi, as 3,000 of their comrades recently did, and all of them will fight with the feeling that they are warring for the Infidel against the promised Deliverer, whose army is full of dervishes, santons, and the religious desperadoes who will swarm up from all manner of monasteries to join the successful Mussulman leader who proclaims a divine Mission. If we retire, Egypt may be divided by insurrection, or accept the Mahdi, and that would mean the advance of a Turkish Army to defend the Ottoman Caliphate, which, if an Arab Mahdi reached Cairo, would not be worth a week's purchase. It is impossible for Great Britain to allow either such utter ruin to Egypt, or such an overthrow of all her policy; and whatever happens, until the Mahdi has been defeated, or his movement has died away, the Delta must be garrisoned by British troops. We are not responsible for the Soudan, nor, in spite of the opinion of the ex-Khedive Ismail, are we bound in any way to assist in recovering a dominion which has not extinguished slavery, or, except for a moment under Gordon Pasha, produced any result beneficial to humanity; but we are bound to make Egypt safe against a barbarian invasion. We must hold the Valley up to Syene at least, and to do it we must retain a force strong enough, should the Mahdi advance, to teach him that, even as against fanaticism, civilisation is clothed in an impenetrable armour. Whether it is either right or expedient to hold Khartoum, at so vast a distance from supplies, we do not know, and leave to the able experts who will consider the question; but that we must defend Egypt to the First Cataract, or abandon it to the Turk, we do know; nor do we believe there will be any hesitation on the part of the Government, which has already directed the Fleet to recover Suakim for Egypt. The troops must remain, and Lord Ripon must be warned that in conceivable contingencies he must once more remind the Arabs and the world that, east of Alexandria, Great Britain strikes from two sides at once. No great effort may be necessary. A movement like this may be shattered by victory, or dissolved by internal dissension; and an Army like the Mahdi's has to feed itself, like any other—rifles and cannon in quantities it has unhappily gained in the overthrow of General Hicks—while in any event, short of a rising in Egypt itself, there is ample time to consider action. Even if the Mahdi is a true soldier, it will take him a hundred days to march from El Obeid to Syene; and the Egyptians, whatever their feelings, will await his descent. There is time in plenty, but there must be decision also, and in any event, until the designs of the Mahdi are known the evacuation of Egypt cannot proceed, nor can Sir Evelyn Wood be left with 7,000 doubtful Sepoys, to hold down the Delta and resist an advancing army of thousands of brave fanatics, flushed with a victory over a larger army officered like his own.

THE LORD MAYOR ON LONDON.

THE new Lord Mayor has spoken out strongly against the proposal to make London a Municipality, and as he is in his way a representative man, and as the Bill for that purpose is to be introduced next year, it is well worth while to hear what he has to say. We may premise that we have nothing to do with his motive for saying it, though he makes such a point of that. If Mr. Fowler really believes his own assertion that, as Lord Mayor, he is bound to defend the separateness of the City, and that it would be traitorous or otherwise wicked "for an Archbishop to turn Dissenter, or for a Cardinal to turn Protestant," we can have nothing to say in reply. Every man must obey his conscience, and if Mr. Fowler's compels him to regard official position as a final reason against yielding to his better judgment, we can only remark that the vagaries of unenlightened conscience are endless, and that Mr. Fowler should resign his seat in the House of Commons. His conscience as Member must bind him to give the vote he deems best for his fellow-countrymen, which may not be the vote binding, by his theory, on the Lord Mayor; and invaluable as conscience is, to possess two consciences, or two halves of a conscience liable to pull in two ways, must be indescribably inconvenient. We may pass over that, however, knowing that men like Mr. Fowler very often speak more strongly than they think, and address ourselves to the arguments he deems unanswerable.

These appear to be in essence only two, either of which, if true, would no doubt be fatal to the plan,—one being that the members of the new Municipality cannot be competent, from want of local knowledge; and the other, that they cannot be competent, from want of general intelligence. "What could a man," said the Lord Mayor, in accents of superb scorn, "who lived in Hampstead know about the drainage of Greenwich?" Just as much as a Member for Northumberland knows about the legislation for Cornwall,—that is to say, he knows all general principles, and the character, abilities, and arguments of the representative for Cornwall, who will describe any special necessities in the county. There is nothing whatever in the local needs of the parishes or boroughs of London to divide them more from each other than local needs divide electoral districts of Great Britain, no insuperable natural differences, no differences of race, creed, or colour, no divergencies requiring for their comprehension an instinct only developed by long residence. Hampstead is a hill, and Greenwich mainly a riverine flat; but water runs downwards and gases fly upwards in both places, and Sir John Hawkshaw would not consider himself overtasked if asked to prepare an efficient scheme of drainage for both. Belgravia is rich, and Shoreditch is poor; but a shilling is twelve pence in either of them, and Mr. Fowler would not be incompetent to denounce or approve a common scheme of taxation for the two regions, and indeed he allows that, as Member of Parliament, he would be competent and compelled to do so. Why, then, as citizen and parishioner, is he not competent? He makes, in truth, a very odd admission upon that point, for he argues that Parliament, being a great and dignified body, is better able to legislate even in local matters for London than any Municipality would be. We might object, that hardly any kind of ignorance can be so perfect as the ignorance of Members of Parliament about Bermondsey and Kennington, or the huge tract of houses and people formerly called the "Tower Hamlets;" but we need not dwell on that, when Mr. Fowler so plays into our hands. If a great legislative body is more competent than many little legislative bodies, as the Lord Mayor argues, to govern a great city, then a Municipality representing all London must be more competent than numerous Vestries representing bits of London. On that hypothesis, which we acknowledge to be quite sound, but which comes oddly from a fanatic for local self-government, a central Municipality is wanted now, and at once, to do the business more nearly as it ought to be done. The Lord Mayor is, in fact, arguing for the very scheme which he is so eager to denounce, and should, on his own showing, support it with all his power.

But, continued the Lord Mayor, the members of the new Municipality will be "mere vestrymen;" and are we to hand over the Municipal Government of four millions of people to mere vestrymen? We might ask whether vestrymen do not govern now, or whether the United Kingdom is not governed by "vestrymen,"—that is, persons considered by their fellow-citizens qualified to represent them; but we reject so easy a victory of words. We know what the Lord Mayor means, and we reply that the general intellectual rank of a representative body is almost invariably regulated by its powers and duties. If they are great, the members will be great also. Reduce the powers of Parliament to the powers of the Congress at Washington, and the next set of elected Members will be as like Congress-men in all intellectual qualifications as the difference of nationality and manners will permit. We do not despise vestrymen, as Mr. Fowler does, for we think the Government of many of our cities—like Birmingham, Glasgow, and if he will forgive us, the City of London—is in many respects remarkably efficient, and we know of London parishes in which, though the Vestry drops its h's, the local requirements are excellently met; but if he so despises them, and wants better men, his course is so to elevate the Municipality that the people will see at once that Vestrymen will not do, and will elect persons of higher intellectual calibre. They do that, the Lord Mayor allows, for the general Parliament; and why not for a particular Parliament to rule a city so vast, populous, and wealthy, that its very importance has to be pleaded as an excuse for not giving it its rightful measure of representation. Mr. Fowler evidently feels the difficulty, for he immediately proceeds to assert that the reason the Municipal Members will be bad is that the better citizens will not consent to serve. Why not? Mr. Fowler has consented to serve the City of London for thirty years; and why should he not serve "London,"—that is, the City multiplied as to population twenty times? Is it because serving will bring more dignity, and more power, and more opportunities of usefulness, or because the government of four millions will overwhelm him, while the government of thirty-five millions does not, or why? He would probably reply, if we understand his character, that he would do his best to serve London, whatever her organisation; and why not other citizens as competent, as courageous, and as fond of any work at once administrative and beneficial? We do not expect to see Mr. Forster or Sir John Lubbock in the new Municipality, for they have other and more national duties; but we do expect, the moment the importance of the new Municipality is recognised, to see a most able, and, if we may use the word, most dignified class of men serving there, and should not be surprised if ten years hence we found Radical journals complaining that wealthy men, and influential men, and men of eloquence, had far too many seats in the Parliament of London; that wealth was much too strongly represented, and that the suffering classes could not get themselves heard at all. The immense functions of the new Municipality will attract the powerful as the immense strength of the House of Commons attracts them; and the Metropolis will no more be governed by petty tradesmen or artisans than the United Kingdom is. London is big enough to allow of its developing a character, and the English character is not one which allows of the election of those whom Mr. Fowler intends to stigmatise as "vestrymen," to do great work over a great area full of wealth, and people, and affairs.

The truth is, the Lord Mayor's arguments, if they have any force at all, are fatal, not only to democratic government, in which he does not believe, but to any kind of representative government, in which he does believe. If the people of London—varied as they are, and numerous as they are, and wealthy as they are—are incompetent to elect a Council able to govern London, the people of the United Kingdom are also incompetent to elect a Council to govern the Empire; and the alternatives are government from above by a Monarch, or government from below through the Communes. Mr. Fowler would hardly wish for absolute power, and would reject the latter suggestion with horror; but if he will for one moment put himself outside himself, he will recognise that his speech is either a Monarchical or a true Red speech, that he is abusing the bourgeoisie exactly as German Princes and French Radicals do, and that most of his arguments would have appeared to the old Elector of Hesse or to Delescluze unanswerably sound. His words are English enough, but his thought is the thought of Continental Monarchists, and of the Communards,—that shopkeepers are incompetent to govern. He fancies that they will be in the ascendant in the new Municipality, and dislikes the idea so much, that he fails even to see how dignified, how powerful, and how much more sought a Municipality for all London must necessarily be, than any conceivable collection of smaller councils, and how deeply that new importance must affect the imagination of the electors. And he also fails to see, what we should have thought so practical a man would have perceived, that the ablest of Cabinets is limited by conditions, and that be the work to be done what it may, Parliament, however resolute, can only find Englishmen to do it with. After all, Mr. Fowler, we dwellers outside the City, though we have neither Livery, nor Aldermen, nor Guilds, are still vertebrate animals.

THE NEGATIVE VOTE.

A GREAT deal will depend on the spirit in which the Government and the country consider the various changes by which the opinion of the country could be more truly represented before the Redistribution of Seats is attempted. There certainly should be a very serious effort made to press on the Government any scheme for the more adequate representation of opinion which may be fully consistent with the Democratic principle. We have avowed our belief that by far the most reasonable scheme suggested for the due representation of adequate minorities, is such a division of electoral districts as will give us truly characteristic constituencies,—constituencies, we mean, of a good many different kinds, with different political bias, and different ways of looking at national affairs. If the present minority principle is to continue in operation at all, we agree entirely with our correspondent "J. A. H." that it should be applied more largely to county divisions where there is really most need for it; and also that a very good form of experiment would be to confine it to a general election, each voter having but one vote, and full liberty to vote for any Member in any division of his county who best represents his own political opinions. The final objection, as it seems to us, to Mr. Parker Smith's modification of Mr. Hare's plan, is that it might very well under certain circumstances return a candidate who had had no first vote at all,—who was only the second choice of a good many whose first choice had been very popular,—and that in this way a candidate, who had been second-best with everybody, might even appear at the head of the poll. Imagine the confusion and disgust which would be excited among the people, by finding the man whom the mass of them preferred credited with fewer votes than the candidate whom none of them had put higher than second-best. Yet this might easily happen, under the rule that after the number necessary to secure a candidate's return is obtained, the remainder of the votes should be carried on to the voters' "second-best" candidate. We must gravely warn the numerous, and as we think, perfectly wise adherents of the fair representation of minorities, that any complicated plan which ends in giving false conceptions of the relative preferences of the electors, will never command the sort of confidence necessary for success. Those who entertain the perfectly just desire to have the larger minorities of the country as freely represented as the majorities—though, of course, by a proportional minority of Members—must endeavour to secure that end by methods which will not mislead and irritate the great masses of the people,—that will not seem as unfair to the majority as they are intended to be fair to the minority.

But the case is different with every genuine proposal for increasing the efficiency with which a man's political convictions may be represented. And we believe that that efficiency may be increased by various methods, the most important of these, though not the only one, being, no doubt, the careful selection of constituencies so as to afford us different political types. But another suggestion has been made which seems to us likely to increase the efficiency of the individual vote itself in the representation of opinion,—we mean the suggestion that a man may use his vote either positively or negatively, either to swell the adhesions to one candidate, or to counteract, so far as one vote will do it, the popularity of another. It is objected that this would be a way of giving vent to personal spite, but would it be so? Why should not an elector's vote be quite as reasonably and as fairly used by way of an energetic protest against one class of principles, as it may be now used to support another class of principles? Suppose that three or four candidates are in the field, of whom three represent the ordinary party views on one side or the other, while the fourth,—say, an adherent of some form of Socialism,—proclaims loudly that he wishes for the nationalisation of the land, the erection of national workshops, the appropriation of the "unearned increment" to the advancement of the labourer, and similar proposals. Is it unreasonable for a voter to say, 'As to the Tory and Liberal candidates, I am indifferent; I am no party man, and would just as soon see a follower of Sir Stafford Northcote's elected as a follower of Mr. Gladstone's, or a follower of Mr. Gladstone's as a follower of Sir Stafford Northcote's; but I have one conviction of the strongest kind that I should like to express, namely, that Socialism is mischievous, and that if we encourage it, it will sap the energy of England. By far the most characteristic form which I could give to my vote would be to make it a protest against the election of the Socialist. Indeed, that is my main object; but under the present system, in order to do so I am obliged to express a preference which I do not feel, for either the Tory or the Liberal.' That seems to us to express a very conceivable and perhaps legitimate state of mind, though it is not one with which the present writer would sympathise. Surely, everything that enables the very rough machinery of a vote to express something which at present it cannot express, would be an immense advantage under a truly Democratic system. We ask nothing for one voter which we do not give to another; but is it not true that the difference between the number of special political supporters and the number of special political opponents, would be a much truer test of the opinion of a constituency concerning the character of a representative, than the mere relative number of positive votes obtained by the various candidates as we have them at present?

And though personal spite might occasionally determine the giving of negative votes, yet personal spite is just as active now, though not so distinctly expressed, and shows itself by voting for the man whose success would most mortify the candidate objected to. But in an English constituency personal spite is a rare motive, and we do not think that an elector would often sacrifice all chance of helping the candidate whom he liked best, for the sake of injuring the candidate whom he hated most, unless he really hated his principles much more than he hated his person. And in that case, it is only fair that he should be able to give expression to his protest. Surely, in a Protestant country, a protest should not be considered an unreasonable and dangerous species of political opinion.

Indeed, the more we attend to the symptoms of mischief in the present House of Commons, the more we feel that there is need of fresh scope for effectual protest against mischievous politicians, as well as for more efficacious support of wise politicians, than we have hitherto had. Take the case of a Member who has wasted intolerably the time of the House, like Mr. Warton or Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett. Is it not easily conceivable that an elector who cared little comparatively for party questions, but who cared enormously for the efficiency of the House of Commons, should desire to record emphatically his vote against the return of a mischievous time-waster, though he might not care which party were in the ascendant? And would not any change in the machinery which enabled a waverer or neutral to give his vote against the election of a marplot, even though he could not make up his mind for which of the non-marplot candidates he preferred to vote, be a distinct addition to the representative efficiency of our system? For our own parts, though we should certainly regret the use of a negative vote to express mere personal malevolence, we do not believe that there would be any more personal malevolence expressed by using negative votes than is already expressed by means of positive votes, though the expression might, in the former case, be a little more adequate. That, however, is no reason why those who have something definite to express by the negative vote, which they could not possibly express by a positive vote, should be denied the advantage of such an increase to the efficiency of the electoral machinery.

LORD OVERSTONE.

LORD OVERSTONE was one of the few who have rendered the possession of enormous wealth, not derived from land, dignified and attractive. For the most part, the owners of vast fortunes made in trade do not take a very dignified place among their fellow-countrymen. They seem, somehow, to be hangers-on of their own wealth, and to be dwarfed by it, instead of magnified. They seem insignificant beside the wealth they have accumulated, and you wonder how a man of sufficient parts to put so much together, should seem so little of a magician and so much of an accident, when you watch him as he guards the pile of golden dust he has raked together. It was not so with Lord Overstone. He was not the hanger-on of his own millions; he seemed somehow to embody them, and to embody all the care and foresight which had been necessary to invest capital all over the planet, and to know what the investment would yield. It was the power of wealth, not its glitter, which you felt in Lord Overstone. He spoke ore rotundo, indeed, and with a great air of authority, like the master of many legions as he was; but it was not the wealth to move mountains which you heard in his voice, so much as the sagacious experience which had acquired that wealth,—the far-reaching, financial mind,—the habit of considering safety first and gain afterwards,—the contempt for risky prizes,—the supreme indifference to accidental but not dangerous loss. Lord Overstone was not an original man. He would utter truisms with the impressiveness that made you think them striking truths, and he administered time-honoured jokes like the official head of a great Department of State inaugurating a new régime. But it was hardly possible for him to do anything that was not impressive. The truisms from his lips had a new dignity, if not an air of novelty; the old joke solemnly revived gave you the impression that you were sharing in the temperate geniality of historic tradition itself. Lord Overstone spoke like an institution, rather than a man. You could not help fancying that his voice was the voice of a great net-work of agencies which merely centred in himself, and that you were hardly at liberty to try what he said by the ordinary tests of reason, any more than you would the voice of an Oracle which you had consulted. "Securus judicat orbis terrarum," said an old father, speaking of the testimony of the world against heresy. Well, Lord Overstone spoke like the orbis terrarum. You felt, when you heard him, as though his judgment were secure, because it was the testimony of weighty men all the world over.

Lord Overstone was not a frequent speaker in the House of Lords. He seemed to feel that those sententious periods of his should be few, and that reserve was a great power in a public man. But when he did speak, he had a large way of treating financial catastrophes, as if they were merely the counters with which he was playing a game. "He had always maintained," he said, on one occasion, a year or two after the Overend-Gurney crash, "that financial crises, however disastrous at the time, were the seed of expanding prosperity in the country." The ruined victims must have felt, we think, something of an additional pang, when Lord Overstone, in his lofty survey of the financial agencies at work, treated them as the dying seed which was to spring up into the new wealth of other people who had profited by their collapse. On another occasion, Lord Overstone, resisting the proposal to transfer some of the taxes on real property to moveable property, attacked Lord Malmesbury for touching with profane hands so great a mystery as the relative burdens on land and on circulating capital. "If their Lordships were to follow out that subject, he was sure they would find abundant proof of the necessity of extreme caution and circumspection in every step they took regarding it; it was one of those subjects in which 'fools rush in where angels fear to tread.'" And no doubt Lord Overstone thought that angels would have far too much "circumspection" to interfere in the adjustment of the relative burdens on real and on personal property. How could they better show their angelic nature than by estimating duly the enormous difficulty of so taxing personal property as not to prevent the rapid accumulation of wealth? It was all very well for the landowners to cry out that they were overburdened, but the landowners did not know the delicacy of the problems on which the accumulation of commercial wealth depends. For such a one as Lord Malmesbury to interfere grossly in the refined transactions of the Bankers, was indeed a sight to make the angels weep.

Lord Overstone will always be associated with Sir Robert Peel's Bank Charter Act, which he certainly did more to press on Sir Robert Peel than any other man in the kingdom. It has succeeded to a certain extent, for it has made the Directors of the Bank of England adopt the right policy when they are losing gold, with a promptness with which they never adopted it before; but an Act which requires to be suspended whenever it would otherwise exert its most characteristic effect, and which would do pure harm if it were not so suspended, can hardly be called a model of legislative wisdom. Still, it was, on the whole, very characteristic of Lord Overstone's sagacity, which was just of the kind which applies a very useful remedy to ordinary ills, though one which needs superseding whenever the evil rises to a maximum. He was hardly a statesman, but he was a most impressive politician, who could make men attach extraordinary weight to ordinary considerations; and he was, above all, one who derived great personal influence from the management of extraordinary resources, instead of becoming, as most men of that kind do, mere appendages to such resources,—mere managers of their machinery and their display. He embodied the forethought and the judgment which had accumulated millions; and that involved much more than merely having such forethought and judgment at his command. These qualities entered into his character, gave significance to his words, and expression to his countenance. The various energies needful to guard and multiply vast means, made themselves visible in ways much more impressive than those vast means themselves,—in the life and bearing of the man who wielded them.

MR. W. H. SMITH ON IRELAND.

MR. W. H. SMITH can hardly have intended his remarks on Ireland, addressed to the "London and Westminster Working-men's Constitutional Association" on Monday, to be reported. A keen sense of the requirements of inductive and deductive logic would, no doubt, be fatal to the true Conservative temperament. On the subject of Ireland especially, we are accustomed to see the Conservative leaders showing absolute indifference to the ordinary rules of reasoning. But though they make no scruple of ignoring such logical rules as require people to abstain from begging the question to be argued, and from arguing in a circle, or from contradicting themselves in different speeches, yet it is not usual for them to put forward absolutely contradictory propositions in the same speech. Yet this is what Mr. W. H. Smith must be convicted of doing, in the utterance to which we have referred. After a passing reference to the way in which Ireland has been made the shuttlecock of parties; especially one party, he goes on to say that the "one" thing it needs now "is rest, peace, and security for life and property, and he would go further, and say, absolute relief from legislation." He frankly acknowledges that the country is now fairly quiet, though he, of course, imputes the improvement entirely to the Crimes Act. He still disapproves of the Land Act, and still thinks it will produce more harm than good; but he does not advocate its repeal. "It would be contrary to everything that is just and fair, to take away now what has been given them [the people of Ireland] by the law." This is all very fair, very sensible, and very statesmanlike. It is fairly open to him also to complain that the language used by Mr. Healy at the Limerick election, in saying that the Irish nation "ought never to be satisfied so long as a single penny of rent was paid for a sod of land in the whole of Ireland," and that the "milk-and-water" business was no good, tends to incite to outrage, though it is to be observed that the language used was not a bit stronger than that used by the Land Nationalisation agitators in England, and not half as strong as that used by the Orange agitators in Ulster. Still, in expressing a demand for "rest," he may be pardoned for expressing his opinion rather forcibly that such speeches do not tend in that direction.

After all this, we naturally expect that this fair-minded and eminent leader of the Opposition is going to bury the hatchet which Mr. James Lowther is always brandishing, and will use that fiery orator's speeches to light the pipe of peace, instead of to light the fire of party strife over Irish questions. In this view, all Liberals would have gladly accepted his statement that he really had nothing Communistic in view, by his proposals as to the purchase clauses of the Act, and his implied assurance that those proposals were not made as "a means of getting into power by" any "party." But when he has thus established and enforced the major proposition that relief from legislation is the one thing needful in Ireland, it is somewhat astounding to find that, after all, Mr. W. H. Smith is prepared, "when the proper occasion arises in Parliament, to state his views" as to the amendment of the purchase clauses, and that there "are strong arguments in favour of a reconsideration of that part of the land question." In other words, Mr. W. H. Smith is prepared, as soon as Parliament meets, for fresh legislation on that very question which above all others has rendered rest the one thing needful. This is to blow hot and cold not merely with the same mouth, but at the very same breath. What would be thought of the surgeon who came to his patient and said, "My dear sir, you have undergone a very painful operation; I am not at all sure the treatment was the right one, but I will not try to undo what has been done; what you need above all things is rest, absolute relief from work and movement. Do not listen to any one who recommends you to adopt strong measures. Only I should like to see your limb reset, and very much stronger splints put on it, and you had better take every opportunity of exercise"? Yet this is exactly what Mr. W. H. Smith, that experienced and distinguished State surgeon, does. Surely it would require too great faith in any patient to trust himself in the hands of that surgeon again. This is the speech put into logical form:—Relief from legislation is necessary for Ireland; Mr. Healy and his party ask for legislation; therefore, Mr. Healy and his party must be suppressed. But Mr. Smith and his party also ask for legislation; therefore, Mr. Smith and his party are to be entrusted with the government, and particularly with the suppression of Mr. Healy. Such is the reasoning which is thought good enough for his working-men constituents, by the Member for the city once represented by John Stuart Mill.

But the reasons which dictate the minor premiss of this conclusion are only less fallacious than the syllogism itself. Though the "proper time" has not yet come for an exposition of the scheme by which the purchase clauses are to be given greater purchasing power, the time has come for stating why it is necessary. And this is why. Because "the Land Act in its effect absolutely stops all improvement on the part of the landlord," and "there is no single person in Ireland whose interest it is to spend money upon the land." Now, even granting, for the sake of argument, the truth of the first allegation, nothing can be less true than the second. The Land Act, we had fondly imagined, had given every tenant in Ireland who was not already a leaseholder a lease of his land for fifteen years, with practically a perpetual right of renewal, and subject to no conditions but payment of what, in a great majority of cases, is a reduced rent, and may in all be assumed to be a fair rent. Mr. W. H. Smith was a member of a Cabinet which thought that sufficient inducement for the investment of capital in land was given if a tenant was entitled to a year's notice to quit, with a power of claiming compensation for improvements on an arbitrary and narrowly-limited sliding-scale. How is it, then, that a fifteen years' lease, on terms under which the tenant is absolutely secure of getting the value of any improvements he may make, has been no inducement to invest his capital in improvements? But it may be argued that he has no capital to invest. If so, how will the payment of a lump-sum down,—for presumably Mr. Smith does not intend to extend the purchase clauses by converting them into confiscation clauses, or to make the tenant a present of the land at the expense of the British taxpayer—how will the payment of even a fifth or a tenth of the fee-simple value of his holding increase the tenant's capital? If the whole sum were found for him, he would have to repay it in increased rent, and where then would be his margin for borrowing additional capital for improvements? But, in fact, the chief capital required is that which has usually been the only capital found for improvements in Ireland,—the labour of the tenant. It may be that if he were absolute owner, the tenant would have still greater inducements to labour than he now has. But the wand of the enchanter has been waved over Ireland, and the "magic of the property" which, according to Mr. Smith's own showing, has been conferred upon the tenant must needs work its usual effect. It may not all at once convert sand into gold, but it is enough to turn a piece of bog into a potato-ground. If the admittedly inadequate security enjoyed by the Ulster tenant before the Land Act was enough to induce him to invest his capital in improvements, a fifteen years' lease perpetually renewable must be adequate inducement for any one. It is much to be feared that the real inducement for the continuous enthusiasm of Mr. W. H. Smith in favour of a gigantic purchase scheme is not so much a desire for the improvement of the position of the Irish tenant, as a desire for the improvement of the position of the English Conservative Leaders.

THE PRINCIPALITY OF SARAWAK.

ENGLISHMEN find it easier to make history than to watch it in the making. They have almost forgotten Sarawak, yet Sarawak is, perhaps, in some ways the most interesting of the forty or fifty States or separate communities which Englishmen have founded. It is, to begin with, the only one in which the rule of the English administrator has never been supported by British troops. From first to last, since the first Rajah, James Brooke, proclaimed himself Sovereign, to the present day, when his nephew writes to the Pall Mall Gazette stating that his regular army consists of 250 drilled Dyaks, supported by all able-bodied males, the Brooke dynasty has raised its own troops, sailed its own vessels, waged its own wars, and crushed its own insurgents, without serious help from the forces of any civilised Power. It has succeeded, by its own force of character and ability, in so disciplining and conciliating the majority of its subjects, that when, in 1857, the formidable Chinese colony revolted and compelled the Rajah to swim for his life, his appeal to his people, unarmed and defeated as he stood, was answered by a rising en masse of the Dyaks and the extirpation of the rebels. Even now, when civilised order has to be maintained, and taxes to be levied, and savage neighbours to be restrained, the second English Rajah maintains only a native army, though his territory is as large as Scotland and his people number 250,000, and relies for great emergencies upon the devotion of an armed people. He has no European soldier but his Commandant. The Rajah maintains himself, in fact, as the Kings and ruling nobles of Europe used to do, through the body of the people, all accustomed to weapons, and all led and guided by a small personal guard. The system, by the Rajah's own account, works excellently well, and is, indeed, the only system which, in a State so thinly populated and with so small a revenue, would work at all. It works, however, and that so strongly, that the present Rajah ventures at once to admit the Chinese—who are dangerous subjects when the force above is not irresistible—and to carry out the terrible law making entrance into a Hoey or Secret Society a crime punishable with death. Without this law, the State could not be governed,—and as the Hoeyes enforce their rules by assassination, it is no more immoral than the Thuggee law,—but the fact that it can be executed without a White army shows conclusively how strong is the social system which the Rajah has established,—a system, be it remembered, under which the city of Sarawak, a city of 20,000 people, is as free from crimes of violence as any English seaport. So also does the abolition of slavery—now nearly completed, and to be final in 1888—the destruction of piracy, once the sole trade of the people, and the creation of a commerce of £1,000,000 sterling a year. This is a remarkable result to have been attained without conquest, and solely by using the English force of character and love of order as the supreme governing power. It wakes a hope that hereafter, even in the colonies inhabited by darker races, the costly English garrisons may be dispensed with, and the people themselves furnish all necessary physical power. The time for such a change seems distant, but political intelligence is spreading, and the moment England is recognised by her dark subjects as irresistible, indigenous garrisons may be safely trusted. Even in India we do not despair of seeing some one people accept English rule with cordiality, and then the Englishmen may be reduced once more, as they were in 1856, to a mere guard.

The second special interest attaching to Sarawak is its form of Government, which is of the Asiatic, not the European type. The Rajah is, we believe, the single Englishman in the world who is absolute in the old and true sense of the word, who holds, that is, the power of decreeing laws and of issuing sentences of death by fiat. The Viceroy of India can, under extreme circumstances which have never occurred, pass proprio motu an Act as valid as an Act of Parliament for six months; but he is a subordinate, liable to recall, and even to impeachment, for misuse of his powers. The Rajah of Sarawak knows in Sarawak no superior. The Governors of Crown Colonies can, if supported by their subordinates in Council, pass very despotic laws, and in some instances have done so; but they must submit to the regular formality of securing a majority, and if they overstepped a well-understood line, might be resisted. Rajah Brooke declares that he is really absolute, and as we see no reason either to doubt him or to question that he would like relief both from work and responsibility, we are driven to the conclusion that two English rulers, who have founded a State in Asia, governed it for forty years, and made it comparatively prosperous, have for those forty years found it necessary either to be or to appear as absolute as Sultans. That is a very curious, though it may be a very useless lesson. We question if a community like the British either could or would release a delegate authority from all laws, and make him truly absolute—though we do something very like it as regards a Commander-in-Chief in an "occupied" territory—but still it is a fact to ponder over, that the only Englishman who is compelled by circumstances to rely solely upon the loyalty of a dark population, finds it expedient or imperative to retain absolute power in a visible and avowed form. As a colonial Governor he would not need it, but as a self-depending ruler he cannot do without it. Why is that? Is it that Asiatics really like the speed, force, and dramatic effect of personal power; or that a ruler without a separate and effective will in him, a quasi-impersonal ruler, fails entirely to rouse the sentiment of loyalty which, even in Europe, it is so difficult to evoke towards an institution, but which in Asia, as in Europe, has for individuals, as well as for dynasties, shown itself a passion? Is it the reason or the imagination of Asiatics which is so touched by personal power, that during ages upon ages a series of successful revolutions have failed to create anything but autocracy, or to restrict it by anything save a revealed law, which, in practice, hardly limits it at all? The Emperor of China, like Rajah Brooke, has a tiny standing Army, and could not hold down his people for a day, yet he also is an autocrat. Our system is doubtless the best, while the object is to produce prosperity and secure justice; but if ever in the chances of time we desired to evoke loyalty, we might learn something from the history of the only Principality in Asia ruled independently by an Englishman.

The third lesson to be learned from Sarawak is the one we all just now sorely need,—to be a little more hopeful and patient about the future of the darker races. There never were barbarians more savage than the Dyaks. When Rajah Brooke first assumed power, their occupation was murder, and their recreation hunts after human beings' heads. They were supposed to be utterly treacherous, and were utterly given up to bloodthirstiness. They had no order, no commerce, no agriculture, no laws. Two Englishmen—one no doubt a hero, but a hero of the rough, Elizabethan type, and the other an ordinary Englishman, with the faculties of a good magistrate—take these people in hand, reduce them through themselves to order, and within little more than a generation tame them till they are as civilised as the working population of India. The work, be it repeated, was not done by men of genius. The reigning Prince does not pretend to be one, and his uncle, though there was the making of a conqueror in him, was not one, unless the insight which enabled him to suppress murder in Sarawak is a proof of it. He was convinced that Dyaks were human beings, and that human beings will no more continue any practice which is surely and suddenly punished, than they will put their fingers into the fire after it has burned them. He, therefore, when trying men for murder, ordered that if the jury returned a verdict of guilty, execution should follow then and there. "As I dropped my hand on the desk," he said, in telling the story, "the murderer fell dead." The juries made few mistakes, the witnesses believed in the Judge, and the Dyaks, appalled by a retribution which looked so certain and sudden, gave up the crime of generations. Still, though that success was startling, there are hundreds of men in England who could, if opportunity offered, play the part of Rajah Brooke; and it is because the dynasty is ordinary that its success contains such a lesson for men who, in the last resort, govern probably more than a clear half of all dark-skinned mankind.

WILL THE CZAR YIELD?

[We do not vouch for the accuracy of the following account of politics in St. Petersburg; but the writer, the author of "Underground Russia," has exceptional means of information.]

SHORTLY after the Czar's return from his visit to Copenhagen, it was announced that he had resolved to yield to the wishes of his people, and grant them a Constitution. But as a similar announcement has been made twenty times before, only to be contradicted the following week, the news was received with general incredulity, and it would be rash to affirm that his Majesty's latest resolution will prove more lasting than its predecessors. Nobody who knows Russia would venture to say that it will, yet circumstances point to the probability that it may, and nothing can be more certain than that the country is on the eve of great changes. Of this the Czar is fully aware, and the fact may afford a clue to the vacillation of his conduct. He knows not which way to turn. Though he went to Copenhagen without any political object, his visit may have important political consequences. None of his Ministers were with him, and beside subordinate members of the Imperial household and the ladies of the Czarina's suite, their Majesties were accompanied only by two Aides-de-camp,—Obolensky and Stakelberg. The opportunity was one that might never recur, and the Czar's Danish kinsfolk took advantage of it to press upon him the necessity of making concessions to his subjects, a necessity which is perceived by all who are not personally interested in the maintenance of the present system. They spoke to him of the desperate state of the finances, of the depreciation of the rouble, of the condition of the peasantry, of whose discontent the excesses against the Jews are only a sign. To this last argument the Czar, who is a narodnik (popularity-seeker), and dreads nothing so much as a servile insurrection, was keenly alive; and in the absence of opposing influences, the counsels of his Royal relatives produced a decided effect. It also weighed much with him that the Nihilists being quiet (though, as he well knows, not from weakness), he might make concessions without risking the imputation of yielding to fear. The Emperor was further influenced in the same direction by the condition of his own Court, and the attitude lately assumed by Loris Melikoff, for the ex-Dictator is now regarded by the Government party as a "Red;" and he, and those who think with him, are watched with as much jealousy, and their correspondence read with as much avidity, as if they were dangerous Revolutionists. So great, indeed, is the ignorance of the Ministers, that they look upon Loris Melikoff as being not only the right hand of the Liberal party, but an accomplice of the very Terrorists whom, when in power, he did his best to destroy. His popularity dates from his fall, and the Government fear as much as they hate him. Of this popularity the Emperor is growing jealous, and he has conceived the idea that by granting a Constitution he may win some of it for himself, and so counteract the Revolutionary projects which are attributed to Melikoff and his followers. The Chiefs of the party held lately a meeting in a foreign city to decide as to the course which, in the altered circumstances, they should adopt. At this meeting were present the ex-Minister Abaza and the Countess N—, called at Court "la Grande Faiseuse," a lady deeply skilled in political intrigue and management. The meeting was strictly private, and the result of its deliberations has not been allowed to leak out; but it is clearly the interest of the Melikoff party to confirm the Czar in his liberal designs. To do otherwise, would be to play into the hands of their bitter enemies of the Government Cabal.

Be that as it may, there can be no question that Alexander returned from Copenhagen fully resolved to follow the advice of his Danish relatives, and that he ordered the Minister of the Interior to prepare a project of Reform. The old Conservative, as may easily be supposed, received the announcement of his master's will and pleasure with sore discontent, a feeling in which his friends and supporters, Pobedonostzeff and Katkoff, fully participated. Nor did they neglect to bring into play all the occult influences at their command to turn the Czar from his purpose, and put off the day of reckoning; and the great question now is, to which side will his Majesty incline? Will he persist in his fair resolutions or yield once more to the sinister counsels of his reactionary Ministers? It is a momentous question, and on its solution may depend the future of Russia and the fate of the Romanoffs. The following considerations will enable the reader to form his own opinion as to the probable issue of the struggles and the intrigues of which the Russian Court is at present the scene.

Since the Czar's return to his capital, events have befallen which can hardly fail to confirm him in his Liberal intentions. The reported arrest of the hundred and four officers and men, including the colonel of a regiment, at Timborsk is a fact of ominous import. Another colonel, serving in a brigade quartered at Odessa, has organised a revolutionary society, somewhat resembling the "Society of the South" formed by Pestel and the "Decembrists" of 1825. The colonel and forty other officers and privates of the brigade are now in custody, and there is a rumour, evidently exaggerated, in military circles that every man in the brigade is affiliated to the Society. Equally true is the news lately published by foreign journals (Russian papers are forbidden, under pain of immediate suspension, to make any mention of these things) of the arrest at St. Petersburg of several officers of the Imperial and Mingrelian Guards. If the Army fails him, upon whom can the Czar count? On the moujik, dying of hunger, and listening to counsels of despair; on the instructed classes, the Zemstvo, and the Press, whose lips drop loyalty, while their hearts burn with hatred?

One fact alone will show how little to be trusted are the loyal assurances of the well-to-do and instructed classes. There could be no better representative of these classes than Ivan Turgeneff, and the imposing demonstration at his funeral shows how great was his popularity with the masses. He always professed Monarchic principles, and when Katkoff accused him of sympathising with Nihilism, he wrote to the Messenger de l'Europe, a paper appearing at St. Petersburg, protesting his loyalty to the Czar. Yet it is now known—the fact has been published by Peter Lavroff, in La Justice—that for several years before his death Turgeneff was a supporter of the Vperiod, a Socialist revolutionary review, conducted by Lavroff. If he did not write in its columns, he found money for its production. Nevertheless, the great writer remained a Monarchist to the last; he countenanced Nihilism only because he had arrived at the conviction that without revolution there could be no reform. By treating reformers as enemies, the Government compels every Liberal to become either an active member or a secret friend of the party of Revolution.

The Emperor, it is said, was much moved and greatly discouraged by Lavroff's revelation, and he can hardly help being influenced in favour of Reform by the existence among his courtiers of so many Constitutional parties. For it is a curious and significant fact that the Russian Court swarms with soi-disant Liberals and pseudo-Constitutionalists. When the ship is sinking, the rats desert. In the first line comes the party of Loris Melikoff, whose ideal is representative institutions and a limited monarchy. But how far they are really prepared to go is uncertain. At Turgenieff's funeral, Prince Bebontoff, a leading member of the party, laid on the novelist's coffin a garland of flowers entwined in a chain, a proceeding which threw the Government into a paroxysm of rage, and was punished by the immediate exile of the offender to Siberia. This incident is enough to show the feeling that prevails between the Melikoff party and the party in power. It is war to the knife.

At the head of another party is Count Shouvaloff, a former chief of the famous Third Section. His views are less advanced, and his followers more powerful, if not more numerous, than Melikoff's. Their principles are based on three ideas—equally just—that the present position is untenable; that the Government can be maintained as it is only at great risk and peril; and that the Devil—that is to say, Constitutional rule—is not so black as he is painted. But they lack the courage of their opinions, for, while advocating the formation of an elective, and a nominated or hereditary Chamber, they would so arrange matters as to retain virtually intact the present political and economical system. They desire, in effect, while maintaining the privileges of the nobility, to curtail the prerogatives of the Crown. The Slavophil party, on the other hand, want to effect the impossible,—to have at the same time a despotic monarch and a popular Constitution. Their project is to convoke a Parliament elected by universal suffrage, whose function shall be purely deliberative. The Executive may listen, but it will not be bound to obey. The scheme is obviously absurd. No popular Assembly could consent to play so ignoble a part, and free speech and autocratic rule cannot, in the nature of things, co-exist. It is probably for this reason that the scheme has encountered the bitter opposition of the Government, and the mere mention of the “Zemsky Sobor,” as it is called, is forbidden to the Press, under pain of suspension. When the project—which the Czar, in the first instance, rather favoured—was submitted to Count Tolstoi, he observed that a deliberative Assembly was simply superfluous; that it would answer the same purpose if each province presented to its Governor a statement of its wants, which that functionary could forward to the Ministry, with whatever remarks he thought fit to make, and that the Government would thus be able to do all that might be necessary,—a profound criticism which procured for its author the appointment of Prime Minister. This is history, not anecdote.

Count Albidinsky, a former Governor of the Baltic Provinces, has also a scheme, perhaps the most extraordinary of all. He proposes neither more nor less than to divide the Empire into twenty kingdoms, each with its own Parliament and Viceroy!

It is probable that none of these projects has much practical value; their importance consists in the indication they afford of the confusion that reigns among the ruling class of the Russian Empire, the class from which the Emperor must perforce choose his Ministers and Councillors and the leaders of his armies. But to infer from this that a voluntary reform of the present system is imminent would be counting without our host,—the host in this case being the pride, ignorance, and obstinacy of the House of Romanoff. Nothing is certain. The present crisis may result in important reforms; it may equally result, after a few weeks of indecision, in nothing more than a change of personnel and a few bureaucratic palliatives.

In the meantime, rumour has it that the First Minister will shortly be dismissed; and a curious project is spoken of, for a Convocation of the Provincial Governors-General, to deliberate on the state of the Empire, and suggest measures of reform for the consideration of the Czar. This will be quite a new sort of Parliament, due to the inventive genius of his Excellency Count Tolstoi.

STEPNIAK.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE ON THE MONUMENTAL CHARACTER OF LITERATURE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE'S address on Literature at Birmingham, as President of the Suburban Institutes Union, was certainly not suburban. His general view, that the words and thoughts and imaginations and songs in which the nations express their various characters are by far the most important of the monuments of energy which they leave behind them, more characteristic than their greatest buildings, more characteristic than their tillage, more characteristic even than their art, may be true or false, but it is not vulgar or conventional. For our own parts, we should say that it is not necessarily true, and is sometimes misleading, if not false. Take the case of Rome. It is, we suppose, true that with the literature of Rome in our hands, and no other trace of Rome's conquests, we could give a better account of what Rome had aspired to do in the world, than her innumerable camps and viaducts and baths and amphitheatres and roads and mighty walls would give without the books. But would the literature without the mighty and wide-spread remains impress us with anything like the same sense of the dumb fidelity and energy of her legions? Is Livy, or Juvenal, or Tacitus, or even Virgil, half as expressive of the genius of Rome as the Coliseum, or even our own Roman Wall? Roman literature expresses the thoughts of the thinking and writing men, in a nation that had comparatively few thinkers and writers. But can the thoughts of the thinkers and writers express adequately the silent power and purpose of those who were neither thinkers nor writers, and who, if they had ever been given to studying the thoughts and writings of others, would have lived very different lives? You may say, perhaps, that the stately eloquence of Livy, and the terse intensity of Tacitus, and the fierce scorn of Juvenal, and the magnificent pathos of Virgil, reflect the attitudes of minds that could never have expressed themselves in words;—that Livy was a sort of mouthpiece for Tarquin and Coriolanus, Tacitus for Agricola, Juvenal for Trajan, and Virgil for Octavia or Augustus. But even granting this, the most characteristic monument of Roman energy can hardly be the voice of its interpreters, when the most striking thing about it was that it yearned after no better interpretation than that of deeds, and that even in its amusements it preferred the sight of blood and danger to the wit of the player or the passion of the poet. Of course, in the case of Palestine and Greece it would be much truer to say, with Sir Stafford Northcote, that by far the greatest monument which the natives of those countries have left to us is the monument of their Literature. The Books of the Old and New Testament strictly represent the characteristic achievement of the Hebrew people, the one achievement which has made a country not much bigger than Wales more important to the earth than the rest of Asia, Africa, and America. But even here the monument is not so much the work of the people, as the work of a few chosen minds carved upon the rocky hearts of the people, as the inscriptions in some of the Arabian fastnesses are carved upon the lonely rocks of that desolate land. The Hebrew literature is the monument not of a people, but of the inspired teachers of a people who required line upon line and precept upon precept, before any lasting impression could be made upon their minds. In the case of Greece, perhaps, the literature,—at all events if taken together with the art of Athens,—does more truly represent, if not exactly the achievements of a race, yet the true delight of the race in the achievements of its greatest minds. Homer, Herodotus, the great tragedians and comedians, the Parthenon and the Amphitheatre, Demosthenes, Plato, and Aristotle, represent probably more adequately the highest delights of the popular mind in Greece than any other literature and art in the world succeed in representing the highest delights of the people in whose service that literature and art have been produced. There was, probably, less of noteworthy character in Greece which found no reflection in its literature and art, and less of Greek literature and art that had no answering feature in the life of the Greek people, than we could find in comparing any other national literature with the actual life of the people. But even in relation to Greece, how much of dumb, inarticulate life there must have been of which we see only the fragmentary reflection in such writers as Plutarch or Athenaeus.

The truth is that Sir Stafford Northcote's notion of Literature as a monument of national character and energy, is only half true. It is really the monument of the character and energy of a few select minds, partly stimulated by their love or hate of what they see in the life around them, and partly by their yearning for that which they do not see, but have dimly heard of, and very much desire to see. Nothing, we fancy, can be more dubious than Sir Stafford Northcote's assertion that we can always tell from the literature of any age whether it approved wars of aggrandisement or only wars of self-defence, whether its commerce was greedy or only boldly enterprising, whether its civilisation was stationary or advancing. Take the case of Chaucer. He served in the army during the invasion of France by Edward III.; but could you gather from his poetry whether the English people condemned or approved that invasion of France, or whether they had not made up their minds on the subject? Take the poet whom we are rather surprised to infer is Sir Stafford Northcote's own favourite, Milton,—could we judge from his poetry whether the mass of the English people approved or rejected his own Puritanism, and whether they admired or disliked his own elaborate and somewhat pedantic learning? We might perhaps justly infer from Shakespeare that the aggressive wars of the Plantagenets, so far as tradition passed judgment on them, were not unpopular, and that anything like either Puritanism or pedantry was unpopular in England; but then, Shakespeare is the most faithful of national mirrors. Still we hold that all literature is by no means a mirror of the life of the nation, nay, is often a completely false light upon it,—representing often the writer's yearning for what he does not find in the national life, rather than his delight in what he does. Spenser will no more tell us what England was in the days of Elizabeth, than Scott will tell us what Scotland was in the days of George IV. Both writers were more or less dreaming of a life that they could not touch or handle, though they had the vision of it in their imagination. Spenser lived in the world of fancy, and Scott in the world of tradition. Thus, the latter doubtless built the monument of a generation that had passed away, while the former built the monument only of his own exquisite reveries. Shelley and Keats would not furnish us with any materials for reconstructing the early part of this century, and if we attempted to recast the life of the last generation from the writings of Ruskin, we should inevitably read it backwards, as well as represent it out of all drawing. Certain parts of literature are the monuments of what men have been; other parts are but the monuments of the revolt of certain imaginations against the restraints of reality,—excursions into the world of the might-have-been.

And again, there is a very great part of the life of every people which cannot get itself imaged in Literature at all. Sir Stafford Northcote virtually admits this, when he says that science and the arts, in this last hundred years, have been making great strides, with which literature has not kept up. Science and the arts are, of course, part and parcel of the life of the nation, and if there is no proper reflection of them in literature,—which there certainly is not,—then there is a large part of the life of the nation to which literature builds either no adequate monument or no monument at all. Minute, technical, monotonous effort, literature can commemorate only in its picturesque results; and hence a great part of life, and even of the most characteristic life of such a people as the English, is hardly reflected in English literature at all. Is it not this, indeed, which irritates the genius of men like Mr. Ruskin against such minute, technical, and monotonous life, and leads them to affirm that it ought not to be at all? Perhaps the false literary canon, "All that can be rightly done at all can be made fascinating in literature," is at the bottom of a good deal of the denunciation which is launched against the more dismal pursuits and industries of men. If so, those who see the falseness of this literary canon should protest against such large generalisations as Sir Stafford Northcote's, which really tend to inspire a sort of disgust for any sort of energy of which you cannot paint the fruits as at once beautiful and imposing.

MISCHIEVOUSNESS.

HARDLY any tendency in the human mind is quite so hard to explain satisfactorily as the one which the educated call Mischievousness, and the uneducated, with a clearer idea than usual of the value of emphasis, Mischievousness. It is, to all appearance, a self-begotten tendency. Certainly, no theory of evolution will account for an instinct so little profitable, and producing rather danger and loss to its possessor, than safety or advantage. It does not in most of its manifestations help any one to defend himself, while it does draw down on him that increase of hostility which so many of the arrangements of Nature are intended to avert. The raven gets nothing for himself by hiding things he can neither eat nor use; the parrot is not rendering himself safer when he makes the dog run about to imaginary calls; the monkey has won nothing in the race when he "makes hay" of the pretty things in a room, or twitches the tail of another monkey stronger than himself, and then looks away into space, with that innocent inquisitiveness which, be it noted, in spite of the cleverness attributed to these beasts, usually takes in the more experienced monkey. Nor does the boy benefit who hides his comrades' toys, spoils their lesson-books, fills their boots in the morning with water, thereby compelling himself also to fill his own, lest their dryness should betray him; or drops breakable things in half-open doorways upon their heads. Yet so strong is this tendency, that in some animals it can scarcely be checked by severe punishment—nothing, for instance, will cure a really mischievous monkey—that in some boys it is a leading feature of character; and that in some men it lasts far down into middle-life, and is only apologised for as freakishness in old age. It must almost have dominated Theodore Hook, and rises in some of the girls who pretend to be Spiritualists into a sort of hysteric passion. Men have been repeatedly brought up in Police-courts for freaks ascribed to drunkenness, but perpetrated in pure, wanton mischief; and it is to be noted that these freaks usually cause danger to the person attacked, or those around. The lad Moriarty, now in custody for wounding a gentleman he never previously saw, may have been "practising," as he says, or may have had some other motive, or may be insane, but his act hardly transcends some others frequently committed in the country out of pure wantonness and perversity. Boys have been known to fire hayricks, to set dogs on sheep, and to drop stones on passing trains, from no more serious impulse, and this, too, with a nearly full appreciation of the consequences. In fact, it is only because mischievousness is limited to a small number, that it does not become one of the more serious troubles with which the human race have to contend. A country in which every second young man or growing girl displayed this spirit would be almost uninhabitable.

We should have said that the cause of Mischievousness was an abnormal desire to enjoy the sense of power by giving pain, but for its manifestation in so many animals. It is difficult, however, to believe that the raven thieves from any such motive; while the monkey often, and the dog almost always, tries to hide away the evidence of his conduct, which is inconsistent with the enjoyment of power. That may influence the boy who fires a hayrick or stretches twine before a horse's feet, or the girl who collects a crowd of stargers by throwing furniture about, but it will not explain acts of pure "bedevilment," like that of the boy who sets fire to his own hair, or swallows ten peach-stones in succession. Nor will the commonest form of vanity, the desire to be an object of attention—or, as we now phrase it, the "craving for notoriety"—account for many of the manifestations of mischievousness which are intended always to remain secret, and sometimes are enjoyed in proportion to their secrecy. We should, therefore, be inclined to suggest another explanation. The truly mischievous are rarely bright, tricksiness, not mischievousness, being the attribute of the over-vivacious; and we suspect that in some animals and men there exists a duller form of laughter, a rudimentary laughter, as it were, which mischievousness provokes, and which is, therefore, enjoyable. The foundation of laughter is the sense of surprise, and it is to awaken this sense in themselves and others, in a rude and immature, but violent way, that the mischievous display their perversities. "I did it to see how he would look," or "I did it to see what would happen," is the frequent and true explanation of the guilty, and would be the constant explanation, but that the world does not accept it as an excuse, and the mischievous know that. Why Nature should evolve this desire to excite and to feel surprise, when surprise can in no way add strength to the animal or man who enjoys it, is, like laughter itself, one of those mysteries which the metaphysical evolutionists have not explained, and which, like that extraordinary fact, the apparent occasional existence of what we call "irony" in natural forces, is inexplicable on any theory ever offered, except the single one that behind the "Forces" is a Mind with a design.

"ON THE WANDLE."

ABOUT fifteen years ago, the following story was told to the present writer, with reference to the business which the poet William Morris had started and was managing. The firm had most unexpectedly become possessed of actual profits to the amount of fifteen shillings. This being an unprecedented occurrence, the partners met together and very seriously discussed how the sum should be invested. So prolonged were these discussions that the fifteen shillings had time to get lost before they were concluded, and ever since—so our informer said—the beadle of the square in which stood the premises where the sum was realised, has been looking for it. Seldom are such stories made up, unless they suggest what might have happened. And it is true that at that time Morris's firm were working out eagerly and fervently in their business high aims and principles quite new in the trade of the nineteenth century. These gave the real impulse to the work; the making of money was quite a secondary consideration. Indeed, the firm continued to cast its bread upon the waters many years before it found any of it again, as far as money went. However, all this has since changed. "Morris" has become a household word for all who wish their material surroundings to be beautiful yet appropriate for homely use, "neat, not gaudy," English in taste, not French. William Morris has long been recognised, by all who are at all intelligently watching the current of taste in this nineteenth century, as a poet who has succeeded in bringing poetry into the material surroundings of life; who has succeeded in making the things of common use far from common-place; a poet, moreover, who has made a successful and practical protest against heartlessness in hand-work. His power is proved by his many imitators. Nearly all the better kind of designs in the shops are, as far as they are good, cribs from Morris, just altered sufficiently "to prevent unpleasantnesses." His willow-pattern paper is taken very boldly, stamped upon a carpet, and a trellis of little squares added by the accommodator. Even Paris taste, that mixture of fantastic extravagance, persistence in mediocrity, and industrious finish of detail, took up the style of Morris colours some years ago, and flavoured it with the usual touch of French morbid cynicism by calling the colours "teints dégradés."

Down at Merton, on the River Wandle, is an old mill, formerly used, we believe, for the production of common printed table-cloths. In this mill are now made all the beautiful things which can be seen at "William Morris and Co.'s" shop, in Oxford Street, excepting the wall-papers. There is no actual dilapidation about the old mill, but certainly there is nothing in the place to contradict the principles of the "anti-restoration of ancient buildings society." Things seem to have gone on till they dropped, and then they were patched, the patches honestly put on, without disguise. Passing through the gates from the high-road, the mill and Wandle present themselves much mixed up together. The river as we saw it was shimmering in the sunlight of a bright November afternoon; little eddies of the stream carried light and glimmer into dark corners, round the many angles of the scattered building. Near its edge the stream is shedded over, to protect some bright-brown wooden pegs, turning on a wheel, through the mysteries of which bright blue stuff is dripping and splashing. The opposite bank is green meadow, where the trees are scantily hung with fading leaves, golden against the blue country distance beyond. In the meadow, close to the river, a group of three cows stands passively gregarious, outlined by a fuzzy edge of red gold, fiery against the misty blue background. A party of five white ducks, very orange-coloured about the feet, are quacking and waddling along the narrow footpath between the mill and the grassy edge of the river. We are confident that on the premises of no other such "thriving business" should we be allowed to come so near such nice things as ducks and cows and untouched river-banks. Here there is none of the ordinary, neat compositeness of "business premises." True poets and good workmen do not favour stilts in any line; it is not likely that the chief of this mill, who is practically both, should mount them. We turn through doors into a large, low room, where the hand-made carpets are being worked. It is not crowded. In the middle sits a woman finishing off some completed rugs; in a corner is a large pile of worsted of a magnificent red, heaped becomingly into a deep-coloured straw basket. The room is full of sunlight and colour. The upright frames face you at right angles, with a long row of windows looking close upon the bright-shining river. On the window-sill are pots of musk and some other greenery. Across the trellis-work of the small window-squares are thrown the pointed violet shadows of the few remaining leaves flapping loosely on the willow trees outside. The strong, level afternoon light shines round the figures of the young girls seated in rows on low benches along the frames, and brightens to gold some of the fair heads. Above and behind them rows of bobbins of many-coloured worsteds, stuck on pegs, shower down threads of beautiful colours, which are caught by the deft fingers, passed through strong threads (fixed uprightly in the frames, to serve as a foundation), tied in a knot, slipped down in their place, snipped even with the rest of the carpet, all in a second of time, by the little maidens. Twenty-five rows does each do in a day,—that means about two inches of carpet. One of the rugs being made is of silk, instead of worsted, very exquisite in quality of surface. The workers may be as tiresome as most young people between the ages of a girl and a woman generally are, but they do not look tiresome in this bright sunlit place, so near the shining river, but merry, and busily happy. It is a delightful workroom, and we turn out of it wishing we could go on longer watching the work done in it. Out again by the Wandle, and across a bridge where the trout are to be seen lying in its shadow, you pass through a garden; the paths and grass are covered with golden leaves, and the fallen chestnuts roll under your feet, a faded sunflower hangs its head pathetically over the stream, the cows are still grouping themselves in the meadow beyond. You pass an open door, and see men working over vats, and are told it is where the dyeing is done (how like a bit of Rembrandt light and shade); but we turn into another room, where the handlooms are working busily, the shuttles flying to and fro between the webs with a speed like lightning, as fish that make sudden darts in the water. There are many looms, and beautiful-coloured threads are being woven into beautiful materials on every side. Men work the looms; the only women we saw employed at the mill were those working the hand-made carpets. We go on to the rooms where the printing and the stained glass is done. Both are reached by outside wooden staircases. In the glass room, we see cartoons by Burne Jones and by Morris himself in process of being copied. There are many other rooms, for stores, in the old mill. In no part of it does there seem any crowding, either of things or people; the work seems all going on cheerfully and steadily, without hurry.

Turning out of the gates again, a few minutes along the high road bring us to the building where Mr. De Morgan's pottery is already manufactured, though the whole of the building is not yet finished. Hitherto, a little walled-in garden at the back of one of the old houses in Great Cheyne Row, Chelsea, has alone been the site for the kilns, out of which have come those tiles, plates, and vases which have certainly after their kind never been surpassed, even if equalled in beauty. The work in the new building is only beginning, not yet going along full swing. When it does, the quantity of pottery made will, it is to be hoped, enable many to enjoy it who till now have hardly heard of it. It is a separate business from W. Morris and Co., but at the shop in Oxford Street specimens of this pottery are to be seen. Already on the new premises you see the process of making the pottery from beginning to end; you see the black Stourbridge clay in lumps, then you see it cut in squares for tiles, or being shaped into vases and plates by the hand, in the old time-honoured fashion, on the turning mill-stone; then the tiles with the designs added, afterwards with the glaze, and finally, some hundreds packed in a kiln ready to be fired, a process which lasts some eight hours.

What is the real secret of the refreshing atmosphere which clings about these workshops of William Morris and William De Morgan? Wherein lies the immense difference in the influence on us produced by their work and the ordinary manufactured stuffs, stained glass, and pottery? In the work we have been seeing what a strength there is of individuality, and what an entire absence of common-place self-importance; what a natural way of doing things, and what a sense of distinction in all that is done! We believe that we have but to realise the impulses which are always pushing the work forward with fresh inventiveness, in order to account mainly for the sense of distinction and beauty which flavours it. The genius of inventiveness and the love of beauty are the ruling principles, not the making of money. The machinery used in the manufacture is accommodated, made subservient and elastic, to a standard of excellence which has no place at all in the ordinary manufacturer's horizon, but is quite outside and beyond it. If a piece of ordinary machinery can only in part carry out the conception, however easy and inexpensive the use of it would be, it is not used, but something else invented or adapted which shall carry out what is wanted as perfectly as it is possible to carry it out. If a dye is beautiful in colour, but does not give a fast colour, no time is spared in inventing a combination which will make it fast. The ordinary manufacturer, even were he to perceive the beauty of the colour, would see no advantage in overcoming difficulties and incurring expense in order to use it. He would ignore it as practically useless. He could not spare the time or money to try experiments. Just so, in the case of Mr. De Morgan's pottery, there is an inventiveness shown in practically carrying out his ideas which lands the work on a very high level of excellence, very different from the result we see where good designs are carried out by ordinary means. For instance, in painting clay there is a difficulty in regulating rightly the amount of colour to be put on in painting the design, owing to the ground of the tile or vase being opaque. Mr. De Morgan has invented a method of painting the colour on a transparent ground (which is afterwards transferred to the clay), on which the thickness of the colour can be regulated exactly, in order to give each tint its due effect. And so on through all the work done by these real artists. No time, trouble, or money is spared in making the work as perfectly true to the conception as human means can make it. But we must remember that before the difficulty of producing beautiful colours and designs is encountered and got over successfully, the beautiful colours and designs must be preferred. The sense which originally and mainly propels the making of these things is an instinct for beauty, a love of it for its own sake. It is an undoubting preference which directs their manufacture. The results are evolved out of individual choice, the means alone adjusting themselves as different requirements present themselves to the mind of the inventor, but the choice is peremptory. Here, at last, we can see some practical outcome of the principles of which Mr. Ruskin is the prominent preacher. Here are examples of what the human machinery can do at its best, heart, head, and hand all in their right places relatively to one another. Mr. Ruskin has insisted often on the fact that the true instinct for beauty is the outcome of healthiness in the nature of the artist; of love for what is pure, gentle, and solemn in nature; of a respect for individuality which encourages originality of invention; of a freedom which is earned by obedience to the higher laws.

No wonder that the character of this work done on the Wandle has a high distinction in it, if, as we believe to be the case, it is worked out from feelings and principles so very uncommon, so very different from those which inspire manufacturers as a rule. Too much of our civilisation in these days tends to an artificiality without refinement, to elaborated vulgarity, to luxury which is at the same time costly and coarse. This work, on the contrary, is uncommon because it is so natural, so indicative of the pure, ungreedy side of human nature, so real as an outcome of individual choice. We may like it or dislike it, but very certain is it that the inventor himself liked it; it is the result of a genuine preference; and therefore a bit of unsophisticated nature is at the root of its creation, not a volition based on a belief in any artificial standard of beauty,—on a belief in things which ought to be liked because momentous academies or individuals have ordained them as the correct things to be liked.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE NEGATIVE VOTE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The proposal of Mr. F. W. Raikes in your last number as to a "minus vote" is certainly novel, but it is startling to find it quoted with approval by the Spectator. Surely Mr. Raikes's own instance supplies a telling, if not conclusive, argument against his suggestion. I am no defender of the "obnoxious" views on religion held by the member of the School Board whom he mentions, but would it not be better to have a dozen Bradlaughs or Avelings on a School Board, than take so sure a means of rousing the odium theologicum, not to say anti-theologicum as well? That would be indeed the beginning of strife!—I am, Sir, &c., C. R. A.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The remarks on negative voting in your issue make me think it worth while to call your readers' attention to a pamphlet on this subject written by Mr. Greer, of Reigate, and read by him before the Social Science Association in (I believe) 1869. Mr. Greer's object is to express the unfavourable or negative opinion as clearly as the present system expresses the favourable or affirmative opinion. The plan proposed by Mr. Greer is that the voter's ticket should be arranged in the following manner:—

Against.	Candidates.	For.
120	Williams	517
256	Jackson	600
38	Grant	87

In this specimen voting-paper, Williams is elected because his affirmative difference is greater than Jackson's, though the latter has a larger affirmative vote, which is counterbalanced by a larger negative vote.

A short quotation from Mr. Greer's pamphlet states the principle upon which the scheme is to be worked. He says:—"The equality of negative and affirmative opinion would constitute a standard or zero, and the candidates would rank above or below zero, according to the quantities of the excess of affirmative over negative, or of negative over affirmative opinion. Thus, whenever the negative votes exceeded the affirmative votes for any candidates, such candidates should be deemed to be rejected; and they might, if thought desirable, be arranged in the order of the quantities of the excess of the negative votes."

One improvement could, I think, be made, viz., that the places should be decided by the ratio of affirmative to negative votes, instead of being decided by the gross difference. It is quite possible for lower figures to show a lower rate of opposition.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE CUMULATIVE VOTE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me a comment on your editorial note to my last letter? You say that the cumulative vote would secure the victory to those who have few, but enthusiastic supporters. I admit it, but is that an evil? Surely, what we really want is a Parliament composed of the 658 people whom the electors really believe to be the best men. To return men, as is now too often done, merely as poles to stick a flag on (as one modest candidate described himself), is to reduce Parliamentary Government to government by plébiscite, and to lower the standard of intelligence required in a Member. Now, the cumulative vote seems to me to meet in some degree that difficulty. The man to whom three or four votes are given is a man, as a rule, who is chosen on his own account. Mrs. Garrett-Anderson, in the first School-Board election, was distinctly a case in point. No one could reckon her in any particular party, she was chosen for her services in the past to the community, and for her expected services in the future. And, as party feeling has grown stronger in the School Board, and the pride in the institution itself apart from party has declined, electors are more and more disposed to distribute their votes among different candidates, and less to concentrate them on the persons they care for. I do not wish to make invidious comparisons, but where in the present School Board shall we find three such Members as Lord Lawrence, Mrs. Anderson, and Professor Huxley? Is the School Board the better for the change? Surely, you ought to ask not whether the cumulative vote would be tolerated, but whether it ought to be tolerated, at Parliamentary elections.—I am, Sir, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

[We do not think it a good thing that the favourites of a sect or a crotchet should be returned by the enthusiasm of a few, and returned apparently above the heads of those who are the sober choice of the many. We might in that way get, as in School Board elections we have often got—though in that case with much more justification—a good many purely denominational returns.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE ASSIMILATION OF COUNTY AND BOROUGH FRANCHISE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As this question is now engaging much public attention, and seems likely to take precedence upon the meeting of Parliament, I think that many of your readers will be glad to have their attention called to a pamphlet published by Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co., under the above title, and which, after careful perusal, cannot fail to commend itself to those desiring a concise and clear examination of this important and interesting subject.

It is written by Mr. Havelock Fisher, a gentleman who for some years has devoted himself to the study of political and Parliamentary subjects, and seems an excellent paper,—the most compendious yet offered to the public. The literary ability displayed is above the average, and the pamphlet is written in a philosophic spirit, rather than from a party view. The question is treated with a discernment and an impartiality that will go far to temper existing prejudices, and allay the exaggerated alarms of those politicians whose apprehensions have been aroused by the proposed further development of popular power.

The arguments are terse and forcible, and supported by well-ordered statistics. The views expressed are apparently sound and constitutional; and inasmuch as it has already passed through two editions (a third being called for), and furthermore has been dedicated by permission to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and commended by him and by several leading Members of Parliament, you will perhaps feel that I am justified in asking you to give it, by publicity in your columns, that fair consideration I believe it merits.—I am, Sir, &c., TRURO.

THE REPRESENTATION OF MINORITIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I fully agree with you that Mr. Parker Smith's scheme is impracticable, from its want of simplicity. If, however, the principle of minority voting is justified by the identification of county and borough franchises, as possibly it may be, why should not the larger counties be made the subjects of this process by a system of grouping, without the further refinement which Mr. Parker Smith proposes?

There are twenty-seven English counties which have been split for voting purposes into sixty-nine divisions, each returning two Members. What may be the effect of the abolition of non-resident votes, and the addition of the smaller householders, it is impossible to calculate; but as things are at present, if my guess at the relative strength of the two parties be anything like correct, the minority is most inadequately represented, for while it appears as if there were not more than five per cent. difference between Tory and Liberal strength, only forty-one Liberals were returned at the last general election, to ninety-seven Tories.

Why should not these county seats be grouped, county by county, under the arrangement that any voter, each voter having two votes, as at present, may give one vote to any candidate in any division of the county, the county in which the voter resides, though possibly in another division?

This would be a very mild form of minority voting, for it would be difficult to put it in practice among the smaller and more rural voters, while it would enable the more intelligent class to support their own side anywhere throughout their county, in which, be it remembered, I assume that they reside.

The division of counties for voting purposes dates only from 1832, and they are still one for many purposes of a local nature,—rating, jury lists, J.P. and D.L.-ships, Militia, and so on, so that there is not the same look of unfitness in the proposal that a voter should give one of his votes in any division of his county that he pleases, which there would be if it were proposed to jumble up half-a-dozen boroughs for a similar purpose.

It may be suggested that if there is no contest in the division in which one of these minority voters resides, he will not be able to give his outside vote. True; but on the first General Election after the change of suffrage there is sure to be a contest for every division of every county in England, and at that contest the strength of parties will be very efficiently tested. This would probably produce compromises for many seats at another general election; and even if, in order to poll these outside votes, contests were set on foot, the Corrupt Practices Act will have rendered them far less formidable in point of expense than they have hitherto been.

Some modification of the balloting arrangements would doubtless be necessary, but I do not see that this would involve any difficulty, beyond that of printing the names of all the county candidates on every voting-paper, instead of the names only of the candidates for each division.

I have only to add that the result of my calculation is that the voting strength of the Liberals in the counties referred to is somewhat under 270,000, that of the Tories somewhat above 280,000, taking the constituencies as they stood at the last General Election.—I am, Sir, &c., J. A. H.

DINNERS FOR POOR CHILDREN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Dinners given to poor children are a form of relief. They cost so much to the givers, are worth so much to the receivers, and are given to the children because of the poverty of their parents. Are they a judicious form of relief? I cannot think that they are. That is why I have been unable to support the scheme for feeding Board-school children, about which Mrs. Pennington and Mr. Allen have written in your columns.

The children most needing help in the Board Schools—those who are worst clothed and fed—are the children of drinking parents. It has been a difficulty for the promoters of this scheme to decide whether such children should share their bounty or not. The first children I heard named as receiving the dinner-tickets were those of a widow who had taken to such disreputable ways, that I had felt obliged to get her parish relief stopped, in the hope that she might be compelled to go into the workhouse with her children. It must be painful to pass by the children who want the help most, and to give the tickets to those who are less badly fed. But the managers of the dinners now announce that they carefully exclude the children of all parents who are not decently respectable, and that they visit the homes of the parents, in order to ascertain their character. Let us suppose that there is a respectable widow with children, receiving parish relief or not, but very badly off, and that it is a good thing to assist her. These benevolent strangers propose to do it by giving casual dinner-tickets to some of her children. But it seems to me the wiser plan to give the help to the mother, that she may do the best she can for all her family, including the little ones who do not yet go to school. And the help should be either a regular allowance, which she can depend upon, or temporary relief, when there is some temporary need of it. Those who are trying to know and help the poorest people in a locality cannot but doubt the expediency of one more casual, over-lapping charity, administered under the impulse of sentiment. We might with as much reason have a dozen other separate agencies,—one for giving milk to infants under three years of age, another for giving boots (the want of which interferes with education more than the want of food), and so on. It is a defect in charity, to be casual; it is another, and, perhaps, a more serious one, to ignore the general parental responsibility.

May I mention another scheme, which covers nearly the same ground as Mr. Allen's, but is not, I think, open to similar objections? It is proposed to open in the same populous neighbourhood a "Day Home," such as has already been tried with success in Hoxton. Nothing is more pitiful than the condition of the children of a widow or widower who is compelled to go out for the day to work. Small children are left at home, to send themselves to school and to see to their own meals. It is almost inevitable that they should have wretched meals, and that they should fall into the habit of being late at school, if not of playing truant for the whole day. It has occurred to some good people to provide a place where such children may have their food in comfort, and from which they may be sent in good time to school. It is a fixed condition that the parents should pay in advance what the humblest feeding of the children would necessarily cost at home, the object being not to relieve poverty, but to save children from desolateness and vagabondage. The children of the most disreputable will be received, with the appointed payment, as readily as any others, at the Day Home. I think that such an institution promises to meet in a happy way a definite and crying want. The ladies who are endeavouring to open a Day Home in this Lisson-Grove quarter are represented by Mrs. Montague Cookson, of 29 Rutland Gate, and Mrs. Edward Sidgwick, of 29 Gloucester Square. They require about £300 for the first year, and about £250 a year afterwards. They have collected a part of what is needed, but they want more, and I shall be grateful to any of your readers who will help them in their generous effort.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE OXFORD PHYSIOLOGICAL LABORATORY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Chapman makes a very grave statement with regard to our Memorial. The memorialists describe themselves as "resident in or round Oxford," and you mentioned a fortnight since that rather more than one hundred of them were resident in Oxford and its suburbs, and the rest "within a circle of about fifteen miles round." Mr. Chapman, however, tells your readers that "the fact is, that the signatures are not drawn exclusively from either the smaller or even the larger area, one of the so-called Magdalen signatures being that of a member of the Hereford Cathedral Choir."

I am Secretary to the Committee which promoted the Memorial. I took exceeding care that no signature should be sent in to the Hebdomadal Council from any one fifteen and a half miles off, and I say that Mr. Chapman cannot make good his assertion. I have no hesitation in conjecturing that it rests entirely on an error of his own, or some informant of his, in confounding the Rev. G. H. Lambert, M.A., of Magdalen, with the Rev. J. H. Lambert, M.A., of Magdalen. The former, who is Rector of Emmington, near Thame, did sign; the latter, who was a member of the Hereford Cathedral Choir, has neither signed, nor been asked to sign.

In that case, the curious question arises,—How comes Mr. Chapman to know of the signature at all? I did not mention it, even to my Committee, and the paper containing it went straight from me to the Council, without having been seen by any third party. If Mr. Chapman had derived the knowledge from Mr. Lambert, or any friend of Mr. Lambert's, he would hardly have asserted that the Rector of Emmington was the member of the Hereford Cathedral Choir. The conclusion is almost forced upon me that either Mr. Chapman has been allowed access to the memorial while it has been lying before the Council, or that the information has come to him, directly or indirectly, from some member of the Council. The former conjecture is impossible of acceptance, and, if the latter is correct, is it proper that the communication of a name by a member of the Council should, while the memorial is still before Council, be used by one outside as the basis of what is practically—whether Mr. Chapman so meant it or not—a public imputation on our bona fides?

The rest of your statement of facts was also correct, but Mr. Chapman's right to show the other side of the shield is beyond cavil. I am ready to give him, here or privately, a considerable bill of exceptions to both his sets of figures; but it would serve no useful object, and I do not want to keep up irritation for irritation's sake. As to the inference which was drawn, it is one which I also have drawn, but it is based on too low figures to be by any means conclusive, and for the same reasons I prefer to say nothing further than that about it. It is an unfortunate feature in controversies of this kind that one cannot help saying and doing things, in the interest of what one feels to be right, which must be disagreeable to many other people, and people whom one particularly regrets to annoy; and I am sorry to have been obliged by a statement of Mr. Chapman's to remark on it as I have done. I sincerely trust that we shall have a speedy opportunity of proving decisively which party is the stronger, and shall then return at once to our normal peacefulness.—I am, Sir, &c., EDWARD B. NICHOLSON, Bodley's Librarian.

P.S.—Since I wrote the above, the Hebdomadal Council—who might have caused my closing hope to be realised by next Wednesday, by acceding to the prayer of the memorial and allowing Convocation to vote "Yes" or "No" on the matter—have declined to accede to it. It would be childish to say that the Council are bound to submit any matter of dispute to Convocation when they receive a memorial asking them to do so, but here is a case in which nearly one-third of the resident members of Convocation signed, and in which the question at issue was not one of religion, or politics, or education, or finance, but of the University's view of the elementary principles of right and wrong. It is unreasonable to suppose that when those are in question, and when the memorialists have good reason to believe that Convocation would be with them, they should be content with a refusal to allow Convocation to decide. I am not writing now as Secretary of the Committee, for the Committee have had no time to meet, but, personally, I shall be glad if all friends who are members of the Convocation of this University will send me, at 2 Canterbury Road, Oxford, their names and addresses on a postcard. I must excuse myself from writing back, as my entire day is taken up with library work, and for months past all my evenings have been taken up with the memorial, but my silence will not mean inattention.

THE OLD NAME FOR THE MOUSTACHE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. Freeman, in last week's Spectator, tells us that in the days of Sir Roger de Coverley the hair on the upper lip kept the name of "whiskers." This was not the only name, however, as the following passage from "Robinson Crusoe" will show. I quote Macmillan's reprint of the edition of 1719:—"My beard I had once suffered to grow till it was about a quarter of a Yard long; but as I had both Scissars and Razors sufficient, I had cut it pretty short, except what grew on my upper Lip, which I had trimm'd into a large pair of Mahometon Whiskers, such as I had seen worn by some Turks, who I saw at Sallee; for the Moors did not wear such, tho' the Turks did; of these Muschatoes or Whiskers, I will not say they were long enough to hang my Hat upon them; but they were of a Length and Shape monstrous enough, and such as in England would have pass'd for frightful." (p. 152).—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

VOX VENTURA.

WHAT'LL I do wi' my vote, when I've got it? Nay, don't yer ask!

Tapping your beer's no good, till yer've got your beer in the cask;

Votin' agin my Squire sounds all very moity an' grand,
But I'll not talk o' my vote till I've got my vote i' my hand.

Harkee, however, my friend! Ye're makin' a speech, yer say: "Got to get up yer case." Well! can keep a secret? Aye! Then look here! Sit down! A pipe an' a pottle o' ale? Well, don't mind if I do. Here's to yer! And now, my tale!

Fust, my house! As I am, a pig fares better nor I;
Feeds as well, do'sn't work, and lives in a fust-rate sty.
We've one room for all. And wi' that, there's none as can Bring up a family decent; no, not if he's twice a man.

Then my garden! See, I'd like it just twice as big;
Handy when work is slack, and room enough for a pig;
"Muck is money," yer know, and then, a pig 'll eat
What yer cannot, or won't, an' he turns it all to meat.

Then, my childern! Bob, an' Sal, an' ten of 'em more;
Like enough they seem, please Heaven, to reach a score;
Parson says I mun pay their schoolin', but I don't see Why I should pay a penny. Why can't yer teach 'em free?

Then there's a cow, an' grass. The young uns look thin an' pale;

Wife, she says it's the want o' milk. Why, it's dearer nor ale.
Farmers send theirs to Lunnun. O' coorse they do; it pays.
So I'll go for a cow an' a acre o' land, to graze.

Politics? Well, see here! I were allers loyal an' true,
An' when beer were plenty my colours were allers "Blue;"
Fought for it, too, like a man, an' I made the old town ring
Hollering Church and State, an' all that sort of thing.

Jem, he voted "Yeller," an' talked o' cheapenin' bread.
Radical chap were Jem; how I used to punch 'is 'ead!
But, when I've got a vote, can't say, but p'raps I'll go
An' vote along wi' Jem. Yer must move with the times, yer know.

Work? Nay, I don't mind workin', as long as it ain't too hard.
Wages? I don't want nothin' as isn't a fair reward.
But my idee and the farmers' they don't agree alway:
They want yer to work ten hours, and get two shillin' a day.

No, Sir! That won't do. A slave is a slave, and lives
Just where his master tells him, an' takes what his master gives.
But when I've a vote, I'll show 'em,—I'll let my master see If he do nothing for I, then I'll do nothing for he.

Time for more? Well then, when a man's grown old, an' past Work, then I say it's a shame he should go to "the House" at last;

Tied up there like a dog, an' never go out unless Master gives yer leave, an' then in a pauper dress!

Sir, I'm an English-man, d'ye hear? an' I'd just as lief
Go to H—ll as "the House," so I'll have outdoor relief;
Four an' sixpence a week, an' a loaf a day, an' a ton
O' the best o' coal at Xmas,—an' more when that is done.

There, now yer've got it all; but don't yer say its fro' me:
Squire, he don't like folk as speaks their minds too free.
Now I mun stand wi' my hat in my hand, as he goes by:
P'raps there is some as 'll stand wi' their hat to me, by-an'-bye.

A HIGHLAND STUDENT.

Two previous poems described the lives and characters of two Students from the Highland district of Rannoch. The following poem closes the series :—

BUT one more grave, and that completes the tale
Of Student lads from Rannoch. Twenty years
And more have vanished, since from yonder farm,
The other side the valley, passed two youths,
Clad in grey hodden, from their own sheep spun,
To the ancient College by the Eastern sea.
Reared amid mountain lonelineses, where,
Save the shy curlew's call, or wild glead's scream,
No living voices come, they had beheld,
Winter by winter, o'er Schihallion climb
The late cold morn, as they went forth to toil,
Beside their father, in his swampy fields,
About the base of Ben-a-choulach,—
Broad Ben-a-choulach, that stands to guard
The north side of the vale over against Schihallion, its great brother-sentinel.
There, with all Nature's grandeurs round them shed,
And blending with their daily thoughts and toil,
Their boyhood grew; yet from work out of doors
Leisure of nights and stormy days was saved
For learning; and the village teacher lent
His kindly aid, till, ere the elder saw
His eighteenth summer, they were fit to essay
The Student life at College. Forth they fared,
Those simple-hearted lads,—a slender stock
Of home provisions, a few well-worn books,
A father's blessing and a mother's prayers,
All their equipment, as they set their face Toward that new Student world. How hard it is To climb the hill of Learning, when young souls
Have early felt the chill of poverty,
And stress of numbing toil, through all their powers!
The elder, Ian, was a climber strong,
In body and mind, to breast the steep himself,
And with a ready hand of help to spare
For his less valiant brother. Many a time,
When I had taught them lore of ancient Rome
Till past noon-tide, ere winter afternoons
In darkness closed, Ian would come and be
My teacher in the language of the Gael.
Strange, old-world names of mountains, corries, burns,
On the smooth side of Loch Rannoch, or the rough,
We conned their meaning o'er. And he would tell
Of dim, old battles, where his outlawed clan,
Along the dusky skirts of Rannoch Moor
Had clashed 'gainst wild Macdonalds of Glencoe,
And gallant Stewarts from Appin. Or he told
Of black bloodhounds let loose by Campbell foes,
From corrie and cairn to hunt his clansmen down
Through long Glen Lyon; and the frantic leap
Over the rock-pent chasm and foaming flood,
And the lorn coronach by his widow wailed
O'er fall'n Macgregor of Rozo. None the less,
But more for these brief Celtic interludes,
He plied the midnight hours, till four full years
Of strenuous study, by the longed-for hope,
A good Degree, were crowned; and by his aid
The younger brother compassed the same goal.
A few more years of poor and patient toil,
Within another seat of learning, gave
To each the full rank of Physician. Then
They took—the brothers took—their separate ways.
Early the younger on the world's high road
Fainted,—the battle was too sore for him;
He sank ere noon of day, and found a grave
Far from his own Schihallion. Strong of frame,
Well proved in Netley wards, the elder sailed
Physician to a regiment Eastward-bound.
There beneath Indian suns plying his art, Faithful and kindly, he from comrades won
Liking and much regard, and good repute
With those set over him. Step by step he climbed,
Till he attained an office high in trust,
In old Benares. Then the first to feel
The kind glow of his bettered fortunes were
His parents, whom he summoned to lay down

Their toiling days for comfortable ease,
And the cold Rannoch braeside for the warm,
Well-wooded Vale of Tay. A home therein
He had provided them—a sheltered home—
With a green croft behind, and bright out-look
O'er the clear river to the southern noon.
While there they passed the evening of their days
In quiet, month by month he gladdened them
By letters quaintly writ in Gaelic tongue.
English was but the instrument wherewith
He trafficked with the world; the Gaelic was
The language of his heart, the only key
That could unlock its secrets. When he met
A Gael on Indian ground, he greeted him
In the dear language; if he answered well,
That was at once a bond of brotherhood.
And when at length he made himself a home,
To the young prattlers round his knee he told
The mountain legends his own childhood loved,
With Gaelic intermingled. Then he took
And blew the big pipe, till the echoes rang,
Through old Benares by the Ganges stream,
With the wild pibrochs of the Highland hills.
While all things seemed with him to prosper most,
Strangely and suddenly there fell on him
A deep, fond yearning for his native land,—
Longing intense to be at home once more.
Just then it chanced that, sore by sickness pressed,
The old man, his father, to the Rannoch farm
Had wandered back, and laid him down to die.
This hearing, homeward Ian set his face
In haste, and reached his native roof in time
Only to hear his father's blessing breathed
From lips already cold. A bleak grey noon
Of May 'twas when they bore the old man forth
Across the vale, and laid him in his rest
Beneath Schihallion, among kindred dead.
There, while his son stood by the open grave,
Bareheaded, the chill east wind through and through Smote him, enfeebled by the Indian clime.
A few weeks more, and by the self-same road
Him, too, the mourners bore across the vale,
To lay him down close by his father's side,
In that old kirk-yard on the hillock green,
Where is the grave of Ewan Cameron.
Strange by what instinct led, they two alike,
Father and son, sought the old home to die!

And so they rest, all that is mortal rests,
Of those three Students, in their native vale;
Two on this side the Rannoch river, one Beyond it; and above them evermore
Schihallion's shadow lying, and his peak
Kindling aloft in the first light of dawn.

BOOKS.

OLIVER MADOX BROWN.*

ENGLISH readers have reason to be grateful to Mr. J. H. Ingram for his admirable edition of the works of Edgar Allan Poe, and for his judicious editing of the series of brief biographies of "Eminent Women." Their debt is now increased by this interesting biography of a remarkable youth, whose performance, not less than his promise, justifies a more adequate memorial than the brief sketch which Mr. W. M. Rossetti and Mr. F. Hueffer prefixed to their collection of Oliver Madox Brown's Literary Remains. That sketch was very charmingly written, but, from its necessary brevity, it excited, rather than satisfied, curiosity; and Mr. Ingram's fuller and more detailed record cannot be classed among literary works of supererogation. The biography of a boy who, dying before he had completed his twentieth year, left behind him such an imaginative legacy as Gabriel Denver and The Dwale Bluth, was, to say the least, well worth writing.

The mere incidents of the short life of Oliver Madox Brown were not in themselves more noteworthy than similar incidents in the lives of most lads brought up in refined English homes; but many of them have acquired a deep interest, from the fact that they served as realistic foundations for ideal superstructures which owed much of their power to the skill with which daringly imaginative situations were supplied with backgrounds closely studied from the life. The mistake of most young artists of genius is that they rely too much upon their creative and not enough upon their observing faculties, and it is to this temerity that we can trace much of the almost universal crudity of youthful imaginative work. Juvenile art is for the most part crude not because the artists lack the experience of maturity—for a little experience will go a long way—but because they disdain to use the experience that they have. Oliver Madox Brown had none of this unwise disdain; his life and his work were not disjointed, but closely related each to each, and while the former enriched the latter, the latter reflects upon the former much of its own interest.

This gifted son of a gifted father, who still survives—Mr. Ford Madox Brown, the distinguished painter—was born at Finchley on the 20th of January, 1855. That he was a singularly precocious child seems certain, though no stress can be laid upon the stories of “significant anecdotes and remarks related by his relatives in proof of his innate cleverness.” Every family has similar nursery traditions, while very few families produce a boy or girl of marked genius; but there is an anecdote of how, at three years of age, he gave a “shrewd and critical” description of a landscape painted by his father, which certainly does seem to indicate an unusually early development of the powers of perception and expression. In the house of a painter, where painters were wont to congregate, it was natural that an imaginative lad should be drawn to pictorial art; and though, when five years old, Oliver stubbornly refused to learn to read, he educated himself in his own way, by covering “the white marble mantel-shelves, and any other available spaces, with designs of hunts, battles, and subjects of that sort.” So far, there was nothing extraordinary, but, under his father’s guidance, Oliver’s artistic aptitudes developed so rapidly, that at the age of eleven he produced a design in water-colour, “Queen Margaret and the Robbers,” which, even allowing for the enthusiasm of the friendly critics by whom it has been described, seems to have been a work not merely of astonishing promise, but of actual performance. The next three years were years of rapid progress. In 1868, he being then thirteen, he began a drawing of “Chiron Receiving the Infant Jason from the Slave,” which was so mature that in the succeeding year it was found worthy of a place on the walls of the Dudley Gallery Exhibition. He exhibited again at the Dudley, and also at the New British Institution, at the South Kensington Exhibition, and at the rooms of the Society of French Artists, where, in 1872, appeared his last important design, a scene from Silas Marner, a work which we remember well as impressively original in conception and colouring.

It was not, however, in the pictorial, but in the literary domain of art that Oliver Madox Brown was destined to win the most enduring distinction. It was during the year which brought with it his fourteenth birthday—the year of his first Dudley success—that his family discovered in him a poet as well as a painter. He permitted his relatives to see six or seven sonnets which he had written, and though the young versifier destroyed all but two, “in a fit of morbid irritability or bashfulness, caused by their being shown to a few friends,” these two are sufficiently extraordinary productions for a lad who might naturally be supposed hardly to know what a sonnet was. One of the two has become fairly well known, as it has been published not only in the Literary Remains, but in the sonnet anthologies of Mr. David M. Main and Mr. Hall Caine, and possibly elsewhere. We therefore quote the other, which was probably written before, certainly not long after, the completion of his fourteenth year:—

“Made indistinguishable ’mid the boughs,
With saddened, weary, ever restless eyes,
The weird chameleon of the past world lies,
Like some, old, wretched man whom God allows
To linger on: still joyless life endows
His wasted frame, and memory never dies
Within him, and his only sympathies
Withered with his last comrade’s last carouse.
Methinks great Dante knew thee not of old,
Else some fierce glutton all insatiate
Compelled within some cage for food to wait
He must have made thee, and his verse have told How thou in vain thy ravening triedst to sate
On flying souls of triflers overbold.”

Perhaps because this sonnet is so much more ambitious than its beautiful companion, which was painted on the frame of Miss

Spartali’s picture, it seems to us less artistically satisfying; but that such a conception should be rendered at all in the verse of a lad of thirteen or fourteen is in itself so astonishing, that a suggestion of anything like want of perfect adequacy in the rendering seems almost impertinent. Though he had destroyed his little batch of sonnets, the young poet could not but feel that he had gained a certain assured command of the vehicle of verse, and when at the age of fifteen he worked out the plot of the marvellous story by which he will be longest remembered, it was with the intention of giving it the form of a poem. The intention was abandoned, and instead of the projected poem, Oliver Madox Brown, in the winter of 1871-2, produced the prose romance which, in its original form, was called The Black Swan, but which was afterwards rewritten, and published as Gabriel Denver. In the earlier version, Gabriel Denver, an Australian colonist, sails for England, with his unloved and unloving wife, on board the ship ‘The Black Swan.’ The only other passenger is a young and beautiful girl, Laura Conway, and the moment Gabriel sees her, he feels that he loves for the first time. At last he makes his love known to the object of it, and finds that it is returned. The wife discovers the lovers’ secret, and, with the mad jealousy which thinks of nothing but revenge, sets fire to the vessel. ‘The Black Swan’ burns to the water’s edge, and all that is left of her is an open boat, in which are Gabriel, the girl he loves, and their would-be murderer. For four days and nights the three suffer the torments of gnawing hunger and raging thirst, until the neglected woman, after drinking deep of the maddening sea-water, dies a raving maniac. The two survivors are picked up by a passing vessel, but the terrible ordeal has been too severe for Laura’s delicate frame, and she dies on board the ship that has rescued them. Night falls, and the crew are discussing the burial of the dead girl, when they are startled by seeing, poised high upon the dark outline of the bulwark, “a strange, black silhouette appear, and pause for a moment, a man carrying a dead woman. Her head and neck hang back passively, and long hair, bright with the moonlight, streams from it in the wind, while her hands fall dangling helplessly; this is all seen plainly against the sky, the next instant it is gone.”

Such was the weird, imaginative conception which formed the groundwork of the boy’s romance. Remarkable as the mere skeleton is in itself, the flesh-and-blood embodiment is more remarkable still. In the finished work there are no tentative touches, but each line has the decisiveness which characterises the work of a master of the craft, and every detail has been firmly grasped by the imagination, both separately and in its relation to the whole. In terrible consistency of sustained horror, it is not too much to say that it is worthy of a place beside Titus Andronicus and Wuthering Heights; and nothing is more noteworthy than the manner in which, while every element of pure tragedy is emphasised and accentuated, the effect of the moral unpleasantness of the motive is reduced to a minimum, by an austerity of treatment which is scientific, rather than ascetic. The unpleasantness was there, however, and when submitted to a publisher and editor, with a view to its appearance either as a magazine serial or in a volume, the author was told that its acceptance depended upon his willingness to make certain important structural alterations. Oliver Madox Brown reluctantly consented, and in Gabriel Denver—the title of the small volume published by Messrs. Smith and Elder—the aggrieved wife becomes a cousin, to whom Denver is betrothed, but not actually married; and instead of the fateful dénouement, Laura recovers from her prostration, rescues Denver as, in the madness of brain-fever, he is about to plunge into the sea, and after storm come rest and peace, and the joy of blameless wedded love.

Mr. Ingram expresses deep grief for what he considers the mutilation of the story, and high anger with the critics to whose suggestion it was due. We confess that we cannot share either emotion. Mr. Ingram seems to hold the opinion, which we should call extraordinary, were it not unfortunately so prevalent, that a work of art loses power and value by the excision of anything which revolts or offends the moral sense of the ordinary reader. There may, of course, be cases in which this is so. An immoral situation may have an interest which would vanish were the immorality removed, but it is an interest of a low and unhealthy kind; and to say of any author that he can only impress us when he gets outside the range of the Decalogue seems to us a very poor compliment. In the case under consideration, the psychological interest seems to us quite unimpaired by the alteration which takes the wedding-ring from Deborah's finger, and presents her as a jealous woman, though not a jealous wife. It may even be said that the story gains in consistency by the change, for in both versions Laura is invested with a stainless purity which becomes unrealisable when she is presented to us as accepting without protest the love of another woman's husband. In Gabriel Denver, the barrier between Gabriel and Laura, though real, is not so impassable, and there is therefore less to detract from her satisfying charm. Concerning the other alteration, there is more room for difference of opinion. We confess to an old-fashioned love for stories which, as the phrase goes, "end happily;" but there are undoubtedly instances—the play of Hamlet, for example—in which a happy ending would violate what we feel to be an abiding law of art. This may be one of them; at any rate, we will not quarrel with Mr. Ingram for thinking it such.

Gabriel Denver was followed by The Dwale Bluth—a Devonshire name for the deadly nightshade—which, if less impressive in some ways than its predecessor, perhaps leaves behind it a more confident assurance of what in the language of the Turf is called "staying power." Two or three other curiously interesting contributions to imaginative romance are included in the volume of Literary Remains; but it is as the author of the two stories we have mentioned that Oliver Madox Brown will keep his place in the history of English literature. He died on the 5th of November, 1874, of blood-poisoning following upon rheumatic fever, his twentieth year lacking two months of completion. He was, indeed, "a marvellous boy;" and there seems much evidence that the quality of his mind was matched by the attractiveness of his personality. Mr. Richard Garnett, not a reckless or extravagant writer, has said of him:—

"The wonderful precocity of his genius may be set forth, but the peculiar charm of his character, its sweetness and manliness, its alliance of the most daring originality to the most exquisite ingenuousness, can never be adequately represented, even by those who knew him most intimately. It was something unique and indescribable, and the objective and purely imaginary character of his writings renders them very inadequate exponents of his mind and heart. I should despair of communicating any just conception of him to one who never knew him, and can only say that I should expect anything sooner than to meet with another Oliver Madox Brown."

We can only add that the interest of Mr. Ingram's fascinating biography is increased by a portrait, which gives one an impression of life-likeness; by autotype reproductions of several of Oliver Madox Brown's designs; and by some memorial sonnets, written by Mr. D. G. Rossetti, Mr. Theodore Watts, Mr. P. B. Marston, and Mr. Ford Madox Brown.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY'S NEW NOVEL.*

IN adopting the autobiographical form for his latest novel, Mr. Justin M'Carthy has not done so rash a thing as most writers do when they undertake an evolution that demands for its success many-sidedness and judgment given to few. A calm sort of love-story, told by the lover, a fine, manly, sensible, observant person, who does not insist at all on his fineness, manliness, sense, and habit of observation, but who shines through the story with the lameness that is one of the author's peculiar gifts, is just what his habitual readers would expect Mr. Justin M'Carthy to execute to perfection. Deeply committed as a politician to a fierce and unscrupulous policy, the Member for Longford is as a novelist one of the mildest of men. A gentler spirit, or a better-balanced mind, we could not point out among the writers of fiction who have any real rank in contemporary literature. He is not incapable of sadness; no writer with the poetical vein that runs through all Mr. Justin M'Carthy's novels can be of the jocund sort; but of morbidity he is entirely guiltless, as, indeed, we may say at once of any affectation whatsoever. His taste is fine, his culture (the word is forced on us, though we hate it) is thorough and "all round," so that he naturally casts his thoughts and fancies into a scholarly and polished form, as pleasant to the ear as good music correctly played, but no "fine" writing ever comes from his pen. He is very capable indeed of mirth, and that of the pleasantest sort; one sees him beaming on the scene and the people before his fancy with spectacles benevolent as those of Mr. Pickwick, but also truly knowledgeable; surveying them with a quiet humour in which there is no gall and no intolerance; none of that vindictiveness towards the silly majority, that passionate desire for the summary extinction of fools and snobs, which we find among the harder and hotter satirists of society and delineators of men and manners. There is a great deal of live and let live—even for snobs and fools—in the cheerful, or rather the serene, philosophy of Mr. Justin M'Carthy; it is not "chirpiness"—for it is entirely out of his power to be vulgar, and nothing is more distinctly vulgar than "chirpiness"—it is a kind of mildly contemplative why-not-ness, very difficult to describe, but which we think nobody can read his novels without feeling. This benignity in keenness is salient in the present story, related by Kelvin Cleveland, a gentleman of varied experience, who, having sketched out more than one career in life—admirably told—but failed to carry any beyond the sketch, has settled down into that of a special correspondent. Only in love has he been constant, though unsuccessful, and we make his acquaintance when he is on his way back to Greece,—to the Parthenon, to the Maid of Athens. His companion is a dreadful English boy, Steenie Vale; and they have met, on board the steamer going from Trieste to the Piræus, a Levantine, one Constantine Margarites, whom Cleveland does not like. "Perhaps he is too handsome; a man has no business to be so handsome as that, at least in that kind of way,—the sentimental young lady's hero." He resembles Byron's Selim and the Corsair; as Cleveland does not like him, he makes him out to be Steenie's friend. "We both met him," says Cleveland, "for the first time at the same moment, and had made the same journey together. Still, it is pleasant to throw the responsibility of a disagreeable acquaintanceship off oneself and on somebody else." It is with regard to Steenie Vale, who calls Cleveland "old chappie," and is full of the doings of the "Johnnies"—by far the most detestable variety of young man of the last half-century—that Mr. M'Carthy reveals his benignity. Cleveland does not scorn him, snub him, or fling him over a precipice; on the contrary, he sacrifices his own feelings, tastes, and ways to the young fellow, and subsequently does him signal good, although this is how he behaves:—

"We were on the steamer's deck, straining our eyes through the darkness. 'Look here, Steenie, this way. Do you see that light; that one speck of twinkling light, far away on the left?' 'Why, certainly.'—'That light is,—hush, take breath; prepare for emotion.'—'All right, old chappie, go ahead; I can bear it.'—'That light is on Salamis.' Even Steenie checked his flood of irreverence. For two whole seconds he remained silent. 'There was a battle there,' he said, at length; 'I used to know once, but I have forgotten. The Greeks licked, didn't they?' We were on the soil of Greece. 'Awfully jolly, awfully like Wapping!' Steenie observed, delightedly. 'Is this Athens? Where's the Coliseum? the what's its name,—Parthenon, I mean? This is Athens, ain't it?'—'Oh! no Athens is miles off, yet.' After our first visit to the Parthenon, Steenie said nothing in particular disparagement of the place, but he observed that, after all, there was not a great deal for him to see there, inasmuch as all the finest things the Acropolis had ever had were now in the British Museum. 'You see everything best at the British Museum, don't you know?' Steenie observed, as we passed the Temple of the Wingless Victory, and came down the marble steps of the Propylæa together. 'That's a noble sea view, anyhow, Steenie. They haven't that in the British Museum.'—'No,' Steenie replied, surveying Salamis, and Egina, and Sunium, and the sea with cool, critical eye. 'It's a little like the view from Great Orme's Head, near Liverpool, don't you know? but not so fine.' It was Steenie's creed that the whole earth could show nothing new to him who was acquainted with London and Liverpool."

This youthful Philistine has so much in common with everybody else in the book that he falls in love with the Maid of Athens, a lovely and enthusiastic English girl named Athena Rosaire, with a wily mother, the drawing of whose character is quite the subtlest thing the author has done: this passion, and Steenie's recovery from it, form amusing episodes.

Of the story of The Maid of Athens there is little to be said, simply because it is an almost perfect piece of workmanship of a characteristic kind. Its tone is quiet, intimate, marked by the features which we have already alluded to, and the one bit of tragedy near the close of the third volume is led up to and then given with consummate skill. His Maid of Athens is the most interesting girl whom Mr. Justin M'Carthy has drawn for us since his "Fair Saxon," and he has not overdrawn her; the enthusiasm which warms and lights the picture is never unhealthy or affected, and the ever-present sense of the dignity of the girl, who espouses the cause of Greece after a fashion which exposes her to many dangers, is a beautiful feature of it. A scholar, a critic, a chronicler of his own time, like the author, must have had strong temptations to put scholarship, analysis, and antiquarianism into his story; but Mr. Justin

* Maid of Athens. By Justin M'Carthy, M.P. London: Chatto and Windus.

M'Carthy, when he is writing a novel, is all novelist; and although this book is adorned with touches which tell of him in those other capacities, they are laid on without cumbrousness; they do not retard or weight the story. We should like to give our readers several sips from the stream of observation, humour, and narration flowing through these pages; especially a truly beautiful passage relative to the Parthenon, followed by one which is supremely funny about how travellers take that world's wonder, also the episode of the death of Sarsfield MacMurchad, the young Irishman who perishes by the treachery of Margarites, and dies with a groan of lamentation that the blood which he clears away from his wounded breast, and lets drop from his dying hands, "was not shed for Ireland;" but we cannot do so, our readers must mark these fine touches for themselves. They will not fail to observe the instance of the author's poetic vein which occurs in the account (in the first volume) of Cleveland's absurd duel with Mr. Pollen, one of the "character" actors in the drama. The meeting takes place on the famous plain of Marathon, and Cleveland's mind has been wandering into the past, while the people about have been talking after their fashion; but he is wounded, and falls,—“The plain was reeling under my feet, and confusing noises were singing in my ears, and then a strange, sweet sense of drowsiness came over me, and I saw neither sea, nor sky, nor Marathon.” That the vision was as real as the scene, and faded with it, seems to us a fine idea.

There are several clever social sketches, types rather than individuals, though we think we could put another name to Lord St. Ives. Lady Lance, who has gushing sympathy with every nationality, is wild to have cremation established, and, being a steadfast atheist, holds that with cremation everything is done; Nellie, her pleasant, happy, lively, fast, but not vulgar daughter, who calls men by their Christian names, says So-and-so is “such a dear,” but is as good as gold with it all, and admires the Maid of Athens with rapturousness totally unleavened with jealousy; the Pollens, the Greek adventurers, the special correspondents (easily-recognised portraits, sketched with benign humour); the Clissolds, a fashionable artist and his wife, who have been taken up by “Society,” and talk peerage and upper-ranks slang to their humbler acquaintances; Mrs. Rosaire, and her ingenious way of accounting for marrying Sir Thomas Vale,—these and many others which we cannot particularise, lend the story a fine flavour of actuality. MacMurchad is in reality the gem of the book; but he will not be the most popular person with all Mr. Justin M'Carthy's readers. He will speak most audibly to those who, also looking at the Greece of King George, Vlachos, and Margarites, “see Marathon.”

MR. MATTHEW ARNOLD, in the new preface to his Literature and Dogma, says with that air of authority which suits his manner so well, and his critical principles so ill, that the fatal objection to miracles is that they do not occur. Whether they occur or not depends, we suppose, very much on what the true definition of a miracle should be; but that events all but indistinguishable from what the Christian world used to regard as miracles, occur in considerable number, and in connection with almost every description of faith and want of faith, would be, in the judgment of the present writer, the conclusion of any person of competent judgment who had given his mind to the impartial investigation of the subject, without any sort of bias either in favour of or against them. Take the present volume. Of the five cures here related, reputed to be miraculous by the subjects of them, and given with the full names and testimonies of all concerned, probably four would be considered by most medical men to be explicable on principles consistent with the rejection of any miraculous factor in the cure. Nevertheless, they would certainly regard the cures narrated as very striking and extraordinary evidences of the curative power of hope and faith, especially as in all these cases a long time has since elapsed without any subsequent ebbing-away of the rush of nervous energy to which such cures are usually attributed, an ebbing-away usually expected by medical men in the case of such cures. We will give a brief account of the author's own cure, as an illustration of this class of cases, as it is one of unusual interest, because the experiment with the Lourdes water was suggested and urged on M. Henri Lasserre by a very eminent Protestant, who has since been the Prime Minister of the French Republic, M. de Freycinet. In September, 1862, M. Henri Lasserre had so far lost his eyesight from some affection which the Paris specialists, M. Desmares and M. Giraud-Teulon, attributed to hypertrophy of the optic nerve, that he could not read three or four lines of the largest print without an excessive fatigue in the upper part of the eyes, which rendered it quite impossible for him to continue. He was recommended to try douches of cold water on the eyeball (prunelle), cupping on the nape of the neck, various other forms of water treatment, and alcoholic lotions, all of which were of no use whatever. It was when he had been deprived for nearly three months of the use of his sight for all reading purposes that he received in September, 1862, this note from M. de Freycinet (the Prime Minister of 1832), in answer to a letter dictated, but not written by himself:—

“MY DEAR FRIEND,—Your few lines have given me pleasure, but as I have already said to you, I long for a sight of your handwriting. This last few days, on returning from Cauterets, I passed Lourdes (near Tarbes); I visited there the celebrated Grotto, and I heard of such marvellous things in the way of cures produced by its waters, principally in cases of diseases of the sight, that I press upon you very seriously to try them. If I were a Catholic and a believer like you, and if I were ill, I should not hesitate to try this chance. If it be true that some sick persons have been suddenly cured, you may very fairly hope to increase their number; and if that is not true, what do you risk in making trial of the waters? I add that I have a little personal interest in the experiment. If it were to succeed, what an important fact it would be for me to record! I should be in presence of a miracle, or at least an event of which the principal witness would be beyond all suspicion. Adieu, my dear friend; give me news of yourself, and arrange for me to see you soon.—Your old friend, (signed,) C. DE FREYCINET.”

M. Henri Lasserre was not willing to make the experiment, and in a subsequent talk with M. de Freycinet and his sister, he told them the reason very frankly. It was not, he said, that he feared failure, it was rather that he feared success. “A miracle of that kind, of which I myself were the object, would impose on me the obligation to give up everything, and to become a saint; it would be a terrible responsibility, and I am so much of a coward that it makes me tremble. With a physician, I should be quits for a little money; but if God cures me, what is it he will want of me? That is horrid of me, is it not? But such, unfortunately, is the pusillanimity of my heart. You suppose my faith faltering? You imagine that I fear to see the miracle not succeeding? Undeceive yourselves, I am afraid of its succeeding!” M. de Freycinet's reply was very wise and manly. “You are not less obliged to be virtuous now than you would be as a consequence of the miracle. And besides, even if your cure were brought about by the agency of a physician, that would be just as much God's gift, and your scruples would have just as much right to raise their voice against your weaknesses or your passions.” Nothing could be more reasonable than M. de Freycinet's view, and it is clear that it was his importunity which induced M. Henri Lasserre to make the experiment. M. de Freycinet wrote with his own hand the letter to the Curé of Lourdes, asking for the bottle of water with which the cure was to be attempted; the letter was signed by M. Henri Lasserre, and of this letter we have a photograph given us in these pages. The cure was sudden and complete, though there was some threat of a relapse, which M. Henri Lasserre ascribed to a conscious moral failure of his own, following directly upon the cure,—a threat of relapse which was averted, as he believes, by the prayers of M. Dupont, and his own penitence for his fault. Twenty years have elapsed, and M. Lasserre, who has become the historian of the Lourdes wonders, has never found his eyesight fail him again. The cure will, we doubt not, be ascribed by physicians in general to the directly curative effect of faith on nervous diseases,—and perhaps that is M. de Freycinet's own view of the case, as it certainly did not make him a Catholic,—but though the disease was by no means one of those which would be thought beyond the reach of the influence of a great act of faith on the nerves, the story of the Protestant's earnestness in making M. Lasserre try the experiment, and the great eminence of that Protestant both as a scientific man and as politician, makes it especially interesting to the readers of this volume.

The one cure here described, which will, to most medical men, appear to be quite beyond the reach of anything like a stimulus given to the nervous powers by faith and hope, is the account of the cure of a carpenter of Lavaur (a town some forty miles from Toulouse). This man was cured of an exceedingly aggravated case of varicose veins, of thirty years' standing. Three medical certificates are given of the condition of this carpenter's varicose veins, which we will translate:—

* Les Épisodes Miraculeux de Lourdes. Par Henri Lasserre. Paris: Société Générale de Librairie Catholique, Victor Palmé Directeur-Général. 1883.

"I, the undersigned, declare that for about thirty years Mr. Francis Macary, carpenter, had been suffering from varicose veins in the legs. These varicose veins, which were of the thickness of a finger, and complicated with 'de cordons noueux et flexueux très-développés,' compelled him to wear up to the present time a regular compression ('une compression méthodique'), exerted partly by means of twisted bandages, partly by means of dog-skin stockings. In spite of these precautions, ulcers frequently showed themselves on both legs, and whenever they did, compelled complete repose and a long course of treatment. I have visited him to-day, and although his under limbs were stripped of all clothing, I have only been able to discover a few traces of these enormous varicose veins. This case of spontaneous cure appears to me all the more surprising, that the annals of science record not a single fact of this nature.—(Signed), SÉGUIER, Doctor of Medicine, Member of the Mutual-Aid Society of Saint Louis, Lavaur, August 16th, 1871."

The second certificate is as follows:—

"I, the undersigned, certify that for about thirty years Mr. Macary, carpenter, of Lavaur, has been attacked by varicose veins with enormous nodosities in the legs, frequently complicated by large ulcers, in spite of the compression exerted by appropriate stockings or bandages, that these symptoms have disappeared suddenly, and that to-day there only remains a nodosity, sensibly diminished, in the inner and upper part of the right leg.—Lavaur, August 25th, 1871 (Signed), ROSSIGNOL, Doctor of Medicine."

The third medical certificate is as follows:—

"François Macary, sixty years old, carpenter, of Lavaur, member of the Society of Saint Louis, consulted us about twenty years ago for varicose veins, which filled up the left popliteal hollow and inside of the knee and of the leg. We then observed towards the lower third part of this limb a varicose ulcer, with thickened edges, with considerable and painful engorgement of the tissues. There was besides, both in and outside the upper part of the calf, two large old scars, which had nothing to do with the affection for which we were consulted, and which were the result of a gunshot received by the patient twenty years previously. There were so many enlarged veins, and they were enlarged to so great an extent, that so far as we were concerned, the surgical means with which one treats this disease were formally contra-indicated. Macary appeared to us to be the victim of an infirmity which would last him his life, and we advised only palliatives which several of our brethren had already advised. Eighteen years later,—that is, two years ago,—Macary presented himself to consult us again. The state of his leg had grown much worse. We confirmed our former prognostic, and told him it was of urgent necessity for him to get the ulcer to cicatrise, to submit himself, as the only means, to absolute and prolonged rest in bed, and to the application of regular dressings. To-day, August 15th, 1871, Macary appears for the third time. The ulcer is perfectly cicatrised. There is nothing compressing the leg, and nevertheless there does not exist the shadow of engorgement. What surprises us, above all, is that the varicose knots (paquets) have entirely disappeared; and that where they were before, one can feel some small strings, hard, empty of blood, and yielding under the pressure of the fingers. The interior saphene vein has its normal direction and volume. The most attentive examination affords no trace of a surgical operation. According to the account of Macary, this radical cure was produced in the course of a single night, and under the influence of nothing but the application of some compressors wetted by water drawn from the Grotto of Lourdes. We conclude that, apart from Macary's story, science is impotent to explain this fact; for [medical] authors give us no experience of anything at all similar. They are all unanimous on this point, that varicose veins, left to themselves, are incurable; that they are not cured by palliatives, and still less spontaneously; that they go on getting worse steadily, and that one can only hope for any radical cure by the application of surgical means which involve grave dangers to the patients. And though the fact asserted by Macary would not be proved by evidence taken from any one else, still it would not the less remain for us a fact of the most extraordinary kind, and—let us say it out plainly—a supernatural fact. In which faith we sign the contents of the present report.—BERNET, M.D. of the Faculty of Paris, August 15th, 1871."

Macary's story was, that having been himself a cruel sufferer for the greater part of his life, and an unbeliever in Christianity too, he was immensely struck in his sufferings by the story of the Lourdes cures, that he procured a bottle of the Lourdes water, shied his bandages and stockings into the corner of the room, saying he should never want them again, applied the water freely to his legs, went to sleep at once, woke up to call out to his wife that he was cured, but was immediately overpowered by sleep once more, and in the morning found all the varicose veins and knots on his leg entirely gone. He got up early to his work, as he had not done for a great number of years, and he was found there by his astonished son. The sequel of the story is itself curious. He lived for four years without any return of his disease, but then died suddenly at the age of sixty-four from aneurism, i.e., we conjecture,—for we speak by no medical authority,—through the internal swelling of a vein or artery of a kind closely allied to that which had caused him such prolonged suffering when it occurred in the external veins.

We will not say that this is a miracle, for we find evidence of wonders of this kind in too many directions to be sure that events of this kind, even if they are authentic, happen through any specially divine force,—which is, we suppose, the sine quâ non of a miracle,—but we do say that it is a statement of a kind which Mr. Arnold is bound to consider, before he decides so coolly that the defect of miracles is that they do not occur.

We shall be asked what moral impression the volume as a whole makes upon us. First, M. Lasserre, the author, writes with much too rhetorical an air, and is neither so simple nor so manly in his narrative as to give us the idea of the higher kind of piety. But M. de Freycinet's testimony proves him to be a man of honour, and he appears to have taken great pains to get everything at first-hand. As to the religious atmosphere of the book, it is certainly not such as to suit English piety. Undoubtedly, the worship of the Virgin does seem in this book to have almost replaced the worship of God; and undoubtedly, too, there is an air of pettiness about the religious detail;—the importance attached to wearing the Virgin's colours, for instance, as if she were to be gained over by small etiquettes, and a very great many details of the same kind. None the less, the book seems to us, though certainly not to justify, still to explain, a remark which was once attributed to Professor Huxley,—namely, that if he could accept at all the class of events which go under the generic name of "miracles," he should certainly cite, as those having the best external evidence, not the miracles of Christianity, but the miracles of Lourdes.

GLOVES.*

THIS is a delightful little book. Mr. Beck, whose Drapers' Dictionary had already proved his capacity to extract sentiment and philosophy from a haberdasher's store, here writes of gloves, with the knowledge that can only come of love. He tells us of the etymology of gloves, and of the antiquity of gloves; he unveils the mysteries of perfumed gloves, and chicken gloves, and hawking gloves, and gauntlets. He ransacks history for information about gloves in the Church, on the Throne, on the Bench; and poetry and fiction for all the "divine nonsense" of gloves as gages, gloves as pledges, gloves as gifts, gloves as favours. He even comforts us as a nation with the declaration that, as regards gloves, our commercial position is strong. "In the thin kid, France still maintains unapproachable excellence; but in the stouter skin gloves, England still stands pre-eminent." It is well. This proud pre-eminence in "the stouter skin" is passing well. Yet somehow Mr. Beck's book, in spite or in virtue of its excellences, rather induces unpleasant dreams than awakes pleasant memories. Coleridge lamented the plebification of knowledge; what of the plebification of gloves? Does the word recall now-a-days Shakespeare or Ben Jonson, or courts of Love, or gages of battle, or even maiden assizes? Does it not rather bring to the mind, or at least to the tongue, the latest extravagance in Court or stage attire,—Madame Bernhardt and her six feet of gloves? Nay, does it not suggest the somewhat vulgar romance of the last Bank-holiday? M. Taine avers that we, as a nation, have still "the accent of the Renaissance as it left the heart of Spenser and Shakespeare," still "the divine sentiment of beauty!" True, our first poet has delighted to tell us how,—

"From the illumined halls
Long lanes of splendour slanted o'er a press
Of snowy shoulders, thick as herded ewes,
And rainbow robes, and gems, and gem-like eyes,
And gold and golden heads;"

and even that,—

"Many a little hand
Glanced like a touch of sunshine on the rocks."

But then, the dismal questions force themselves on the mind,—Did Ida buy "small sizes," did she carry about a button-hook, and would she have relented after all, and accepted the Prince, when he recovered from his death-like swoon, if he had required more than "seven-and-three-quarters"? True, also, we have an etiquette of gloves lingering amongst us. "She is no lady; did you notice, she kept her gloves in her hand?" is the verdict of the young milliner to her friend of the post-office, on the stout, florid, well-to-do lady, all satins and sealskin, who has just left the second-class carriage. It is still a serious question whether "a gentleman on entering a room should take off his glove before he shakes hands with a lady;" and Mr. Beck maliciously quotes a modern Piercie Shafton, who informs ladies perplexed as to their duty in this matter, that "friendship is so sacred, that not even the substance of a glove should interpose between the hands of those who are united by its influence." But the excesses of Euphuism indicated the decay of the chivalry they brought into ridicule; and the romance of gloves must, we fear, be going, when we think of them as things to be measured and buttoned, and not as "the mystic, wonderful" symbols of love, defiance, and purity.

Mr. Beck, as the historian of gloves, has been preceded by a Mr. William Hull, who in 1834 published a book on the subject, which was intended, however, largely to demolish M'Culloch and the Free-Traders; and something like the skeleton or plan of his volume may be found in Isaac D'Israeli's "Curiosities of Literature," and in what is there styled "a learned and curious dissertation compiled from the papers of an ingenious antiquary." Mr. Beck, however, frankly acknowledges all his obligations; and he has so improved on everything that has previously been written on his subject, that we may safely conclude his work to be a final book on gloves,—until, as Burns said of Delolme on the British Constitution, we get a better. The points specially treated by Mr. Beck, and even his general method, may be gathered from what we have already said. He exhibits a healthy, though not unenlightened scepticism as to the supposed extraordinary antiquity of gloves. Thus, in reference to the supposition that for "shoe" we should read "glove" in the book of Ruth (chap. iv., v. 7-8), and also in the famous threat, "Over Edom will I cast my shoe," in the 108th Psalm, he says, "The question is as little likely to be determined as that of the identity of the Man in the Iron Mask, or that other as to the authorship of the Letters of Junius;" although, by the way, this second comparison is not a very fortunate one. Mr. Beck stands on the terra firma of the tangible and the verifiable when he treats of gloves in the Church, on the Throne, on the Bench, and in the hunting-field. The gloves worn by Queen Elizabeth and preserved in the Bodleian Library would not please the advocates of what is tight-fitting for the hand. "The middle finger of the glove is four and three-quarter inches in length, and the thumb five inches; the palm is three and a half inches in width! The glove is close on half a yard long, the gold fringe at the bottom only taking two inches from the total length." There is also preserved in the Ashmolean Museum a pair of gloves believed to have belonged to Mary, Queen of Scots, and "of such liberal dimensions as to tell either against the skill of the glover or the beauty of the wearer." Under the head of "Gloves in Common Wear," we have an interesting account of what are known as Shakespeare's gloves, rendered still more interesting by a drawing which is admirable, as, indeed, are all the illustrations in this volume. These gloves, which were presented to Garrick by the Mayor and Corporation of Stratford in 1769, and are now in the possession of Miss Frances Benson, Mr. Beck inclines to consider genuine relics. "These were real work-a-day gloves, and have plainly seen some wear. Made of substantial leather, they are not altogether destitute of ornament. The scroll stitching on the knuckles has been in red and gold, two colours maintained throughout all the accessories of the glove. The ribbon marking the cuff is of yellow silk, and that on the lower edge of crimson, with a yellow fringe. The cuff is of double leather, with a pattern pinked in the upper skin."

Of the various chapters in which Mr. Beck deals with the symbolic or fanciful uses to which gloves have been put, that on "Gloves as Pledges" is, if not the sprightliest, the most valuable as a contribution to our social history. The following passage may be quoted, both for the speculations it contains and as a specimen of Mr. Beck's style:—

"There can be little doubt that the symbolism of security attaching to the glove in this, as in many other associations, arose from its being the covering of the most active and potent member of the body. The strong right hand won and maintained power; it confirmed agreements, and on the top of the sceptre of a monarch, denoted an authority able to reward or punish. It was the hand of honour, and the right-hand glove would appear to have been usually employed in covenants of all kinds. One of Du Cange's citations specially mentions the use of a left-hand glove investiture—indicating that such an instance was exceptional. Thus, the glove represented the hand it usually covered. They are hand and glove, says an old proverb, when an unusually close intimacy is to be denoted (Fuller, Gnomologia). Tenures held by gloves are common enough, so much so that Blount says, in the preface to his Jocular Tenures, 'I have purposely omitted, or but rarely mentioned, those more common tenures, whereby the owner was obliged to deliver, yearly, into the Exchequer, a mew'd Spar-Hawk, a pair of Spurs, Gloves, or the like; of which kind I met with many, and held them not for my purpose, which was to take in none but what were in some respect or other remarkable.' This—so far as this present work is concerned—ominous announcement, is happily neutralised by the citation of three cases in which gloves were the outward and binding sign of a covenant arranged and agreed upon. These are those of 'William Drury, who died May 7th (31 Eliz.), 1589, and held the manor of Little Holland, in the County of Essex, of the Queen, as of her manor of Wickes, alias Parke-hall, late parcel of the Duchy of Lancaster, by the service of one Knight's fee, and the rent of one pair of gloves turned up with Hare's skin;' of 'John Besett, who (amongst other things) gave to the King 8d. for his relief for 48 acres of Land in Elmesall, Co. York, which John his father held of the King, by the service of paying, at the Castle of Pontefract, one pair of Gloves furred with Fox's skin, or eightpence yearly;' and of 'Phillip Bassett, who held of the King, in Capite, the manor of Woking, in the County of Surrey, by the service of half a Knight's fee, and the annual payment of one pair of Gloves, furred with Grise, to be paid yearly at the King's Exchequer.' The manor of Elston, in Nottinghamshire, was held by the rent of 1 lb. of cummin seed, a steel needle, and two pair of gloves. These, and other like examples, are considered to have been remains of the ancient practice of binding a bargain, or transfer of property, by the delivery of a glove; but, as regards tenure, might perhaps have begun with the conditions of feudal service, under which lands were held, when the glove would again be representative of the faith under which the feoffee was bound to do true and laudable service whenever called upon to fight on behalf of his lord. With many requirements attached to the holding of land, which were either demanded by the physical needs of the lord—such as providing table luxuries at certain seasons, or doing stated domestic or household service—and more which were dictated by a spirit of buffoonery, often, with the coarse humour of our forefathers, becoming flagrantly indecent or immoral, there was a general symbolism in the ancient servage of tenants. This can be traced in the transferred horns and daggers and swords, which were such common charters of transfers, or gifts of land. Doubtless, in many instances in which the holder of land did yearly service in a manner that necessarily degraded him, there was still probably an undercurrent of purpose in causing him so to make submission. Grants and gifts were figuratively made to religious houses; the dower of land to a monastery was made by laying a sod of the given soil upon the altar. Knights figuratively offered their services to the Church; it was part of the religious ceremony in making a knight for the candidate to offer his sword upon the altar, in token of his devotion to the interests of the Church. The glove was sometimes, and at very early times, also made the pledge of a promise. In offering a gift of lands or other tangible benefits to Mother Church, a glove was tendered and placed on the altar, as a sign of fixed purpose; and we may be sure the good fathers furthered and upheld the binding character of the earnest of better things to come. In 1083, the Earl of Arundel and Shrewsbury vowed the construction of an Abbey to St. Peter at Shrewsbury, and in token of his intent, placed his glove on the altar of the monastery there (Dugdale: Monasticon)."

This volume gives a very clear and succinct account of the vicissitudes of the glove trade in this country, its present position, and the materials used and processes employed in the making of gloves. "At the present time," says Mr. Beck, "English gloves, of which the manufacture centres at Worcester, are without rivals, are exported to all parts of the world, and command higher prices than any other." People are apt, therefore, to forget that the glovers were opposed to Free Trade, and that from one cause or another the distress among them had in 1840 become so serious that a deputation of their number waited upon Dr. Carr, Bishop of Worcester, to ask him to present some gloves of Worcester manufacture to Queen Adelaide, and to raise a fund to relieve their immediate necessities. When Hull wrote, half a century ago, he thought machinery could never be brought into competition with operative glovers. But Mr. Beck believes that a German machine which has recently been invented, and which produces gloves entirely by automatic power, saving only one minor and unimportant process known as "felting the slit-welt"—that is, the turning over and hemming of the welt on the edge of the openings of the gloves—will ultimately supersede hand labour in this industry. Circumstances give a special value to what Mr. Beck says as to the decadence of the glove trade in Ireland, and the vague talk in the present day about the possibility of resuscitating it:—

"The decadence of the Irish glove trade has been attributed to French competition, not in general only, but by direct effort. The Irish workmen, says one apologist, are alone to blame. 'While the trade was still flourishing, the French workmen became alive to the superiority of Irish kid skins and the Irish method of dressing them, and came to our country to learn. Having gained all the information they sought they returned, taking with them several Irish workers, and with all the skins they could buy up in the Irish market. Such a proceeding, though in nowise reprehensible on their part, produced a comparative scarcity in the home market, and the skill of the Irish workmen, aided by the use of machinery (there was not any machinery in Ireland), enabled French manufacturers to produce excellent gloves in large quantities. The home makers raised their prices, which the trade refused to accept, and abandoned the Irish for the French manufacturers.' Hull, in his History of the Glove Trade, assigns a high place to the glove industry in Ireland; it gave, he says, 'extensive employment to many thousands of people in Ireland;' and he further states that 'the glove trade in Ireland not only occupied many thousands directly in the trade, but it gave occupation to an immense number of persons who went all over Ireland collecting the skins for the gloves, and on an average one million skins were collected and consumed.' These statements require to be taken with more than one grain of salt. The latter is obviously exaggerated; and we may conclude that all the figures are over-estimated, and give the glove trade of Ireland an entirely fictitious importance, unless the best writers on Irish industries are culpably silent on the subject. It is rare—and in this particular the writer can claim an extensive acquaintance with works of the kind—that gloves are mentioned at all in any account of Ireland's manufactures. It is absolutely untrue that any such prosperity attended the glove trade in Ireland within this century, and, indeed, Hull admits that it had in his time (1834) utterly decayed. To go farther back, Wakefield (Account of Ireland, 1812) says, 'Gloves are manufactured in Ireland, but not to any great extent.' Arthur Young's Tour in Ireland, 1780, does not mention gloves at all, and Lord Sheffield's Observations on the Manufactures of Ireland, 1785—treating of the products of the country seriatim—does not include gloves. It is fair, in considering the matter, to note that Lord Sheffield shows from the Custom House books a declared export, in 1783, of 22,510 dozen of calves' skins, sent almost entirely to Scotland and Ireland. These, we are free to admit, were possibly used for the greater part in the manufacture of gloves. It is further asserted that 'great frauds are committed in the entry of hides, and particularly of calves' skins outwards; there is a duty on the export, and it is certain that the quantity exported exceeds greatly the quantities entered in the Custom House books.' Still, allowing this illicit traffic to be equal to the legitimate trade, presuming that some of these skins were used for producing light leather articles and were wholly used up in glove-making, adding another like quantity to be made up into Irish gloves, and there yet remains a large balance to make up an average annual produce of a million skins, and equal difficulty in imagining the services of an 'immense' number of persons to be required in collecting them. In this year (1783) there were no gloves exported from Ireland to Scotland or England, the principal channels of trade, and by reason of the Navigation Act the only considerable channels of export. To Newfoundland, Ireland sent 48 pairs of gloves, and to Nova Scotia 1,014 pairs. From England were brought in 743 pairs, at an estimated value of 3s. per pair. A large trade, too, was done in French gloves, although the figures for 1783 are not shown. But in 1765, 5,747 pairs of French gloves were imported into Ireland, 5,030 pairs in 1766, 12,726 pairs in 1775, and 4,176 pairs in 1776, showing a large and generally stable trade. It would not be possible to cite higher authorities on Irish trade than those quoted, but it is remarkable that of the large number of tracts on Irish trade all are silent as to this great glove traffic, and it is most probable that even if the flood-mark of Irish prosperity in glove manufacture were again reached the country would hardly be sensible of it. The idea of making the industry a profitable or extensive one in these days must be pronounced altogether hopeless. It is very easy to advocate that a factory shall be established in every town of importance, and Irishwomen induced to make each successful by patronising only home manufactures; but Ireland has, unfortunately, no possibility of becoming self-supporting, and, in this respect, no hope of being able to encounter the competition of France or England. The only remaining connection of Ireland with glove manufacture is the existence of a solitary factory at Cork, and an inconsiderable trade in kid skins, which are annually collected, chiefly by French agents."

COCKS'S DIARY IN JAPAN IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.*

In the history of our relations with the Far East, one of the most interesting episodes, as Mr. Thompson well says in his preface, is that of our early and brief connection with Japan in the first quarter of the seventeenth century. These volumes contain a record of the only factory established by the English—that of Firando (Hirado)—previously to the Treaties of 1858. The factory, consisting of eight members, endured for twelve years, namely, from 1612 to 1623; but the Diary of its Cape (capo) or head merchant, Richard Cocks—at least, so much of it as has been preserved—which forms the bulk of the present work, covers only portions of that interval, from the middle of 1615 to the beginning of 1619, and from the end of 1620 to March, 1622, nearly two years anterior to the abandonment of the factory, which at no period of its existence had shown much vitality. The Dutch had preceded us at Firando (first made a trading station by the Spaniards and Portuguese about 1550), their settlement dating from 1609, and they remained there long after Cocks's departure, but finally removed to the far more commodious harbour and convenient commercial centre of Nagasaki. The Dutch and English were allied in hostility to the Spaniards and Portuguese, who claimed the commercial supremacy of the Eastern seas; but the Diary gives many amusing proofs, and some which are not amusing, of the bitter feelings of jealousy and hatred with which they regarded each other.

Before dipping into the Diary, a few words must be said about its author. Mr. Thompson supposes him to have been a native of Coventry, but we are inclined to think that he was a North-countryman. In a postscript to a letter dated from Fushami (Fushimi), September, 1617, and addressed to two of the "merchants" at Firando, printed by Mr. Thompson among the correspondence appended to the second volume, Cocks asks to be commended "to all our frendes, both hees and howes." Now, howe (hoo), which Mr. Thompson rightly supposes to be a descendant of the Anglo-Saxon heo, is a common North-country expression for she, but is not, we believe, often heard south of the Trent or the Mersey. Cocks was a man of some substance and position, an original member of the East India Company, incorporated on the last day of December, 1600, and a member also of the Company of "Merchant Adventurers." He was likewise "free of the old House," as he himself tells us in one of his letters. He appears to have enjoyed the protection of Sir Thomas Wilson, Secretary to Lord Treasurer Salisbury. On the whole, he seems to have been, as Wilson describes him, a man of honesty and judgment, notwithstanding King James's exclamation on hearing some of his letters read, that they contained the "loudest lies he had ever heard." His book learning was not great, but he had some; could quote Latin, possessed a few books, and tells us of his purchase on one occasion of "fifty-four Japan bookes printed, their antiqeties and cronocles from their first begynning, cost eight taels nine mace," which according to his own computation would be about forty-five shillings, decidedly a high price, if by "bookes" he means volumes, as is most probably the case. The ill-success of the Firando factory was attributed, with some justice, to the simplicity and carelessness of the "Cape" merchant, and poor Cocks found anything but a welcome on his return to Batavia, whence he took ship home in February, 1624, and died at sea, a worn-out and disappointed man, in the following month.

With the Japanese he appears to have lived on good terms, though the traders and labourers he has to deal with are described by him as a fickle, "brabbling," treacherous folk, not too fond of paying their debts. He goes to the play, but unfortunately tells us nothing of what he saw, and joins often enough in the Japanese diversion of witnessing the performances of "caboques," by which he probably means "Kabuki yakusha" (operatic performers), rather than "Kabu," as Mr. Thompson supposes. He never forgets, when he makes a journey, to bring back with him presents for his friends, "nifon catange" (nippon katachi)—in the Japanese fashion—and is especially careful to remember his Japanese wife, whom he calls Matinga, a name the present writer is wholly unable to recognise. To "nifon catange," indeed, he is always anxious to conform, but is not sorry when circumstances allow of his escaping an expensive observance of it. Thus, on October 16th, 1615, he tells us that a "fyre arrow" was "shot out of a sherbo"—whatever that may be—before the King of Crates (Karatsu, or Kuratsu) and the King of Firando, but that the latter, departing about midnight, "saved the geveing a present of two damoekt (damascened) fowling-peeses, yf he had staid till morninge." A true Protestant, he hates the Spaniards and Portuguese, or "Portugals"; in his letters, he notes delightedly that the "Emperour" is "noe frend" to either, and seldom loses an occasion in his Diary of saying an ill word about them. Sometimes he extends hospitality to a fugitive "padre," but when the 'Elizabeth' captures a Japanese junk having on board the two fathers, Zuffiga and Flores, his chief anxiety is to prove them to be Catholic missionaries, in order that the junk may be adjudged to him and his Dutch colleague as a prize. There are Japanese accounts extant of this occurrence which tally with Cocks's narration, and leave little doubt that forged letters were used to ensure the condemnation of the fathers, who were burnt, while all the crew were beheaded, and that Cocks and his Dutch colleague were at least accessories to the shameful plot. One can hardly wonder at the Japanese massing all foreigners together under the title of southern or western barbarians. The conduct of the Dutch and English sailors was an equal reproach to either nation; they were eternally drinking and brawling with each other or the natives. On one occasion the Japanese authorities lost patience, and seizing a couple of Dutchmen who had given "a skram or two to some Japons," had them "haled out into the fields and their heads cut off and sent home to the Hollands' howse," and this "notwithstanding the privileges which we and the Hollanders," says Cocks in a letter dated September, 1621, "have from the emperours of Japan, that the Japons shall not execute any justice upon our people." In another letter, dated October, 1621, Cocks himself complains "of the unrulynesse of many of our marrenors and sealers, and some of them not of the meanest sort, whose daillie lie ashore at tipling howses, wasting their goodes, &c." Severe measures were taken with but little effect. The Dutch beheaded a man who had killed an Englishman; an Englishman was hanged at the yardarm of the 'Elizabeth' for killing a Dutchman. Four Englishmen who were deserters were caught by the Japanese and hanged "by generall consent [of the Factory?], according to marshall law." Other defaulters and brawlers were flogged, and "then washed in brine" and flogged again. It must, however, be remembered that these men were taken out of the slums of London, were ill-lodged, ill-fed, and ill-treated on board, and had—what is still the case in many foreign ports—no place whatever to go to save a low grogshop when on leave ashore.

Cocks relates two journeys to Yedo, on either occasion taking the Tōkaidō both out and homewards. Though somewhat bare, the accounts he gives of these journeys are among the most interesting portions of the Diary. At Fushimi he saw a man "cursefied upon a crosse" for murder, and in another place "some eight or ten malefactor's heades set upon tymbers by the hieway side." "Yf it were not," he adds, "for this strict justice, it were no living among them,—they are so villanouse desperate." Much the same sights, we may add, were common enough throughout Japan up to less than twenty years ago. The fact is hardly credible to those who have known the country only since 1868, but so it was. Of Hacone (Hakone), so well known to Yokohama residents, who make it one of their summer resorts, he only notices "the great pond (a lake occupying an ancient crater some four miles long by one and a half miles broad) with the devill." Shortly after his arrival at Edo (Yedo), on the first journey there "hapned an exceeding earthquake," which became "soe extreame that I thought the howse would hove falne downe on our heads, and so was glad to run out of doares without hat or shewes." Twenty-two years before, he was told, there had been an earthquake in Bungo, in which a city of 4,000 "howseholds" sank into the sea, a mountain hard by was clove "in the middell," and "it rayned long haire lyke unto that of men's heads." Cocks had an audience of the "Shrongo" (Shōgun), Hidétada, Iyeyasu, commonly referred to in the Diary as Ogosho Sama, had died shortly before. On the latter, the author of the Jiugo Daiki (History of the Fifteen Sovereigns of the Tokugawa Line) passes the following panegyric:—"Was he not an invincible warrior in the field, an incomparable ruler in the cabinet, full of love for the people, the justest of men!"

With Cocks were admitted Eaton and Wilson, two of the "merchants." Hidétada "sat alone upon a place something rising and had a silk catabra (a summer cape, katabira) of a bright blew on his backe. He set upon the mattes cross-legged, like a telier." Cocks was greatly struck by the rich decoration of the "Emperours pallis," especially by the lavish gilding and the "paynting of lyons, tigers, onces, panthers, eagles, and other beastes and fowles, very lyvely drawne, and more esteemed than the gilding." Hidétada returned the obeisance of his visitors, but does not appear to have conversed with them. Of Cocks's doings upon this visit to Yedo, the best account will be found in his letter to the East India Company, dated January 1st, 1616 (7), and printed in the correspondence. The Shōgun had evidently determined to get rid of all foreign Christians, and Cocks had much ado to make the Court understand that although the English were Christians, they were of a totally different sort from those who held with the Pope and followed the "padres." The Government, however, were only half-convinced, and would not definitely confirm the privileges granted by Taiko and Iyeyasu.

Cocks saw a good deal of William Adams, who died during the existence of the factory, but gives fewer details about him than one would wish. He recognises the influence he had at Court, and no doubt held him in great respect. He did not, however, quite like him, and thought he did not use his influence in favour of his countrymen as much as he might have done. Probably, Adams was a little more anxious to be just than suited the "Cape-merchant."

Mr. Thompson's introduction is an excellent piece of work, and places vividly before the reader the situation of Japan at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The mysteries of Cocks's orthography he has taken no small pains to unravel, and, on the whole, with great success. The correspondence printed at the end of the second volume is, perhaps, more interesting than the Diary, but the latter is full of quaint entries, which will be read with especial delight by those—and their number is increasing daily—who have some personal knowledge of the country, its people, and their ways.

DISARMED.*

FALLING in love is, no doubt, a refreshingly novel sensation to each member of the human race, for at least once in his or her life; but that does not prevent it from being a sadly hackneyed affair to the race as a whole, and so also is the expression of it. "I love you," is not a sentence that admits of much variety of treatment; originality cannot well be imparted to it, even though it be contorted, reversed, and turned inside out, like Monsieur Jourdain's famous address to the eyes of his belle marquise; consequently, the alternate ecstasies and woes of lovers, which supply the chief theme of a large proportion of novels, are apt to become wearisome. Disarmed, however, takes us to other fields, and is welcome as a cleverly-written story, which supplies the seeker after mental recreation with entertainment drawn from less common-place sources than mere love-making, while yet it contains a sufficient amount of that article to conform to the orthodox novel requirements. The opening paragraph creates a favourable impression of brightness and vivacity, which is justified by the sequel. With those superior mortals who consider all works of fiction as things too frivolous to be worth looking at, we have obviously no concern, and do not expect them to agree with us. But we venture to assure individuals of a more "livious" turn of mind, that the sentiments expressed by Miss Betham-Edwards at starting, as to the delight afforded by "happy surprises," are such as will infallibly command the approval of any genuine lover of novels. Her commencement is well calculated to inspire serene confidence in its author; for one feels that she would surely not praise "happy surprises" as she does, if she did not intend to contrive some of them for the delectation of her readers.

Setting out with this expectation, it is less astonishing than it might otherwise be, to find oneself immediately taking a lively interest in the doings of an old lady of nearly seventy. Miss Hermitage, as she is named, is a bold and spirited conception of a character which, though, perhaps, not very likely to exist in real life, is yet not to be called altogether impossible. We have little doubt that the materials of which she is composed are to be found in human nature, even though they may not actually be combined in any one living whole. She is the daughter of a miser, and after passing a dreary existence till her father's death, she comes into fortune and freedom at the age of sixty, and determines to make up in a few years for the dullness of a lifetime. She will spend, make merry, and compensate herself as far as may be for the blank monotony which she has hitherto endured. The past repression has dwarfed her sympathies and made her heartless, but it has not deprived her of the power of enjoyment. She is quite conscious of her "sound, healthy, unflagging appetite for enjoyment," and rejoices over it, "like a girl just awakened to the consciousness of beauty and its power." Having a frame of iron, she looks forward to getting still twenty years of satisfaction out of her life, and announces that if she can do that, she thinks she need not grumble. Incessant, ever-varied amusement is what she covets and is resolved to have, whatever the cost may be. "Amusement," she says, "is another name for happiness. Why was I unhappy in my youth? Because I never got any amusement. Why am I as happy now as the day is long, though but a withered old woman? Because I am amused." Enormously rich, she squanders endless sums upon her own pleasure, without a qualm on the score of their being spent on an unworthy object. Here is a specimen of her morality:—"What were we sent into the world for, but to amuse ourselves? What were others sent into the world for, but to amuse us? Let those sophisticate who may about moral obligation and Christian duty. We bid them pack; and in amusing ourselves, do good all round, without taking any trouble!" Of course, everything unpleasant is to be banished from her presence, and she will tolerate no creature about her who presumes to make evident any anxieties or sufferings of its own. She declines to be accompanied on a visit to Paris by an old cousin whose society she enjoys, because, "At his age, who can tell what may happen? And with the best intentions in the world, he might die in the house!" To fall ill, be low-spirited, marry, or die, are social sins of the first magnitude, in her eyes. She is aware that people must be ailing at times, must have trouble, must pair off, must make an end; but she considers them bound "to perform their duties amusingly, or at least agreeably, and with due regard to the feelings of others." Cynical, selfish, unfeeling as she is, de-declaring that the very word "philanthropy" drives her mad, she would not be altogether comfortable if she gave nothing to the poor, so she "does her charities handsomely, to ease her conscience, and there the matter ends." That charity which she recognises as a duty she performs, it is true, but only in a most stand-aloo and unsympathetic fashion. Almost, if not quite, a heathen, she, nevertheless, accompanies a cheque for £5,000 to a charitable lady with the words, "Save my soul by your prayers." And though, as a rule, profoundly indifferent to her iniquities, as long as their unpleasant consequences can be kept out of sight, she yet, when alarmed by an unusually violent thunderstorm, has a twinge of some feeling akin to remorse, on account of a misdeed which troubles her not at all at other times. We have an idea that Miss Betham-Edwards may have a deeper purpose than is at first apparent in her portrait of this hard, selfish, worldly, evil, old Epicurean, and may intend it to remind those whose lines have fallen in pleasant places of a danger to which they are liable. For Miss Hermitage, utterly callous to sin and suffering as long as she is herself amused, refusing to be brought into contact with anything that can make her think of the misery that is in the world, grudging nothing for the gratification of her whims, and throwing to conscience a sop that costs her nothing, lest it should reproach her for her lavish expenditure,—is she not a very incarnation of that spirit which the enjoyment of wealth and prosperity has a tendency to produce in humanity?

Readers are referred to the book itself for an account of the masquerades and entertainments of all kinds devised by Miss Hermitage's white slaves to satisfy her insatiable appetite for amusement. Her individuality struck us so much that we have dwelt upon her at a length which prevents our expatiating upon these things, or upon the other people in the story; and we can only mention that they are to be found there, and that its interest by no means centres exclusively on her. A strong contrast is presented by Stephana, a younger lady, who is also very rich, but who is wholly devoted to philanthropical schemes and the good of her fellow-creatures; she is mesmeric, visionary, eccentric, and somehow not altogether human, in spite of her amiability. Then, too, there is Valerian, who must be accepted as the hero, inasmuch as there is no other male character of sufficient importance to dispute the position with him. He is, however, an unsatisfactory representative of that rôle; for, though clever and plausible, he is too shallow, weak, worldly, vacillating, and cold-blooded, ever to appear in a heroic light; one feels that the proud, affectionate, impulsive, true-hearted girl who finally falls to his lot is a great deal too good for him, and that one has a right to be irritated at her not being provided with a more worthy mate. We think, by-the-bye, that a happier title might have been found than Disarmed, as that hardly gives sufficient clue to the contents of the book.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

GIFT BOOKS.

Of the annual volumes of magazines, we are inclined to place first, for the variety and interest of its contents, The Magazine of Art. (Cassell and Co.) The frontispiece is an attractive etching, "Maiden Dreams," drawn by Mr. G. L. Seymour and executed by M. Lulauze. The illustrations well fulfil the promise of this beginning, and the letterpress does not fall behind in merit. Both are well represented, to take one instance out of many that present themselves, in M. Isaac Pavlovsky's account of the Polish sculptor, Mark Antokolsky. It is a striking history of the struggle of genius under difficulties, and the drawings that accompany it, representing the statues of Peter the Great and Ivan the Terrible, are very impressive. Of the other contents, we may mention articles on the "Country of Millet," "Greek Myths in Greek Art," "Sculpture in Piccadilly," "Elton Ware," "The Pipes of All Peoples," and a particularly interesting account of "The Slade Girls," i.e., of the women students at the Slade School in University College, London.—Good Words has, as usual, many attractions, the chief, perhaps, being Mr. Besant's novel, "All in a Garden Fair," of which we may probably find occasion to speak elsewhere. Miss Betham-Edwards has also contributed a novel, "Pearla," which we have noticed. No magazine seems to command the services of such a staff; none certainly offers to its readers a more attractive table of contents. It has, however, competitors which run it close, though not, perhaps, following exactly the same lines. To The Boy's Own Annual (Leisure Hour Office), for instance, M. Jules Verne contributes one of his inimitable stories, "Godfrey Morgan: a Californian Mystery;" Mr.

Ascott Hope, who is also a master in his own line, "The Tell-Tale a School Story;" and Mr. David Ker and Mr. Whitchurch Sadler tales of the kind in which they are known to excel. There are papers on cricket, athletics, and other sports. Useful things are well represented by articles on carpentering, matters of natural history, the keeping of pets, &c. Altogether, this is an abundant store of amusement and information.—The Girl's Own Annual (same publishers) presents, with an appropriate difference, much the same features as its companion volumes. "Bound to Earth," by the Author of "Phil's Fortunes," and "A Long Lane with a Turning," by Miss Sarah Doudney, are the chief tales; and there are papers of all kinds, with an abundance of matter, useful and entertaining.—We are sorry to see that The Union Jack (Sampson Low and Co.), which had been so excellently conducted by Mr. G. A. Henty, has come to an end. Young readers must be very well off, we might say too well off, if so good a magazine has not secured sufficient patronage. The volume before us seems as good as its predecessors. Mr. Percy St. John contributes a tale of life among Indians, "Sweet Flower, or, Redskins and Pale-faces;" Mr. Henty, "Jack Archer, a Tale of the Crimea," of which we speak elsewhere; and, among other good things, we have a continuation of the amusing marvels of the "Major." There are some interesting papers, written by two gentlemen who know their business, on "The Lawn Tennis of the Year." No notice, we see, is taken of the matches played by the American pair, though these were certainly worth recording. We agree with the writers that in a great tournament care should be taken that the second prize should go to the second-best man. If there are twenty-four entries, and these happen to be drawn in the order of merit, the second prize will fall not to the second, but to the thirteenth.—Sunday Readings for the Young (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.) fulfils its promise excellently. Both illustrations and letterpress seem to give what is wanted.—Routledge's Every Boy's Annual (Routledge and Co.) is an old favourite, which keeps up well to its standard of merit. Fiction is represented by Lieutenant Low's "Cyril Hamilton," and history by an interesting series of papers on "The Victoria Cross," from the pen of Lieutenant-Colonel Secombe. Colonel Drayson contributes papers on sport, "Salmon and Trout-fishing in North America" being one of his subjects; and Mr. R. Routledge writes on the "Electric Telegraph." With this book should be mentioned its companion volume, proceeding from the same publishers, Routledge's Every Girl's Annual. These two magazines are under the editorship of Mr. Edmund Routledge and Miss Alina A. Leigh respectively.—The Rosebud Annual (Clarke and Co.) is meant for the youngest readers of all, and should please them well, with its spirited drawings. They like to have their things good, even as do their elders.

The Jackdaw of Rheims. By Thomas Ingoldsby. Illustrated by Ernest Maurice Jessop. (Eyre and Spottiswoode.)—The drawings here are of decidedly good quality, the birds being, perhaps, somewhat better, or, anyhow, more pleasing than the "humans." The last, "S. Jym Crowe," is especially excellent. The finish of all of them is noteworthy. The artist, we see, signs himself "E. Maurice," but there is certainly the name of Jessop on the cover which serves for a title-page.

We cannot profess to have felt much satisfaction in looking at The Raven, by Edgar Allan Poe, illustrated by Gustave Doré. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Stedman's "comment upon the poem" which is prefixed is, of course, worth reading. His remarks on Poe's strange analysis of the mental processes which he represents as having resulted in the production of The Raven is particularly judicious. "My belief," he writes, "is that the first conception and rough draft of the poem came as inspiration always comes; that its author then saw how it might be perfected, giving it the final touches described in his chapter on 'Composition,' and that the latter, therefore, is neither wholly false, nor wholly true." Doré's illustrations are what we might have expected from his pencil, full of a certain weird fancy, but wanting, we think, in dignity and true impressiveness. Skulls and death's-heads and a skeleton Time with his scythe, for instance, are conventions which have now lost all their force. The fact is, we cannot but think that the poem is not one which well bears being thus translated into the definite shapes which the pencil produces. To take one instance, the lines,—

"And my soul from out that shadow that lies floating on the floor Shall be lifted nevermore,"

are not adequately rendered by a figure prostrate on the floor in a shadow (and such a shadow, by the way, as could hardly have been cast by any natural means), that falls from the owl on the Minerva's head. We are disposed to think that much pains—and there is plenty of good mechanical work in some of the illustrations—has been spent, without quite as satisfactory a result as might have been attained in a more suitable subject.

Dr. Stoughton very seasonably publishes a "new and revised" edition of his Homes and Haunts of Luther. (Religious Tract Society.)—The additions consist chiefly of biographical details, collected by recent research. Among the illustrations, the most notable novelty is a very striking portrait of the great Reformer, by Albert Dürer. This is a very interesting volume, which comes commended also by a handsome exterior.

Brave Lives and Noble. By Clara L. Matéaux. (Cassell and Co.)—Miss Matéaux tells us in this volume a number of stories of the Old World and the New, Robert Bruce and Christopher Columbus, and Walter Raleigh; and in more recent days, Sir John Franklin, and Michael Faraday, and Abraham Lincoln are among the heroes whom she celebrates. We need not inquire whether all the incidents which she relates are historical, or all the characters which she gives, just, but this is certainly a pleasant and readable book.

The Story of Roland. By James Baldwin. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Baldwin makes an interesting book of materials gathered with much pains, and skilfully employed. Round the figure of Charlemagne—the Charlemagne of legend, not of history—are grouped the knightly figures of whom Roland is the most picturesque. Then there are Ogier the Dane, and Oliver of Genoa, Duke Aymon, and many more. Many of these stories will be new to their readers, who, indeed, could hardly find a more interesting book.

King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, by Henry Frith (Routledge and Sons), is a modernisation, suited to the spelling and, we may add, to the manners of our own times. We do not know that it is better done than other volumes which we could name. "J. T. K.'s" little book is as good of its kind as could be wished; but there is no reason why this volume should not meet with a welcome.

Another old favourite in a new dress, perhaps a little more disguised than we might wish, is Far-famed Tales from the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. (Hogg.) Still there are readers who will welcome the fishermen, genies, viziers and caliphs, Sindbad, Aladdin, and Ali Baba, even though they have lost something of their genuine Oriental aspect.

The City in the Sea: Stories of the Old Venetians. By the Author of "Belt and Spur," (Seeley and Co.)—This volume attracts at once by its illustrations, with their quaint outlines and the brilliancy of their colouring. Some of them are familiar designs. "Carlo Malatesta taken Prisoner" is from a well-known picture, and there is the "Brides of Venice." But most will be as novel as they are certainly interesting. We may mention the quaint presentation of a ship entitled "In the Port of Acre," and the more realistic "Bucentoro." Another striking naval piece is "The Siege of Ghioccia," while in another line we have "The Marriage of Sir Jacopo Foscari;" and, again, in curious contrast to the mediæval aspect of this last, the "Doge going in Procession," from the original of Tiepolo and Canaletto, which is full of the spirit of the eighteenth century. The narrative deals with some of the most interesting passages of Venetian history, the doings of the City in the Crusades; one of its least creditable exploits, the taking of Constantinople; the wars with Genoa, &c. The writer tells the story with much skill, though we might suggest a slight improvement in the connection of the sentences. The "and" so frequently repeated produces a somewhat monotonous effect.

George Washington. By George M. Thayer. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—Mr. Thayer, who told so well the story of "From Log Cabin to White House," has now attempted a more difficult subject, more difficult because it has less of the attraction of novelty, in the "boyhood and manhood" of the first President of the United States. Bowes, Everett, and Bancroft are among those who have told the story of this great life before Mr. Thayer, and it is no small credit to him that he is able to hold his own with them. For young readers, this volume is, we take it, specially suitable. Many details—and the details of the War of Independence are often wearisome, except from points of local interest—are omitted, and the broad features of the narrative, as they go to make up Washington's heroic figure, preserved. A few words might have been given, as explanation, not excuse, of Benedict Arnold's conduct, indicating his unworthy treatment by the civil authorities.

The Ocean Wave, by Henry Stewart (Hogg), consists of Naval narratives, tales of adventure and of discovery, of peace and of war. The volume begins with Prince Henry of Portugal, and goes on to speak of the great discoverers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, Columbus, Nunez de Balboa, Magellan, and others. The second chapter is given to "The Old English Sea-Kings," the third to "The Buccaneers and Pirates." The voyages of Anson and Cook are narrated; a chapter narrates "Anecdotes of English Admirals from Blake to Nelson," and another is specially devoted to the exciting theme of "Lord Cochrane's Exploits." The claim of the volume to novelty is the account it gives of the naval operations in the Civil War in America, and the latest addition which it makes to the tale of Arctic adventure.

We have received The Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, by Daniel Defoe. Newly edited after the original editions. (T. Fisher Unwin.)—The editor, using the initials "S. R. B.," gives in an introduction an account of Defoe, which is brief and very much to the point. The illustrations are effective.

Sunday Magazine, Volume for 1883; and Little Snowflakes, being the Christmas Number for Children.—This magazine scarcely does itself justice in adopting this name. We mean that it is much more than a book for what is called Sunday reading, and it rather cuts itself off, by its title, from the general reading public, which is becoming much less narrow and severe in the line which it draws between secular books and those supposed to supply the only reading fit for Sundays. We have a strong feeling that regular Biblical education is terribly neglected, and particularly amongst the higher classes; but we also feel that, except during the hours devoted to study, no greater mistake can be made than that of confining young people to "Sunday," or "good" books. Now, there is nothing of a goody-goody character about the Sunday Magazine, except that there is a special department of it devoted to the religious instruction of young children; and we think its title a mistaken one, and calculated to frighten away two classes of readers: the class, that is so sadly extensive now, that thinks itself too scientific and philosophic to be deluded by the old superstitious beliefs in things called "sacred"; and the class of volatile readers that instinctively shuns any book that sounds solemn, dull, or heavy. Now, we have not, year after year, perused this ponderous volume without being able to assure our readers that there is nothing "preachy" or "goody-goody" about the Sunday Magazine, and that they will find as much secular matter in it, as universal, varied, and interesting, as they can desire. The large number of Reverend Gentlemen—even of Reverend Doctors—who figure in the list of authors, no doubt alarms ordinary readers with the ponderous learning and severe morality that they conclude is to be brought to bear upon them. Here, again, let us assure them that we find "the Cloth" using its influence and power in all kinds of secular directions; and we observe, not unfrequently, that these gentlemen can be very lively and amusing, and are much brighter and cleverer, and talk much more to the purpose on ordinary topics, in a magazine or review, than when speaking with assumed authority from the pulpit. We do not wish to deny that in the stories, biographies, travels, &c., there is a preponderance on the side of subjects with a religious tendency or reference; but they are far from being, therefore, without piquancy or excitement for the most hearty hater of all that is solemn. And there is an abundance of matter that is not serious in any way. The very tale, "How It All Came Round," that is the pièce de résistance of this volume—though we do not by any means entirely agree with its doctrinal teaching, and though we cannot but smile at the extraordinary and innumerable coincidences which help on its remarkable plot—contrives to rivet our interest to an extent that we do not nearly always realise in the very secular stories that flaunt their gay bindings on W. H. Smith and Son's bookstalls. The illustrations are many of them of great beauty, and the poetry certainly advances on that of former years, and contains pieces of true poetic power, as well as feeling. Little Snowflakes is exceedingly good, on the whole, and contains a delightful little story, called "Scarlet Anemones," by the authoress of the long serial story in the Sunday Magazine, which we have been noticing, L. T. Meade. "Bizzy"—short for Bismarck—is another charming story. "The Big Peasant and the Little Duke" is the only blot in this little book. There is no moral purpose served to balance the pain it inflicts; and seems anything but a successful effort towards making Christmas happy to the young reader.

TALES PUBLISHED BY THE SOCIETY FOR THE PROMOTION OF CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.—Paths in the Great Waters. By E. A. Hoare, M.A.—This is a story of the colonisation of Virginia. Mr. Hoare mixes together, after the manner of his craft, real and imaginary persons, and makes a tale which will probably please many readers.—Pirates' Creek, by S. W. Sadler, R.N., is an old-fashioned story of adventure. The hero leaves his desk in a merchant's office, very much to his delight, to search for a concealed treasure. He meets, of course, with a number of adverse adventures, which he and the reader endure with equanimity, aware that a good Providence, in the shape of an author, is bound not to allow him to come to any permanent harm. Mr. Sadler is, of course, at home in most of the scenes which he describes, and the more romantic adventures it is easy to take for granted. The number of people who know by actual experience how buried treasures are found is probably few, and the proportion of them who are to be found among the readers of this book almost infinitesimal.—Home and School.—This is described as a sequel to "The Snowball Society," a tale which we are sorry to have missed, if it is as good as that which is now before us. The writer takes for her subject one which Miss Yonge has brought into fashion, the fortunes of a numerous middle-class family (whose money, by the way, seems to have gone much further than one would have expected). The speciality of the story is the doings of two of the girls at a newly-founded High School. And very brightly and cleverly these are told. This "story for girls" is one that can be heartily recommended to them, and, indeed, to other readers.—We Little Ones. By L. H. A. Payne.—This is a capital "nursery" story. "Lilla" tells the story of her childhood, spent in company with her two brothers,—

"Jerks," one of those boys whose joints are said to be hung on wires; and a steady, sober, little fellow, who is called "Tim," because his name is Llewellyn. These and a long-suffering nurse are the principal actors in the little drama, the more dignified personages, papa, mamma, and brothers and sisters more or less remote from the nursery, occasionally intervening. The chief event in the young lady's life is her stealing, or "lifting," as she puts it, a coffee-berry from a grocer's counter, a misdeed that causes her agonies of remorse. All this is admirably described, with what we should say is just the right mixture of humour and seriousness. Humour, indeed, and good sense, and a happy art of suggesting without intruding a moral, characterise We Little Ones from beginning to end.—A Valley of Diamonds, by Crona Temple, is an effective picture of a clergyman's work in a "Black Country" town, not without many sad things—and, indeed, to be at all near to the truth, it could not be without such—but brightened with a spirit of hope and faith in better things. Lancelot Pearse, the hero of the story, is a fine, large-hearted fellow, and makes a satisfactory ideal of a working parson, not the less satisfactory because we are not allowed to suppose him perfect.—A Six Months' Friend, by Helen Shipton, and Kate Temple's Mate, by the Author of "Clary's Confirmation," &c., are two stories of humble life. Both are good of their kind, the former, perhaps, having the advantage, not only in the figure of its principal hero, which is particularly well conceived, but in the wider scope of its moral. The motive of the latter, on the other hand, is more definite. Kate Temple loses her lover, who is attracted by her own special friend, but finds afterwards that she has every reason to congratulate herself, seeing that the man turns out to be an irreclaimable drunkard. She forgives and helps in her need the faithless friend, while the drunken husband acts as an example to warn a younger sister from making the same mistake. If one can hope that any preaching by books or voice can turn a girl from the hopeless folly of marrying a man who drinks, then Kate Temple's Mate should be useful.—Carl Forest's Faith, by Mary Linskill, is in a measure the story of real experiences, the early struggles of Ole Bull, the Norwegian violinist. Carl is the son of an English clergyman. From his German mother he inherits a love of music, which, indeed, is developed in him into genius. He has to pass through deep waters of trouble, sorrow, solitude, and almost starvation, before he finds his place in the world. These troubles are related in a simple, unpretending manner, which makes them very pathetic.—Olive Smith. By H. L. Child-Pemberton. —We must own that we do not care much for transformation-scenes. Olive Smith, whom Mr. Smith finds with a mother dying from the effects of a carriage accident on the road, is found to turn into something "rich and rare." And as she is also "an ugly duckling," she will, we are sure, become a very comely swan. In the face of such well-grounded expectations there can be no real surprise, and the story accordingly falls somewhat flat. The author, too, makes the mistake of separating the nice characters from the disagreeables far too sharply. The good-natured vulgarity of Mrs. Smith, and the ill-natured vulgarity of Kate Myers, have something of the effect of a caricature.—Lucile, by Mary Davison, is a very simple story, its most thrilling incident being, perhaps, the heroine's losing her purse—and finding it again—in Richmond Park. But it is gracefully told, and leaves a good impression on the reader.—His First Offence, by Ruth Lamb, is more eventful and striking. It is a tale of conscience; a man commits a fraud which escapes detection; he gives up the evil ways which led to the crime, prospers, and marries happily. Then his happiness, and the companionship of a good woman who believes him also to be good, force him to confession and restitution. This "true tale of city life" is one that should not have been told in vain.—Lia: a Tale of Nuremberg. By Esmé Stuart.—Nuremberg, in the days toward the end of the fifteenth century, when the thoughts that were to bring about the Reformation were stirring more and more in the hearts of men, is made the scene of this story. The author imposes on herself the most difficult of tasks that a writer of fiction can encounter, the making a long-past generation live again before our eyes. She has attained a fair, but not more than a fair, success. The main interest of the story is the love of a Nuremberg sculptor for a Jewish maiden, Lia by name. So far as incident goes, this story is well contrived and interesting; but the characters do not impress us as having much reality about them. Sometimes it is quite impossible to realise them. How can the most lively imagination picture to itself a face such as we are told was the characteristic of Rabbi Santa, Lia's brother, a face in which "there was a look of low cunning mixed with extreme pride"? Pride and cunning never went together in looks, or, we might venture to say, in disposition.—Two Old Maids, by Annette Lyster, is the story of a young woman who, following too faithfully the counsels of her worldly father, is proof against the better influences of her aunts, the "two old maids" of the story, contrives to make a marriage that seems very advantageous, and finds out that she has committed a great mistake. Worldly fathers, happily, do not often leave behind them instructions which are to make their daughters follow their steps; and, equally happily, daughters would seldom resist gracious influences in the present, in order to be faithful to the ungracious influences of the past. So far, this tale seems to us somewhat far-fetched; but, apart from this, it has considerable merits.—Miss July, by the author of "Mrs. Chrichton," &c., is a love-story, perfectly wholesome and proper, but not distinguishable, as far as we can see, from those that appear under secular auspices.—Under Canvass, by F. Bayford Harrison, is a tale of a lad who falls in with gipsies, and is turned into a burglar against his will. All of course ends well, and not only the boy, but also the little girl whom he finds already an inmate of the gipsy's tent, are restored to their proper belongings.—A Tale of the "Fifteen," by "C. M.," sufficiently describes itself by its title.—Brave John Norse, and other Tales, is a collection of short stories "founded on fact."—Stick to Thy Last, and other Stories, adapted from the German, by "H. I. M. G.," is a collection of short tales, in which various distinguished persons figure. A King of Bavaria who shows that he cannot keep a flock of geese in order, a Margrave of Baden, Admiral Von Ruyter, Horace Vernet, and an Archbishop of Treves, with various humble persons with whom they came into contact, are the heroes of these stories. With this may be classed The Rehearsal, adapted from the German by the author of "A Queen." The first story relates an experience of the early days of Handel; the second, "Flauto Solo," comes from the life of Christian Pepuset, chapel-master to Frederic William I. of Prussia. Three others of a similar character complete the volume.—The Lady of St. Owen, by S. W. Sitwell, is a story of the days of King John, supposed to be told by a mother to her children.—Other tales for children are Felix Morton, by "D. G. B.," and A Pair of Them, or One Day's Mischief, by "C. J. S. L."—Three volumes of readings for classes and meetings are Hearts and Lives Given to Christ, by Elinor Lewis; Wives and Mothers of the Bible, by the author of "The Choristers of the Bible;" and Lectures on the Acts of the Apostles, by H. W. Burrows, B.D.

The Book of Psalms in Metre. Revised by David M'Laren. (David Douglas, Edinburgh.)—These are the Psalms "according to the version approved by the Church of Scotland." Mr. M'Laren has, he tells us in his preface, made "an attempt to remove from a noble version some of its greatest blemishes, without interfering with its majesty, or straining too much after mere elegance." We must confess to being unable to see the merits of the version. People born south of the Tweed very seldom can see them. Its metrical form, such as it is, may make it useful for singing; if so, it had surely better stand as it is; the kind of revision which Mr. M'Laren or, indeed, any one else, can give, can be of no real use.

CHRISTMAS CARDS.—Messrs. L. Prang and Co., of Boston (London agents, Messrs. Ackermann, of Regent Street), have sent us some of their very elaborate and ingenious Birthday and Christmas Cards and Valentines, set in silk and fringe. Some of them are in the shape of a fan, with a handle, and with very pretty coloured designs on each side of the fan. There are also elaborate valentines, with tassels, scents, and delicately-finished landscapes. The face, intended we suppose, to express the ideal of female beauty in the Valentine, does not strike us as especially fascinating. The birds and butterflies are, as usual, amongst the most effective of these delicate paintings.—Messrs. Marcus Ward have also sent us some of their pretty designs for Christmas and New-Year Cards,—containing a considerable variety of types, some Scripturally appropriate, some only seasonable, some comic; only, why amongst the latter the fox's carnivorous propensity towards the goose, and the dog's destructive propensity towards the fox, need be commemorated, we are unable to understand.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE destruction of the Army of Hicks Pasha has been placed beyond a doubt, but nothing whatever is known of the subsequent movements of the Mahdi. A report has reached Cairo that Khartoum has fallen, but it is not true; and a subsequent report that Dongola is in insurrection, though probable, is not confirmed. That would cut off Khartoum from Egypt. What is certain is that the scattered Egyptian garrisons have fled to Khartoum, that the people there are excited, that the resident Europeans have fled, and that Colonel Coetlogon, who has taken command, thinks the place untenable. The Egyptian Government has despatched General Baker, with 2,000 gendarmes, to Suakim, with orders to clear the road to Khartoum, and will forward a regiment by the Nile route to that town. It is reported, however, that the gendarmes went very unwillingly—the Turkish officers, indeed, resigning, and nearly half of the men deserting—and the new Regulars are to be kept in Egypt. The Egyptians themselves half believe that the Mahdi must be the true "Messenger," as he is victorious, and but for the European troops, there might be disturbances. The Europeans are, however, to remain; and Admiral Hewett, with the "Euryalus" and four gunboats, is on his way from Bombay to Suakim. According to statements slowly dribbling in, the Europeans are all dead, except F. Vizetelly, artist, of the Illustrated London News, but many of the soldiery have been allowed to take service with the Mahdi.

La France states that a General of Division in Algeria, in answer to a demand for troops for Tonquin, has already telegraphed that the Mahdi's "emissaries" are proclaiming his victory, and that he expects a general rising of North Africa. He deprecates, therefore, the withdrawal of any troops. The first part of this intelligence must be false, as even quick dromedaries could not have carried "emissaries" across Libya so quickly; but the second is probably true. The higher officers in Algeria, instructed by the officers of the Arab bureaux, who really know the natives, would be well aware that such a victory must be followed by a dangerous insurrection in North Africa. The Mahdi is connected with the Kadiree monasteries behind Tripoli and with the fanatics of Kairwan, and they will all now rise at his signal. It is quite possible, indeed, that the Mahdi's strength may be spent in this direction, and that he may try to found an empire in North Africa. Nothing, however, will be done quickly. There are no telegraph-wires between the monasteries and the head stations of the tribes, the stars have to be consulted, and the Moors have not waited half a century to count half-hours at last. Asiatics can wait, if needful, till their hair is grey.

Mr. Chamberlain made a speech at Bristol on Monday, at the meeting of the National Liberal Federation, which was singularly clear and vigorous, though without the higher qualities of the orator, without passion and without warmth. Out of the thirty impending questions referred to by Mr. Gladstone, before the present Administration was formed, as needing early attention, the Government had dealt with eight, besides the formidable Irish Land Question, which was not one of the thirty. Mr. Chamberlain was very anxious to deal with the Government of London in the next Session, as well as with the county franchise, if possible, but he thought that nothing should be allowed to elbow so pressing a matter as the extension of household franchise to the counties out of the way. He thought it absolutely necessary to deal with this, before attempting a Redistribution measure—first, because it would strengthen the hands of the Conservatives to offer them all the resisting surface which a Redistribution Bill would offer, before bringing in the simpler measure; next, because it is impossible to project a fair Redistribution Bill till after the county electorates have been enlarged, and their precise strength on the Register accurately estimated. Mr. Chamberlain re-expressed his own strong preference for manhood suffrage, while avowing that the time for manhood suffrage had not yet come; and he ridiculed the notion of contriving any special guarantee for the representation of minorities, till it should appear that, under the new system, minorities were likely to lose their fair proportionate influence in Parliament. He thought that London, with household suffrage, proves that the minority of one electoral district is the majority of another.

Lord Hartington spoke in the Free-trade Hall of Manchester on Tuesday. He admitted that Lord Salisbury could certainly force a dissolution, if he pleased, on the Franchise Bill, supposing that the Government decided to introduce it; and he admitted that, so far as appearances go, Lord Salisbury would please to do so, since he had recently become a great admirer of the American Constitution, and wanted to introduce a sort of reference of every constitutional change to a popular plébiscite, by using the House of Lords to compel a dissolution. Lord Hartington reminded the meeting that no such plébiscite was taken before the great Constitutional change of 1867, a change, nevertheless, proposed by a Government in a minority, and therefore a Government needing a much more stringent check on the use of its responsibility than Governments supported by a majority need. He charged the steady loss of influence by the House on Lord Salisbury's own extraordinary tactics. A House that had never in our recollection acceded to any measure for extending popular rights, except under absolute compulsion, could not expect to retain its influence in such a country as England. On the subject of foreign and colonial policy, Lord Hartington maintained that the Tories always attacked it in an ambiguous manner. If things go wrong, as in South Africa, they say it is due to the wretched policy of the Government; but if things go right, as in Egypt, they say, 'Ah, yes! it is all right, on the hypothesis that a military expedition was necessary at all; but if you had only interfered in time, no military expedition would have been needed,'—forgetting that interfering 'in time,' as the Tories put it, would have meant setting all Europe against us, and possibly exciting a European war.

On the subject of Reform, Lord Hartington reproached the Leeds and London Conferences with having neglected practical difficulties, to press on a measure which could hardly be shaped until the practical difficulties had been overcome. He thought there would be great difficulty in either abolishing the 40s. freehold qualification for counties, or in extending that qualification to boroughs, and yet without some decision on that point, even the Franchise Bill could not be introduced. He saw still further difficulty in either excluding Ireland from its scope, or in extending to Ireland a measure which must increase the numerical strength and the political power of the Irreconcilable party. He did not in the least suggest that these difficulties were insurmountable, but he did wish that more effort had been made to surmount them by those who pressed the Franchise measure so urgently upon the Government.

An extraordinary correspondence has been published between Mr. F. Lockwood, the Liberal candidate for York, and Lord Salisbury. The latter had stated that Mr. Lockwood was interviewed by the Irish Nationalists, and that, in consequence of this interview, they had voted for him. As no such interview had occurred, Mr. Lockwood asked Lord Salisbury his authority for the statement. Lord Salisbury had no authority, and at once withdrew his assertion, but added that the Nationalists did vote for Mr. Lockwood, after having heard his statement of the policy he was prepared to pursue towards Ireland. Mr. Lockwood again denied that he had favoured Nationalist policy, declaring that he had refused Home-rule and inquiry into Home-rule, and had also refused to vote for the repeal of the Crimes Act, while still deemed necessary. He pointed out also that Sir F. Milner, who promised to repeal that "cruel Act," was more friendly to the Nationalists than he was. Lord Salisbury rejoins that Mr. Lockwood had advocated household suffrage in Ireland and elective county government, and that these measures must lead to Home-rule. Mr. Lockwood answers that they prevent Home-rule, and tells Lord Salisbury that his reliance in Ireland is exclusively on force. Lord Salisbury clearly is either not candid, or is so blinded by passion that he really believes any advocate of county government in Ireland to be a secret advocate of Home-rule. The second is the fuller explanation, and indicates precisely the temper which makes his Lordship such a dangerous leader.

Paris is greatly agitated by a fear that things are going wrong in Tonquin, and M. Clémenceau on Thursday tried to obtain permission to make an interpellation. He maintained that a memorandum had been received from China making an attack on Bacninh a casus belli, that, nevertheless, an attack had been ordered, and that consequently the Ministry were decreeing war, contrary to the Constitution. M. Ferry replied, alleging this and that of no importance; but his substantive answer was that negotiations were going on, and that if the Parliamentary system required the premature publication of documents like the memorandum, the Republic would have to dispense both with diplomacy and a foreign policy. He would discuss everything when the Vote of Credit for Tonquin came on. The Chamber, on a division, affirmed this view by 308 votes to 195; but the minority is formidable, and the Chamber shaky. It does not want war with China. In the course of his speech, M. Ferry let his thoughts loose for a moment, and spoke of "the serious situation," producing cries of surprise and alarm from all sides, except his immediate party. He made haste to explain that he only meant to say that any war three thousand leagues off was serious; but the first impression was indelible. We endeavour to explain elsewhere the "seriousness" of which M. Ferry was thinking.

The news from Tonquin is not pleasant for Frenchmen. It is rumoured, on good authority, that Admiral Courbet refuses to advance on Bacninh without further reinforcements; and he has only 600 men to expect immediately, and 1,200 men in a month. It is, moreover, certain that the Tonquinese are exhibiting a new audacity in attack, probably because they are sure of Chinese support. On the 17th ult., they attacked Haid-zuong, a French fort protecting a bend of the Red River, with such courage that they lost 200 men, and, but for the accidental arrival of the gunboat 'Lynx,' the French would have lost the fort and the steamer 'Carabine.' As it was, the garrison evacuated the place, and went on board the 'Lynx.' It is moreover reported that the Russian Embassy has received intelligence of a severe "battle" at Haiphong, the first French station on the best mouth of the river. This may be untrue, but the rumours indicate that the whole delta is swarming with Black Flags, sent down from the higher lands, and that Admiral Courbet will need half his army to guard his communications.

The German Emperor, on the 27th ult., received the Presidents of the Prussian Diet, and in his address used an expression which has attracted great attention. He "assured them, in the most positive manner, that peace was at the present moment completely secured; and that, in particular, the relations of the nation to Russia had, to his great joy, become most cordial and happy." This report is official, and though the Emperor may be deceived like another man, his impression coincides with all recent information, and particularly with the otherwise inexplicable action of Russia in Bulgaria. The "Imperial Powers," as Lord Beaconsfield loved to call them, have not renewed their alliance, but there is obviously some understanding among them that peace shall not be broken for some time to come. Russia and Austria want financial rest, and the old Emperor of Germany cannot commence new undertakings. France can disturb the peace, of course; but restless and irritable as Paris is, the peasantry want quiet, and an opportunity of refilling hoards sorely depleted by the Bourse transactions of two years. War is usually unexpected, but it is still much that the Sovereigns who move armies would rather not fight.

It appears to be nearly certain that a great strike is impending, both in the coal and cotton trades. In the former, the miners declare that prices have risen, and demand an increase of wages by ten per cent., while the owners assert that they are only just recovering from recent losses. They, therefore, refuse to yield; the men are handing in notices, and according to the Times, 125,000 men—all the Yorkshire miners, in fact—will shortly be out of employ. As the masters can wait, and the men are poor, from a long course of low wages, the issue may be foreseen. The cotton spinners, on the other hand, ask an increase of five per cent., not because trade is prospering, but because it is not. They say that competition is so great that there is no profit, and consequently, a low rate of wage, which can be raised only by killing out the little mill-owners, who take low prices and produce too fast. In this case, also, the men, 90,000 in number, have little chance, for they have small funds, and the strike will directly benefit all owners who have accumulated stocks on hand. There is no doubt, we believe, that too much capital is put into this trade, and more cloth made than people are willing to buy, except at ruinously low prices. It is difficult to understand why, under such circumstances, the temptation to little men to open mills is so strong; but so it is, and there may be some gambling element in the trade which outsiders do not clearly perceive.

G. Warden, formerly Secretary of the London and River Plate Bank, and J. D. Watters, broker, were tried this week for stealing £116,000 worth of bonds payable to bearer from that Bank. Warden surrendered after he had escaped, and pleaded guilty, but Watters declared himself the other's victim. Both received the same sentence, twelve years' penal servitude, the Judge remarking on the terrible effects of their crime. We imagine a poor man feels in losing his spoons quite as much as a Bank feels in losing capital; but, no doubt, crimes offering great temptation and producing great social disaster require severity. That is the reason for the laws against keeping dynamite. The trial revealed, as we have pointed out elsewhere, the great difficulty of inventing precautions to protect bonds payable to bearer from theft by trusted depositaries. Warden testified in his evidence that he and the accountant of the Bank had each keys of the safe in which securities were deposited, the two sets being evidently intended as a precaution against robbery. "I and the accountant," however, "used each other's keys for years." The evidence is the more noteworthy, because there is neither charge nor suspicion against the accountant, who simply trusted character, instead of trusting rules.

Sir Charles Dilke, in a speech to the E'ensis Club of Chelsea on Thursday, revealed a secret of some importance. The Government intend to act promptly on a Report of the Royal Commission on City Guilds, and to bring in a Bill to prevent the dispersion of any City Company's property. "They did not intend that the property of the City Guilds should be divided, as was the property of Serjeants' Inn." It is understood that the Bill will be brought in in the Lords by Lord Derby, and that the property will be vested to a certain extent in Trustees, pending legislation as to its ultimate disposal. There can be no doubt that much of the property of the Guilds is only held in trust for the benefit of London, but the announcement will raise up a new host of enemies to the Government. Fortunately, the body of London electors are waking up to the municipal question, and becoming aware that it is they, and not the rich, who suffer by the want of organisation in London.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre made a telling speech at the Gladstone Club on Thursday, in which he abused the attempt to secure by any direct scheme the representation of minorities up hill and down dale. But while attacking it thus furiously with his lips, he showed himself to be very favourable to the one device on which alone we look with much hope,—that of subdividing constituencies to something like the same limit, and giving to every such constituency but one Member, and to every elector but one vote. That, we believe, if honestly done with the help of a Boundary Commission anxious to secure a genuine variety in the class of constituencies to be represented, would really result in giving a fair representation to minorities. Indeed, this, as Mr. Lefevre well showed, is at present very tolerably secured in the metropolis itself. The fallacy of Mr. Lefevre's speech was his calm assumption that we who fear the undue suppression of minorities, advocate some juggle of machinery by which a minority may be transformed into a majority. We desire nothing of the kind. But we do desire to see the minority of the nation fairly represented by a proportional minority in Parliament, and not to see it extinguished in Parliament altogether. To pretend that this is either impossible, or so much even as unlikely, with household suffrage all over the country, is almost foolish. By a very little manipulation of the constituencies, in the interest of one party, a grossly unfair result might be very easily secured.

It is satisfactory to find that Lord Rossmore's commission as Justice of the Peace for Monaghan has been suspended, in consequence of his action on October 16th. Lord Rossmore, on that occasion, unquestionably led a procession to a meeting held to overawe another perfectly lawful meeting, though, no doubt, one very offensive to Lord Rossmore and his allies. He was warned by the Resident Magistrate that his conduct was likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and nevertheless he persisted in taking the route on which he had entered. And now he pleads that he was only complying with Mr. Gladstone's suggestion that leading men in Ireland should show a little more public spirit in resisting movements which they think hurtful. To show courage in denouncing outrages, which is what Mr. Gladstone desired, is certainly not the same thing as getting up faction-fights, which is what Lord Rossmore did. It will not do to have Justices of the Peace who promote bloodshed, whether it be on the side of Union, or on the side of Disunion.

The Birds of Aristophanes has been acted at Cambridge this week with singular success. The Birds is the great comedy in which, according to Ottfried Müller, Aristophanes satirised Athenian plausibility and credulity, in the persons of Plausible and Hopeful, of whom the former persuades the Birds to found that splendid castle-in-the-air, Cloudcuckootown,—without believing in it himself,—while the latter drinks his fill of illusions for which there is no real excuse at all. The fun poked at the Greek Divinities appears to have been very well represented at Cambridge, the scene between the Divine Commissioners and Plausible being one of the best in the play. We have given some account of the performance in another column, but may add here that Mr. John O'Connor's scenery was universally admired, and that the various Birds,—especially the Swan,—were costumed with even more effect than in the old Greek theatre itself. We Englishmen hardly know what true comedy is by anything in our own literature. The laughter of Aristophanes contained satire, imagination, fancy, humour, and light-heartedness, in a combination which has never since been even approached.

The Electra of Sophocles was performed last week at Girton by the students of the College, with a success which certainly justified the attempt. The play was selected as being one of the few really good ones containing a chorus of maidens, and the whole representation was given with felicity, grace, and considerable artistic power. The ladies' Greek, especially, received deserved and high encomiums from the Cambridge Dons and members of the Council, who were the only gentlemen permitted to be present. The scenery, dresses, &c., were designed and executed by the students themselves, Mr. Newton, of the British Museum, pronouncing on the correctness of the Greek costumes. The part of Electra, which was taken by Miss Case, was perhaps the most effectively rendered; but all were creditably sustained. Indeed, the performance altogether may fairly challenge comparison with those given by the members of the Universities themselves.

An admirable letter in Thursday's Times from the Rev. Brooke Lambert, Chairman of the Council of the "Metropolitan Association for Befriending Young Servants," describes the work done by that Association amongst the 3,000 girls from the District Workhouse Schools of London, who are sent out, often at the age of fourteen, into the world, without any home in which they may find a refuge when they lose their places, and who are thus almost inevitably ruined. The Association in question befriends them between the ages of fourteen and twenty; visits them, with the consent of their mistresses, in their places; provides them with a temporary home when they lose their places; trains them for better work, when they are in need of such training; and in a word, helps them in their struggles during their apprenticeship to the rough work of domestic service. Mr. Lambert points out how impossible it is to keep up such a machinery as this without considerable funds, and how difficult the Association finds it to get the funds that are adequate for its work. For the truth of this statement we can ourselves answer, and only hope that Mr. Lambert's letter may bring the kind of aid to the Association whose head-quarters are at 14 Grosvenor Road, S.W., of which it stands in such urgent need.

The Carlyle statue on the Chelsea Embankment appears to be much disfigured by a great framework of notice-boards, on which the public are solemnly warned of the rules and regulations under which public gardens are to be used by them,—rules and regulations printed, nevertheless, in letters so small that the public cannot read them without a field-glass, though they can see the full ugliness of the staring boards on which these regulations are inscribed. Mr. Frederick W. Foster, writing to Thursday's Times, proposes to have these boards lowered or removed, that Carlyle's statue may be seen without this ugly margin of emphatic officialism; but we are not sure that he is right. The effigy of the "Latter-Day" pamphleteer will not be made at all the less effective for his admirers, by being thus set in an artistic framework, as it were, of bureaucracy and red-tape. We suspect that the Metropolitan Board of Works have expressly designed this framework for his statue, in order to set the significance of the grim Philosopher of Chelsea in an appropriate and striking light.

The Crown Prince of Germany has evidently produced a most pleasing impression in Spain, the populace especially being quite enthusiastic about his dignified bearing. Both he and his father are taking unusual pains to deepen the friendly impression. The Prince has not only sat out a grand bullfight, which is not exactly a festival approved by geist, but has allowed a follower to publish a very favourable, though, we believe, accurate account of the King of Spain, which he had given on board ship. He recognises in Alfonso a distinctly able man, with much courage and will. On the other hand, the Emperor of Germany has addressed to the King a warm letter of thanks for the reception of his son, and has worded the letter in that old, grave style of Royal courtesy so seldom used now, which is meant to imply that the recipient is not only Legitimate and a King, but the equal of the writer. The letter is just the one to please Spaniards, who evidently feel honoured by the German recognition of their King's place in Europe. It is rumoured that the Crown Prince may return to Berlin via France, but that is not probable. He could not go to Paris, and to avoid Paris would take all grace out of the journey.

We are not sorry to see that the Cambridge Senate has rejected the proposal to establish a modern-language tripos, and wish the majority had been larger. It was only 40 to 39. The modern languages are most useful, but the study of them, even if their literatures are included, does not necessarily educate. The women who used to know them are now turning to harder and more educative studies. Some of the least educated men in Europe speak two or three languages, and there is always a practical difficulty in examinations. Men who have learned languages by residence, as we learn English, cannot be kept out, and very often know nothing else. The children of the Continental English are not the persons, as a rule, who deserve University honours.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

THE MAHDI.

WE are not often in accord with the Government on Egyptian questions, but in the new crisis which has arisen, their action strikes us as both wise and firm. They have appreciated the seriousness of the situation arising from the destruction of General Hicks's Army in the Soudan, but have disregarded the panic-mongers, and have given no premature assurances to any side. They have recognised that Egypt may possibly be threatened, and will certainly be agitated by the Mahdi's victory, and have, therefore, ordered the British garrison to stand fast in Cairo, and have sent out the drafts necessary to bring up the regiments to their full strength. They have also perceived that it may be necessary in certain contingencies, such as a successful insurrection in Upper Egypt and a rush by the Pretender to reap its fruits, to strike hard at his rear; and have, therefore, ordered Admiral Hewett to take possession of Suakim, the only port on the Red Sea whence there is a road open for a corps d'armée marching on Khartoum. They possess, therefore, force sufficient to quell a rising in Egypt Proper, and an open gate through which they may, if the need arise, act from India upon Upper Egypt with energy, safety, and effect. These positions secured, the British Government await further developments, before deciding upon any course of action. They do not yet know whether the Mahdi will be able to utilise his victory; whether he will rush down upon Egypt, relying on Mussulman feeling; whether he will consolidate his rule in the Soudan, where he is now, as the "Victorious Messenger" and agent of God, emancipated from the tribal chiefs; or whether, as is quite possible, his idea is to rouse North Africa against the French, and put all the Moorish tribes in the field, before he attempts his own advance northwards up the Nile. The Government, therefore, wait; and if only they have warned Lord Ripon, which we do not doubt, and have forwarded to Admiral Hewett an instruction which we will mention presently, which we do doubt, their attitude of calm expectation is the very strongest they could assume. Fortunately, Parliament is not sitting to worry them into premature explanations; and the people, as usual whether the Administration is Liberal or Tory, leave policy in Asia entirely to the Cabinet.

The pause is wise, but the situation is none the less a serious one for the Ministry. It is nearly impossible that the Mahdi should under any circumstances ascend above Assouan (Syene) and enter Egypt, for we have ample time to meet him there with a civilised force, before which his followers, however fanatic, will melt away, heartless and disenchanted. But that the Mahdi's power is immensely increased is beyond doubt, and we see no evidence whatever that up to Assouan there is any trustworthy resisting force. In the first place, the victory has turned Mahommed Ahmed from a Pretender into an absolute monarch, who could execute the slave-hunting chiefs, if necessary, wholesale, but who will be obeyed by them as implicitly as by the meanest of their followers. He has fulfilled the promised condition, has given the prophesied evidence of his divine commission, and as the recognised Messenger from on high, there can be in the entire Soudan no authority equal to his command. Until defeated, he will be obeyed as Mahommed was obeyed, up to the verge of civilisation, and every Mussulman up to Assouan may be counted his willing subject. Moreover, with the tact which the Prophet also showed, he wages against votaries no war of extermination, but, as the few who have escaped report, accepts all Mussulmans who throw down their arms as soldiers of his own. Under those circumstances, the old Egyptian soldiers will either desert, or fight without a heart, the black populace will take up arms, and Khartoum, as Colonel Coetlogon already sees, will be indefensible. General Baker, with his 2,000 Gendarmes, half of whom go unwillingly, while the other half desert en route, can, with the aid of Admiral Hewett, hold Suakim; but to suppose he can hold the road to Khartoum, 400 miles long, or help to defend that city, is, we think, to indulge in an illusion. He would lose half his men by desertions, and the rest in forcing the passes where Consul Moncrieff was lost. There is nothing for it, if the Mahdi advances, but to fall back; and there is no true point of rest till Assouan is reached, and the British Army comes into the scene. The Mahdi, of course, may not advance. No European knows him, and he may be a man without energy, disposed to enjoy new power, or infected with that dread of encountering Europeans which weighs on Asiatics in exact proportion to their intelligence. But if he advances, he will, we believe, reach the British bayonets; and the chances, gravely weighed, are in favour of an advance. The slave-dealers, who, it is said, will check him, will be as powerless as mice. His victory, as the French Government is aware, is already known through North Africa, and fanatics devoted solely to him, and not to any tribal leader, are by this time swarming towards El Obeid. These men are armed and provisioned, and fearless of the Desert; they do not die, like Englishmen and Egyptians, from drinking rotten water; and, strange as it may seem to Europeans, they heartily believe that God has declared for the Mahdi, that victory is assured, and that if they die in obtaining it, they will reach Heaven in the instant of death. It will be nearly impossible to resist their pressure; the Mahdi himself is, in all human probability, a fanatic; and if he advances, he can choose only one of three paths. He may advance direct on Egypt; he may swerve westwards towards Barca and Tripoli; or he may make for the coast, with the design of reaching Mecca, and thence claiming the obedience of the whole Mussulman world. In the second event our rôle is over, for it is France with whom the battle will be fought; but in the first and third, the British Government will be compelled to act with all their energy. They must, not only for the sake of their own policy, but as mandatories of Europe, which already insists on their responsibility, defend Egypt; and they must, from a mere brutal instinct of self-defence, prohibit the descent on Mecca.

Admiral Hewett must, we fear, be instructed to capture or sink the Mahdi, if he attempts to cross the Red Sea. As a rule, we regard the eternal panic of English journals about the spread of Mussulman movements into India with a certain contempt. The dangerous section of India is the North, and in Northern India the conditions are most unfavourable to Mussulman insurrection. The British Army lies there, always ready; the majority of the people are not Mussulman, a silent but powerful check; and the great fighting peoples, Sikhs and Rajpoots, Mahrattas and Goorkhas, are fanatically Hindoo. They want no Mussulman lords, to kill their cows and desecrate their temples, and the Mussulmans know that. Mahomedan movements; therefore, usually when they touch India, break into spray; but there may be one exception to that rule. If an Arab claiming to be the Mahdi, and consecrated by victory, were acknowledged in Mecca, we doubt if any considerations whatever would hold in the Mussulmans of North India, and feel assured that South India would be almost instantly in flames. South India does not matter politically, for it can always be reduced; but still a movement there, which would cost us twenty millions and ten thousand lives, would be a considerable disaster. Under the circumstances, three words said in Hyderabad by the boy who has just mounted the Nizam's throne, would for the moment terminate British rule south of the Nerbudda. The Mahdi must not reach Mecca, and the British Government has, therefore, to watch his movements, possibly through the winter, on two sides at once, with an excited and angry Egypt to keep in order the while. We do not envy the Foreign Secretary his task, but it must be performed, nevertheless, in the interest not of Great Britain only, but the world.

While, however, we would earnestly enjoin watchfulness, we trust Lord Granville will be deaf to most of the wild suggestions now pouring up from every side. It is folly to say we must reconquer the Soudan, to put down the slave-trade there. We cannot prohibit the slave-trade by an invasion, unless we also garrison the country; and unless we annex Egypt, we have not the means for any such undertaking. We might as well conquer Brazil under a proclamation emancipating the Blacks, or annex all Central Africa because it is cruelly ruled. Philanthropy does not abolish the necessity for sense, and we are glad to see that the Anti-Slavery Society repudiates this suggestion. And we would reject with even more decision the idea of any appeal for help to Abyssinia. To call those dark Christians into the field against the Mahdi would be to rouse a religious war with a vengeance,—a war in which every white man in Asia would be endangered. The Mussulmans will fight the White troops fairly, knowing well that they are directed by political motives; but to be attacked by soldiers darker than themselves on distinctly religious grounds, would rouse a fury in which all prudence and moderation would be cast to the winds. It is not our business to widen, but to limit the area of this war, if we can, and prevent its spreading till England and France are fighting half the peoples of the continent of Asia. There is danger enough in this movement both to England and France, as they will know well before the winter is over, without our calling up allies who before the campaign was finished would be at once a hindrance and a disgrace.

CABINET MINISTERS ON REFORM.

BOTH Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Hartington have spoken this week, and both have said something on Reform. Though neither of them spoke for the Government, and both, indeed, as we understand them, expressly disclaimed speaking for the Government, yet it may, perhaps, be assumed that Mr. Chamberlain, at Bristol, gave the wheel a decidedly stronger turn in one direction than Lord Hartington applied to it, at Manchester, in the opposite direction. Mr. Chamberlain expressed a very strong personal desire to see the Franchise question wholly separated from the Redistribution question,—first, because he holds that even if there were no redistribution, the admission of the county voter to the franchise would be exceedingly right and desirable; next, because he holds that you cannot settle the question of the proper redistribution of power till you have passed the Franchise Bill, and counted the new county voters whom it will admit. Further, he maintains that it cannot be questioned for a moment that it will extend to Ireland, because, “The whole of the Liberal Government, and I think, with one exception, the whole of the Liberal Party, supported in 1879 and in 1882 resolutions in favour of an identical suffrage for the Three Kingdoms.” Apparently, Lord Hartington must have regarded this remark as going a little too far in the direction of committing the Cabinet, which had not yet decided the question, for he said at Manchester on the following day that the extension of the household franchise to Ireland was still a moot question, which the Liberal Party ought to discuss carefully and settle at once. And, while not ignoring “the difficulties, perhaps the great dangers that there would be in making any distinction between England and Ireland in the matter of the franchise,” he thought it necessary to insist that “there are many in the country, not only among the Conservatives, who do view, and will view with considerable dislike and apprehension any measure which is likely to increase the number or the powers of what I am afraid we must call the Irreconcilable party in Parliament; and you must recollect that the more conclusively you prove the impossibility of separating the question of the Irish franchise from that of the English franchise, the more you will excite the opposition and increase the number of the opponents of any measure for the reduction of the franchise at all.” That, perhaps, explains the tone of complaint in which Lord Hartington talked of the Leeds Conference, which he reproached for urging on the Franchise question before discussing its difficulties, in strong contrast to the tone of eulogy in which Mr. Chamberlain spoke of the achievements of the same Conference. Nevertheless, as we said, we hold that Mr. Chamberlain succeeded in giving a more decided turn to the wheel in one direction than Lord Hartington gave in the other, and this, too, whether Mr. Chamberlain’s colleagues choose to take offence at what he has done or not. It is not very easy, after such manifestations of opinion as those of the Leeds Conference have been publicly supported by one of the Cabinet, for the other Members of the Cabinet to make their scruples heard. The time is passed for such suggestions in arrest of judgment as Lord Hartington offers. Either the Cabinet must take up a bold position, or it must be well aware that all the country will say that Mr. Chamberlain has been overruled by the timidity of his colleagues; and a Cabinet once openly regarded as “timid,” is not a Cabinet that can hope to do very much more in Parliament. It is the same with the Irish complication. As our readers know, our own view is decisively and strongly with Mr. Chamberlain. We regard it as quite childish to suppose that any increase of the Irreconcilable party,—even if it gets a very large increase,—can add an iota to the danger of insurrection. The more clearly we recognise the full strength of the Irreconcilable party in Ireland, the more effect will our positive refusal even to consider the disintegration of the Empire have in daunting that Irreconcilable party; and as for any influence that the frank recognition of their Parliamentary strength can exert in the direction of the wishes of the Irreconcilables, we have not the slightest belief in its existence. While England admits the Parliamentary principle for Ireland at all, she is bound to promote steadily the true representation of Irish wishes in Parliament; and to delay a just Reform Bill on the ground that it will bring about a truer representation than any we could otherwise obtain of Irish wishes, is simply delaying it because we do not want to face the truth. If in 1879, and again last year, the whole Cabinet and almost the whole Liberal party repudiated any such hesitation as this, it is hardly likely that they can find anything in the present state of Ireland to justify that hesitation now. We hold, then, that Mr. Chamberlain has not only anticipated the answer to Lord Hartington’s difficulty, but has anticipated an answer that Lord Hartington will himself feel obliged to treat as sufficient for the occasion. None the less, if Mr. Chamberlain had reserved his reply for the deliberations of the Cabinet, it would, perhaps, have had all the greater weight. Men like Lord Hartington may possibly resent having their hand forced, even by statesmen so vigilant and apt in the successful manipulation of Ministerial scruples as Mr. Chamberlain. We hold that Mr. Chamberlain’s argument is unanswerable, but we cannot help wishing that he had not taken the public into his confidence till after his colleagues had heard, and been convinced by, the statement of his reasons.

There are two points on which Mr. Chamberlain’s speech appears to us to be much less statesmanlike than it is in reference to the extension of the Franchise Bill to Ireland. The first is his reiterated plea for manhood suffrage in the abstract, though he admits that there is no question of embodying it in the Bill of next Session. It is surely a very unwise thing for a Minister to repeat so emphatically the private views which he has consented to waive in practice, on the very eve of the introduction of the measure in which he has consented to waive them. That can produce but one result,—a feeling amongst all who do not agree with him that he reserves the right to reopen the whole question, so soon as he shall see fit. Is that a wise impression for the Minister to diffuse who has consented to put his own views by, and to lend all his weight to the framing of a measure in which all his colleagues can heartily concur? We do not think so, and this is not the first time that Mr. Chamberlain has given a sign to the political world outside, that he is not content with the scope of the measure which the Government are likely to introduce. In the next place, though it is perfectly true that “the wider you lay the foundations of your liberties and institutions, the more stable those liberties and institutions will be,” the sense in which that maxim must be interpreted depends on what you mean by the widest possible extension of liberty. Now, it is surely making political liberty as wide as you can make it, if you give every one who cares for political issues, the means of easily gaining the right to pass his judgment on those issues. It does not widen the foundations of an Art society, if you include in it multitudes who do not know, and do not care, what perspective means, or what is the difference between oil colours and water-colours, or how the etcher draws on copper, or the lithographer on stone. It is not artistic width to insist on appealing to the ignorant multitude as to artistic questions. And so we insist that it is not political width to insist on including in the franchise a great multitude of people who would never walk the length of a street to get their names put on the Register, who would not alter a single arrangement of their lives to secure the right of voting, though they might as easily secure it now as under manhood suffrage. Yet it is perfectly true that there is not a grown-up man earning his own livelihood anywhere, who could not, by taking a very little pains, secure a vote, either under the household franchise, or under the lodger franchise, as the law now stands in boroughs, and as the law will soon stand in counties as well as boroughs. While the County Franchise remains as it is, it is certain that large classes, most deeply interested in the franchise, and most eager for it, are excluded from any chance of exercising it. But let Household Suffrage be once extended to the counties, and we venture to say that no grown-up man with a real interest in politics need be without a vote, if he cares enough for politics to take a little pains in order to get it. Manhood Suffrage means making a vast multitude of persons who do not care a straw for politics, voters, in spite of their own complete indifference to the possession of a vote. And that, we say, seems to us as foolish and unstatesmanlike as it would be to insist on swamping an Art society with a mass of members who do not know a straight line from a crooked, or on securing the “stability” of Lloyd’s, by enrolling all the soldiers of a score of regiments of the Line among the names of the Underwriters. Surely, it is manifest enough that what makes universal suffrage in the United States so unsatisfactory, is the enrolment of so many voters who care no more for the distinction between Democrats and Republicans than they care for the distinction between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. It is not adding to the breadth of any liberty to force upon indifferent people the privilege of passing judgment on matters in which they take no interest and desire no control.

Once more, we differ from Mr. Chamberlain in thinking that because minorities have been over-represented hitherto, there is no danger of their being under-represented under a uniform system of Household Suffrage. It is absurd to say that because there has been no intoxication where there was no fermented liquor, there will be no intoxication after you have provided fermented liquor in large quantities. It must be of the very essence of the Franchise Bill and the Redistribution Bill to throw power everywhere into the hands of the majority. Now, no one can deny for a moment that if three members of party A and two members of party B live and vote in each compartment, every compartment will return a representative of party A, while none of them will return a representative of party B. That would not be a fair representation of the opinions of a country divided in the proportion of three to two between party A and party B. Mr. Chamberlain virtually replies, 'Oh! if there are three of party A in one division and only two of party B, then there are sure to be three of party B in another and only two of party A.' We want to know why it is sure; why it may not be quite easy to contrive that there shall be no such compensation; why we are secure against that "jerryandering" which has been so great an evil in the United States, and why it is not eminently reasonable and right to observe the utmost precautions against it. We insist that in this matter Mr. Chamberlain is not taking his usual moderate and reasonable attitude. It is plain good sense, when you are for the first time running a great risk, to take pains to insure yourself against that risk. It is common candour to admit that an evil which greatly afflicts other countries in which the suffrage has been as widely extended as ours will soon be, is likely to afflict us also, unless we take the utmost precautions to avoid it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S PLAN FOR REHOUSING THE POOR.

THE Government has evidently considered the necessity of taking some action, or, as we hope, of authorising the new Municipality of London to take some action, towards the Rehousing of the Poor. The head of the Local Government Board, Sir Charles Dilke, has been spending his spare time for weeks in the distasteful work of inspecting "rookeries;" and now Mr. Chamberlain has come forward in the Fortnightly Review with a definite plan for securing their reconstruction. It is a very different plan from Lord Salisbury's, much more practical, much more capable of expansion, and much harder upon owners of house property. Lord Salisbury's leading idea is that the existence of Rookeries—that is, clusters of houses unfit for human habitation, but still inhabited—is a misfortune to the country resulting mainly from circumstances, and that, therefore, the State should lend money to trustees to rebuild such places, or to build competing and wholesome structures on the Peabody plan. Mr. Chamberlain's leading idea, on the other hand, is that the existence of rookeries is a fault, almost a criminal fault, in their owners; and that these should, therefore, either be compelled to rebuild them on sound principles, or to sell them to the Municipal authorities at a price calculated not according to their value as letting tenements, but according to their value minus such fine as an official arbitrator—who would be, in practice, a great officer of the High Court—"may inflict for the misuse of the property, and the offence committed in allowing it to be the cause of disease and crime." The rookeries are, in fact, to be treated not as "property," in the full sense of that term, but as nuisances, condemned by statute, justly liable to be swept away without compensation—as a copper-smelting establishment in Holborn would be—and only treated more leniently because their proprietors did not originally defy a law. So thoroughly does Mr. Chamberlain carry out this principle, that he would even allow the Municipality to abstain from acquiring the condemned houses, and either to rebuild them at the owners' expense, or to close them altogether, like houses expected immediately to fall down.

This is a drastic proposition, and will produce a chorus of remonstrances of a kind to which the House of Lords is only too ready to listen. It will be alleged that "ownership" in London is often a most complex affair, that what with life-interests, leaseholders, and mortgagees, the true owner will be often hard to find, and that when found or created he will sometimes be the most innocent of all concerned. If we are not mistaken, Lord Hanmer was once attacked in the Press very severely for neglecting a rookery, and proved conclusively that, although the ultimate "owner," he was as powerless in the matter and as irresponsible as any writer who assailed him. It will be necessary often to extend the word "owner," till it covers the jobber in houses; but with that reservation, we see no injustice in Mr. Chamberlain's proposal. The man who lets an uninhabitable house for profit is really just as much an offender as the man who sells diseased meat, or opens an unhealthy factory, or starts a trade dangerous to the neighbourhood, and may fairly be treated in the same way. There is no moral objection whatever to taking his houses from him, subject only to payment for the site; and if the community gives him more, it is only in deference to the well understood result of experience, that in such matters lenient laws work most easily and effectively. They produce less resistance, and do not arouse that bitter reaction against philanthropy which constantly paralyses, as in the case of Plimsoll's Act, the best-considered efforts of the Legislature. We believe, therefore, that Mr. Chamberlain's principle will be accepted by the Commons, and that the Lords, after a short and bitter discussion, will refuse to impair the safety of property by including in its safeguards the right to preserve unwholesome or dangerous structures. They will rather strengthen Mr. Chamberlain's hands, and protect property-owners by filling up the gap his measure will leave by some sharp and effective enactment against overcrowding. A house may be perfectly built, and yet made uninhabitable by the number of its inmates, an evil against which no unwholesome property law will provide, and which, though remediable, can be remedied only by measures involving a considerable interference with liberty, and perhaps some oppression. If a man has ten children and two rooms, there will be overcrowding; and if he cannot earn wages sufficient to pay rent for two rooms, the overcrowding will be awful.

It will not be forgotten that Mr. Goschen, who, as a political economist, is on the side of capital, and Lord Shaftesbury, who has a rent-roll of £40,000 a year, have expressed themselves as strongly as Mr. Chamberlain, who, again, is decisively anti-Socialist. We do not, therefore, expect much opposition to his first principle,—which, indeed, is implicitly affirmed in many recent Acts; but he propounds another, as to which there will be more discussion. As a practical administrator, he foresees that there will ultimately be some loss in rehousing the nearly destitute, and he tries to settle where this loss should fall. Clearly, the money must be raised somehow by a rate, and the only question is, what kind of a rate. Mr. Chamberlain proposes a rate on owners and long-leaseholders only, and it is at this point that opposition will be developed. It is quite certain that the freeholders of London, dealing as they have done for half a century with a rising market, pay a great deal too little to the general metropolitan fund; but then, can they be made to pay any more? Will they not instantly recoup themselves by raising rents, or, what is the same thing, increasing their fines for renewals of leases? If that were done, the result to householders would be exactly the same as if the rehousing rate were levied, like other rates, in proportion to rental,—which Mr. Chamberlain, we take it, is desirous to avoid. London differs from other cities in this, that its householders are in great part bound to live where they do live in order to earn their livings, and must pay what landlords ask, or throw up work. This is not true, of course, of Belgravia, but it is true of the professional quarters, the shopkeeping streets, and the workmen's extensive quarters; and these districts, therefore, will feel the burden, and not the ground-landlords, who, extravagantly wealthy as many of them are, do not even now exact the last procurable penny. The Duke of Bedford was supposed to be sharp in his recent clearance of Gower Street, whence so many families disappeared that the tradesmen of the neighbourhood were temporarily ruined, but as a matter of fact, those who took his new leases were able to sublet at a still greater advance. We are not sure that Mr. Chamberlain's plan will reach the landlords at all, and there is another fact to be considered. Poor, but respectable occupiers will benefit very greatly by rehousing schemes,—in the first place, by the improved state of the neighbourhood, and in the second, by the diminished risk of disease, and are therefore fairly chargeable with a portion of the cost. The matter is one of detail, which in the end the Municipality must settle, and which doubtless will be arranged by compromise, but it is not expedient to rouse in the owners of London a bitter opposition to the very idea of a Central Municipality. The system of rating must be improved, and the absurd inequalities of London taxation redressed, but nothing is gained by impracticable efforts to throw the burden of all improvements on to a class. They can recoup themselves; and if they suspect a class injustice, they will. Nor are we quite certain of the wisdom of the farther proposal to rate small districts, if they are supposed to be benefited by clearances. There is no unfairness in the proposal, but it will introduce in some districts a curious uncertainty into the value of property. The Duchy of Lancaster, for instance, owns much property very near a rookery. The Municipality will, under Mr. Chamberlain's proposals, pull down the rookery, rebuild, and charge the Duchy with any ultimate loss. The Duchy, of course, will recoup itself by fines when the leases fall in; and as, practically, its tenants cannot move without heavy losses, the value of their leases will be altered by a sudden effort to cure an evil for which neither leaseholders nor the Duchy are responsible. We should, we think, prefer to see the guilty owners made responsible first, and the general Municipality afterwards, to any attempt to fix the burden on limited local areas. After all, if our printers are better lodged under a new scheme, we shall benefit quite as much as the landlords of Wandsworth or Kennington, where the men reside, and ought to bear our share of the general taxation. These, however, are details; and in substance we accept Mr. Chamberlain's grand principle,—that an owner must be as responsible for letting an uninhabitable house as a butcher for selling diseased meat, or a dairyman for distributing unhealthy milk.

THE MOVEMENT FOR AN ENGLISH CHURCH BODY.

THE appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the best mode of constituting an efficient Anglican Church Representative Body,—if, at least, it may also inquire whether such a body would be useful or injurious to the Church,—seems to us a step against which it is hardly possible to produce a single solid reason. Of course, we do not mean that there is no solid reason against the constitution of such a Body. We are aware that there is a party in the Church,—and there may be more than one party,—to whom the organisation of the Church into a living body, with power to advise Parliament authoritatively on Church matters, appears a very dangerous proposal. We have ourselves no sympathy with that feeling, from whatever cause it may proceed,—whether it be from fear of the class of leaders into whose hands an organised Church might fall, or from dread that, if it once became a living whole, with power to act for itself, the Church of England might take action which would sever it from the Church of the past. But though we have not the least grain of sympathy with either objection, believing that the Church of England cannot long continue to hibernate, so far as regards her collective life; as she has hibernated so long, we do not deny that all the grounds for fearing the result of a more effective organisation of the Church should be considered, and should be fairly represented to the Royal Commission which is proposed. Let the timidities be fairly and fully heard. Let those who, with some friends of our own, think that it is much better to keep the Church as a believing body paralysed, lest it should get itself too strongly discriminated from the nation which has no definite belief, say their say before the Royal Commission, by all means. Let those, again, who fear that if once the Church could act for herself, she might commit herself to some policy inconsistent with her traditional position as a branch of the Church Catholic, be heard too, though we do not well see what they could say, except that they were fearful lest some heretical opinion already implicitly accepted by the members of the Church, should be explicitly accepted also. We do not at all mean to assert that there is nothing to be said against the constitution of an adequate Church Body, nor that the Royal Commission which it is proposed to ask for might not find out what that is, and say it with great force. But then we do think it almost impossible to assert with the smallest plausibility that there is not so much as a case for careful inquiry into the reasons why a wish which so many Churchmen feel,—a wish which we ourselves heartily share,—should or should not be gratified. No doubt, the petition to the Queen asks for the appointment of a Royal Commission, “to inquire into and report upon the best method of creating a Body of lay members of the English Church” to act with a Reformed Convocation as a Church Body; and no doubt this assumes that the question of method is the only point at issue, and that it must be a good thing to do, if a proper method of doing it can be found. Well, if that objection be sincerely urged, we should not object to allow the Commission to consider whether or not the constitution of an adequate Church Body be advisable or not, before considering how it could be best done, if, as we think, it is advisable. We do not in the least wish to see those questions prejudged which are at the bottom of many persons' objections to a reform of Convocation, and the constitution of a Lay House intended to co-operate with Convocation. If there be an arguable case for keeping the Anglican Church dumb, when every other religious body in the realm has it in its power to express its wishes freely and to avow its aims, let us have these reasons candidly stated, and let us have them fairly examined. But this is at least certain, that while the lay members of the Anglican Church have no proper mouthpiece at all, and while the clerical members of the Anglican Church have so inadequate and misleading a mouthpiece as the present Houses of Convocation of Canterbury and York, the Church of England will continue to be destitute of any semblance of collective life. What she does through individuals, she may do vigorously enough,—and her life of this kind has long been thoroughly vigorous; but whether she has any view of her own on new questions affecting creed or worship, and if she has any view, what that view may be, must remain for ever uncertain, so long as the great majority of Churchmen cannot make their voice heard at all, while the great majority of clergymen find themselves misrepresented by machinery which seems carefully contrived for that purpose.

We are well aware that the difference between a Church which has a collective life and a Church that has none is this,—that while the former can commit herself in many ways,—doctrinal, ecclesiastical, practical,—the latter cannot, and that there are a certain class of persons who think it a great advantage to belong to a Church that cannot commit herself, either for evil or for good. We have already said that we should be glad to listen to this plea for a non-committal Church, if it were adequately formulated. It would be something, indeed, to get it adequately formulated, and to have the world explicitly informed that what some Churchmen really wish is to prevent the Church from being put on her mettle, for fear that if she were once put on her mettle, she would fail. We do not think that that somewhat cowardly and pessimistic plea would find favour with many Englishmen. If the Church of England is really such that a breath of liberty would bring her to ruin, we do not believe that ruin would be too bad a fate for her. For our own parts, we should wish to see the Church fairly tried with the gift of liberty,—liberty to think, liberty to judge, liberty to act,—even though the exercise of that liberty did bring the Church either to Disestablishment, or,—what would be much worse,—national discredit. This, of course, we do not fear,—the former not much, the latter not at all. The effect of giving the Church power to think, and speak, and act as a Church, might, of course, be to bring her difference with the nation into strong relief; or it might be, to bring her influence with the nation into strong relief. In the former case, we should have Disestablishment, and some kind of Disendowment; in the latter case, a speedy euthanasia for the popularity of the Liberation Society. But whichever event happened, the result would be to show the Church in her true colours, and the nation in its true colours; and that cannot but be desirable, whether the Church should turn out to be more or less popular with the nation than she at present seems. As it is, the Church can do anything but prove herself a Church. Many of her Ministers are most admirable teachers, many of her Laity are most earnest and most religious, many of her rites are most impressive and inspiring. But yet if any one asks that a Creed which is explained to mean one thing shall be modified so as to say that thing, and that thing only, in unmistakable language, we are merely told that the thing cannot be done,—that the Church has no power of adapting herself to the living generation, but must speak the language of the early centuries, even though that language does not express to us what it expressed to them. That is not the kind of Church to meet modern infidelity and demoralisation. A Church that has no living voice, cannot grapple with a scepticism which has a living voice. That is why we wish to see at least a fair discussion of the reasons for and against restoring the Church to the kind of life which the Roman Catholic Church, and the Presbyterian Churches, and all the Dissenting Churches in the realm, have now, and would never consent to forego.

THE DIFFICULTY OF FRANCE IN ASIA.

GENERAL CAMPENON, the French Minister of War, was on Wednesday interrogated by the Committee of the Chamber, which is discussing the Tonquin grant, as to his resources for carrying on a war with China. In reply, he made a statement which throws a remarkable and an unpleasant light on the French position, and confirms in a striking way a statement made by ourselves on May 19th last, which at the time greatly irritated our French friends. It is really the fact that in spite of their enormous expenditure on armaments, the French Departments of War and Marine have not the means of carrying out a forward Colonial policy, or of fighting China, without great European danger. As we then pointed out, the Minister of War cannot, except in some great emergency, employ the Regular Army in Asia at all. The vast numbers of trained men who now form that Army consist in great part of Reserves, who cannot be called out except in national danger; in another part, of undrilled conscripts, who die like flies in a camp; and in a third part, of men with only a year to serve, who would be useless for a long war. None of these can be taken, and to make up a powerful Corps d'Armée the Minister must deprive his regiments of their bones, the men of eighteen months' service, and thus, in the event of European commotion, dangerously enfeeble his whole Army. He will not do it, especially as, the Colonies being part of the Department of Marine, he is slightly jealous of surrendering soldiers to an alien authority; and if he would, the Chamber would not permit a "dislocation" which, expecting, as the Deputies always do, a German attack, they regard with extreme terror. The War Minister and the Minister of Marine are, therefore, when pressed by events or policy, compelled to get together scratch armies, made up of that excellent force the Marines—say 15,000 effectives—that singular but daring body the Foreign Legion, usually 2,500 strong, and a certain number of "Volunteers," who draw high pay and are attached where the Departments please. This force, roughly estimated at 20,000 men in all, is now confessedly used up. Part garrison the West India Islands, part are fighting and sickening in Tamatave, part control that pandemonium, New Caledonia, and the remainder are in Tonquin, where they are insufficient. There must be from 8,000 to 9,500 of them in Cochin China,—but the authorities there have to garrison Saigon, their own city; to overawe Hué, the capital of their vassal King; to garrison Hanoi, the fortress-capital of Tonquin, effectively; to watch Haiphong, the town guarding the entrance to that mouth of the Red River which they find most convenient; to garrison Haidzuong, the fortified station which protects the same mouth higher up; and to supply the Army of action against Bacninh, which, as we now know officially, is defended by Chinese regulars. There are not, therefore, enough of them. Admiral Courbet has no native auxiliaries worth mention, for his Yellow Flags, or Anamese, cannot be trusted; he dare not empty his garrisons, lest the Black Flags should attack them, as they did Haidzuong the other day, and the moment he leaves the river, he must post at least 1,000 men at the landing-place to protect his stores. His actual force would be whittled away to some 3,000 men, with whom to attack a fortress carrying Krupp guns, defended by Chinese, and made as unapproachable as ditches and canals dug in a tropical delta, where the water rises if you stick a spud into the earth, can make it. The force is too small, and we do not doubt the rumour that Admiral Courbet, an excellent officer, trusted, like most experienced sailors, for prudence, as well as valour, has telegraphed that he will not risk a defeat by advancing without more men.

Where is he to get them? There are 600 Marines nearly due at Haiphong, and 1,200 men in the Red Sea on their way, and it is reported, though we cannot verify this, that 2,400 more have been collected by different expedients in the ports of France. None of these, however, are the material the Admiral wants, except the 600 seasoned Marines; and, apparently, there are no more to be obtained in time. Admiral Courbet must, therefore, advance, or indefinitely postpone his movement; and we are by no means sure that he will not choose the second course. If he does not, he risks a repulse which would be followed by insurrection and massacre; if he does, the Minister at War has but cold comfort to give him. He told the Committee on Tonquin that he would not touch the Regular Army in France in any case, but that he could find 2,000 troops in Algeria—who, however, cannot be in Tonquin for two months, and who will probably be stopped, for fear of a coming insurrection—and that if more were required, he "would call for three volunteers from every company of the French Army," and so make up 8,000 men additional. Imagine the time it will take to collect these men from every little barrack in France, the kind of men who will volunteer for a detested service, the want of non-commissioned officers, and the general disorganisation of a drilled crowd like that, and recollect that General Campenon knows war, and we may realise the straits to which the French Ministry is reduced. It is really fighting twelve thousand miles away, with a great empire for opponent, and with the name of France to guard, while it disposes of less force than the majority of third-class Powers. Well may M. Ferry say that "the situation is grave," amidst cries and starts from his opponents; and well may he hint, as he does to all who can read between the lines, that if China would only give him a nominal victory—which Teeng, snubbed and affronted by all Frenchmen, is in no temper to do—he would gladly be out of Tonquin without beat of drum.

Many of our friends will ask why even the small force available should not serve, as equally small forces have often served the English turn, and we confess to a certain perplexity on that point. It must be remembered, however, that even in Olive's early battles, and in the Mutiny campaigns, we have always had native auxiliaries, and have, therefore, been exempt from "fatigue duties;" that the Chinese Regulars are thoroughly armed, and trained by Europeans—are, in fact, as good as Sikhs—that the Tonquinese are exceptionally daring men, accustomed for ages to a position like that of the Montenegrins; that all French training has for object the acting in masses; and that all French officers are disheartened by the singular severity with which French opinion treats those who fail. Allowing for these things, however, there remains something to be explained, and the explanation we believe to be this. The French soldiers, including in a less degree even the Marines, never like this kind of work. They hate to be away from Europe, they see little glory in jungle-fighting, they lose heart in the horrid climate—worse than that of Rangoon before it was drained—and they have some special liability to dysenteric disease and low-fever, which every doctor notices, which has never been explained, but which is, as we believe from the Tunis record, due to the most reckless carelessness about the water they consume. A small allowance of brandy, instead of their abominable vinegar, and peremptory orders not to drink water unmixed with it, would save half the invaliding which so weakens their expeditions; but in conscript armies, human life is cheap. It is a pity to see men so brave and so resigned so served, but the Medical Department is worse treated in France than even in our own country, till the soldiers dread sickness much more than wounds. Be that as it may, the fact is undeniable that French soldiers in the tropics show little or none of the elasticity they display at home, and that French officers there hate to move forward with visibly inadequate means. It is this which makes a full supply of men so necessary, and General Campenon, with all the will in the world, has, as he frankly admits to the Committee, not got them to send, unless he collects them from all France with a toothcomb. Of course, if things go worse, the difficulty will disappear, for France will use her Regular Army at any risk, and send 50,000 men; but the Chamber will be crazy with panic, and the Reserves must be called out for garrison duty,—an order which would, even in Prussia, under the iron German discipline, create bitter murmurs. The French Ministry are not to blame for their difficulties, which lie deep in the very structure of their State, but they are to blame for attempting three wars at once, and still more to blame for refusing to believe, in spite of evidence, that a Monarchy which governs three hundred millions in tranquillity must possess some fighting force. China is weak, as Chinese Gordon told her, because her capital was selected with an eye to Tartary, and not to the sea; but if France cannot get to Peking, let her not fight China. Anywhere else, the Empress-Mother can waste men like shells, and not know that they are wasted.

LORD DERBY AND THE AUSTRALIAN CONFEDERATION.

WEDNESDAY, November 28th, 1883, may hereafter be a day famous in the history of the "Expansion of England." The meeting of the advisers of the Crown in the several Australian Colonies which was then held is, in all probability, the first step towards immediate Federation, and where the potential forces involved are so vast, federation may be the first step towards the formation of an Empire which shall shape the destiny of that infant world which we speak vaguely of as the Islands of the Pacific. But a short time back, it seemed to many that Australian federation was only a dream. Economical differences and social rivalry were supposed to constitute an insurmountable barrier. Federation might come in the future, but it was not to be hoped for in the present. We could wish that now that, contrary to all expectation, federation promises to come, and to come quickly, the stimulus applied and the welcome given had been of a different kind. Unfortunately, England has now a Secretary of State for the Colonies among whose many admirable qualities imagination is not included. In many Cabinet offices, this want is no disqualification for the due discharge of a Minister's duties. Trade, local government, and the Duchy of Lancaster may be administered in a spirit of the merest prose. But there are two posts for which want of imagination is a very great disqualification. A man who cannot vividly reproduce the past will never make a good Secretary of State for India. A man who cannot vividly picture the future will never make a good Secretary of State for the Colonies. If Lord Derby could have looked beyond the present—or rather, perhaps, if he could have gazed into any future other than an economical one—he would have realised something of what is involved in Australian federation. He would have been eager to have his name associated with it in after-times,—to go down to history as the far-seeing Minister who in the bud could detect the perfect flower, and who neither despised nor was deluded by the day of small things. Had Mr. Forster been at the Colonial Office instead of Lord Derby, the Ministers of the Australian Colonies would have met on Wednesday in a very different temper. The decision of the English Government on the particular question submitted to them might have been exactly the same, but it would have been announced in a very different tone. Indeed, to tell the plain and unpleasant truth, that decision could hardly have been announced in a worse tone. It is not the decision itself that we quarrel with. A single colony cannot be allowed to go about annexing islands as an Italian annexes cigar-ends, and the grave questions raised by the action of the Queensland Government in the matter of New Guinea would be greatly simplified, if the Government to which the newly-annexed population was to be handed over were the Government of an Australian Dominion. But the more necessary it is that Federation should be treated as an indispensable preliminary to annexation, the more important it was to say no word that could be represented as in any way throwing cold water on Federation. In this respect, Lord Derby's despatch of October 12th is a perfect shower-bath. The Agent-General for Victoria had been instructed to impress upon him "the sense of her Majesty's Colonial Ministers that it is eminently to be desired, in view of the Convention of the Australasian Governments, that a clear understanding with her Majesty's Imperial Government should be attained in respect to the conditions on which the confederation of the Colonies should be approached." No doubt, he asked several other questions besides the question as to what the Imperial Government thought about annexation. But considering that the day for the Convention of the Australasian Governments was actually fixed, and that Federation in its first initiative was only a few weeks off, the Secretary of State might have said something implying his sense that the occasion was a remarkable one. Lord Derby said nothing that could imply any sense that it was an occasion at all. He left the whole subject of annexation on one side. The Agent-General for Victoria had impressed upon him that the Australians wanted his views about Confederation. Lord Derby scarcely so much as names Confederation; he confines himself to stating the views of the Government on "certain questions connected with the proposed annexation of various islands in the Pacific Ocean." He does, indeed, say that if the Colonies decide upon confederation, there "would undoubtedly be much less difficulty than at present in arranging for the transfer to them of the obligations of this country in respect of neighbouring native communities." But to federation in a more general sense there is not so much as a reference. Not a word is said that can be taken to convey even a common-place congratulation. He does not even wish the Australasian Governments a pleasant Convention. Quite apart from the importance of the questions involved, this method of handling them is greatly to be regretted. It does not concern the Australians. They will consolidate themselves into a great Dominion, whether we give or withhold our sympathies. But it does concern Englishmen, because it may greatly alter the spirit in which this work of consolidation is carried out. We should wish it to go on in the full light of home interest and home sympathy. Lord Derby is determined that, so far as it lies with him, it shall go on in the outer darkness of ignorance and unconcern.

France has of late had so much on her hands besides the treatment of habitual criminals, that Englishmen may have almost forgotten that there is such a thing as a Récidiviste Bill. But though that Bill has not yet become law, it has passed through the Chamber of Deputies, and in one form or another will soon pass through the Senate. The Committee to which it has been referred has made considerable changes in its provisions, but they are not changes which affect the scope of the Bill as regards the Australian Colonies. Whether habitual criminals are sent to New Caledonia as a matter of police precaution, or by the sentence of a Judge, matters nothing. They will be sent there in one way or the other, and they will probably be sent there in large numbers. The French are in a panic about their Récidivistes, and men in a panic are not likely to allow what they hold to be a safeguard to go unemployed. And when they do employ it, some awkward questions are certain to arise, unless there are entire sympathy and co-operation between the Australian and the Imperial Governments. What the former have done in the case of British subjects not convicted of any crime, they will certainly not omit to do in the case of French subjects convicted of many crimes. These Récidivistes are to be sent to New Caledonia, in the almost avowed hope and expectation that they will make their escape and lead their old lives in communities that are not French. If they attempt to land in Australia, they will promptly be shipped off to France; if they attempt to land in New Guinea, the Australian Governments will make annexation more of a reality than Queensland made it the other day. When it is remembered how nearly these prospects touch the relations between Great Britain and France, it is surely well that Great Britain and her Australian Colonies should not be of two minds as to the manner in which they are to be dealt with. If they are to be of one mind, the Imperial Government must take more pains than it has yet taken to understand the Australian position.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

WE have not had the advantage of reading any report of Mr. W. Morris's Oxford defence of Socialism which would give the remotest idea of the kind of Socialism which he advocates, or the reasons for which he advocates it. But there is so much Socialism "in the air" just now, and it has so much influence in rendering people discontented with the principles on which society is actually organised, even though it is insufficient,—as, of course, with reasonable men, it usually is,—to make them plead in earnest for a new set of principles, that it is well to look carefully at the motives which appear to actuate the better of the new Socialists. We do not suppose that M. Jules Guesde, who maintained in Paris on Monday that if house property grows in value, that is due to the merits of the nation at large, and that therefore the nation ought to appropriate such property without compensation, is likely to have many followers in England. On the same principle exactly, the gains of a great writer being evidently due to the appreciation of the nation at large, Victor Hugo's copyrights should be seized by the State, and administered generally for the benefit of the community. English Socialism, if it has any root at all,—and we do not think it has much,—has a root in something of more value than the excuse which a demagogue invents for scrambling for the property of another; and we believe that that root is nothing less than a deep sense of the duties of property, and a profound disgust for the gross neglect of these duties by so many who have inherited all their wealth, and have not, therefore, even their own energy to thank for being in a position to exert the rights of a great proprietor. There is a vague notion, too, that Christianity favours Socialism, that Socialism is the antagonist of selfishness, and that the present régime is nothing but a pitiless and selfish scramble between the strong and the weak for wealth which would be enough for all, if there were any fair authority to divide the spoil.

The truth is, we believe, that no great faith ever existed which favours the root-principle of Socialism less than Christianity. That the early Christians, feeling that their faith was all in all to them, shared their property amongst each other without gradging, is true enough; but that is no more Socialism than it is for people of unequal wealth to support amongst them by unequal contributions such a society, for instance, as that for the Propagation of the Gospel, without demanding a higher influence in its decisions for the man who gives more, than is wielded by the men who give less. Socialism, if it means anything at all, means something very much more than that; it means that even without any great end for the sake of which men are willing and eager to make a great sacrifice, the needy are to be accorded the right to sponge upon the rich, if, indeed, any distinction between the needy and the rich is to remain at all, and all are not rather to be reduced to the same level of pensioners on a common fund. Now, is there anything in Christianity, anything in Christ's teaching, or in that of any of the Apostles, which looks even remotely in this direction? We say without hesitation,—absolutely nothing; on the contrary, the whole tendency of our Lord's teaching goes in the opposite direction,—that each man shall be held responsible for the proper use of his own talents, whether they be of mind or of money; that to whom much is given, of him shall much be required; and to whom little is given, of him shall little be required.

Doubtless, the whole drift of Christian, as also now of Buddhist teaching, is to inculcate the detachment of the spirit from dependence on the material things of the earth. "Man's life consists not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth," "The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment," "Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on," "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God," are all warnings against the growth in the soul of the false belief that accumulation of earthly wealth is one of the urgent duties and necessities of life. "One thing thou lackest," said our Lord, to the rich young man; "go sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come, follow me," when he saw that the disciple's heart was still drawn towards the treasures of earth. And so, too, he tells his disciples that "it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye," than for those who trust in riches to enter the kingdom of God. Of all this there is no doubt, however difficult it may be for an age that insists on the accumulation of wealth as the first duty of mankind, to receive it. But this is not only not Socialism; it is not in the least an approximation to Socialism. It is a moral discipline for those to whom the right is freely accorded by the State of doing what they will with their own,—a right with which the Christian teachers never by any chance tried to interfere. They always taught that only that should be given to the poor which could be given with all the heart; that he who did not support his own household was worse than an infidel; that compulsion should never be put on the desires of men to give or to withhold, unless it were by the spirit of the man who felt those desires.

In fact, such a system as Socialism was absolutely inconsistent with the first assumption of Christianity, that any sacrifice to be made by those who were richer for the sake of those who were poorer, was to be made freely. Our Lord commends the poor widow who casts a mite into the treasury, because she had cast it in of her poverty, whilst the others had cast in their liberal contributions out of their abundance; and again, he tells those who give, to give secretly, not for the reputation of giving, but for the love of giving; but all this assumes that all giving is to be voluntary, and that unless it is voluntary, and proceeds from a pure motive, it is of no moral account. Where is there a single passage in the New Testament which so much as suggests that private ownership is mischievous, and that common property, established by law, is to supersede all private generosity, all the give-and-take of liberality and gratitude? Does not Christ commend the woman who spent much on the box of ointment with which she anointed him, even though it was taken from the resources for the poor, on the ground that "the poor ye have always with you, but me ye have not always"? In other words, there are inspirations of the giver which are higher even than those prompting men to redress the inequalities of life. Again, does he not, in the strictest way, maintain the right of the lord of the vineyard to pay his labourers who had come to their work only at the eleventh hour as liberally as those who had borne "all the burden and heat of the day," and this solely on the ground that he had right, as owner, to do what he would with his own, and that so long as he kept his engagements with the first, they had no claim to protest because he did a good deal more than keep his engagements with the last. It may, perhaps, be said, and said truly, that this is a parable referring rather to races than to individuals, that its drift was to intimate that those who had never passed through the training of Judaism were to be as welcome to the gifts of God in Christ, as those who had borne all the preliminary training of the Jewish system,—most of whom, indeed, had rather been hardened by it, though they had been made the vehicles for a great revelation to the world at large. We do not deny for a moment that this is the chief bearing of the parable, but none the less it teaches the lesson that God, who promises and keeps his promise to one, may give much more than he has promised to another, without being open to any charge of injustice. "Is thine eye evil, because I am good? Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" are questions intended to show that if the grasping side of human nature makes a sort of leverage of the divine generosity, in order to exact more for itself than it had otherwise agreed to be content with, it is to be fairly silenced by an appeal to the final right of divine power to choose its own terms of giving. But such a comparison as this could not have been made without sanctioning and enforcing the absolute right also of human ownership, so long as it keeps faith with all, to do more than keep faith with many. The lesson of the parable is the denial that those who have received all they have had any pledge to receive, can have any right to complain, or, indeed, would produce anything but evidence of their own narrow-heartedness if they felt even disposed to complain, that others are more generously treated. And that is as strong an indirect sanction to the principle of ownership, even in what we call earthly property, as we can imagine any teacher giving. Indeed, the more our Lord dwells on the importance of not attaching our hearts to the wealth of earth, the more significant those words of his and of his apostles become which show that they recognised in the fullest degree the rights and claims both of wealth and of poverty, though they certainly regarded the latter as the more generally conducive to the attainment of Christian virtues than the former. We cannot imagine a greater confusion of ideas than the notion that because Christ rather dreaded wealth for his followers, as a serious temptation, he desired to see the compulsory division of wealth enforced between the rich and the poor, between the industrious and the idle. That would imply not only depriving the poor of the special Christian discipline which Christ valued so highly, but depriving them of it in the worst possible way, because in a way not resulting from the play of Christian character. Undoubtedly, Christianity looks upon the love of wealth as a great danger to the soul. Equally undoubtedly, it has nothing at all to say to those mechanical social systems which take the stress of the problem off the individual soul, to put it on to the social system.

THE PROTECTION OF PAPER SECURITIES.

THE trials of Warden and Watters for stealing a huge amount of Bonds payable to bearer and speculating with them on the Stock Exchange, have evoked a quantity of excellent, but not very instructive sermons. We seem to have heard before that gamblers are great fools, that they generally ruin themselves, and that when they lose they very often betake themselves to stealing their masters' property. Warden and Watters were exactly like two apprentices who first betted for pennies, then betted for shillings, and then, when luck went against them, abstracted sovereigns from the employer's till, till they were found out. The scale of their operations was an accident, due mainly to their positions, and there is no moral reason for punishing them more severely than any other thieves. There is, it is true, a social reason, just as there is a social reason for distinguishing between forgery and theft; but the additional punishment should be recognised as one demanded by the safety of society, and not by the moral law. The old adage about the sin of stealing a pin is not true, though society is constantly compelled to act as if it were, and give years of imprisonment to one thief who has destroyed commercial confidence, and only months to another who has annexed a silver spoon. We do not care to add one more sermon to the number poured out this week, and would rather discuss the question whether it is possible or not to add to the security of the new masses of portable property which civilisation has succeeded in inventing, and which so tempt the greedy and the knowing. That mass is now something enormous. Our grandfathers were very jealous over their plate, and took elaborate precautions to preserve the jewels which they often bequeathed separately by will; but all the plate and jewels in the kingdom are worth little, even if we add all the bank-notes, when compared with the mass of property, probably not weighing in all a ton, called "Bonds payable to bearer." There are hundreds of millions sterling invested in such Bonds, and their preservation from theft, fire, and destruction by insects is a matter of the first importance to two-thirds of the well-to-do households in the Three Kingdoms. So far from thinking it wonderful that the bonds should be sometimes stolen, we think it most remarkable that they are stolen so seldom, for the carelessness and trustfulness of their owners hardly know any limit. Great ladies are not more careless of their diamonds than investors are of their bonds. An extraordinary number of people keep them in their houses, though if they had an equal sum in bank-notes to keep there they would never sleep for fear of fire, or thieves, or burglars. Another crowd insist on depositing their bonds with their lawyers, trusting entirely to their integrity, and making no inquiries either as to the place where the bonds are kept, or the liability from fire, or the persons who have access to the strong-room of the firm, or the chances that unknown men may be taken into partnership. So common is this practice, especially in London, as to be a positive embarrassment to many lawyers, who are by no means anxious to do unpaid bankers' work in addition to their own duties, and are painfully aware of any fresh responsibility. A third crowd deposit them with their brokers, quite careless of the fact that brokers, of all men, are tempted to pledge securities, and without, in most cases, an inquiry as to the places in which the rich portables will, till wanted, be deposited. The brokers, for all their clients know, may keep them in their desks. Indeed, the public never seem to think at all about the mechanical safety of their bonds. Investors take that for granted, and sleep happily with as little dread either of fire, or water, or burglars, as of breach of trust. The Directors of the National Safe Company, who have built a sort of steel fortress for the deposit of Bonds, have been amazed for years past to find how little the public care about their elaborate precautions, and how reluctant investors are to take a little trouble or pay a few shillings a year for the right of depositing valuables in a perfectly safe place. They would just as soon trust an old desk with rotten hinges, and entirely sympathise with the great lady who, if she intends a tour, puts all her diamonds and sapphires into her housekeeper's jam-pots. Like their grandmothers, who always put valuable papers in the best tea-pot, they rely upon concealment, and to the disgust of the Safe Company, treat mechanical guarantees, and armed patrols, and huge cisterns, and all the rest of their precautions, as useless surplussage. That is the real reason of the disappointment of the shareholders of that Company, who, if the rich were as timid as they are supposed to be, would possess a mine of wealth. The remainder of the crowd deposit bonds with their Bankers, and there leave them without a care. The Bankers may pledge them, or the bankers' clerks may steal them, but the depositors give neither risk a thought, and very seldom inform themselves as to the precautions taken. The Bankers implore them to see the bonds for themselves at least once a year, but they will not do it; while as to checking their own lists and their bankers' lists by occasional comparison, they think such a proceeding would show want of confidence, and are as ashamed to do it, as housewives are to count the spoons after a great party.

It is this easy-goingness of the public which makes it so difficult to enforce thorough care in the keeping of Securities payable to bearer. If investors were nervous, Bankers would soon find plans which would render the theft of bonds in their keeping almost an impossibility. At present, they rely partly on mechanical devices, such as fire-proof cellars and strong safes, and partly on a system of espionage and mutual distrust, which, as the Warden trial shows, is liable to break down. It is forbidden for any single person to enter the deposit-cellar, and the doors are fastened by two sets of keys, which are placed in the hands of two separate officials, the theory being that a combination of two casually connected persons for purposes of robbery is nearly impossible. We do not see why that should be true, and fancy the Banks rely mainly on character, but it is true that the theory has hitherto proved correct. No conspiracy to rob has been detected. Unfortunately, it is very difficult to keep up in men who meet every day, and know each other's worthiness, the proper amount of distrust and dread; and the two trusted officials soon begin to feel waiting for each other a useless trouble, and confidence in each other very convenient, and to borrow each other's keys. That was the way, as the evidence showed, in the Warden case, and, if the truth were known, it would be found to be the case in many another Bank. Men tire of watching through life other men whom they think they can perfectly trust. The two keys are of very little use, even if it were impossible to forge the second, and it is difficult to see what plan would be more efficacious. If, indeed, the key were deposited with an officer placed in each Bank by the Syndicate of Bankers, who will, it is believed, ultimately guarantee each other's securities, and the officer were shifted month by month from Bank to Bank, the precaution might be found of more effect. The intruder, having nothing to do but watch, probably would watch, if only to do something, while the Bank accountant would dislike him too much to let him enter the room alone. That scheme, we believe, would work, but it would require as many clerks as there were Banks in the Syndicate, and clerks who could hardly be set to do any other work. A still better plan, however, would be to allow the Bank in which the securities were deposited to stamp its name across them, and agree with the Stock Exchange to forbid sale until this stamp had been regularly effaced, by some officer who never went into the strong room. We cannot see what the objection to this plan can be, for it is final, and it would require as little additional expenditure of time as the defacement of a stamp in passing through the Post Office, which is a matter of seconds. There is, however, it is said, an objection on the part of depositors, and of course neither this plan nor any other could quite exclude the possibility of a personation arranged by the Bank Manager himself, who, with a pseudo client by his side, would be master of all the defences. Still, either of these two schemes would greatly decrease the probabilities of fraud, which can be finally destroyed only by the substitution of inscribed Stock for Bonds payable to bearer. The Colonies are beginning to make this change, and why all Governments anxious for credit do not make it we are unable to guess. People say inscribed Stock is not so easily pledgeable, but as a matter of fact the owner of Consols can always, on their security, obtain a loan in ten minutes; and other issuers of inscribed Stock could adopt a similar system, which would have for them the advantage of raising the price of their loans two per cent. Nobody has any difficulty in pledging Railway Debentures, and they are practically inscribed Stock, not transferable till certain erasures have been made within the Railway Office.

"THE BIRDS" AT CAMBRIDGE.

THE brilliant representation of the brightest and gayest of the Greek Comedies, which has attracted crowded audiences to the Cambridge Theatre throughout the week in which we write, must be reckoned as a most important and valuable contribution to the modern movement which endeavours to connect classical scholarship with actual life. Comedy, indeed, shows us the secular, as Tragedy may be said to show the religious side of Greek life. And The Birds, with its sprightly wit, its fancy, so extravagant and yet so happily controlled by taste, its sparkling gaiety, exhibits that everyday life in its very happiest aspect. We miss, and are not sorry to miss, the savagery of attack with which, as in The Clouds, Aristophanes assails one whom he considered a dangerous doctrinaire, or, as in The Knights, falls on the leader of an opposite faction. Of course, he gives a rapier-thrust now and then, keen enough, doubtless, only that we cannot now perceive the point, to enemies, social, literary, or political; but the spirit of the whole is inspired by humour, rather than satire. The commentators have started a theory that the play was designed to rebuke the extravagant desire for aggrandisement and adventure, which had led the poet's countrymen into the Sicilian expedition. The coincidence of the representation with the starting of the armament in 415 can hardly be overlooked, but the dramatist does not go beyond a gentle laugh at the Athenian temper, so hopeful, so ready to receive grand promises of the future, symbolised, perhaps, by the two names, "Plausible" and "Hopeful," as they may be paraphrased, which head the list of characters. But he certainly does not satirise. And the happy conclusion of the play, where Plausible brings back the beautiful bride whose marriage is to be the earnest of all kinds of blessings to his new state and to mankind, seems meant to encourage rather than to check the popular hopes. The mind of Athens was, as may readily be imagined, in a state of the utmost tension. The city had sent out, not a mercenary army, but a citizen force, every soldier in which was a distinct unit in its political and social life; and the poet skilfully uses his very gayest and lightest fancy to soothe its anxiety. It helps us much to realise the Athenian temper, when we call up to mind the assembly of spectators, every one of whom must have had some keen, personal interest in the great enterprise of the day, sitting with eyes and ears intent on this extravagant burlesque of politics and religion.

In literary merit the play stands, we should say, easily at the head of the Aristophanic Dramas. Nowhere does the comic poet show more conclusively that, had he so pleased, he could have rivalled on their own ground the votaries of the more serious Muses. It contains passages of great lyrical beauty, notably the address of the Hoopoe to the Nightingale, and the choral portions of the Parabasis, where, alternating with some very broad humour, and strangely mingled with quaint imitations of bird-notes, are to be found examples of very fine poetical diction. It was in the Parabasis that the author was commonly accustomed to address his audience, to make his excuses and explanations, and not seldom to hint, more or less directly, his disapproval of their judgment in literature or politics. It is commonly, as may be supposed, the most interesting, if not the most amusing part of the comedy. The first portion in The Birds consists mainly of a burlesque of the popular cosmogonies; but a burlesque so brilliant that, but for its unmistakable lapse into farce, it might be taken for the most serious poetry. In the second, the dramatist makes a humorous attack on a well-known poulterer, who had the wickedness not only to sell siskins at the monstrous price of seven for three-halfpence, but to blow up thrushes to make them appear plump. For himself, he has only to say that if the spectators will give their judgment in his favour, his patrons, the Birds, shall reward them with all kinds of blessings. The comic business is exceedingly amusing. A poet, who is certainly a reminiscence of Euripides, sings plaintively how short of clothes was Straton, as he wandered among the Nomad Scythians, and carries away some old garments as a prize. The visitors that follow him are less fortunate. A vendor of oracles is met with a prophecy which foretells a beating for some one who should intrude uninvited on sacrifice, boasting of prophetic power, and with a manifest eye to a joint. A surveyor who offers to lay out the new city is summarily dismissed. An inspector and a dealer in "Acts of Parliament" depart quicker than they came. An informer, who thinks that a pair of wings will help him in his trade, gets nothing more than a sound whipping. This catastrophe, indeed, is repeated till it might seem monotonous; but it is one which never fails, it would seem, to rouse the mirth of an audience. Throughout the play, too, the action of the Chorus, as it has been realised and interpreted by the designers and performers of the Cambridge representation, is full from beginning to end of the highest gaiety and humour.

Of the merits of the performance, it is not easy to speak too highly; as a spectacle, it was brilliant in the extreme,—such a sight as no one that saw it will be likely to forget. The trooping-in of the Chorus, with its grotesque bird-figures, grotesque indeed, but never unsightly, made a visible impression on an assembly which was not of an excitable kind. Then the music was exquisite, and the rhythmic movements, with appropriate song, varied now and then by the clear solo of the Hoopoe, charmed both eye and ear. The declamation of the Parabasis was all that could be desired. The solemn cadences and os rotundum of the speaker were nothing less than admirable. Some of the performers were not quite word-perfect, and the metre suffered accordingly in parts—we speak, it must be understood, of the first representation—we seemed to hear one false quantity, and the enunciation was occasionally too rapid. But, on the whole, a most striking success was achieved. The effect of the music, the acting, and the scenery (to which, especially to the first scene, a word of special praise must be given) were such as to repay the pains which have been ungrudgingly spent upon them. This Cambridge Company deserves well of the Republic of Letters.

SIR WILLIAM SIEMENS.

THE work of Sir William Siemens deserves notice, not only because of the interest which attaches to great achievements, but also because his career bears witness at every step, to the practical value of scientific generalisations.

Whereas Englishmen are peculiarly apt to disdain general truths and to doubt their applicability. Sir W. Siemens has given it as his deliberate conviction that, "The further we advance, the more thoroughly we approach the indications of pure science in our practical results." Here lies the secret of his success; and his inventions are really important, inasmuch as they attest the value of this rule. As for the events of his early life, it suffices to say that he was born at Lenthe, in Hanover, in 1823; that he was educated at the Polytechnic School at Magdeburg, and at the University of Göttingen; that he came to England in 1843, for the purpose of introducing a method of silvering by galvanic deposit, that this invention was so well paid for that he compared himself to Croesus, and resolved to make England his home. From that time on until the moment of his death, on the 19th of last month, the history of his life is the record of a series of great inventions. And as he himself attributed these inventions to his endeavour "to realise in practice the indications of pure science," it becomes necessary to speak of the results arrived at in some branches of science about the year 1840. It will be remembered that Davy was the first to demonstrate the immateriality of heat, by melting two pieces of ice in an atmosphere below freezing-point by rubbing them together. Guided by this and similar experiments, a German physician named Mayer arrived at the conception of the interaction of forces; indeed, if we may believe Professor Tyndall, "Mayer had in 1842 actually calculated the mechanical equivalent of heat." This honour, however, Mayer must be content to share with Joule, who came, at nearly the same time, to the same result. In 1849, Joule published the formula which has since been universally accepted; he established, namely, that 772 foot-pounds of work—that is, 772 times the amount of force required to raise a weight of one pound one foot from the ground—is required to generate as much heat as will raise the temperature of a pound of water by one degree. Now, Siemens had studied the writings of Mayer and Joule, and while still in his teens he adopted the new theory. Forthwith, he set himself to compare this theoretic power of heat with the mechanical power of heat developed in the steam-engines of the day. He found $\frac{1}{3}$ of the total heat in the boiler was lost, the remaining $\frac{2}{3}$ part alone being all the heat really converted into mechanical effect. Here was a large margin for improvement, and he at once determined to try to save some of this wasted heat,—that is, he set to work to construct a regenerator or accumulator which would utilise a great part of it, and so approach in practical results more nearly to the theory as above formulated by Joule. For many years his labours were only partially successful, and on these we need not dwell. At last, more than ten years after his first attempts, he tried the plan of volatising the solid fuel, and by first converting the coal into gas, and then using the gas in regenerators, he obtained practical results of the utmost value. In his regenerative gas furnace, he utilised almost double as much heat as the steam-engine can utilise. The last lecture ever delivered by Michael Faraday was delivered in 1862 before the Royal Institution, and had for its subject this invention of Siemens. The great discoverer lauded the good qualities of the furnace, its economy, its facility of management. It has since come into very general use. It has been recently stated in a most interesting book, "The Creators of the Age of Steel," which will be published this week by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, that the inventor received a million dollars, or two hundred thousand pounds, in royalties for this patent in the United States alone,—no mean proof, one would say, of its usefulness; yet Sir William Siemens prophesied for it a still more extended sphere. In 1882, he expressed his belief that it must yet be introduced into all factories and on shipboard, nay, that "the time is not far distant when both rich and poor will largely resort to gas as the most convenient, the cleanest, and the cheapest of heating agents, and when raw coal will be seen only at the colliery or the gas-works." If this hope be realised, and the probability is that it will be, the regenerative gas furnace will have revolutionised industry as completely as did the steam-engine. Let us consider one result of this invention. When Mr. Siemens took out the patent for his furnace, in 1861, he stated that it was specially applicable to the melting of steel on the open hearth. That is, he thought that by means of this furnace "steel could be made directly from the raw ores, without the intermediate use of huge blast-furnaces and laborious refining processes." With this object in view, he erected experimental steel works at Birmingham in 1865, and two years later he succeeded completely in converting old iron rails directly into steel. Almost immediately his method was adopted at Crewe, by the London and North-Western Railway Company; a little later, by Krupp, at Essen. Since that time it has made its way. In 1873, only 77,500 tons of open-hearth steel were made in Great Britain, as against 436,000 tons in 1882. One effect of this cheaper process of producing steel deserves mention; it has revolutionised shipbuilding. Not only are steel vessels safer, because stronger, than those built of iron,—they are also lighter. Their carrying-power accordingly is so much greater, that they are said to earn twenty-five per cent. more than iron ships. Now, “in 1879, only about 20,000 tons of steel vessels were built, whereas in 1883 over 260,000 tons were built, being one-fourth of the total tonnage of new shipbuilding for that year.” These are achievements which would in themselves entitle William Siemens to the gratitude of mankind, yet in another field he has made for himself a still greater name; and his method remained the same; he ever sought to realise in practice theoretic truths.

It was in 1808 that Davy produced an electric light, although at an excessive cost. The thing lacking was a strong and continuous current at a cheap rate. In 1831, Faraday showed that electric currents might be produced by permanent magnetism. These currents, however, were very weak. This defect Siemens set himself to remedy; in 1856, he produced what has since been known as the Siemens armature, by which the strength of the electric current could be increased almost indefinitely; and this discovery led, some ten years later, to the discovery of the dynamo-machine.

In February, 1867, Mr. William Siemens sent to the Royal Society a paper, “On the Conversion of Dynamic into Electrical Force, without the Use of Permanent Magnetism.” Ten days later, Sir Charles Wheatstone announced—also in a paper to the Royal Society—the same discovery, arrived at quite independently. Both papers were read upon the same night, February 14th. “It would be difficult,” says Professor Tyndall, “to find in the whole field of science a more beautiful example of the interaction of natural forces than that set forth in these two papers.” A suggestion contained in Sir C. Wheatstone’s paper led Sir W. Siemens, in 1880, to a further improvement of the discovery. Without going into details, it will suffice to say that the invention of the dynamo-machine made electricity available for industrial purposes. It has already been proved capable of transforming into electrical work 90 per cent. of the mechanical energy employed as motive-power. It is daily giving fresh evidence of its utility; and, although but just introduced, some of its effects belong, indeed, “to the fairy-tales of science.” First among these must be named the electric light. The leading part played by Sir W. Siemens in the improvement of this light is so well known as to render comment superfluous. But his opinion of the light itself may here be reproduced. In 1882 he said, “Electricity must win the day, as the light of luxury.” We have already noticed his belief that gas will come to be used for all heating purposes. Sir William Siemens, too, employed the electric light in horticulture with good results; the fruit and grain, we are told, which were subjected to the electric light at night, grew with extraordinary rapidity, and were superior in size and quality to the fruit and grain produced under ordinary conditions. The electric railway of our day is the work of his brother, Dr. Werner Siemens, who, as early as 1847, distinguished himself by insulating telegraph wires by means of gutta-percha, and so making submarine telegraphy practicable. In passing, we may say, that the electric telegraph, as it is to-day, owes almost as much to the improvements of the Brothers Siemens as to Sir Charles Wheatstone or to Mr. Morse, the American, both of whom claim the honour of having invented it. But whatever may be the value of electricity in horticulture, or as a light generally, no one can doubt that as a dynamical force it is destined to revolutionise industry. In 1877, Sir William Siemens calculated that “all the coal raised throughout the world would barely suffice to produce the amount of power that runs to waste at Niagara alone,” and he added that it would not be difficult to realise a large proportion of this wasted power by turbines, &c., and to use it at great distances by means of dynamo-electrical machines. Some five years later, a similar power was in England transmitted to a distance by means of electricity, and used for pumping water, &c. When this fact is considered, we seem led to the portal of a new world, stranger and more fascinating than any pictured by the imagination. To turn, however, from the possibilities of the future to reality, we cannot avoid mentioning one fact which seems to throw some light upon the personality of Sir W. Siemens. In 1879 he constructed a house-grate that brought the power of economising fuel within the means of the ordinary householder, but “in order that it might be used without restraint and at the least expense, he did not make it the subject of a patent.” Whether the worth of this grate be much or little, the kindness of the action enhances our admiration for the genius of Sir William Siemens by a touch of purely human sympathy. With this incident we might well conclude our sketch of the man and his work, but we cannot help remarking that his successes come to commend a reform he was never weary of advocating, viz., that the State should establish free technical Schools and Science-Laboratories in every part of the country.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MINORITY REPRESENTATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE “SPECTATOR.”]

SIR,—I am afraid my scheme of representation must, indeed, be complicated, if even the Spectator misapprehends it. You object that it might very well, under certain circumstances, return a candidate who had had no first vote at all. But in certain cases, such a result is right and satisfactory. It might happen when a party was strong enough to return two Members, and was running an old favourite along with an untried novice. It might also conceivably happen, in a case where parties were so divided, that no candidate obtained the necessary quota, but there was one person whose name, like that of Themistocles at the altar of Neptune, was found second upon nearly every voting-paper.

You object that such a candidate might even appear at the head of the poll; but you forget that, as soon as he had obtained the necessary quota of votes, his surplus voting-papers would be passed on to the candidate next named upon them, according to the same rules as those by which he himself received them. You picture the confusion and disgust of the people, at finding that the numbers credited to each candidate in the final state of the poll did not represent the relative preferences of the electors. But the significant figures, as regards the relative popularity of candidates on the same side, would be the number of first votes originally given to each, and not the number finally attributed to them after the calculations of the returning officer. The seniority of Members might well be determined by the number of first votes received by them, and these figures, and the results of each subsequent stage of the process of calculation, should be published.

With regard to the principle of negative voting, a simple power of voting minus, as an alternative to voting plus, gives an undue influence to the protesting vote. Take the case of three candidates, A, B, C, standing for a single vacancy. By allowing a voter to record a negative vote against A, you double his power, for the effect will clearly be the same as if he were able to vote both for B and for C. A much fairer and less invidious plan would be to enable a voter to distribute his votes fractionally among as many candidates as he pleases. For instance, if five candidates were contesting a place returning two Members, he would be able to give either a whole vote to each of two candidates, or two-thirds of a vote to each of three candidates, or half a vote to each of four. To carry the principle fully into effect, he ought also to be able to give a whole vote to one candidate, and half a vote each to two others, or to make any other fractional combination that pleased his fancy. But I have no faith in such refinements, and I altogether object to the scheme, as being contrary to true principle, and based upon what, as Mill points out, is the false analogy of blackballing at a Club. Mr. Chamberlain to-day makes an appeal in favour of the rights of a down-trodden majority. His arguments are unanswerable, as against any partial attempts at representing particular minorities; but they do not touch general schemes of representation, which would be as effective in giving to the majority its due preponderance of power as in securing for the minority its fair opportunity of a hearing.

Mr. Chamberlain urges that the minority in one place is the majority in another. In England, and in ordinary times, this may often be true. But take the case of Ireland. Our danger in that country arises, in Mr. Chamberlain’s words, from the hostility of a large portion of the population to Imperial rule.

Surely, it is not well, in such a country, to adopt an electoral system such as Mr. Chamberlain desires, which would put almost a monopoly of the representation into the hands of that hostile portion, and would leave quite disproportionately unrepresented the minority of the population, which is friendly to us.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE NEGATIVE VOTE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me a few words on your own article, and on the letter of "C. R. A.," relative to the negative vote? As to the former, I regret that whilst you use the strongest arguments in support of the principle, you should still find the state of mind which would make use of it "not one with which you would sympathise." But, with your permission, I would put the following proposition. I suppose that most people will acknowledge a difference between mere opinions and principles. So long as I see two men striving to attain the same end—the happiness and good government of this country and her people—whilst they seek to attain those objects with due regard to the Decalogue, I may, and do, prefer one plan to the other, and vote accordingly. If, however, a third person seeks the same object by a breach of the fundamental laws of morality, it at once becomes a matter of comparative indifference to me which of the first two succeeds, but of paramount importance that the third should not.

It ceases to be a question of better or worse, and becomes one of right and wrong. In a one-Member constituency, or if the voter has but one vote for a constituency with any number of Members, or again, with the cumulative vote, he would wish to vote for his principles, rather than for his party; but, if possible, not against his party, whilst for his principles. And this he could accomplish only by giving a negative vote. Your correspondent "C. R. A." gives me an apt illustration; the election referred to is for a School Board, the question, "Shall I have persons who approve the principle of religious instruction, and only differ as to the how, the when, and the where of its inculcation, or a person who will have none of it?" All the first class agree with me in principle, differing only in opinion; the last is wholly obnoxious to me. Better that we should have a brief battle at the polling-booth, than a constant polemic on the Board. "C. R. A.," I think, will agree with me, if he sees the account of a breakfast, given by the gentlemen he names, to one who had been imprisoned for an offence which was obnoxious to "C. R. A." These gentlemen, one of whom is a Member of the London School Board, applaud the speech of the guest of the day, in which he says, "Not a day shall pass over my head without my striking a blow at the accursed creed!" Can any Christian have a doubt that his duty is to prevent such persons from having a voice on the education question? Similar observations would hold good in the case of a Parliamentary candidate holding the peculiar views of the late candidate for Manchester.

One word as to the probability of the minority retaining its Member in case each voter has but one vote. At present, at Liverpool the Conservative party has a well-recognised majority, yet at the last bye-election the Liberal was returned. At Manchester, at the general election, it appeared that the Liberals could seat two Members, yet at the bye-election a Conservative was returned.—I am, Sir, &c., Belgrave Road, November 26th.

F. W. RAIKES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me to supplement Mr. Compton's hypothetical case of the working of the Negative Vote by another:—

Against.	Candidates.	For.
1,161	Jones	1,150
1,236	Brown	1,280
2	Robinson	54

In this case, would not Robinson be returned?

Jones and Brown might be representatives of the two great political parties, the return of either of whom would be an honour to the constituency; Robinson a local nobody. This would, indeed, be the representation of minorities with a vengeance!

The radical defect of all schemes for the representation of minorities, seems to me a failure to show that minorities are not sufficiently represented under our present rough-and-ready system. Take any "minority" cause,—Local Option, "Fair-trade," Disestablishment, Anti-vaccination, or (pace the Editor of the Spectator) Anti-vivisection; can we say that any of these are not represented in the House of Commons, somewhere about in the proportion in which they are supported by the electors throughout the country?—I am, &c., Regent's Park, November 24th.

ALFRED W. BENNETT.

[As we said in commenting on the previous letter, we have no belief at all that electors who are explicit supporters of a definite party would dream of giving up their vote for a man whom they wished to see in Parliament, in order to use it exclusively for the defeat of his antagonist. No doubt minorities are over-represented now. In that we heartily agree. That is no reason why in adopting a measure the tendency of which must be to take that representation away, we should not look carefully to see that they shall be, not over-represented, but fairly represented in future.—Ed. Spectator.]

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Is it not possible that the adoption of negative voting would effectually destroy the chances of men with any marked individuality of character, and result in the still further upheaval of mediocrity?

Suppose a contest in a two-seated borough constituency. Let us say that Smith, a local brewer, and Lord R. Churchill were the Conservative candidates; and that Jones, a local ironmaster, and Mr. Chamberlain were the Liberal candidates. Would it not be almost a certainty that Mr. Chamberlain and Lord Randolph Churchill would be at the bottom of the poll, and Messrs. Smith and Jones at the top?

I protest against undue honours to Smith and Jones. The negative vote would give us negation of talent.—I am, Sir, &c., Slingsby, York, November 26th.

W. C. ALEXANDER.

[We do not think that voters with strong positive leanings would ever wish to give up their power of supporting a man they admired, for the purpose of opposing another man. In the case supposed, the strong Liberals would all vote for Mr. Chamberlain, and the strong Conservatives for Lord Randolph Churchill.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE REFORM BILL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the many able articles which have appeared in your paper lately respecting the approaching Reform of Parliamentary representation, I have not observed a reference to the question of Residence. A fertile source of uncertainty in the results of borough elections is the nomadic character of the smaller householder and the lodger. In consequence of the long period of residence in one house requisite to qualify for a vote, it would be quite possible for three elections to take place in the same borough, at intervals of six months, each with a different result, in consequence of the change of the electorate, those qualified in one election having become disqualified in the next, and others meanwhile having completed the required period of residence.

I could from personal knowledge give numbers of instances of householders remaining fully qualified to vote during several years, and nevertheless being unable to take part in two general elections, having changed their residence just before each election. If a general election were absolutely certain to take place at a particular date, these people might adjust their arrangements accordingly; but a man can scarcely be expected to wait a year, or perhaps longer, for the possibility of this event occurring. A material shortening of the period of residence, or better still, an abolition of any requirement of residence in favour of a simple proof of having been qualified in some part of the United Kingdom during twelve months preceding, would influence elections to an unimagined extent, whilst the safeguard against unsubstantial voters would still be retained.

I hope this suggestion may induce you to deal with the point, when next treating of the coming Reform, as an amendment of the law in the direction indicated would, whilst in accordance with perfect justice, probably considerably strengthen the Liberal party.—I am, Sir, &c.,

CARLYLE'S NEMESIS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Carlyle's inveterate habit of detraction—a mean habit, unaccountable in a man so great—avenged itself upon him in one instance of which, so far as I am aware, no notice has been taken. His wife's letters, which, despite an occasional dash of coarseness and profanity, are among the most charming, brilliant, and womanly in our literature, must have owed much of their charm to her constant use of what Carlyle calls "our ceteric-speech," her constant allusions to quaint anecdotes and utterances familiar to her circle of correspondents. For us, however, these allusions need explanation, as Carlyle felt; and it is in making these explanations that he has, quite unconsciously, punished himself for his besetting sin, and punished himself in what to him would have been the severest and most intolerable form.

In a letter to her husband (Vol. I., p. 202), Mrs. Carlyle amusingly describes a lad who, while scraping the walls of her rooms with pumice-stone, consoled himself by striking up one plaintive melody after another, each of which, "after a brief attempt to render itself predominant, dies away into unintelligible whinner." On which Carlyle annotates, "My father's account of a precentor who lost his tune, desperately tried several others, and then 'died away, &c.' " Now, Carlyle was very proud of his father, and in especial of his father's keen eye and graphic speech, his power of throwing off "little sketches of Annandale biography." "Such a set of Schilderungen" (human delineations of human life), he says (p. 4), "so admirably brief, luminous, true, and manlike, as I never had before or since,"—not even from Wordsworth himself. In this same volume, however, and in another letter to her husband (p. 34), Mrs. Carlyle refers again to this familiar story of the precentor's voice dying away into "an unintelligible whinner." And now Carlyle's annotation is,—"Some fool's speech to me, I forget whose."

That Carlyle should have lived to write down even his venerated father a fool may be taken, perhaps, as some slight atonement for the pain he has caused to many by his indulgence in a habit the most opposed to all real greatness and magnanimity.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE OXFORD PHYSIOLOGICAL LABORATORY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As Mr. E. B. Nicholson has declared himself to be the high local authority for the statements I challenged in the Spectator for last week, I trust you will extend to me your well-known courtesy by allowing me to write a few lines, in reply to his letter which appeared in your issue of the 24th inst.

Mr. Nicholson practically brings three charges against me:—(1), That I have mistaken a name; (2), that I had had some unfair access to the signatures of his memorial to the Council; (3), that I had made "a public imputation on our bona fides," i.e., of the memorialists. To clear the ground, let me repeat that I did not and do not wish to discuss the subject-matter of the memorial. I stated distinctly that my letter referred to that part of the paragraph in your paper of the 10th inst. which, owing to erroneous information, gave, in my opinion, a misleading account of the relation of Magdalen College to its Professor Fellow, Dr. Burdon Sanderson, and further, to the physiological teaching of the University.

To charge one, I plead guilty, and frankly accept Mr. Nicholson's correction. That I was misinformed as to an initial is not much to the point, save as an extenuating circumstance. With this my inference on the fifteen miles' radius falls to the ground. Freely admitting this, I still assert that the rest of his letter does not in the least shake the position I took up. I still maintain that the memorial does not number among its signatures one-eighth of the governing body of the College, and that those outside that body do not amount to one-third of its resident members of Congregation. Equally strong was my position from the first,—that the physiological teaching of the University had for years been carried on in the Magdalen College Laboratory, under a Government licence, and with the full consent of the College, a portion of my letter which Mr. Nicholson seems to ignore.

Charge two is wide of the mark. I had no private access to his memorial at all, but simply made an application to the Council for a copy of the Magdalen College signatures only, which was readily granted. Impossible of acceptance as the conjecture appears to Mr. Nicholson, any member of the Council would at once have informed him that the moment his memorial was presented to that body it became public property. Why Mr. Nicholson should be so anxious for concealment, I am at a loss to imagine.

Charge three. To clear oneself and one's friends of an imputation unjustly made, by a correction of the facts and inferences upon which it rests, is perhaps necessarily to retort that imputation upon those who bring the original charge. I am equally anxious with Mr. Nicholson to avoid personal recrimination, and would rather leave the question on which side the bona fides did or did not exist to be decided by the public on the evidence before them. I am not anxious to pursue the inquiry, as, after all, my censor has not been able to show more than a single technical flaw in my argument, a flaw which I have acknowledged as arising out of the confusion of a single initial. I am therefore naturally contented to leave the matter where it is. How affairs really stand now, Mr. Nicholson tells us in his postscript, which saves me the trouble of stating that the Council, a body elected by Congregation, of which Mr. Nicholson is a member, have refused to consider his memorial. Surely this is the most significant fact he has yet presented to our notice.—I am, Sir, &c.,

EDWARD CHAPMAN, M.A.,
Fellow and Tutor of Magdalen College.

Magdalen College, November 27th.

[Mr. Chapman has admitted that he charged the Memorialists with making a false statement on the strength of a hasty inference of his own which turned out to be false. Surely that was quite indefensible. The correspondence must end here.—Ed. Spectator.]

POETRY.

CHARLES LAMB.

DEAR heart! from dim Elizabethan days
Surely thy feet strayed to our garish noon;
Thou should'st have walked beneath a yellowing moon,
In some old garden's green, enchanted ways,
With Herrick and Ben Jonson; while in praise
Of his lady thrilled the nightingale's full tune,—
And he grown still, these sang, 'neath skies of June,
That bent to hear, catches and roundelays.
In fair converse, thou might'st have wandered
With Burton's self, the master whose rare thought
Makes Melancholy glad the heart like wine;
In thy earth-day, these fair compeers were dead;
How pleasant was their laughter, had they caught
The sallies of thy humour, quaint and fine!

KATHARINE TYNAN.

BOOKS.

A TIMELY HANDBOOK FOR CONSERVATIVES.*

THE late Mr. Bagehot was, as is well known, on almost all subjects a hearty, though moderate Liberal. Nevertheless, his great dislike to the Democratic principle of government,—the government by pure numerical majorities,—led to his resisting very strongly the general principle of Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill in 1867, and to his entertaining very great apprehensions of the political consequences of that Bill when actually passed. His views concerning Reform before 1867, and his expectations of its consequences after 1867, are contained in the three very interesting essays here given, the two former of which may be regarded as very interesting discussions on ancient history, containing, however, many remarks applicable to our own times, while the last is an equally interesting discussion on modern history almost wholly applicable to our own times. Doubtless, the book will serve the Conservatives admirably as an armoury from which to draw weapons of attack on the Government Bill of next Session. And we only hope that they may so use it. If they limit themselves to such positions as those taken up by Mr. Bagehot, and are wise enough also to take home to themselves his very sagacious warnings, they will not only greatly improve the character of the Parliamentary debates, but avoid the chief danger into which they are likely to fall. Perhaps a Liberal thinker with whom they have so much in common as Mr. Bagehot, may exert over them an influence better calculated to guard them against unwise resistance to the national will, than even the mere cautions of their own statesmen.

* Essays on Parliamentary Reform. By the late Walter Bagehot. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co. 1883.

We do not quarrel with Mr. Bagehot's main principle that in matters political, "right" springs from capacity; that you cannot have a right to do that for which you have not a corresponding capacity; or, in other words, that there is no right belonging to absolute incompetence. Where we practically differ from Mr. Bagehot is in this, that he overrates so greatly the capacity due to what he terms political intelligence, and underrates so greatly the incapacity due to the prejudices of self-interest. As a matter of fact, we believe that the positive incapacity of self-interest has proved itself ten times as blinding and mischievous in political affairs, as the capacity of so-called intelligence has ever proved itself useful. What can be more impressive than the incapacity of the ten-pounders to pass an Education Act during the whole of their reign between 1832 and 1867,—an incapacity positively verified by the sectarian outcries which wrecked the first attempt at an adequate Education Act,—and the capacity of the householders to pass it within three years of their enfranchisement? It is just the same with such measures as the Abolition of Purchase in the Army, the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the Irish Land Acts. The ten-pounders were incapacitated for seeing the need of these measures, not from want of intelligence, but from absolute want of interest in issues which either did not affect their personal feelings at all, or only affected them by exciting vivid prejudices against those who asked for such changes. Mr. Bagehot seems to us to have lost sight of the value of certain moral elements of capacity, and to have immensely overrated the value of the purely intellectual elements; and this is the chief ground of difference between himself and us.

For the rest, this volume is full of shrewd anticipation and comment which we heartily recommend to Conservatives as quite sufficiently Conservative to attract them, and quite sufficiently Liberal to do them an immense deal of good. For example, take first a passage in which Conservatives will say that one of the mischiefs of Democracy was sagaciously predicted. Mr. Bagehot remarks on the importance that a Representative system shall represent the real public opinion of the nation:—

"The first requisite of a representative system is, that the representative body should represent the real public opinion of the nation. Nor is this so easy a matter as some imagine. There are nations which have no public opinion. The having it requires what a pedantic writer might call the coordination of judgments. Some people must be recognised to be wiser than others are. In every district there must be people generally admitted by the judgment of their neighbours to have more sense, more instructed minds, more cultured judgments, than others have. Such persons will not naturally or inevitably, or in matter of fact, agree in opinion; on the contrary, they will habitually differ: great national questions will divide the nation; great parties will be formed. But the characteristic of a nation capable of public opinion is, that those parties will be organised; in each there will be a leader, in each there will be some looked up to, and many who look up to them: the opinion of the party will be formed and suggested by the few, it will be criticised and accepted by the many. It has always been the peculiarity of the history of England, that it has been capable of a true public opinion in this its exact and proper sense. There has ever been a structure in English political society: every man has not walked by the light of his own eyes; the less instructed have not deemed themselves the equals of the more instructed; the many have subordinated their judgment to that of the few. They have not done so blindly, for there has always been a spirit of discussion in our very air: still they have done so—opinions have always settled down from the higher classes to the lower; and in that manner, whenever the nation has been called on to decide, a decision that is really national has been formed."

And he also points out that any uniform extension of the suffrage to householders everywhere, will endanger this adequate representation of public opinion. If Mr. Bagehot had been writing now—this passage was written in 1860—he would undoubtedly have observed that the House of Commons of the present day is much less effective as the organ of public opinion than it was before Mr. Disraeli's last Reform Act; and that it is so just for the reason that the disorganisation or disintegration of opinion due to that Act, has been enormous; that the convictions of the people at large,—which are much better represented by the House of Commons than before,—have never mastered the opinions of the middle-classes, as the convictions of the ten-pounders before the Act of 1867 had mastered them; and that in consequence the present House of Commons represents politically a class of opinions to which socially it has not reconciled itself, and against which, consequently, there is more or less of a secret revolt. It will please Conservatives to remark this, and to notice that it is the consequence of giving to the largest class, the complete mastery of the borough constituencies. But they will, perhaps, not be so well pleased with the advice which

Mr. Bagehot gives them as to their best mode of action under this admitted divergency between the opinion of the middle-class and the opinion of the people at large, which the Act of 1867 has produced. The following, of course, was written years after the passing of that Act:—

"In all cases it must be remembered that a political combination of the lower classes, as such and for their own objects, is an evil of the first magnitude; that a permanent combination of them would make them (now that so many of them have the suffrage) supreme in the country; and that their supremacy, in the state they now are, means the supremacy of ignorance over instruction and of numbers over knowledge. So long as they are not taught to act together, there is a chance of this being averted, and it can only be averted by the greatest wisdom and the greatest foresight in the higher classes. They must avoid, not only every evil, but every appearance of evil; while they have still the power they must remove, not only every actual grievance, but, where it is possible, every seeming grievance too; they must willingly concede every claim which they can safely concede, in order that they may not have to concede unwillingly some claim which would impair the safety of the country. This advice will be said to be obvious; but I have the greatest fear that, when the time comes, it will be cast aside as timid and cowardly. So strong are the combative propensities of man, that he would rather fight a losing battle than not fight at all. It is most difficult to persuade people that by fighting they may strengthen the enemy, yet that would be so here; since a losing battle—especially a long and well-fought one—would have thoroughly taught the lower orders to combine, and would have left the higher orders face to face with an irritated, organised, and superior voting power. The courage which strengthens an enemy and which so loses, not only the present battle, but many after-battles, is a heavy curse to men and nations."

We wish Lord Salisbury would take that to heart. Perhaps in action he will be compelled to take it to heart by the prudence of Sir Stafford Northcote and the Duke of Richmond. But what we desire is that he would take it to heart not only in action at the last moment, but in speech from the beginning, for that is what the real wisdom of this advice requires. Prudence such as Mr. Bagehot has advised does not consist merely in withdrawing opposition to the inevitable after a long course of irritating and violent invective against it, but in withholding those unwise words which do almost as much mischief as unwise acts themselves.

Again, let the Conservatives listen to Mr. Bagehot's almost ostentatiously timid counsels on crises like those which are close at hand:—

"I should venture so far as to lay down for an approximate rule that the House of Lords ought, on a first-class subject, to be slow—very slow—in rejecting a Bill passed even once by a large majority of the House of Commons. I would not, of course, lay this down as an unvarying rule; as I have said, I have for practical purposes no belief in unvarying rules. Majorities may be either genuine or fictitious, and if they are not genuine, if they do not embody the opinion of the representative as well as the opinion of the constituency, no one would wish to have any attention paid to them. But if the opinion of the nation be strong and be universal, if it be really believed by Members of Parliament, as well as by those who send them to Parliament, in my judgment the Lords should yield at once, and should not resist it. My main reason is one which has not been much urged. As a theoretical writer I can venture to say, what no elected Member of Parliament, Conservative or Liberal, can venture to say, that I am exceedingly afraid of the ignorant multitude of the new constituencies. I wish to have as great and as compact a power as possible to resist it. But a discussion between the Lords and Commons divides that resisting power; as I have explained, the House of Commons still mainly represents the plutocracy, the Lords represent the aristocracy. The main interest of both these classes is now identical, which is to prevent or to mitigate the rule of uneducated numbers. But to prevent it effectually, they must not quarrel among themselves; they must not bid one against the other for the aid of their common opponent. And this is precisely the effect of a division between Lords and Commons. The two great bodies of the educated rich go to the constituencies to decide between them, and the majority of the constituencies now consist of the uneducated poor. This cannot be for the advantage of any one. In doing so besides, the aristocracy forfeit their natural position—that by which they would gain most power, and in which they would do most good. They ought to be the heads of the plutocracy. In all countries new wealth is ready to worship old wealth, if old wealth will only let it, and I need not say that in England new wealth is eager in its worship. Satirist after satirist has told us how quick, how willing, how anxious are the newly-made rich to associate with the ancient rich. Rank probably in no country whatever has so much 'market' value as it has in England just now. Of course, there have been many countries in which certain old families, whether rich or poor, were worshipped by whole populations with a more intense and poetic homage; but I doubt if there has ever been any in which all old families and all titled families received more ready observance from those who were their equals, and perhaps their superiors, in wealth, their equals in culture, and their inferiors only in descent and rank. The possessors of the 'material' distinctions of life, as a political economist would class them, rush to worship those who possess the immaterial distinctions. Nothing can be more politically useful than such homage, if it be skillfully used; no folly can be idler than to repel and reject it." That is, indeed, what Madame Mohl would have called "nutritious" reading for Conservatives of the present day.

The general drift of the book is in favour of resisting uniformity, and of promoting variety, of franchise-qualification as the best mode of getting at a really Representative Chamber; but that line of counsel has been knocked on the head by the Conservatives themselves, and now only applies to the proper selection of constituencies, which in all probability must consist of voters all qualified by nearly the same franchise. Still, to the selection of constituencies, the principle of aiming at variety, and not at uniformity, does apply; and for that purpose, we, as Liberals, can adopt it heartily. So long as the minority in the country is represented only by a proportional minority of Members in the House of Commons, it is of the utmost importance to the principle of democracy itself that the minority should be so represented, and not left out of account altogether. It is no democrat who would try to prevent 50,000 well-to-do people, living in each others' immediate neighbourhood, from choosing their own Member as freely as the 50,000 poor of the neighbouring parish would choose theirs. And yet this may be prevented by so juggling with the boundaries of constituencies as to manage to merge the well-to-do of every constituency in a mass of poor, with whom they would have no sympathy of political feeling. The true principle of any Redistribution Bill ought to be determined by Mr. Bagehot's principle, though the Conservatives have determined for themselves that the suffrage cannot and shall not be so determined. Indeed, it will be easy, in discussing any such Bill, so to apply the principle of variety as to obtain the greatest possible difference of type between constituency and constituency which may be consistent with the democratic principle of numerical equality in the new constituencies to be created, and to provide that it shall be the intent of the Constitution to keep these constituencies, so far as possible, typical and characteristic for the future.

THE author states in the preface that this book is an attempt to produce "a drama, in the form and under the conditions of a novel;" but what that may mean is not very apparent, as the work does not contain more dramatic situations than are to be found in many other novels, nor is it marked by any distinctive peculiarity of construction, unless an occasional disconnectedness and want of smoothness in the action are to be so considered. The book derives its title from Cranmer's second wife, of whom history records that she was the niece of Osiander, that Cranmer married her at Nuremberg in 1531, that he kept the marriage a secret, and that he had to banish her from England when the Six Articles Statute was passed, in 1539. This is the foundation on which the story is constructed. It represents her as coming to England without her husband's wish or knowledge, just before the birth of her first child; after that event has taken place, she finds the baby an impediment to her flight back to Germany, so leaves it in a boat on a lake in Sir John Oldcastle's grounds, with an unsigned letter committing it to the care of Lady Oldcastle, a staunch Roman Catholic. This last lady, moved by compassion, accepts the charge, and treats and loves the nameless child as if he had been her own son. Some years later, Mrs. Cranmer, still preserving a mysterious silence as to her identity, wishes the boy to be restored to her; and to this, Lady Oldcastle not unnaturally objects, unless the soi-disant wife and mother will reveal who she is. The question of who is to have possession of the boy leads to jealous and hostile feelings between the real and the adopted mothers; a further cause of dispute is that each of them is most anxious for him to be brought up in her own religious faith. Here the story does not make Mrs. Cranmer's behaviour altogether consistent with her principles, since a person who regarded it as of the utmost importance for her son to become a Protestant would hardly have abandoned him to the care of Lady Oldcastle, on the chance of that lady's educating him in the heresy she abhorred—which abhorrence was quite widely enough known to have been easily ascertained on inquiry. There is a want of probability in other ways, also, about Mrs. Cranmer's behaviour to her child. The need for deserting him is not made sufficiently apparent for the reader to be altogether satisfied that it may not have been done as much from caprice as from real necessity; and, besides that, was it reasonable to expect that when Lady Oldcastle had learnt to love the boy who had been thrust upon her unsought, she would be willing to give him up at a moment's notice to a person of whom she knew nothing? The portrait of Lady Oldcastle is a spirited one; to our mind, she is more interesting, because more life-like, than the heroine; and her devoted love to her husband is brought into so much prominence as to suggest the idea that the book ought by rights to have been called, "Two Noble Wives." A strong Roman Catholic, she is terribly distressed at Sir John's leanings towards the Reformers; yet never does she allow religious differences to separate her from him, but cleaves steadfastly to him, in poverty, exile, and prison, and ever strives earnestly to win him back to that faith from which she herself never swerves for an instant. Her readiness to sacrifice herself for him is shown in a scene early in the story, when he has dismantled a chapel in a fit of passion, and she, though proud and hot-tempered, humiliates herself, to save him from being denounced to the authorities, and declares that she alone is to blame, as having provoked him to the deed by hasty speech. Notwithstanding her orthodoxy, she is not over and above respectful to her father-confessor, and the mixture of contempt for the individual and respect for his office with which she treats him is very amusing; if all Romanists behaved similarly, there would be small cause to dread the priest's influence in a household. Sir John Oldcastle is a good study of a sincerely religious and virtuous man, becoming more and more convinced that the Reformers were right, and having the courage of his convictions up to a certain point, but not the point of martyrdom. The following is a thoroughly characteristic utterance of his: "Blessed sometimes—though I confess, not often—are the compromisers." There is both beauty and force in the character of Ishmael Johnes, a half-fanatical Protestant tailor, who is affectionate and unselfish, with the simplicity of a child and the fidelity of a dog. Gladly helping his master to desecrate a chapel, he is yet so superstitious as to deem it almost sacrilege to tear a blank leaf out of a bible; intricacies of doctrine are beyond his comprehension, and he dies exclaiming, "I believe as my friend believes."

Cranmer does not appear in person until near the end of the book, yet he may be said to pervade it all through, certainly not in a way to give a favourable impression of him. A Roman Catholic priest who violates his vows of celibacy, keeps his marriage secret lest it should hinder his worldly advancement, lives in high position and honour whilst his wife is exposed to unfounded slanders, devotes himself to trying secretly to upset doctrines to which he outwardly professes allegiance—a man, in short, whose life is for years a living lie—this is the disagreeable and jesuitical portrait of Cranmer presented by these pages. We subjoin part of a fine scene describing his interview with his wife in prison, when he tells her of his recantation, and seeks to justify his past actions in the persecution and condemnation of his fellow-Reformers (such as Joan Bocher and George Van Paris), actions which must certainly have required an immense amount of special pleading to reconcile them with his conscience:—

"'Cowardice? Were I to recant, would you stamp your husband with so ignominious a name?'—'I refuse to answer a question that so wrongs my husband that only himself could be guilty of suggesting such a crime to me?' She said this with a smile, but also with a warmth of tone she could not conceal. 'But suppose a man regardless of himself; nerved to bear any, whatever pangs other men may inflict on him; and yet pausing in doubt and hesitation, because he has put his hand to a great work—a work the Lord has commissioned him to do; which if he dies he fears may long remain incomplete, or be even subject to a fatal overthrow altogether; and yet that if he lives opportunity may again arise to accomplish all—what then?'—'He has no such choice!' she responded passionately. 'God's work he must leave in God's hands, who will, if He needs them, find fresh and fitting instruments. But the work of such a man as you speak of is to live in perfecting it, if he can; or to die in perfecting it, if he cannot; for there is no perfection like that which a great human maker gives to his fabric when he cements it with his own blood; always supposing that the question is of being consistent with his work, and consistent with himself to the last—or being faithless to both.'—'Wife! wife! I have already followed Sir John's example. Now curse me! Now unsay all you have ever said of honour or respect for me!' It was some time before she would believe him, for her usually unerring instinct found something contradictory between so terrible a revelation, and the tones, looks, and gestures that accompanied it. 'Listen to me, patiently,' he said. 'I see in you not only the cherished wife of my bosom, my comforter through life, but also the genius of posterity; and I feel in standing before you I stand at the bar of a dread tribunal,—which still is not God's tribunal, but man's. In sickness of soul and deep remorse I look back on my past life, and I see many things done to which I have been a consenting, though unwilling party, and that I never would do again. God help me! I have sat in judgment on Protestants, and have shared in their condemnation to death. Is not that terrible? Why did I so far yield? Because the evil done was no part of my bringing-about; because it was impossible to guide the mighty stream of events except by going to some extent with it, and retaining influence and power; while I knew, by guiding it, I might be helping to create a new England, a new faith, a new and holier development of humanity. I have done that! I dare to tell you, posterity will confirm thus much. Can you wonder, then, that even with a Mary on the throne I did not give up hope? I thought it might be yet my privilege to live, and see—either through her people, or the people of her Protestant successor, if Mary have no children—a restoration of all that now seems to be but a lamentable wreck.”

The time when the arbitrary Henry VIII. was wavering between the old and new faiths, and was succeeded first by the Protestant Edward VI. and then by the Roman-Catholic Mary, was a period when those who cared more to stand well with the powers that be, and to secure themselves from risks of pains and penalties, than to be true to any particular form of religion, must, no doubt, have been sorely exercised how to act. The vacillating, timid, time-serving state of mind thus produced is shown in A Noble Wife, as affecting the male rather than the female characters; for both the Roman-Catholic Lady Oldcastle and the Protestant Mrs. Cranmer, are alike free from the lukewarmness and tendency to let unworthy prudential considerations interfere with religious belief, to which their husbands are liable. The book is clever, but does not show the author at his best; and the wife who is its heroine does not excite our admiration and sympathy, as did the woman who filled the same post in Abel Drake's Wife. A person who wishes to produce a good historical novel requires an unusual gift for throwing himself into unfamiliar surroundings. Probably Mr. Saunders has been hampered by the effort to do this, and has therefore fallen short of his own highest capability.

LIFE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.*

THE private correspondence and diaries of public men of the past have long been objects of research, as the best materials for history which aspires to go below the surface. In publishing the present book, which consists of extracts from the pocket-book of his grandfather, the author has gone somewhat out of the beaten track, and given us the diary and entries thought worthy of note by a private gentleman of the last century. The life of Thomas Wale, the grandfather in question, is a peculiarly good one for the experiment, as it extended over nearly the whole of the century, he being born in 1701 and dying in 1796, and was curiously compounded of the successful foreign merchant and the well-to-do country squire. He was the scion of an old family of whom his dutiful descendant gives the usual particulars how they were Crusaders, sheriffs, knights, county Members, and so forth. But apparently the fortunes of the house were on the wane, as the hero of the book was apprenticed at the age of seventeen to a merchant at Lynn, and at the age of twenty-four was sent off to Riga as a factor and commission agent. Riga had only then belonged to Russia for fourteen years, having been taken by Peter the Great from the Swedes in 1710, and its trade in hemp, flax, and timber was chiefly carried on by foreign merchants, of whom those of the English factory were the chief, “and lived in a very hospitable and splendid manner.” But Riga was a very “close” borough. “No foreigner was permitted to deal with any man but with the Burgers or freemen of the City, or resell goods bought there, at all.” Further, “No foreigner or unfreemen were at any time permitted to keep house, nor their own bed, board, or table, but were then obliged to lodge and board in the house of a Riga Burger, or Burger's widow, as the writer hereof surely experienced in 1729-30, when, under pretence he hired a poor, old Burger's widow to bear the name of keeping house for him, without her being in the house, and gave her fifty roubles annually for her name only.” But “this even was prohibited by the Riga magistrates. . . . So [the “so” is to be noted] after that Miss Louisa Rudolphina Rakten arrived from Blankenburg, and that Thos. Wale and she had honourably concluded on a marriage, they journeyed on to Mittau, ye Principality of Courland (a dukedom of Poland not subject to Russia), and there privately solemnised their marriage on March 17th, 1749, and so returned to their house-keeping, she as owner and keeper of the house in her own name, and T. Wale, with his partners and clerks, or her lodgers and boarders,” until “these rigid laws were subsided. They then thought proper to convince the world of their connubial rights by a new marriage in Riga, in 1760, from which time she took the proper name of Wale. Before this,” adds the diarist, regardless, as he is continually, of his self-imposed oratio obliqua, “our tableling linen was marked “L. R.” and “L. R. R.”

* My Grandfather's Pocket-book. By the Rev. Henry John Wale, M.A. London: Chapman and Hall.

Mr. Wale seems to have caught a Tartar in his Louisa Rudolphina, as we are continually having entries revealing domestic quarrels. For instance, on October 12th, 1774, “Daughter Polly having this day behaved rudely and impudently to her mamma (and that in my hearing), received my reproaches and chastisements.” On March 22nd, 1775, “a long altercation with Mrs. Wale about her reconciliation with her daughter Polly, in which she remained fully repugnant;” and, at last, in June the same year, “after that Mrs. Wale and daughter Polly have long had enmity and ill-will, the mamma too severe and the daughter somewhat as obstinate and provoking, have on all sides consented to part,” so poor Polly is packed off to school. That it was not Polly's fault appears probable from an entry, October, 1775, when some one having borrowed Mr. Wale's “hobby” and lost it, on his return “some words arose between him and Mrs. Wale, upon which Mrs. W. called him names and abused him; and by their mutual consent he was instantly to leave our house.” And on another occasion, “Our servant-maid, Hetty, having been saucy to her mistress, was turned away;” and when a man-servant is caught “roguishly stealing out a bottle of brandy or rum” from the cellar, he begs forgiveness, and that “I would conceal the same from his mistress.” But to return to Riga. Mr. Wale very quickly made a considerable fortune there, chiefly through supplying the British Navy with ship-masts and hemp for ropes,—though on the occasion “of ye great and fatal contract in hemp” the firm lost no less than £10,000. However, as a few years afterwards he returned to England, and in 1783-1784, long after his return, he got £9,500 for his share of profits in a single year, the business was not, on the whole, a bad one. Not much information is given about prices at Riga; but we learn that at Cassan, in Russia, in 1738, a fat goose and turkey together cost 14 copecks (7d. English); a sirloin of beef weighing fifteen pounds, 6d. English; and three dishes of nice fish, gudgeons, turbot, and gouldings, 5d. together; while a German man and woman servants cost 11 roubles, or some 45s. a year. “Thus,” as the person who gives the information says, “you can't spend a great deal of money in housekeeping.” But prices in England, too, were enough to make one's mouth water. When Mr. Wale came back, he set up as country gentleman in Cambridgeshire, and estimates his total yearly expenses at £580. Chariot and horses, £50; two sons' board and clothes, £60; man and boy's wages and living, £60; three maids, £20; housekeeping, say victuals and beer, 39s. per week; and so on in proportion. It seems that the wages were much over-estimated, as a footman, also to work in garden, cost only £7 a year, and his living; a ploughman the same, a coachman, “without vailles,” eleven guineas. Food must also have been cheap, as he bought two large fowls at 6d. each. Schooling was absurdly low. Mr. Foote, £50; St. Paul's School, board, lodging, and education, £35 14s.; while Mr. Heath's, at Harrow, and Mr. Vesper's and assistants, at Rygate, Surrey, “short and compendious finishing of youth,” cost only sixteen guineas. Doctoring, too, was relatively cheap, as daughter Polly had a tooth drawn for half-a-guinea. On the other hand, law was expensive, it costing no less than £126 to get Louisa Rudolphina naturalised.

Altogether, there is a good deal of interesting information to be gathered from the book as to how our forefathers lived in the eighteenth century. But the book has been unnecessarily enlarged by the insertion of numerous and sometimes lengthy scraps of poetry, most of them quite common and well known, such as “Celia's Charms” and Atterbury “On a Lady's Fan,” which the old gentleman had copied out as good things. There is also a would-be funny introduction, and divers witty comments scattered about the book, which are not in the best possible taste. But on the whole, the book has been well edited, and if its pages are turned over not too carefully, a very agreeable hour or two may be spent with it.

A NOVEL ABOUT THE REGENCY.*

ONLY the other day, we were all reading what Mr. Anthony Trollope says in his Autobiography about the hopeless unpopularity of historical novels, and finding confirmation of it in our own experience. Now comes a proof of the rule, in the shape of an exception of a striking kind. Everybody is reading, everybody is talking about Abigal Rowe, although heretofore even those devourers of three volumes daily who form the modern version of the dragon-and-the-maiden legends, but somehow transpose their constituents, could by no means be induced to look at an historical romance. They would almost as soon have read history itself! Even in France, people do not read Dumas père; a generation has arisen that knows not D'Artagnan, Athos, or Porthos, that cares nothing for Le Balafre, and for whom the Chevalier de Maison Rouge would be a mere madman. That, however, is a wise French proverb which says,—“Ne dites pas, ‘Fontaine, jamais je boirai de ton eau;’” and we recommend it to Mr. Wingfield, who has a peculiar instinct for French proverbs, for his novel admirably points its moral. Historical romance was the fountain which might flow—but had better not—however lavishly, in vain; we would not drink of its water, and canny publishers would hardly care to bring us to it, or rather, it to us. What has wrought the sudden change, and set all the novel-reading world—a larger one than philosophers suspect, though probably most of them swell its numbers—all agog about an historical romance, and ready to dash through thick-and-thin to the circulating libraries, in order greedily to read of the “Adonis of fifty” whose “final pulverisation” was the congenial task of Mr. Thackeray, more than a score of years ago? Simply this,—Mr. Wingfield has “accommodated” the historical novel as cleverly as ever did a heaven-born chef de cuisine his plain meats, and serves up a dainty dish altogether to the taste of an age which will by no means “away with” the sword and plume, the destrier and the dungeon, the tourney and its queen, or, indeed especially, with the prancing-and-majestic style of narrative. The actual, the real, especially on the seamy side of them; the common, very common, talk and ways of the Court of the Regency; the coarse and vulgar aspects of the private life of the Royal brothers, Wales and York, at that time—if, indeed, any portion of their life could be called private, considering how open was its dissoluteness,—and the plainest possible dealing with the character and habits of Caroline of Brunswick, together with the dispersion of the sentimental myth that has grown up around the “sonsy” image of the Princess Charlotte of Wales, and turned that kind-hearted tomboy into a being quite too good for this world; all this, written in the energetic, easy, but decidedly odd style that belongs to Mr. Wingfield, constitutes the attraction of the book.

* Abigal Rowe: a Chronicle of the Regency. By the Hon. Lewis Wingfield. London: Bentley.

It cannot be said that the author does much for his high-placed dramatis persone in the way of levelling-up. The process by which he manages to leave on his reader's mind the impression that George was not so bad after all, but very much the victim of circumstances; that there was something almost redeeming about his placability towards everybody except his excruciating wife, and that our judgment of him ought to be modified by consideration of the ill-treatment which he experienced from both his odious parents, is of the levelling-down description. He does manage to create this impression, however; next to the daughter of the wretched pair, between whose respective kinds of vulgarity there seems to have been not much to choose, we feel more kindly towards George than towards any of the people whom Mr. Wingfield makes to buzz about our ears, in his strange and attractive fashion.

The motto on the title-page of the story is “Chaque âge a son esprit, ses plaisirs, et ses mœurs.” It is devoutly to be hoped that the age which is thus painted may not find its repetition in history, for it was a truly hideous one. The proverbial homage which vice pays to virtue—hypocrisy—would be preferable to such an indecent flaunting in the face of the sun of all the passion, vice, meanness, and hatefulness of human nature. The lives of these people were like a dream that is not only bad, but disgusting, with its gorging, swilling, swearing, swindling, boxing, gambling, and indecency. It is needless to speak of the evil—more frightful, inasmuch as it involved masses of honest and industrious people, who had to suffer because such unclean animals sat in the seat of the rulers,—that attended the exercise of power by such men as the Royal Princes and their associates. We are bound to give great praise to those two chapters of Mr. Wingfield's first volume, entitled respectively, “Retrospect” and “At Home and Abroad,” in which he gives a brilliant sketch of the political and social situation.

Mrs. Fitzherbert figures on the scene, of course, living in her retirement at Brighton, and interfering in the affairs of Mr. Wingfield's heroine, Abigail Rowe, for a good purpose, and with effect. An interview between the Prince and his discarded wife is an admirable episode, and the following passage lends its effect to the palliative purpose of the author:—

“Mrs. Fitzherbert judged him aright, who was sneered at by carping critics as the acme of fickleness, for to the end George was true to her.” [The author does not mean faithful, of course, but only that George never ceased to love her.] “On his deathbed, the King spoke anxiously to his Grace of Wellington, imploring him to see that the tiny chain about his neck, which bore a precious freight, was allowed to linger there. The Duke fulfilled his trust. The lock of bright brown hair, covered by the half diamond, was enclosed within the coffin, and is lying now upon the dust that once was George IV.”

There is something phantasmagoric and whirlwindy in the book; there are no pauses, the reader is swept along with it; and in what company! Caroline of Brunswick, with her fiddlers and toadies, at Kensington Palace, and at her “Trou Madame” in Bayswater; Princess Charlotte, with her governesses, at Warwick House; the dissolute crew who made up the shameful Court of the Regent; and George himself, with Townshend, the Bow-Street officer, and a pleasing group of pugilists always in attendance, at Carlton House, and, later at the Pavilion; with the Marchioness of Hertford for confidant and adviser; the Ministers, whom we meet but casually; the mean, miserly, spiteful Queen (whom Mr. Wingfield portrayed so forcibly in his Lady Grizel); the masqueraders, the playhouse people, a crowd of tumbling, tipsy figures, all dancing along the path of perdition; and, perhaps the most cleverly drawn in the whole ghastly yet amusing show, Sheridan and Brummel. Mr. Wingfield has the happiest way of introducing his historical personages into his story quite naturally; they come in and go out like life, without the waxwork or automaton effects of the historical novel proper, and unreadable. This is especially the case with Sheridan; he is made to take his share in the action easily, without a creak. His death, with its tragi-comic surroundings, is finely told, and we are forced to say that the author seems to us to have taken the exact measure of,—

“The orator, dramatist, minstrel, who ran Through each mode of the lyre, and was master of all.”

We would rather think better of one whom we admire so ardently. In these few lines his history is told:—

“A great man, too simple to profit by his greatness, in whom genius was unaccompanied by judgment. Byron said of him that all he did was of the best. From his brain emanated the best comedy, The School for Scandal; the best burlesque, The Critic; the best address, The Monologue on Garrick; and the best Parliamentary oration, The Begum Speech. In society he shone superb, until he grew mandarin drunk. He was so genial that he could soften even an attorney. In spite of endless lessons, he never lost his confidence in the goodness of men. Though his works showed a knowledge of human nature, it was confined to his pen alone, for in all his acts he was the dupe of the designing knave. At the age of sixty-five he died, and the debts which had crushed him amounted, as it turned out, to four thousand pounds, in trivial sums. Like his comrade of younger days, the august Signor, he was a muddler. George, when he heard of his end, was more moved than he chose to show, and looked himself up in his apartments for a week, refusing to be comforted.”

The story which has this brilliant setting of historical portraits, like diamonds in a picture-frame, is an ingenious one, well devised to set forth the social features of the time; but it is of less interest than its accessories, strictly so called. Mr. Wingfield is an expert in “sumptuary,” and his familiarity with that complicated branch of human knowledge is of great utility in producing the lifelikeness of his book. For instance, here is his first picture of Caroline of Brunswick:—

“The second of the two ladies, aged about forty, was stout, painted, raddled, with a large head and short neck, a quantity of light hair gathered in an untidy knot under a monstrous beaver hat, quick, beady eyes, deep sunk in their orbits, and a scarcity of clothing ill-suited to so overblown a figure. A lilac-silk pelisse was worn negligently open, displaying a short-waisted robe of thinnest sprigged muslin, through the lower part of which was plainly visible a pair of thick ankles and wrinkled stockings. The jewelled bracelets on her rough arms seemed to intimate that she was a person of importance, which suggestion was corroborated by a sharp, querulous manner, as of one who is accustomed to obedience; but then, on the other hand, her attire was of the crumpled, flashy kind that is worn by vulgar drabs. The stockings, of common thread, were wofully unclean, and the low shoes of primrose satin were unlaced and not innocent of holes. She tossed off her hat with an impatient, puffing gesture, and ran through unbrushed locks a set of short, fat fingers, much beringed, but sadly in need of soap.”

The last glimpse we get of the Princess (her husband speaks of her as “the Dreadful Woman,” and she of him as “the Brute”) is very characteristic; it is given to us together with a description of the Regent's grief for his daughter:—

“Caroline would not die, not she; she would live yet to plague him for half a century. Only the other day, a letter of hers had fallen into his hands, in which she wrote, ‘Since de English won't give me de great honour of being Princesse de Galles, I will be Caroline, a happy, merry soul. De old Bégum, de Queen, is on her last legs, I hear; mais ça ne me fait ni froid ni chaud. There was a time when I should have been glad, but now noting in de world do I care for save to pass de time quickly.' She received the news of Charlotte's tragic fate with perfect apathy, too much absorbed in the enjoyment of her eccentric freedom to heed such a trifle."

The raconteur air of this remarkable novel lends it extraordinary attraction; it is a strange story, and the author "speaks it trippingly on the tongue."

PROFESSOR WEISS ON THE LIFE OF CHRIST.*

PROFESSOR WEISS's first volume consists of two books, entitled respectively "The Sources," in which the origin and the mutual relations of the Four Gospels are discussed; and "The Preparation," dealing with the life of Christ as far as the Wedding Feast in Cana of Galilee. The style is somewhat cumbersome, and, whether from the fault of the author or of the translator we know not, wanting in lucidity. The reader is apt, in spite of a close attention, to lose the drift of the argument, and would be thankful for a more precise enunciation of it. Still, he cannot fail to recognise a work of great critical acumen, the result of a most careful and complete study, and which, while conceived in a reverent spirit, is certainly not wanting in boldness.

For the details of the argument in the first book, Professor Weiss refers us to earlier publications from his pen, in which that argument is fully set out. We must for this reason, and because any complete discussion of the subject would transcend any available space, content ourselves with indicating the conclusions at which he has arrived. These, indeed, are highly interesting, not only for the intrinsic value which any open-minded student of the New Testament will be ready to concede to them, but for their revelation of the gulf—for it is nothing less—that divides the stand-points of German and of English orthodoxy. The English divine is commonly disposed to accept without question the simple traditional account of the authorship of the Gospels. The First, for instance, he attributes without hesitation to the Apostle whose name it bears, and probably dismisses as a delusion the idea of a Hebrew or Aramaic original. Such a reader will be startled by the freedom with which Professor Weiss thinks on this subject. Of the existence of the Aramaic original he has no doubt whatever, and he sees his way to definitely fixing the date of its appearance to the year 67, or, at least, to the latter half of what, by a numeration which we do not understand, he calls the "sixth decade." But this document is, he thinks, irrecoverably lost, the Matthew Gospel that we have not even being a translation. On the contrary, he sees plain proof that the writer was not even a Palestinian Jew; that he was learned, indeed, and acquainted with the Hebrew original of the Old Testament, but inaccurate in Palestinian geography, and generally occupying the standpoint both in what he inserts and in what he omits of a Jew of the Dispersion. He is supposed to have had in his hands the Gospel of St. Mark, this, again, having been founded partly on the recollections of St. Peter, communicated to his favourite disciple, and partly on a Greek translation of the original Matthew, which it is not difficult to believe may have reached Rome (where the Mark Gospel is supposed to have been written) somewhere about the year 69. Out of this Mark Gospel, then, "the entire contents of which, with the perfectly insignificant exception of a few unimportant fragments, have been transferred to our First Gospel," and out of the original Matthew, which was also in the writer's hands, the Matthew that we have was constructed. The theory of this construction is thus summarised:—"The form of the oldest Apostolic document [the Aramaic Matthew], which was really only a collection of a material, was no longer adequate for the later period. A complete representation of the life of Jesus was required, and to the Evangelist, who was not himself an eye-witness of the life of Jesus, nothing presented itself as being such but the oldest attempt in this direction, as it is given to us by the Mark document. The latter is laid by him at the foundation, and affords the historical background for his delineation, and more especially there is borrowed from it the whole history of the Passion. Within the framework thus granted, he tries to place the material derived from the Apostolic source, partly introducing particular passages into suitable places to supplement what is there already, partly inserting them in larger masses."

To St. Luke's Gospel Professor Weiss attributes a very similar origin. He is quite certain that "he was not acquainted with our canonical Matthew;" but it is equally clear to him that he had the Mark document in his hands, and also the original

Matthew, which, indeed, a writer so careful as he describes himself to have been in collecting authentic materials could not have overlooked. What remains unaccounted for by these two sources we must refer to the other documents which may be supposed to have lain before him, the works of the "many who had attempted to set in order," as the Preface has it, the facts of the Master's life.

It is when we come to the Fourth Gospel that we find the most striking part of Professor Weiss's work. He turns the tables most completely on the impugnors of this document. In his view, it is the only really Apostolic Gospel of the Four, and so far as it differs from them, must be placed above them in point of authority. He thinks,—

"That in almost every place where actual differences between John and the Synoptists fall to be dealt with, the representation of the first has every historical probability in its favour; that in the most striking differences, such as the chronological extent of the public activity of Jesus, the repeated visits to the feasts, the early date of the Last Supper, undesigned indications in the Synoptic tradition itself, establish the statements of John; that, finally, it is not seldom through the adjustments and the peculiar contributions of this Gospel that the events related by the older Gospels, and their connection with each other, first become intelligible to us."

It does not need proof that the Christ of the Fourth Gospel is the Christ of Christian orthodoxy; and it certainly strengthens indefinitely the position of this orthodoxy, if it can be established that this picture is the one, and the only one, which comes to us attested by the signature, so to speak, of one who drew from the original. Nor is this inconsistent with the admission that the picture was, if the expression may be allowed, idealised. "It is certain," says our author, "that the endeavour to find in Jesus' own words points of connection for his own more advanced knowledge of Christ's person, and apprehension of the salvation which he had found in them, caused the Evangelist frequently to render them with meanings and elucidations which far surpassed their original scope." Something of a veil must have been drawn over the Divine Personality, a veil which was afterwards removed; and the Apostles may well have sometimes written in the light of the later rather than of the earlier knowledge.

It will now be seen that the difference spoken of earlier in this notice between German and English orthodoxy does not, after all, touch the bases of belief. Verbal inspiration and the polemics which uses for its weapons isolated texts, indeed, disappear; but the foundations of faith are firmly laid, all the more firmly, we may be permitted to say, because no longer encumbered. And it is in the spirit of convinced belief that Professor Weiss proceeds to deal with the second part of his subject,—the actual life of Christ. He demands in an introductory letter, addressed to Professor Voigt, of Leipsic, that judgment on the question whether he "has succeeded in sketching a really life-like picture of the greatest drama the history of the world has seen," should be suspended till the publication of his second volume. What we have in the portion here presented to us makes us look forward with much interest to what is to come. We can form a general idea of the lines which it will follow, and feel sure that it will be a valuable contribution to Christology. The specially difficult subject of the correlation of the divine and human natures in the Person of the Saviour, a subject in dealing with which the popular theology is very apt to lapse into sheer monophysitism, seems likely, from what we see, to be treated in a satisfactory way. We may refer our readers to pp. 330-6, where a distinction of great value is drawn between divine omniscience and omnipotence, and the "superior knowledge and supernatural power of operation" bestowed upon Christ as "necessary for the execution of his calling." In this bestowal Professor Weiss sees the chief significance of the descent of the Spirit (John i., 32), though he also regards it as symbolising the burial of Christ's former life, and the emerging to one that was new, and differed from the old, "not by reason of its sinlessness, but only by its being dedicated from that time forward to his great divine calling!" Messrs. Clark deserve the thanks of all students of theology for introducing to them this book, though, indeed, it is but one out of a great array of valuable works which they have continued to send out for now nearly forty years.

MR. F. M. CRAWFORD'S "DOCTOR CLAUDIUS."*

CARLYLE was fond of talking about a certain Ram-Dass, who had "fire enough in his belly to burn up the sins of all the world." Well, there is fire, or rather "go," enough in this one—

* The Life of Christ. By Dr. Bernhard Weiss. Translated by John Walter Hope, M.A. Vol. I. Edinburgh: D. Douglas, 1893.

* Doctor Claudius: a True Story. By F. Marion Crawford. Macmillan and Co. 1893.

volumed novel to cover all its crudities and imperfections, and it may be safely prescribed as an antidote for ennui, to all who are suffering from that self-imposed incubus. Why the author calls his cheery and chivalrous romance of modern life a "True Story," is not for us to say. It is clearly nothing of the kind, though an acute French proverb, which the Psychical Research Society might profitably take for its motto, warns against making probability the test of truth. "Le vraisemblable est la vérité pour les sots!" Why, certainly; but it is not for what Mr. Crawford tells, but for what he conceals, that we object to his title as a misnomer. His story has a hero, the biggest hero in the world, except himself, to adopt Swift's exegesis of "none but himself can be his parallel." Divinely tall and most divinely fair, with an eye like Mars and a front like Jove, with ten thousand pounds' worth of pearls and other "good gifts" in pocket, and with no one but a childless old uncle between himself and a "possibility," which the author is too shy to describe, but is something higher than a rich English dukedom. This distinguished person is found, when the curtain rises, calmly vegetating as a "privat-docent, in the University of Heidelberg, Grand Duchy of Baden, Germany." He has been at it now for ten years or so, "unduly consuming the midnight oil," getting pale of face and drawn of nose, the last, of course, "high aquiline." We mark these signs, because they justify some scepticism about an athletic feat of the Doctor's, which we shall quote by-and-by; but Mr. Crawford may claim the benefit of his assertion, valeat quantum, that in spite of the stiffening influences of privat-docent life, his hero's "stalwart frame was stronger and tougher in its manly proportions" than it had been in his stalwart days "when he handled schläger and sabre" en maître, and, "like a true son of Odin, drained the great horn of brown ale at a draught, and laughed through the foam on his yellow beard." Of the Doctor's studies we must speak more cautiously. He had "plunged into the vast sea of Kant, Spinoza, Hegel, because," says the author, enigmatically, "from the higher speculations of modern mathematics to the study of philosophy is but a step," yet he is still pottering unintelligibly, only not unintelligently, over poor old Sextus Empiricus, when he 'gins to be weary of his world. Pat, pat, on the instant comes a letter from New York, to inform him that he is his defunct uncle's heir, with dollars ad libitum to play with. Swift upon that comes his fate in a falling parasol, and a lovely Countess, with a voice like a transcendental fog-horn. Unknown, she parts from him unknown; brief as the lightning in the night had she shone upon him,—"Hæret lateri lethalis arundo!" Poor Dr. Claudius, like poor Dr. Faustus, knows himself no more. But there is a Mephistophiles for him too, in the shape of Mr. Silas B. Barker, Junior, of New York, whose father was the privat-docent's uncle's partner. And just as Mephistophiles, in Goethe's masterpiece, throws all the other characters into the shade, so Mr. Barker, as a flesh-and-blood entity, takes precedence of the other characters in this novel.

In drawing this specimen of the shoddy aristocrat, the author's foot is, so to speak, on his native heath, and his success is unmistakable. Silas B. Barker, Junior, would be strong enough, on his own merits, to give this tale the vogue which it deserves to obtain, were its "incidents" infinitely less "moving" than they are. Well, Mephistophiles crops Dr. Claudius's yellow mane, puts him en règle sartorially, and introduces him right away to the fog-horn and parasol Countess; and, started on the old theme, Mr. Crawford does quite as well as could be expected. But he forces his hero to propose twice, and confines him to the same formula—an emphatic one, no doubt—when he tells the Countess for the second time that he loves her with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his strength. The phrase, which is but a stolen peacock's feather, after all, and marred in the stealing, reminds us that Mr. Crawford is much too fond of reproducing the cadences of Scripture, but we have no space for verbal criticisms. The love affair ends happily, and the lucky Countess, besides receiving the American fortune which Dr. Claudius inherited from his uncle as pin-money, receives as a husband not Dr. Claudius, which was but a nom de something or other, neither plume nor guerre, for some high-and-mightiness whose exact position in the hierarchy of European potentates Mr. Crawford is too awestruck to disclose. Perhaps he is right, and in any case no harm accrues to his story, for although it is so bright and pleasant that it will be read from cover to cover without a yawn, we cannot fancy any reader troubling himself for a minute over the question whether Dr. Claudius was the son of the biggest big-wig in Sweden, or of the King of Sweden himself. We stand for the King ourselves, for we doubt if the "Duke" would have laid Dr. Claudius's certificate of birth, &c., down "with a certain reverence, as things he respected," if they had not been strongly flavoured with Royalty. For the "Duke" himself was no common Duke, but one whom Mr. Crawford, with all an American's sensitive regard for rank, has deferentially left anonymous. But we must protest, on behalf of that poor "Duke," an "honest Casca," if there ever was one, and married to boot, ought not to have been made to lose his heart to the Countess. But, of course, if the story is true, Mr. Crawford had no alternative. In that case, we hope the "Duke's" wife won't get hold of Doctor Claudius.

As a specimen of the author's lively narrative, we quote the athletic feat which we have referred to, and may add in conclusion that Mr. Crawford's dialogues are always excellent. He fails most where most fail, namely, in attempts at fine-writing, and as a sample of this we should take his description of the Countess's voice, which seems to us to justify an unsavoury comparison. But his dialogues are capital, and as far removed as possible from those of ordinary novels, where no one dreams of saying to the interlocutors, "Let them talk again," and hopes rather that they will ever after hold their peace:—

"Claudius was a very large man, as has been said, and Barker did not believe it possible that he could drag his gigantic frame up the smooth mast beyond the shrouds. If it were possible, he was quite willing to pay his money to see him do so. Claudius put the woollen cap in his pocket, and began the ascent. The steamer was schooner-rigged, with topsail yards on the foremast, but there were no ratlines in the main-topmast shrouds, which were set about ten feet below the masthead. To this point Claudius climbed easily enough, using his arms and legs against the stiffened ropes. A shout from the Duke hailed his arrival. 'Now comes the tug of war,' said the Duke. 'He can never do it,' said Barker, confidently. But Barker had underrated the extraordinary strength of the man against whom he was betting. The Doctor was one of those natural athletes whose strength does not diminish for lack of exercise (avis rarissima). He pulled the cap out of his pocket and held it between his teeth as he gripped the smooth wood between his arms, and hands, and legs, and with firm and even motion he began to swarm up the bare pole. 'There, I told you so!' said Barker. Claudius had slipped nearly a foot back. 'He will do it yet!' said the Duke, as the climber clasped his mighty hands to the mast. He did not slip again, for his blood was up, and he could almost fancy his iron grip pressed deep into the wood. Slowly, slowly those last three feet were conquered, inch by inch, and the broad hand stole stealthily over the small wooden truck at the topmast-head till it had a firm hold, then the other, and with the two he raised and pushed his body up till the truck was opposite his breast. 'Skal to the Viking!' yelled old Harleson, the Swedish captain, his sunburnt face glowing with triumph, as Claudius clapped the woollen cap over the masthead. 'Well done, indeed, man!' bawled the Duke. 'Well,' said Barker, 'it was worth our money, anyhow.'"

CURRENT LITERATURE.

GIFT BOOKS.

The Wigwam and the War-path. By Ascott R. Hope. (Blackie and Son).—Mr. Hope has searched among the treasures of the past history of the American Colonies, and here presents his young readers—and, indeed, his readers need not be young, to enjoy such a book as this—with the result of his labours. His first story takes us back to Florida, in the early part of the sixteenth century; the next to Canada, about a hundred and fifty years later. There are seventeen of these tales in all; and we may say, without vouching any more than does the writer for the absolute correctness of their details, that they certainly give a very vivid picture of life among the Indians. In these strange people we see, not, indeed, the romantic creations of Fenimore Cooper, but something very different from the ordinary savage. They show traits which make a good foundation for romance. The two Pawnee chiefs (father and son), who, by a mixture of courage and prudence, abolished the custom of human sacrifice in their tribe, might easily be made by a skilful hand into another Chingachgook and Uncas. Mr. Hope's volume is notably good.

The Shoes of Fortune. By Hans C. Andersen. With a Biographical Sketch, by Kenneth R. H. Mackenzie, LL.D. (Hogg).—The tales, of course, we need not criticise; but we may say that the illustrations are not unworthy of them. They show something of the same graceful fancy which guided Andersen's pen. Of the singular personality of Andersen himself, we get a really valuable sketch. Dr. Mackenzie estimates him justly, we think, but not unkindly.

The Wings of Courage. Translated from the French of George Sand, by Mrs. Cookson. (Blackie and Son).—There are two stories in this volume, the first and most important being a tale of Brittany, in which the great French novelist has mingled fact and fancy in a very happy fashion. We feel sure that the lad who makes his home among the wild birds on the Breton cliffs is a real person; but he is skilfully idealised, and his story made into a genuine romance.

Poppies and Pansies. By Emma Marshall. (Nisbet.)—"Poppies" and "Pansies" represent two types of girls, which Miss Marshall describes with her wonted skill. The story is slight, but well told. Now and then a touch of humour relieves its seriousness. Mrs. Montague's dogs, for instance, make a welcome diversion. Pamela, the little heroine, is a very pleasing sketch.

Sir Valentine's Victory, and other Stories. By Emma Marshall. (Nisbet and Co.)—Sir Valentine finds himself dispossessed from his position as heir to his grandfather's estate and title by the sudden return of another grandson, supposed to have been long ago lost. The story tells us how he behaved himself under these circumstances, first refusing, and then learning, to bear his changed position. In the second tale we have a notable description of a football match, which does great credit to Miss Marshall's powers in a somewhat unexpected line.

The Court and the Cottage. By Emma Marshall. (Griffith and Farran.)—This is a sad story,—sad at least in the ending, when the girl who has been so wilful at the first comes to her right mind. But we suppose that it will be useful as an alternative bitter to the abundance of "sweet food" which young people get at this season.

In Friends, though Divided (Griffith and Farran), Mr. G. A. Henty goes back to the Civil War for the incidents of his story. The friends, as may be readily imagined, are drawn by circumstances to take opposite sides. This is a situation which readily lends itself, in the hands of a skilful artist such as is Mr. Henty, to the making of a good story; and such the reader will find Friends, though Divided, to be.

The Fate of Castle Löwengard. By Esmé Stuart. (Suttaby and Co.)—Castle Löwengard is the abode of a German baron of the old type, the baron who took toll, and something more than toll, of passing merchants, and trod down his peasants like dirt under his feet. Here, thanks to certain gracious influences, notably that of the Baron's ward, the Lady Ghita, the young Baron Engelbert grows up to a higher range of thoughts, to a noble discontent with his surroundings. Here we have one side of the story; the other has for its central figure, Martin Luther. We see him under the protection of the Elector Frederic of Saxony. His bold stand at the Diet of Worms, and his forced retirement in the Castle of the Wartburg, are among the scenes described. Here is abundant material for the writer, and Miss Esmé Stuart has used it well.

The Madman and the Pirates. By R. M. Ballantyne. (Nisbet and Co.)—We cannot pretend to check Mr. Ballantyne's account of Pacific islanders, missionaries, and pirates, who make up the dramatis personæ of this tale. We can only say that his narrative has a very romantic look, his pirate, in particular, having qualities which are, we fear, strange to pirates. Still, the tale is of a stirring kind, and its intention is excellent, though not always, we think, carried out with the best taste and judgment.

Picked Up at Sea, and other Stories. By J. C. Hatcheson. (Blackie and Son.)—The first of these stories is a curious mixture of land and water. The scene changes from the sea to a mining camp in the States; the Sioux appear on the scene; at last, "gold is found." In fact, we have the usual romance which has been told, mutatis mutandis, a thousand times before, and will be told a thousand times again. Two shorter stories complete the volume; the second, "David and Jonathan," being, we think, much the better.

Cissy's Troubles. By Darley Dale. (Nisbet and Co.)—Cissy, the heroine of this simple little story, is all the more attractive because she is "not too bright and good, &c." On the contrary, she has a distinct spice of wilfulness. But then, she is the very best of sisters. Her painful struggles with circumstances, when she is left to manage on the narrowest of incomes, are told with much pathos, which reaches its climax when she sells her wealth of beautiful hair to buy clothing for the young folk that are dependent on her.

How It All Came Round. By L. T. Meade. (Hodder and Stoughton.)—It is always a pleasure to read one of Miss Meade's tales, but we must repeat a wish that we have, we think, expressed before, that she would consult probabilities a little more. In the story before us, we have two brothers proving a will which leaves absolutely £1,200 a year to their half-sister, and then putting her off with the life-interest of £3,000. This they do, trusting that no one would examine the will. Taking for granted this impossibility, for it is really nothing less, we have a most interesting tale in How It All Came Round. The two Charlottes, "the rich Charlotte," daughter of one of the unjust brothers and niece to the other, and "the poor Charlotte," daughter of the dispossessed half-sister, are excellent characters. Our sympathies are very nicely divided between the two, while they go entirely with the "poor Charlotte's" unworldly husband, whose courage and unselfishness (which do not, however, keep him from some human feeling when he sees his children pining away before his eyes) give him a real nobility. We put this volume very high among the books of the season.

By Uphill Paths. By E. Van Sommer. (Nelson and Sons.)—This is a story of honest endeavour to do good, and teaches admirably that best of lessons,—that a man must not judge his work by the event, nor look to success as the test by which it is proved to have been well intended and well done. The paths which Frederic Fraser treads are often "up-hill" indeed, but he surmounts the difficulties bravely, and there is a blessing for him, and for those who help him in his way.

Lily and her Brothers. By "C. C. L." (Griffith and Farran.)—This is a simple chronicle, bearing every mark of being, what indeed it professes to be, a true chronicle of daily life. There is nothing especially eventful in "Lily's" experiences; yet the most ordinary experiences, if the writer knows how to deal with them, can become curiously interesting. "C. C. L." has something of this art, and has accordingly made out of quite commonplace incidents a very readable story.

Mrs. Temple's Grandchildren. By Evelyn Everett-Green. (Nisbet and Co.)—Dolly Temple and her brother Marmaduke come home from India, to be put under their grandmother's charge, when Dolly is to perform the function of a peace-maker, for the grandmother is sorely displeased at her son's marriage, and has never welcomed her daughter-in-law. How the unselfishness and patient affection of the little maiden—for the old woman's love is almost wholly given to the boy—display themselves, is very prettily described.

For Chums, a Story for Youngsters, by Harleigh Severne (Griffith and Farran), we cannot say much. The book is too big for the very small things which it has to relate. With half the length, it would, if a wearied critic may judge on such a point, have been far more acceptable, for it is simply told, and not without spirit and humour.

Paddy Finn; or, the Adventures of a Midshipman Afloat and Ashore, is a reprint of one of Mr. W. H. I. Kingston's capital stories. (Griffith and Farran.)

The Adventures of a Three-Guinea Watch. By Talbot Baines Reed. (Religious Tract Society.)—This story is reprinted from the Boys' Own Paper; and, indeed, it well deserves a more extended life. The device of making a biographer of a watch, a ring, or the like, is not new, but it is serviceable. In this case, it has been employed with ingenuity and taste. The watch begins its career in the possession of one Charlie Newcome, a lad of thirteen—who ought, by the way, to have been above the second form in the school to which he is sent. At school, of course, the "idle apprentice" turns up, and comes to grief. Indeed, he appears at intervals throughout the book, till we have him at last a reformed character. In due time the watch, though not in the same ownership (this is no small convenience attaching to this particular machinery of fiction) proceeds to the University. Its new owner will afford the boy of the period a timely lesson against over-work, when he reads what befell George Reader, after he had been placed first in the First Class of the Classical Tripos. The watch then passes to an old school acquaintance, a judicious admixture of the athlete and the scholar, and from him, through the hands of a young Irish soldier, to its original owner. We can recommend this story with much confidence. It is well contrived, well written, free from affectation, and altogether wholesome in tone.

Among the Wobblins. By Sydney Hodges. (Remington.)—Though this does not come up to our ideal of a fairy story, it is a brisk and pleasant tale, which will doubtless please its readers. The hero of Mr. Hodges' first tale, "Among the Gibjigs," reappears, and passes through some amazing adventures, being imprisoned in the land of Ogredom, and suffering and doing many things. The illustrations are good, notably that of the heads of the giants on p. 102.

Pilgrim Sorrow: a Cycle of Tales. By Queen Elizabeth of Roumania. Translated by Helen Zimmern. (T. Fisher Unwin.)—The Queen of Roumania has achieved some literary distinction, under the pseudonym of "Carmen Sylva." And, indeed, these tales show some considerable power of composition, and are written in a graceful style, to which Miss Zimmern has contrived to do justice in her translation. But they are coloured with a hue that is not unlike pessimism. We do not wish young folk to think that this is the best of all possible worlds; but the melancholy of "Carmen Sylva's" tales is more unwholesome, we cannot but think, than even the most unseasonable lightheartedness.

An edition of Robinson Crusoe, by John Major (Chatto and Windus) comes recommended by illustrations of George Cruikshank's; and by "A Poet's Memories of Robinson Crusoe," from the pen of Bernard Barton.

Two Little Waifs. By Mrs. Molesworth. Illustrated by Walter Crane. (Macmillan and Co.)—One of the reasons why we can so truly call Mrs. Molesworth's stories charming, is that they are read with as much delight by the old as by the young. The present writer confesses to a preference for those stories of this author which tell of every-day life, rather than for her fairy stories. There is much beauty and play of fancy in the latter, but their authoress seems even more at home, and more graphic therefore, in her descriptions of the real life of little children. We do not know that she will ever write anything more delightful than "Carrots," or the history of "A Christmas Child," which we know to have been read and reread, with ever fresh interest and pleasure. Nevertheless, we sincerely admire the Two Little Waifs. It is not our purpose to tell the public how the tiny hero and the young heroine became little waifs, because we intend every one to read the story in Mrs. Molesworth's own words, or remain in unhappy ignorance; but we do not mind their discovering just one item of their adventures, and rejoicing in the evidence that at least they fell into kind hands when they met with the old French dame, in Paris, who was so puzzled and embarrassed by the conscientious little heroine's adhesion, under very difficult circumstances, to the English custom of daily ablutions. The old Frenchwoman is dressing the little boy, when his sister Gladys interferes and makes her understand with much difficulty what is wanted:—

"'Ah, yes, to be sure,' Madame Nestor exclaimed, her face lighting up, 'I understand now, my little lady. All in good time—you shall have water to wash your face and hands as soon as you are dressed. But let me get this poor little man's things on quickly. It is cold this morning.' She began to take off Roger's nightgown and to draw on his little flannel vest, to which he would have made no objection, but Gladys got scarlet with vexation. 'No, no,' she cried, 'he must be washed first. If you haven't got a bath, you might anyway let us have a basin and some water. Roger, you are a dirty boy. You might join me, and then perhaps she'd do it.' Thus adjured, Roger rose to the occasion. He slipped off Madame Nestor's knee, and stepping out of his nightgown began an imaginary sponging of his small person. But it was cold work, and Madame Nestor seeing him begin to shiver grew really uneasy, and again tried to get him into his flannels. 'No, no,' said Roger, in his turn—he had left off crying now—even the cold wasn't so bad as Gladdie calling him a dirty boy. Besides who could tell whether, somehow or other, Miss Susan might not come to hear of it? Gladys might write her a letter. 'No, no,' repeated Roger valorously, 'we must be washed first.' 'You too,' said Madame Nestor in despair; 'ah, what children!' But her good-humour did not desert her. Vaguely understanding what they meant—for recollections began to come back to her mind of what Léonie's mother used to tell her of the manners and customs of her nurseries—she got up, and smiling still, though with some reproach, at her queer little guests, she drew a blanket from the bed and wrapped it round them, and then opening the door she called downstairs to the little servant to bring a basin and towel and hot water. But the little servant did not understand, so after all the poor old lady had to trot downstairs again herself. 'My old legs will have exercise enough,' she said to herself, 'if the Papa does not come soon. However!' 'I'm sure she's angry,' whispered Roger to Gladys inside the blanket, 'we needn't have a bath every day, Gladdie.' 'Hush,' said Gladys sternly. 'I'm not going to let you learn to be a dirty boy. If we can't have a bath, we may at least be washed.'"

Beyond drawing aside the curtain thus far, we shall only say that the little Waifs are very good, patient and conscientious, and go through their troubles with more gentle philosophy than ninety-nine grown-up people out of a hundred would exhibit, and that they show as much common-sense in their proceedings as is possible to the few years which they can boast when we are introduced to them. It is one of the greatest enigmas of life that very little children have to go through so much suffering, anxiety and fear—sometimes even agony, both bodily and mental—and it is doubly sad when the commonest thoughtfulness, judgment or kindness of their seniors might save them from it. Many of those who take care of children have, one would think, no memory, and are unable to recall what they must frequently have suffered themselves; for we hope that it is very rarely that any one deems it wisdom to let children go through painful discipline that might be spared, on the ground that the consequent suffering will bring with it a useful experience. Further, let us remark, what strikes us more and more every day, that the glaring distinctions made between children and older people are frequently mistakes. What does the common phrase, "It is only a child," mean? "The child is father of the man." There is often as much sense, wit, and patience in the children as in the grown-up people; yet there is much risk of their losing these characteristics, because they are so frequently at the mercy of persons who do not in the least understand what is in them. The hearts of the old are usually softer, and Mrs. Molesworth gives us a fine picture—probably drawn from life—of a gentle old lady, much loved by the little Waifs, to whom "the saddest part of dying was over when she had said good-bye to her little favourites." Old people and young children draw together in a wonderful way. The present writer knew of a little two-year-old child—devoted to its grandmother—who, when deprived of her care and presence by her illness and death, died also on the same day, having refused all food not administered by her. Mrs. Molesworth has done much to enlighten us as to the working of little children's minds, and there is plenty of room for yet more good work in the same direction. It is not usual for Mrs. Molesworth to lift the curtain that hides the future of her little protégées. But she does it in this story, to our great contentment. Mr. Crane does not study with sufficient care the details of the scenes which he professes to represent. His Waifs are much further apart in age than Mrs. Molesworth's. Mr. Crane adds nearly half-a-dozen years to those assigned to the little heroine by her biographer. Save for this defect, the pictures are good and pretty, and carefully drawn; but they are not "illustrations," in the proper sense of the word.

NOVELS.—Juliet. 3 vols. (Bentley and Son.)—There is a merit in the style of this tale which far exceeds any deserving that we can find in the tale itself. It has a style, itself no small distinction, when we compare it with piles of entirely vapid and undistinguished writing that issues month after month from the press. Other gifts besides that of style the author possesses; there is the sense of beauty, the power of drawing a picture in a few lines, and no small feeling for character. As for the story, it certainly is not attractive. It is really the history of a male flirt. Oliver Ormrod wins the heart of Molly Murdoch, a fair maid of Wherndale, without any thought of giving his own in return. He himself loves another fair maid, one Juliet Laybourne, and is beloved by her. And lo! the nemesis comes upon him from a third, who is neither very fair nor very dear, but will have her own way, and has it. By a retribution, this time, Oliver is not the one most to blame. The girl seeks him, and he flirts with her almost because he cannot help it. Juliet has discovered his first love, and condoned it; but when she comes upon plain evidence of the second, her patience is exhausted. She renounces the faithless one, and falls back with what we cannot but think a somewhat imprudent and undignified haste on a certain old friend, old enough, we gather, to be her father, who is fortunately at hand at the time. Molly, too, reconciles herself to her fate, and in a somewhat more satisfactory fashion, and the story ends with the customary marriage bells, and the discovery, almost as customary, that the hero is something a great deal better than we had thought him. The unknown author (who promises very well, indeed, if this is, as we suppose, her first work) lays, we observe, the scene of her story in Wherndale, somewhere, we presume, in the North of England. She is, as she gives us reason to think, an observer of nature, and we conclude, therefore, that they have their hay harvest in June in the Dales.—Eugenia. By William Money Hardinge. 3 vols. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)—Eugenia is, we suppose, a study of life after the manner of M. Zola. The heroine is the very perfection of womanhood, pure in mind, sound in body, beautiful, strong, wise, arrived, too, at years when the judgment is supposed to be mature (she is as much as twenty-eight, almost old age for heroines), and she falls in love, and that in a moment, at the very first glance, with the most unmitigated cad that ever novelist ventured to introduce to his readers. And why? Because he is strong. He is not the demigod sort of hero. He looks like a fine specimen of a private soldier—indeed, by the standard of the officer, he is wanting—and he never utters a word that is not instinct with selfishness and vulgarity; and yet, because he is big and strong, this noble heroine falls down and worships him. She does not even idealise him. She sees his brutality, and it offends her; but the animal attraction of the creature is simply overpowering to her. It is true that she gives him up; he is poor, she thinks, and he must marry for money. But the offence of the whole thing, which is carried into details which it was a pain to read, and which we will not shock our readers by reproducing, remains the same.—Pearla. By M. Betham-Edwards. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—It is a relief to get into the pleasant and wholesome atmosphere which Miss Edwards creates for her readers. Nor does it trouble us to think that some of the circumstances of her story are a little unreal. Pearla is the widow of an impossible governor of a quite impossible island in the Pacific, and comes home to take charge of her only son, who for some years has been under the care of a tutor. The tutor has a romance of his own, having refused an estate because it was burdened with the charge of building a Roman Catholic chapel. The lady finds herself very much indebted to the tutor for his care in the past, and very dependent upon him for his help in the future. Hence the beginnings of another romance. Meanwhile, the son grows up; an old affection of his boyish days develops into something serious, and we have romance the fourth. We shall not follow the story in detail. Its chief interest lies not so much in the plot as in the working-out of the characters and scenes which it describes. Garland, the man of letters, is a particularly interesting figure, and his family life, with its simplicity and unity of affection, an attractive sketch. There is a pleasant little glimpse of student life in London, a subject which might, we fancy, be made more of than has been hitherto done. Altogether, Pearla is a pleasant and readable novel.—George Elvaston. By Mrs. Lodge. 3 vols. (Tinsley Brothers.)—The story opens with the burning of the Elizabethan mansion of the Elvastons and with the death of its owner. We are sorry to lose Mr. Elvaston so soon, as he expresses himself admirably in the grand style which is so usual in the country squire. "Can this dread of something to appear from the unseen world, which has taken possession of me, be an admonition of approaching dissolution?" Then he collects his courage—"Bab, man, this is but coward fancy! What but the weird looks of the ancient Elvastons put death into thy head? What sign of decay is there in this robust frame? What disease lurks in thy vitals, threatening to cut short thy span of life? None. Why, then, art thou afraid?" But his family have still more reason to regret his death. He has married his deceased wife's sister, and his children cannot inherit, the law not taking the view of their union which Mrs. Lodge attributes afterwards to one of her characters, who "regarded a marriage with a deceased wife's sister in the same light as he did that of his own" (we should like to set the words in italics as an exercise in translation). Irene Elvaston, who is really the heroine of the story, loses her lover, the device of intercepting and even forging letters being used with a boldness seldom seen in fiction, by a lady whose glittering blue eye has meant mischief all along. Thus deserted, Irene goes out as a governess, but, as is only too likely, beauty walks "hand-in-hand with anguish," the males of her employers' families making haste to fall in love with her. One of these males she marries—"If he will take me, beggared as I am in love, in name, and fortune, I will accept him as my destiny." This does not sound promising. Robert Lindford—that is the husband's name—turns out furiously jealous, and makes his wife endure incalculable miseries. When she has had as much as possible piled upon her, George Elvaston, who has been trying to run a "first-class daily paper" on what was left of £5,000 after paying his debts, "becomes the sport of outrageous fortune." But we have said enough. If these stories, wholly remote as they are from life as we know it, must be written, why not lay the scene in some remote land,—say, among the Patagonians? It may be true to nature there, but we know that it is not so here.

Messrs. Letts have sent us their convenient diaries for 1884,—the Russia Pocket-book, containing a pocket diary; the Tablet Diary, containing notices of important commercial events; the smaller, larger, and largest Rough Diaries or "scribbling" journals; the Office Diary and Almanack; the Housekeeper's Diary; and various Calendars for hanging up. They are, as usual, thoroughly serviceable, and very neat and commodious in form.

Messrs. Meissner and Buch, of Leipzig, have sent us, through their agent, Mr. W. G. Wallis (112 Fleet Street, E.C.), a box of Christmas and New Year Cards, which consist chiefly of very elaborately painted flowers, though containing also occasional figure pieces adapted to the time of year. The cards are carefully executed, and sometimes in very delicate colours.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

IT is by no means certain that M. Ferry is to win, after all. The result of the division on the Vote of Credit, taken on Friday, has not yet reached us; but it was believed on Thursday night that it would be accompanied with a severe censure. In spite of the weight of the Yellow Book, six hundred pages of close print, the Deputies have picked out the plums, and have discovered that they have been egregiously deceived. Not only has China all along threatened war if Tonquin were occupied; but M. Bourée, the French Ambassador at Peking, constantly and pointedly informed his Government that the menace was a reality. M. Bourée even described the steps which the Chinese Government would take, explained that no rush could now be made on Peking in face of the formidable earthworks thrown up, and finally, risked recall by telling his superiors that they were ignorant of the most essential facts. Reading these statements, the Deputies acknowledge that they have been tricked into risking a war with China. Of course, they do not acknowledge that most of the facts were public before, and that in trusting M. Ferry, they were, partly at least, blinded by their own desire to get a tropical estate for nothing.

It is almost impossible to understand the motives of M. Challemeil-Lacour and M. Ferry in thus deceiving the public. They cannot have wanted a war with China, yet they did all they could to provoke one, and this in the teeth of their own Agents' warnings. We suspect they both believed that war might come, but that if they could conquer Tonquin, France would be delighted, and could easily defend the province against a Chinese invasion. It seems certain that the most peremptory orders to act were sent to the Military and Naval chiefs in Tonquin, and that the Government does not even now understand why Bacninh is not taken. The Departments entirely under-rated the extent of the local resistance to be expected, the losses which would be incurred before the advance could be attempted, and the reluctance of their officers to risk defeat. The history of the affair, even should it end in a compromise, will not raise European opinion as to the efficiency of the French administrative machine. There is a want of imagination visible in the central Bureaux, while their orders, at a certain distance, lose their force. Is there, perchance, any secret wish anywhere that the Republic should not be solidified by success?

Lord Hartington, in his speech this day week at Accrington, stated that, in pointing out some of the difficulties attending a Franchise Bill at Manchester, he had expressly said that he did not suppose them insuperable; but now he inferred that if he were found to concur in such a Reform Bill as the country evidently expects, it would be triumphantly asserted that the Whigs had been beaten by the Radical section of the Cabinet. He was entirely indifferent to that accusation. He admitted that the Whigs had never been the leaders in Reform, but he did claim for them that by accepting Reform in time they had always been able to moderate it, and to prevent its being too violent or too abrupt. He passed from that subject to the charge of Sir Richard Cross, that the blunders of the present Administration had been so unparalleled that eleven nights were necessarily expended in discussing them in the debate on the Address. Lord Hartington remarked that unparalleled blunders might easily be exposed in a much shorter time; it was only acts capable of a double interpretation,—of defence as well as of attack,—which needed so very long to expose. He showed that in India the present Administration had saved for public works large sums which the late Administration had recklessly expended on a most unjust and unprofitable war; and that in Ireland, so far from the present Administration having purchased the support of the disloyal Members by the Arrears Bill, they had alienated the support of those very Members by introducing the Crimes Bill before they introduced that Arrears Bill, which was said to be the purchase-money for an adhesion never received.

With regard to our foreign relations, Lord Hartington gave evidence that there is none of that coolness between England and Germany which the Conservatives delight to suppose and to condemn. This was what he said:—"Our relations with Germany are perfectly cordial and perfectly friendly, and in proof of that I may perhaps tell you, what will be a satisfaction to many of you, that even within a very few days we have received from the German Government an intimation that they are willing to co-operate with us for the protection of their and of our subjects, and of their and our interests in China, in the event of our countrymen or our interests being brought into any peril by the state of the relations between France and China." This passage has been strangely misunderstood to suggest that Germany and England have entered into some quasi-hostile combination against France, which is quite a mistake. Not Germany and England only, but all the neutral States concerned commercially with China, have agreed to help each other in protecting subjects of their respective States, from any violence to which the excitement in China might expose them. We conclude that if France should declare a blockade of the Chinese ports, the neutral States would insist,—as they have always insisted in such cases,—that the blockade should be effective, and not merely nominal; but this certainly is not the primary object of the interchange of friendly assurances, but rather the wish to protect Europeans against the dangers of Chinese massacre.

Sir John Lubbock, who spoke after Lord Hartington, made an admirable joke, in the opening of his speech. He said that the great cataract of invective to which the Government had been exposed, and to which Lord Hartington had referred, reminded him of the criticism passed by a Yankee publican on Niagara, who, after attentively regarding for some time the mighty rush of waters, said that it would be all very fine if it was not "for the poverty of the material." Sir John then proceeded to expose the poverty of the material of which the Conservative cataract and the Tory rapids are composed, directing his remarks specially to the accusations of increase in expenditure. He did not think Conservatives would complain of the extra quarter of a million granted from the Imperial Exchequer in relief of local rates, for that was their own doing; he did not think they would complain of the £600,000 additional for Irish Police, for that was their own policy; he did not think they would complain of the additional £400,000 for education, for that was a policy approved by both parties. He went on to remark on the apparently striking effect produced by education in diminishing the number of juvenile offenders. In 1856, long before the Education Act, the number of juvenile offenders committed for indictable offences was 14,000; in 1866, still before the Education Act, but not before great efforts had been made to improve education, it had fallen to 9,000. In 1876, it was 7,000; in 1881, 5,500; so that a steady diminution in juvenile crime goes on pari passu with the increased attention paid to elementary education.

Lord Salisbury made a lively speech at Watford on Thursday. He directed his remarks chiefly to badgering Lord Hartington. Lord Hartington, he said, wished to make the House of Lords into a kind of political parish clerk, that should always respond with an "Amen" to the wishes of the House of Commons. For his own part, whenever that state of things should come about, he held that the time to abolish the House of Lords would have arrived. Indeed, Lord Salisbury evidently thinks that it is much better for the House of Lords to swear a round oath, first, that they will see the House of Commons damned before they agree with them, and then, on second thoughts, to substitute a sulky "Amen," than to say "Amen" at once, without sulks. Lord Salisbury then went on to remark on "the bold and high-falutin' language in which Mr. Chamberlain treats his colleague," and on "the bated breath and humble whispering with which Lord Hartington responds." His own wishes, said Lord Salisbury, were all with Lord Hartington; but if he were a betting man, he should certainly give odds on the success of Mr. Chamberlain. After badgering Lord Hartington, Lord Salisbury had very little more left to say, but he said it in a good many words. It was chiefly to the effect that the Tories dislike all organic changes, and think they interfere with remedial legislation, about which they are very anxious, though, while they were in office, they appeared to be,—with the exception, perhaps, of Sir R. Cross,—profoundly indifferent.

We deeply regret to find that Mr. Goschen has declined the Speakership, in consequence of the shortness of his sight, which, it is thought, would interfere seriously with the adequate discharge of his duties. All parties would have welcomed cordially the accession of Mr. Goschen to the Chair. Mr. A. Peel has been since thought of for Speaker, and it is believed that he has not yet decided whether to be put in nomination, or to decline to be nominated. Mr. A. Peel is a moderate Liberal, and is generally liked and respected. But for an office of this kind, he is an unknown quantity. Even the oldest Members of Parliament are as ignorant as external politicians whether he has the highest qualifications for the office, or only moderate qualifications for it, or no special qualifications at all. If he accepts the nomination, he will at least show that he has confidence in his own power to administer a very critical function well, and that will be one good reason for hoping that he is the right man; for no one has ever attributed political conceit to Mr. Arthur Peel.

The Delegates from the Australian Colonies, New Zealand, and Fiji met at Sydney on November 28th, to consider the question of Federation. The debates are secret, but by December 5th the Conference had agreed unanimously to the following seven resolutions:—1. That any new settlement of a foreign Power anywhere in the South Pacific would be injurious to Australia and the British Empire. 2. That the Conference believes her Majesty's Government will promptly adopt the most effectual measures for preventing such settlement. 3. That so much of New Guinea should be incorporated as is not claimed by the Government of the Netherlands. 4. That the British Government should, as agreed with France, respect the independence of the New Hebrides, but should endeavour to acquire them by negotiation. 5. That the Australian Governments represented in Conference will endeavour to provide for their share of the expense of carrying out these resolutions. 6. That the Conference protests in the strongest manner against the French project for sending convicts to the South Pacific, and asks Government to interfere. 7. That "this Convention expresses the confident hope that no penal settlement for the reception of European criminals will long continue to exist in the Pacific, and invites her Majesty's Government to make to the Government of France such serious representations on this subject as may be deemed expedient." These resolutions amount to a claim to control the whole Southern Pacific, and to tolerate no rival there, a claim which would seem extravagant, but that Federated Australia will in a few years be able to enforce it.

The rank and file of the Democrat majority in Congress have revolted against their leaders, in the interest of Free-trade. Those leaders wished to elect Mr. Randall as Speaker of the House, but at a previous meeting or caucus, the Western and Southern Members gave 106 votes to Mr. Carlisle, the Kentuckian Free-trader, while Mr. Randall only received 56. Mr. Carlisle was consequently elected; and it is believed that the Democrat party is inclined to make Free-trade its cry during the election for the Presidency next year. So great has been the agitation, that immediate legislation against the Tariff was feared; and the Eastern Democrats, who are Protectionists, formed themselves into a group to resist serious reductions. As the Senate is still Protectionist, and the President Republican, nothing important can be done; but the weight of the West and South will probably overbear all resistance. The planters and farmers are growing weary of paying immense prices in order to make the fortunes of manufacturing corporations, which have persuaded their artisans that without Protection wages must inevitably go down. The struggle will probably be severe, but that it should begin is hopeful, both parties having hitherto avoided this issue.

Mr. Folger, the Republican Secretary to the Treasury, while declining to recommend immediate reduction of the Tariff, except in the matter of wools for carpets, admits that the country does not desire a reduction in the internal revenue duties on alcohol and tobacco. The revenue, at the same time, is so large, that the surplus applicable to the reduction of Debt will this year, after all the efforts made to deplete the Treasury, be £17,000,000 sterling, and ultimately the revenues of the nation must be limited by lowering the duties on imports. Mr. Folger repudiates all plans for distributing the surplus revenue of the country among the States for any purpose whatever, declaring that "it is not the legitimate function of the Federal Government to raise taxes in order to give them to the States." This sharp official snub is directed against the proposal to assign to each State a grant-in-aid proportioned to the ignorance found still prevailing among its citizens. Mr. Folger would continue to pay off Debt, but would ask the nation to pay all pilotage dues, and either to allow foreign ships to be bought free of duty, or to grant bounties upon all cargoes carried in American bottoms.

Mr. Childers has made two speeches at Pontefract this week, of the solidly-instructive kind. In the first, on Wednesday, he told his audience that the recruiting difficulty was over, the rate of enlistment having risen again to 37,000 a year. After mentioning the new pressure on the Exchequer, of which we have spoken elsewhere, he pointed out that fifteen years ago the taxation of the country amounted to £2 0s. 10d. a head, while now it is only £2 0s. 1d. That is to say, taxation has declined, although the cost of education has risen from 9d. to 2s. 3d. a head, that of grants-in-aid to local burdens from 1s. 5d. to 3s. 1d., and that of paying off Debt from 1s. 7d. to 3s. 8d. a head. Whatever the mismanagement, therefore, the mismanagement has not been in the way of extravagance. In Ireland, he believed the Government were within measurable distance of a settlement under the Land Act, which within a year will have done its work. Crime is ceasing, and emigration, especially from the congested districts, taking a wholesale character, 100,000 persons departing this year. He could not reveal the future plans of the Cabinet, for they were not yet decided; but two groups of plans would certainly be brought forward, the reform of the representation, and the grant of municipal institutions to London, two changes which will constitute "the most momentous advance of our administrative and representative systems made in fifty years."

Mr. Childers devoted his second speech, at Knottingley on Thursday, mainly to Reform and the rehousing of the poor. He thought parties were approximating about reform, both of them admitting that household suffrage must be extended to the counties, and that there must be a large measure of redistribution. The contention now was mainly about details,—a view which we fear Mr. Childers will find to be too sanguine. He pointed out, with immense effect on his audience, that if redistribution were to be arranged on the principles laid down by Sir Stafford Northcote in Ulster, the claim of the West Riding and Lancashire would be irresistible. That district contains nearly one-sixth of the population of the United Kingdom, and more than one-sixth of the electors, while its property is over one-seventh; yet it returns only fifty-five Members, instead of more than one hundred. Mr. Childers did not, as we understand him, recommend redistribution on this basis, he only stated the facts. As regards the rehousing of the poor, he believed that the existing law was nearly sufficient, if it were only worked; that it would be worked in the provincial cities, but that it would not be worked in London until we had a strong central municipality. He thanked Lord Salisbury heartily for the "signal opportunity" which he had afforded the Government of dealing with this great subject.

It is reported, apparently on authority, that the Government has succeeded in making a Commercial Treaty with Spain. Spain is to admit British goods under the most-favoured-nation clause, while Great Britain is to admit Spanish wines at the low rate of duty up to thirty degrees of alcoholic strength. The arrangement pleases Spanish statesmen, who are pressed by their wine-growers, and who want large imports for the sake of revenue; but we would advise British manufacturers not to be too trustful. The treaty will displease the French, who want to sell claret, not port, and who can apply pressure at Madrid; and it will irritate Protectionist Catalonia to frenzy. There is a lull for a moment, because the German Crown Prince is the guest of Spain; but the moment he goes, the attack on the Herrera Ministry, and its reforms and its tariffs, will be most severe. The pivot of power is the King, but he will not want to shell Barcelona.

On Tuesday, Mr. Chamberlain spoke at Wolverhampton, chiefly on the county franchise. He said that he was completely unaware of the divisions in the Cabinet of which the newspapers said so much. "To the best of my belief, every member of the Cabinet is anxiously pursuing the same general objects, is governed by the same principles, and is actuated by the same loyalty to the great chief whose long experience and commanding ability entitle him to influence and authority among his colleagues, and whose long-trying sympathy with the popular rights has given him the confidence and the admiring affection of the great majority of his countrymen." Mr. Chamberlain went on to argue for the right of Ireland to a full share in the proposed electoral Reform, in language which we have elsewhere quoted and dwelt upon; and then he insisted on the advisability of separating the Franchise Bill from the Redistribution Bill. This was right as a matter of principle, because whether the Redistribution Bill were bad for its Radicalism or for its Conservatism, whether it went too far or did not go far enough, still the county householders were entitled to their vote. Doubtless, without Redistribution, that vote would give them but a small fraction of the power they ought to have. Still, the fact that they were entitled to more power than it would give, was no good excuse for refusing them as much as it would give. As to Redistribution, Mr. Chamberlain pointed out that in the House of Commons forty Members for certain constituencies represent a quarter of a million of persons, while forty other Members represent more than six millions and a quarter; so that the six millions are thrown in, as it were, to be represented implicitly, and not explicitly by any representative machinery at all. As for the Lords rejecting the Franchise Bill, Mr. Chamberlain expressed a pious hope that the nobility might be endued, in the language of the Church, "with grace, wisdom, and understanding."

Mr. Trevelyan made a very remarkable speech on Tuesday at Kelso, on the extension of household franchise to the counties. He spoke with a certain fire of enthusiasm on behalf of the population of Northumberland and Roxburghshire, which is at present unenfranchised and has no influence in Parliament. That population, he said, "in physical health and stature, in material comfort, in independence of character, and in solid, intelligent, well-informed interest in public affairs, is inferior to no population in the world." And a household franchise was needful not only to give the many unenfranchised their due, but to save the few enfranchised from the nuisance of being canvassed by all sorts of squires, clergymen, factors, and fine ladies, who come and sit down in the voter's parlour, and refuse to leave till he has promised his vote. Multiply these few voters by five, and all this political teasing and persecution must cease. Of Mr. Trevelyan's views in relation to the Irish share in the franchise we have spoken at length elsewhere, but we may add here that Mr. Trevelyan gives his voice most emphatically for settling the Franchise question before the Redistribution question is even touched, and that he is warmly opposed to letting any one vote for a county who is not a resident in that county. Mr. Trevelyan spoke with as much fire and elevation as if he had not been oppressed for a year and a half with the most responsible work which it is possible for man to undertake. He rises daily in the esteem and confidence of the public.

Mr. Trevelyan also made a speech of great mark on Thursday at Galashiels, in which he defended the Irish policy of the Government against the criticisms both of men like Messrs. Biggar and Healy, who say rather what their audiences wish them to say, than what they have evidence to prove; and also against the Orangemen, who accuse the Irish Government of being in league with the party of Messrs. Biggar and Healy. What Mr. Biggar says is of no account at all; but Mr. Healy is a man of remarkable ability, and when he declared that if the gaols and workhouses in Ireland were big enough to imprison the whole Irish people, Mr. Trevelyan would be so pleased that he would not care even to exile them to the New World, he knew what he was about, though he did not believe what he said. The truth is that there never was heartier service given to Ireland than Lord Spencer's and Mr. Trevelyan's, and Irishmen are beginning to understand this. They now pay their rents willingly; boycotting has almost ceased; the tenants are beginning to spend a great deal in improvements, the demand for building materials for cattle-sheds and cottages growing brisker every day; and there are signs all over the country that the minute attention to small matters, on which the success of the petty system of agriculture depends, is rapidly increasing.

The news from the Soudan is not encouraging. It is now certain that the Egyptian Army has perished, owing, as we suspected, to thirst and the total failure of ammunition, and that the natives consider the victory to settle the Mahdi's claims. On December 5th, a dervish entered Sennaar, and swore on the Koran that not a soldier of General Hicks's army had been left alive in Kordofan. Five thousand of the people at once armed themselves and declared for the Mahdi, and this province also may be considered lost. It will be the same at Khartoum, and General Baker, if he fights his way from Suakim—which, in the temper of his troops, is doubtful—will arrive too late. Fortunately, the British authorities in Egypt are not hopeful, and are taking the wise course of throwing up works at Assouan, the lowest point on the river at which the British Army can interfere. They leave the Soudan to the Egyptian Government, and that Government has appointed Zebehr Pasha, the king of slave-dealers, its supreme agent in Kordofan. The notion is to pit his local influence against the spiritual influence of the Mahdi, and it will probably fail.

An Under-Sheriff of London and Middlesex, writing to Wednesday's Times, makes the occasional awkwardness of the hangman, and the consequent suffering of the victim, a plea for abolishing capital punishment altogether. A plea it may be, but it is a very, very weak one. These sensational scenes, seldom more than a few seconds in duration, are most repulsive, and most unfortunate in their general effect; but you might just as well determine the rightness or wrongness of war by the incidental horrors of a battle-field, and the rightness or wrongness of using wood in housebuilding by the incidental horrors of a great fire, as determine such a question as capital punishment by arguments of this class. If capital punishment is right, it is right because it alone expresses adequately the horror of the community for a special class of crimes, and because it alone inspires a certain exceptional awe and dread in the minds of brutal men.

The death, at a comparatively early age, of Dr. Richey, Q.C., Professor of Feudal and English Law in the University of Dublin, has created a profound sensation of regret amongst all men of culture in that city. Singularly well informed (especially in the literature and records of the middle-ages), and master of whatever he took in hand, Dr. Richey combined with great historical discernment an almost total freedom from passion. His writings on subjects connected with the history and archæology of Ireland are marked by such unruffled calmness of reason, that they have not only given offence to no party, but have won the praise of Celt and Saxon alike. His prefaces to the volumes of the Brehon law, published under the direction of the Master of the Rolls, show how thoroughly he had mastered the foundations of ancient jurisprudence. Ireland can ill spare a man of this type.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MINISTERS ON THE COUNTY FRANCHISE.

IN spite of Lord Hartington's warning against pressing on measures before the difficulties which they involve have been fully encountered, we fancy we may assume, not only from the apologetic tone of his speech of last Saturday, but from the confident manner in which both Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Trevelyan pushed aside last Tuesday the objection to extending the representation of Ireland, that at least no hints have been given from the highest quarters which would stop the mouths of those who prefer settling the county franchise first and the question of redistribution of electoral power afterwards, and who insist that Ireland shall be treated on exactly the same principles as Great Britain in reference to the question of representation. The speech of Mr. Trevelyan at Kelso was indeed a speech of great moment, coming as it did from the Minister who is actually the mouthpiece of the Irish Government in the House of Commons. It is simply impossible, we think, that such a speech could have been made, if there had been the least reluctance on the part of the Prime Minister to permit the extension of the Reform Bill, whatever it be, to Ireland. "The very worst recipe," says Mr. Trevelyan, with convincing force as well as complete frankness, "for keeping Ireland at peace is to doctor its representation in a manner which everybody who gains or loses by it knows to be grossly unjust." And, referring to Sir Stafford Northcote's proposal to redistribute representative power in Ireland not with reference to population, but with reference to the existing electorates, he says, "Such a scheme of redistribution would, in my opinion, immensely aggravate the difficulties of Ireland." That is virtually a declaration by the Minister who best knows Lord Spencer's mind, and who vindicates Lord Spencer's Government of Ireland in the House of Commons, that any attempt to treat Ireland in the new Reform Bill on principles which we decline to apply to England, will involve those serious dangers to which Lord Hartington himself alluded as probably too great to encounter, even at the very moment when he was insisting on the aversion which many Englishmen would feel for any step which strengthened the party of Irreconcilables in the House of Commons. Mr. Chamberlain, at Wolverhampton, took up a position quite as strong as Mr. Trevelyan at Kelso, though, of course, the President of the Board of Trade, Cabinet Minister though he be, hardly speaks on a question of this kind with the authority of the Irish Secretary. "There are some people," he says, "who are very indignant whenever any one in authority admits that the Irish people have still some causes for dissatisfaction. I will put the state of the case before you, and I will appeal to you, whether, patient as you are, enduring as you are, you would tolerate, without murmuring, such a sham, such a fraud, such a transparent imposture, as the present Irish Parliamentary system? In Great Britain, that is, in England and Scotland, one person in ten of the population has a vote, and we think the number too few. But in Ireland, only one person in twenty-five is on the Register. In England and Scotland, of the adult males, three out of eight are electors; in Ireland, it is only one in six. The political condition of Ireland at the present moment is not so favourable in this respect as the political condition of England and Scotland was before the last Reform Bill. Sixteen years have passed since then, and we have been complaining ever since. We have said that that settlement was altogether inadequate and insufficient; yet our Irish fellow-subjects have not even at this moment attained to the point which sixteen years ago we thought to be altogether insufficient. I do not believe that, if this inequality had existed in either England or Scotland, it would have been tolerated so long. To perpetuate it now would be to justify disaffection in Ireland, and to put into the mouths of the leaders of the National party the strongest argument they would have for separation, because it would show the impossibility of obtaining justice from the British Parliament. It would be to stimulate and to give fresh vigour to the agitation which it is our interest to allay and to put an end to." We do not for a moment suppose that by refusing to give the leaders of the Home-rule party an additional excuse for agitation, we shall "allay" or "put an end to" their bitter disaffection. We do not doubt that the extension of household franchise to Ireland must result in a very large immediate accession to the strength of the party now called Irreconcilable. But whether it will be nearly so dangerous for purposes of mischief when it is strong—strong for every purpose except that of separation—as it is now that it is weak, is a very different question. In our belief, adequate strength—explicit strength, as distinguished from implicit or merely latent strength—always makes a party more, instead of less reasonable; more willing to face conspicuous facts, and to compromise what it cannot conquer. The mere fact of having all its strength, and also all its points of weakness, fully displayed, fully evident to all the world, tends to prevent that half-mystical obstinacy which is founded on a belief that there is far greater force beneath the surface than is visible on the surface. If we are to reckon with the Irish people, as sooner or later we must, let us, in the name of common-sense, know exactly what the Irish people mean, what they really wish, what they would get if they could, and on what conditions they would be likely to yield to plainly superior force what they cannot expect the rest of the kingdom to which they belong ever to yield to them. This seems to us to be statesmanship of the most obvious kind. And Mr. Chamberlain's warning that the Crimes Act expires in the course of 1885 adds force to these considerations. Let us face the problem, and have our reckoning with Ireland while we have full power to keep down agrarian crime. The expiration of the Crimes Act may then find Ireland in a more reasonable mood, and as disposed to resent any renewal of those fearful outrages which made life in Ireland hardly worth living to either landlord or peasant, as Great Britain herself would be. But till we have really brought the people of Great Britain and the people of Ireland face to face in Parliament, we have not even got to the threshold of the most difficult problem of our day.

Another question of great interest is advanced a step by Mr. Trevelyan's most opportune and weighty speech at Kelso,—the question of how to deal with the non-residential county qualifications. He speaks out with singular force the hearty desire, as we take it, of the whole Liberal party,—and his words mean this, abolish them altogether. "I cannot speak," he says, "for the intentions of the Government, but as one of the thousand interpreters of the Liberal party, I do not hesitate to say that if there is one thing the party has made up its mind about, it is this,—that people who live outside a county ought not to have votes for that county, and that people who live in a county must and shall have votes for that county, or we will know the reason why." That is a contribution to the solution of one of Lord Hartington's difficulties which we had ourselves advocated as the only right one, and from Mr. Trevelyan, who has for so many years back been the almost official advocate of household suffrage in the counties, it comes with peculiar authority and force. Of course he does not absolutely determine the question as to what we are to do with the freeholders. A resident freeholder might still have a vote in right of his freehold, though as he would certainly have it in right of his household residence, we do not see any possible advantage in permitting him to claim for the house in which he does not reside, rather than for the house in which he does. But on the whole, that view of Mr. Trevelyan's seems to us to tend in the direction of the obvious and simple solution that resident inhabitants of the county shall have votes in virtue of the households of which they are the head, and not in virtue of anything else at all. Cannot even those Liberals who feel a sort of pious gratitude towards the 40s. freehold, see that, excellent service as it has rendered, its day is gone by so soon as we adopt the simpler rule that the head of the household, whether in a county or in a Parliamentary borough, shall always vote on behalf of the household of which he is the head?

THE NEW FREE-TRADE MOVEMENT IN AMERICA.

THE new departure of the American Democrats, if they have really taken it, will be in one way a source of perplexity to English Radicals. For a quarter of a century past they have adhered very steadily, through evil report and good report, to the American Republicans. They have perceived that this party, in spite of its Protectionism, of its partial failure in remodelling the South, and of its intolerable tolerance for official corruption, has been the party of freedom, has fought slavery steadily, and has preferred the claim of the nation to that of its component fractions. They perceive that it has maintained a sound foreign policy as free from aggressiveness as from fear, that it has cultivated a reasonable friendship with England, and that it has within it the germ of a policy which would secure in all Departments pure administration. They have, therefore, with a rare steadiness continued almost for a generation to sympathise with Republican successes and to respect Republican nominees, but they will be perplexed, perhaps shaken, if in the fiscal battle supposed to be approaching the Democrats become aggressive Free-traders, and the Republicans stolid advocates of Protection. English Radicals, partly from circumstances, but chiefly from reason, are convinced that Protection, apart from its fiscal imbecilities, involves what is virtually caste government,—that it taxes the whole people for the benefit of a class, and that it defends itself by deceiving the workers, whom it renders poor. They hate it, therefore, for moral, as well as commercial reasons, and can hardly believe in the honesty of a party which, to swell manufacturers' profits, makes the necessities of life—clothes, for instance—so insupportably dear. If the Democrats decide for Free-trade, thousands of Northern Radicals will be unable to separate Republican principles from the fiscal folly which degrades them, and will find themselves wishing that the Democrats may succeed, just long enough, at all events, to sweep away the tariff. They would feel this, even if their interests were not concerned; but of course the North of England holds that American Free-trade would be greatly to the interest of British manufactures. We are not quite sure that it will, having, like Sir Charles Dilke, an idea that the American manufacturers, once brought under the stimulus of Free-trade, may rival us in all the markets of the world, but it is useless to conceal that this is the general English impression. The Radicals, therefore, must lose for a time much of their sympathy with the Republican side.

Upon the whole, and with a reservation upon one point, we think it probable that the Democrats will take this line, and that the Republicans will for a time resist. The Democrats are obviously very sick of the rather trumpery issues they have lately been raising, and of the worn-out men, Tilden and Hendricks, for whom they have been doing battle. They have given up their currency craze as too utterly unpopular. They see that the people, who never like going back upon events, do not really care about the squabble as to the fairness of the election in 1880, and they wish heartily for a new cry, to be fought for by new men. The election of Mr. Carlisle, the Kentuckian Free-trader, as Speaker of the House means that, at least if it means no more. The old men wanted Mr. Randall, who would have stood on the old lines, and the unexpected movement for his rival was not their work, but that of the rank and file. The obscure men from the West and South combined in the caucus held before the vote to defeat the party leaders. It is evident from the success of this combination that a low tariff has great support in the Congressional Districts; and it is most probable, though not proved, that the support is among Democrats nearly universal. A few Eastern Democrats dare not be Free-traders, being pledged to the manufacturers, and a few Pennsylvanians probably believe in Protection as a theory; but the body of the party, Southerners and Western men, have always held that import duties should be limited by the necessities of the Treasury, which just now is crushed and worried with huge surpluses. The Debt is being paid off till the paper currency is contracted, there being no Bonds for the Banks to hold against their issues. The Democrats in the South and West are planters and farmers, and they have therefore no "interests" to make them fancy that dear clothes and dear tools, and dear appliances of all kinds, can be for their benefit. They do not get their living from wages, and are not therefore under the odd illusion that without Protection wages must go down. They can think without bias, and so thinking, they can see that they are taxed, and heavily taxed, in order that the shareholders in manufacturing corporations should earn their large dividends with as little trouble as possible. That is the meaning of Protection to them, and the moment they wake up to the facts we do not doubt that they will vote it down; and that if the Republicans fight on this issue, their opponents will be strong enough to carry both Legislature and Presidency. They cannot carry New England, but the numbers are not there. Apart from the scientific argument, it is not in human nature for farmers whose corn is unprotected to like to pay a fifth of their income for the protection of traders whose rapidly accumulating wealth brings to farmers nothing whatever, except a sense of the increasing social inequality.

But then, will the Republicans resist, when it comes to the point? Prima facie, we should say they would. Their leaders are decidedly Protectionist, and so are the artisans of the Eastern States. They honestly believe, as thousands of Englishmen once believed, that American manufacturers cannot resist the competition of the lower-paid English and Continental artisans; that if the Tariff is reduced, the States will be flooded with cheap foreign goods; and that when this happens, not only will manufacturing dividends be low, but there will be only one work remaining, agriculture, for the people to do. They think a society so uniform and so dependent on the crops, an inferior society, and one too dependent for the amenities of life upon foreign supplies. They think it, moreover, a society which would move Westward too fast, away from the worn-out lands, to the deep, uncropped soils, and regard with horror a change which would deprive them at once of wealth and of all political influence. They are, as Englishmen believe, utterly in the wrong, except as regards some special trades, like that of the bootmakers of Massachusetts; but they are fully convinced, and will be most reluctant, or even unable, to surrender their convictions without at least one stand-up fight. They have plenty of money and hundreds of lecturers, they have the support of their strict party following, which has now ruled for twenty years, they can excite a strong jealousy of English manufactures, and they may appeal to a deep latent feeling in the North that if the Southern Democrats are raised to power again on any pretext whatever, the Union will not be safe. This cry is already rising, and while the men who fought in the war still live, and few of them have yet passed forty-five, it must always be more or less efficacious. The Republicans will not, we think, perceive that the people are against them; and if they do not, they will undoubtedly adhere to Protection until they have been defeated in one pitched battle.

We made, however, one reservation, and it is this. We do not believe that the Republican party is prepared to lose all hold over the West for any cause whatever not positively and visibly a moral one, and, of course, Protectionism is not that. If, therefore, the dislike to high duties infects the whole West, and becomes a passion with the farmers, as it became in England with the operatives, it is more than probable, it is certain, that the Republican leaders will give way, and either offer a compromise, or abandon Protection as hopeless altogether. Such a rapid spread of sound doctrine very rarely happens, but it is always possible, especially in a community constituted like that of the Western States. The farmers there live fairly well, and in good years save money; but they are compelled to very thrifty ways, they pay high for labour, and they watch all outgoings of actual cash with a pitiless economy. They feel the high prices forced on them by Protection very keenly, and feel them every day, for nothing is protected like iron goods and the things they wear. If, therefore, a bad harvest comes, or the Indian competition in the corn market rises to unexpected heights, or Europe should have a bumper crop, or there should occur a financial crash in the West, the whole Western population will feel pressed, and may with one voice demand that the protective tariff be swept away. Then the Republicans will yield. It is not in their leaders to ostracise themselves on a question of duties, nor will they fight, as they did for "hard money," with a feeling that morality as well as the economic future is at stake. They will give way rather than lose their Western following, and we shall see the United States, like England, adopting Free-trade as their permanent fiscal system. Protection, however, dies hard in all countries where it does not include protective duties on corn; it is next to impossible to diffuse abstract economic ideas among great masses of half-educated men; and the notion that the Union, which contains all climates, should be made self-sufficing, a planet by itself, independent of mankind for everything but books, appeals strongly to the American imagination. We look to see Protectionism as a policy die slowly, though the tariff may be swept away by a popular explosion, as the Income-tax was. The people would bear that tax no longer, and it perished, though every economist in the Union was convinced that without it the rich would never pay their fair share to the national taxation. Even here there would have been fluctuations, but that the Protectionists, before they can move a step, must tax the millions' food. The American Protectionists never have had and never can have that difficulty to contend with, and if they could only emancipate clothes and iron, might still retain for their theories, as theories, a long lease of life.

DECLARATIONS OF WAR.

DURING the discussion of last year upon the Channel Tunnel, it was discovered that most civilians in England believed a sudden spring upon the Tunnel to be morally impossible. No nation, it was thought, could be guilty of such a treachery as to make war without declaring it formally, or indeed without long previous warning, unless it was prepared to encounter the distrust or hostility of the civilised world. What the civilised world could do to punish such an outrage was never explained, but the sanguine relied, no doubt, on the magical influence of "opinion," and on some vaguely-remembered traditional principle of international law. Even so able a man as Sir T. Farrer was penetrated by this conviction, and showed, by his questions on the Committee, that he thought any fear of a secret spring without pourparlers an absurd anachronism. It was of the first importance to the settlement of the question that this point should be cleared up, and accordingly, Lieutenant-Colonel F. Maurice, of the Intelligence Department, was ordered to draw up a Report on Declarations of War, which was at first circulated privately to heads of Departments, but has now at last been given to the world. We do not remember ever to have read a document more conclusive. Colonel Maurice disposes at once and for ever of the theory that modern nations hold themselves bound to give formal notice of their intention to make war, even by withdrawing their Embassies, or are accustomed to hold long preliminary pourparlers, or to consider that there is anything wrong, when they have a quarrel on hand, in seizing "material guarantees" for the redress of their real or imaginary grievances. So unfounded is this theory, that previous declarations of war may, if precedent is to govern, be considered irregular, only ten such declarations having been issued in all the wars between 1700 and 1870; while in the present century alone there have been sixty cases of European war unpreceded by any declaration, the tendency, as mechanical improvements advance, being to seize more eagerly on the immense advantages which a surprise offers to the attacking side. Railways and telegraphs offer such opportunities, that it seems to Generals in command monstrous to forego them. "In only the single instance of 1870 is there a case of notice formally sent to the Court of the assailed Power, prior to hostilities on the part of any one of the contending Powers." The regular course has been to attack suddenly, seize some important fortress or some fleet, and then announce to the people of the attacking country that their Sovereign is at war. Thus, in 1801, England destroyed the Danish Fleet off Elsinore, in reprisals for a treaty entered into between Denmark and Czar Paul, without notice of any kind to Copenhagen, the Governor of Elsinore when fire opened having absolutely no information of British intentions. In 1802, Napoleon, without any quarrel with Switzerland, seized Soleure, Zurich, and Berne; and though, no doubt, he was especially unscrupulous, yet on October 5th, 1804, without any warning, the British Fleet seized four Spanish frigates, and Parliament sustained the Ministry, Lord Westmoreland in particular declaring that "war without a previous declaration was neither contrary to the law of nations, nor unprecedented in history." In 1806, Prussia seized Hanover in silence, and her commerce was instantly swept from the seas by England, in reprisals, and also in silence. Napoleon, in 1806, entered Saxony and fought the Prussians while the King of Prussia was expecting his ultimatum. In 1807, the British Government, while negotiating with Constantinople, seized Egypt, then a province of Turkey. In 1807, the British seized the Danish Fleet in the midst of profound peace, because Mr. Canning believed, probably with justice, but without anything like certainty, that if he did not, France might. In 1812, the United States Congress seized all British vessels in harbour, in order that they might not convey news of coming war; and on June 18th declared that "war existed," in order to seize the British West-India Fleet, and the fact of war was not known in England for a month after. In 1816, Portugal, during profound peace, invaded the Spanish Colonies on the Plate; and in 1826, Spain invaded Portugal itself, the Envoy of each Power still remaining in the capital of the other; while Mr. Canning, the instant he heard of the invasion, dispatched troops to Portugal to fight the Spaniards, expressly denying that in doing so he declared war on Spain. In 1827, the British, Russian, and French Fleets destroyed the Turkish Fleet off Navarino, though the Sultan had been explicitly assured that these Powers would not intervene in the war between him and Greece; and in the following year the French, while still at peace with Turkey, seized all the Turkish fortresses in the Morea, and occupied them with 20,000 men. In 1831, both France and England sent fleets to dictate terms to King Miguel in Lisbon, while refusing to declare war; and in 1840, England, Russia, and Austria agreed that Mehemet Ali must be put down without warning; while Thiers, on receipt of the news, urged instant war on England, and resigned because his advice was not accepted. In 1848, the King of Prussia invaded Denmark six days before the Frankfort Assembly authorised him to take up the cause of Schleswig, and the Danish Minister remained in Frankfort three weeks after Holstein had been occupied. In 1850, Lord Palmerston sent a fleet to dictate terms to Athens without any declaration of war, and seized all Greek merchant vessels, while explicitly stating in Parliament that "diplomatic relations between this country and Greece had not been suspended." In 1854, the British Fleet entered the Black Sea with orders to compel the Russian Fleet to return to Sebastopol, before the British Ambassador had left St. Petersburg, or the Russian Ambassador London; and in 1859, Napoleon III. entered Piedmont, before the act which he had said he would consider an Austrian declaration of war, viz., the passage of the Ticino, had been performed. We all remember the Piedmontese march into Naples in 1860, but we do not all remember that Holstein was occupied in 1863 expressly without a declaration of war; and that in 1866, Prince Charles issued a manifesto to the Prussian Army even then in march upon Vienna, saying that,—"To-day I have caused a public declaration to be sent, and to-day we enter the territory of the enemy, in order to defend our own country." We have omitted several cases from the list, but they are not necessary. The truth is that the Powers, England included, have been accustomed hitherto to surprise the enemy, if they could, and that international law does not prohibit the practice, still less lay down any means of enforcing the prohibition. If the French Government intended the conquest of England, it would seize the Tunnel as a material guarantee of its "rights," and then send away the British Ambassador. Europe might pronounce that sharp practice, but Europe would not interfere. Indeed, Europe is growing more accustomed to the idea of surprises, for the subject of rapid mobilisation is incessantly discussed in military journals, and the whole object of that marvellous organisation is to reap the advantage of entering a momentarily defenceless State. A gain of four days may mean the acquisition of a province. There is no reason whatever to believe that either Germany and France, if they had decided on war, would give each other one day's warning.

It did not fall within the province of the Intelligence Department to consider whether the circumstances of modern life make surprise more difficult, but it is worth while to discuss that question for a moment. We cannot see that any improvement of modern days tends greatly to alter the old conditions, while two or three of them make surprises very much easier. Mobilisation has been reduced to a science. Armies have become so large that heavy corps d'armée can be collected without exciting remark, while provisions and munitions can be sent after them by railway with a previously unknown facility. Staff secrets are more rigidly kept than ever, while the collection of a Fleet at a specified date, at a point known only to the Admiral, can be reduced by the use of steam to a mathematical certainty. There are telegraph wires, it is true, but a State intending war would not trust Baron Reuter, and all telegraphs are at Government disposal. We can see no reason why a French President should not collect 30,000 men at Boulogne for some manœuvres, order a Fleet to rendezvous there silently, and reach the British coast before a single Englishman was aware that the French Government, in consequence, possibly, of agreement with some other Power, or of news received from Chinese waters, had suddenly become hostile. Certainly, if France, when intending war, could surprise us, she would, and her whole people would consider the dispensing with declarations an act of adroit vigour. We should pronounce it "treacherous," but that would not help us much; while French statesmen would argue that, with the whole future of their country at stake and a great war to wage, they "could not stop to discuss the least settled and most obscure propositions of international law."

THE AUSTRALIAN CONFERENCE.

THE Australian Republic begins its career by proclaiming the "Monroe Doctrine." There can be little doubt that the Federal Representative Committee, which met at Sydney on November 28th, will succeed in devising a plan for the Federation of the Colonies into a single Dominion, though they may be compelled by fiscal and geographical difficulties to make the area of action of the central power at first unduly narrow. Still, the Delegates, who are all the ruling men of their respective Colonies, have already passed unanimous resolutions which practically bind them to create a Central Government, controlling foreign policy, armaments, the militia law, and, we should imagine, as necessarily connected with defence, all means of inter-communication. This Government will probably be supported, like the Imperial Government of Germany, by fixed contributions; and will be guided, like that of Austria, by "Delegations,"—that is, in English phraseology, by a small Senate elected by the Legislatures. Most of these things follow almost of necessity from the Resolutions, which call upon the British Government to act in certain directions, and promise it, if it does so act, that it shall be sustained by the united strength of the federated Pacific Colonies.

The acts indicated are of the highest importance. Not only is the British Government requested to annex all Eastern New Guinea—to be governed, it is understood, as a "Territory" of the Australian Dominion—but it is asked to negotiate with France for the acquisition of the New Hebrides—now declared neutral ground—and for the cessation of the transport of convicts to any island of the South Pacific; and is informed that, in the judgment of the Representatives of Australia, "the further acquisition of dominion in the Pacific south of the Equator by any foreign Power would be highly detrimental to the safety and well-being of the British possessions in Australasia, and injurious to the interests of the Empire." The Government is, in fact, asked to secure to the Australian Dominion, now about to be founded, a monopoly of territorial extension in the Antipodean world, a position in the South Pacific identical with that claimed by the United States upon the two American Continents.

The policy announced is one which will rather startle the Colonial Office, and may even try the nerve of Parliament; but we do not know, if Australia strongly federates herself, that it is unreasonable. The Delegates assembled in Conference are only anticipating history a little. The Dominion already contains as many people as did the United States when they set up for themselves, and probably disposes of more wealth; and it will, within fifty years, if no political convulsion occurs, be a Republic with twenty millions of people and fifty millions of revenue. Such a Republic, inhabited by vigorous and prosperous Englishmen, accustomed to freedom and to maritime enterprise, will unquestionably, from its geographical position, maintain a powerful Fleet, and will be able to possess itself, if it pleases, of the whole South Pacific. Neither France nor any other Power could dream of fighting Australia in those waters, and for any Power to settle there would be only to court ultimate defeat. It will be well, therefore, if it is possible, to prohibit annexations in advance; and with Australia so strongly moved, it may be possible, though the negotiations may be at once difficult and dangerous. The French mania for Colonial extension is sure to pass, as it always has done; and her desire to transport irreconcilable criminals will not survive, when it is found that if they escape, Australia will invariably send them back to France. At all events, we and the world now know what the foreign policy of Australia is, and in what direction, if we wish to keep the Southern Colonies, our own policy must press, and that knowledge must be an important factor in all negotiations. New Guinea, it is clear, must be annexed; France must be compelled to keep her pledge as to the New Hebrides; and for the rest, we and the remainder of the world must remember that, long before the present generation has died out, Australians will be able to defend their own ideas in arms, and that the quality in Australians which differentiates them alike from Englishmen and Americans is a certain rapidity of decision. A secluded world feels checks from the outside very little. This idea of Federation, for example, has ripened, so to speak, in a day.

MR. CHILDERS ON STATE ECONOMY.

EVERY good has its drawback, even wise Finance. One would think, reasoning a priori, that wise finance could not possibly produce any mischief; but it does, at all events, greatly increase one evil. It is not the main cause of the declining desire for retrenchment and economy in State expenditure, but it is a principal one. The national taxes have been so carefully adjusted to the shoulders which bear them, they press so lightly on the springs of prosperity and they fall so little on the struggling classes, that except once a year, when three households in every hundred see the Income-tax paper, they are almost forgotten. All householders, including even the rich, fret under the rates, which fall on the professional classes, who are over-housed, and on the lower shopkeepers, whose lives are a struggle, with irritating weight; but not one man in twenty thinks about or calculates the pressure of "the Queen's taxes." As Parliament spends them, and not the rates, the discussions about them are felt to be dull and unattractive. There is no general eagerness in the House of Commons for reductions. The party leaders do not think of moving abstract resolutions against the Treasury. The demagogues leave the subject alone, or attack classes through talk about pensions and honorary colonelcies. No one takes up the rôle of Joseph Hume, and if he did, he would not be as sure as Joseph was of catching the public ear. The Treasury itself, instead of fighting for its grants, and learning to regard the advocates of economy as personal enemies, is compelled to protect the public, and dreads the constant accusation of stinginess, as it formerly dreaded that of squandering. Above all, no Member endangers his popularity with his electors by proposing expenditure. Whether he asks the House to give more pensions, or more grants-in-aid to Ireland, or a sum of money for old manuscripts, or a remission of revenue, he makes his proposal with an eye to the House alone, quite fearless of any shower of remonstrances from angry constituents. If Shapira had really found an older Deuteronomy, he would have found a Member also to ask £100,000 for its purchase; and that Member would have been resisted mainly by Mr. Childers and Mr. Courtney, and would not have been turned out of his seat. Officers of the Army and Navy in particular are held unaccountable for waste to such a degree that, as Mr. Childers told his constituents at Pontefract in his lively speech of Wednesday, in the past three years 556 proposals for expenditure have been pressed by them upon the Exchequer, and only twenty proposals for economy. And though he did not say so, we greatly doubt if the disproportion between the efforts to increase and the attempts to reduce civil expenditure is very much less. At all events, the Civil Estimates are always going up—quite rightly, in most instances—and nobody fights against them; while the plans for the reduction of Debt have grown quite to appreciable proportions, with no more opposition than is embodied in a growl that we are doing a great deal for posterity, which has done nothing for us.

We cannot say we like this condition of opinion. It will favour some day or other an extravagant Chancellor of the Exchequer, or a Premier who thinks, as M. de Freycinet did, on less plausible grounds, that with the Debt disappearing and Two and a Half per Cents. at par, the waste of a few score millions in gigantic philanthropies or half-thought-out experiments cannot matter seriously. It does already encourage very loose thinking about the limits of State action, and about the aid which the Treasury could lend to improve the condition of the poor,—looseness which, when the rural householders come crashing into the arena, may have perceptible effects upon the working of the Poor Law. It does weaken the hands of those statesmen who see that, well adjusted as taxation is, the total amount deducted from voluntary expenditure, and therefore from the wages fund, is very large; and, above all, it does prevent that form of penuriousness which historians are convinced tends to the efficiency of States. It is not the Bourbon, with his millions of pensions, but the Hohenzollern, with his grudging allowances to his servants, who is well served. It is a hard thing to say, but it is a truth that a well-paid Army is an army cumbered with impedimenta; that a well-paid Navy,—well, no one ever heard of one; that well-paid diplomats think of social rather than diplomatic successes; that under-paid civilians in fourth-floor lodgings do not grumble, if they work sixty hours a week. Hard management helps efficiency, and the Prussian bureaucracy works on crusts, as the English Civil Service, though it, too, in its way, is effective, does not work on full dinners. We should like to see the cheese-parers in the House again, and this the more because we are convinced that Democracy, in countries naturally wealthy, has a distinct inclination to waste. Nobody is more careful of his cash than an American freeholder, but his representatives in Congress positively play chuck-farthing with millions, till the officials are compelled to tell them, as they have done this week, that it is not the business of the National Government to raise revenues to be scattered in grants among the States, and to suggest that, with the Navy in ruins for want of "appropriations," it is not wise to offer premiums of millions to those States in which the largest number of children cannot read. There really was a danger for a minute of that lunatic proposal being accepted by the House of Representatives. No one is quite so mean as the average French peasant; yet in France, though the Government, warned at last by its difficulty in keeping down the floating Debt, begins to contend with the Deputies, nothing can resist the tendency to spend. The transaction of Tuesday was exactly typical. The peasantry wish education to be free, so school fees have been abolished by a vote. The loss ought to have been made good by the Communes, but as that might have made Deputies unpopular, the majority of the Chamber asked for a State grant, and, after a fierce fight, this was whittled down to £560,000 a year, and conceded. The Communal Councils were not contented, however, or the Deputies, so on Tuesday they carried, by 260 to 240, an increase of the grant to £760,000 a year, the peasants thus saving their school fees, and getting an allowance in all from the Treasury of 2s. per house in addition. That is only a sample of what is going on in France, and what will go on here, if, when the suffrage is extended, we cannot revive the old, healthy grudge against Treasury expenditure. In this very Department of Education, it would be most popular to waste millions, if they did not come from the rates; and there are 20,000 influential persons in daily intercourse with electors and electors' wives whose direct interest it is that the State should be "liberal," and who, moreover, conscientiously believe that its "liberality" must do good. We should like to know what sort of a grant in aid of rates Mr. Bromley-Davenport would think extravagant, or why we are so certain that the rural householder will not agree with that very pleasant story-teller. Local people still think the Treasury a sort of oil-well, a free-flowing fountain of wealth, issuing no one knows whence, and resent an economy as they would the withdrawal of a right of way. Mr. Childers fought the local magnates the other day to save £30,000 a year in the collection of the Income-tax; but they thought £30,000 mattered nothing to the Treasury and a great deal to their patronage, and he was conspicuously defeated. He will be defeated a good many times yet, if the prevalent disregard for expenditure, so long as new taxes are not suggested, is not changed. The money flows in so easily that the people feel like speculators who have "struck oil," as if expenditure came from some place outside their own pockets.

So strongly do we dread this tendency, that we should be by no means sorry to see the Estimates referred to a Grand Committee, even if it were necessary, to prevent the exhaustion of the House, to reduce that Grand Committee to thirty. Thirty men, all interested, and all familiar with the subject, would subject the Estimates to a searching criticism which would be felt even more by the spending Departments than by the spendthrift Members. The items as well as the totals would be examined, a group of economists would be formed, and we should be spared the discreditable spectacle of Estimates voted en bloc in such a hurry, that if Mr. Childers had inserted half a million to be sent to Rome as Peter's Pence, nobody would have perceived the audacity. We suppose the House is for the moment overloaded, especially if the Municipal Bill is to go to a Grand Committee; but ultimately, if the Treasury is to be protected, we must come either to something of this kind, or to a reference of the Estimates to a Standing Committee on Finance. At present, the whole work is left to the Treasury, with the additional aggravation that the Representatives, who ought to be the checking power, wish it to spend more, not less. It is as if the Board of Directors were left to their own discretion, subject only to criticism from shareholders who ask in an angry tone why the business has been so advantageously managed. The natural relations of the Treasury and the nation are topsyturvy, and we have the Chancellor of the Exchequer with tears in his eyes at the incessant attacks on him for saving the people's money with such disgraceful assiduity.

THE CASE OF PRIESTMAN versus THOMAS.

THE case of "Priestman v. Thomas" has one plain moral, —do not presume on success. It seems probable that if Thomas had not forgotten this useful rule, he might still have been enjoying £17,000, instead of the prospect of being put on his trial for fraudulently manufacturing a will. Down to a certain point, everything had gone fairly well with him. He had not been able to secure all that Whalley had apparently left him, but he had secured enough to give him that modest competence—that happy mean between poverty and riches—which in all ages the wisest of mankind have most desired for themselves. Out of £60,000, he had kept £17,000—not a bad fortune for an ex-railway porter, not wholly free from the suspicion of having used undue influence to divert the testator's bounty to himself. In an evil moment, he allowed his natural exultation to get the better of him, and waved a piece of blue paper at the plaintiff, as he drove by his window. It can hardly have seemed a very great imprudence, but it had serious consequences. There had once been—or Priestman thought there had—another will of Whalley's in existence, under which he would have taken some £45,000, and as soon as he saw this blue paper flourished by Thomas, he jumped to the conclusion that here was the missing will. That, too, had been written on blue paper, and what more likely than that Thomas, having succeeded in setting up a false will, should, when he thought himself safe from detection, have pointed in derision to the genuine document? Priestman was thus set on the train of inquiry, which has ended in a verdict by which the will proved by Thomas is declared to be a forgery. Whether what Thomas waved from the window was really the "blue" will, or some quite unimportant piece of blue paper, is nothing to the purpose. The intention was arrogant, whatever the act might have been. There is something finer, no doubt, in the conception of showing the genuine will, at what the possessor thought a safe distance, to the man who had just surrendered all claim to the bulk of the fortune he would have taken under it; but even if it were nothing more than a piece of common blue paper that happened to lie handy, Thomas need not have brandished it in this unpleasantly conspicuous manner. Brandish it, however, he did, and from that moment Priestman seems never to have wanted any aid that he could desire in the way of amateur detection.

In the first instance, the obstacles to be surmounted were very great. No doubt was ever thrown on the genuineness of the testator's signature to the "white" will. James Whalley had plainly put his name at the bottom, whether what went before it had been tampered with or not. Possibly, all the unprofessional ingenuity which was at work would have failed to get over these outworks of Thomas's case, had it not been for his own injudicious economy. He had made certain promises to the two men who had witnessed the "white" will, and had not kept them. Now, nobody cares to witness a forged will out of mere good-fellowship. If you consent to be partaker of another man's sin, you naturally look to be partaker of his profits. Thomas thought this expectation an unreasonable one, and he gave effect to his conviction by keeping back the witnesses' fee. From that moment everything went wrong with him. A great deal was told that he never meant to have been told, and what was told led up to much that was not told. In the long trial that ended on Tuesday, Priestman has established his contention to the satisfaction alike of the jury and of the judge.

Probably, Thomas's error lay in trusting too entirely to the effect of probate. If Whalley's will could once be safely deposited in the Registry, Priestman might wonder as much as he liked. The law would have spoken, and his suspicions would worry no one but himself. But for this belief, he would have been at more pains to support the theory that Whalley had quarrelled with Priestman. If he had not quarrelled with him, the "white" will disposed of his money in a most unlikely way. Priestman was Whalley's natural son, and more than one will had been made in his favour; why should he at the last moment have left the bulk of his property to another man? Thomas's attention, however, was so fixed upon getting a false will executed that he did not trouble himself to account for the suddenness with which Whalley was alleged to have changed his mind. The device he adopted to get the will he wanted substituted for the will he did not want was exceedingly ingenious. He induced Whalley to dictate a pencil letter to Priestman, and then to write his name at the bottom in ink. Here, then, was the signature he wanted. He had now the most essential part of a will, and it only remained to add the incidental details relating to the distribution of the property. The pencil writing was rubbed out, and what purported to be Whalley's last will written in ink above his signature. Possibly, Whalley thought that by not imitating the signature he was protecting himself against a charge of forgery; at all events, he knew that it would be the signature that would be most closely scrutinised, and if that was beyond doubt genuine, it was not likely that suspicion would go any further. Nor but for the quarrel with the witnesses—or rather, with one of the witnesses, for the other sided with Thomas—would it have gone any further. The theory that the signature to the "white" will had originally been affixed to a letter written in pencil, and that upon this letter, as on a palimpsest, the "white" will had been written, rested, in the first instance, on the testimony of the repentant or dissatisfied accomplice.

When once the theory had been set up, however, confirmatory evidence was not long wanting. First, there was the will itself. Though the signature was beyond question, there were undoubtedly traces of pencil-marks underlying the ink in which the will was written, and these pencil-marks bore out the explanation given by the witness. They were in Thomas's handwriting, and the words that could be decyphered seemed to have formed part of a letter addressed to Priestman. Thomas seems to have thought that these very facts might bring him safety. Why should he have left this damning record against himself, when it was in his power to destroy it? A man who is rubbing out pencil-marks as a preliminary to giving himself a fortune could hardly be so careless as to leave whole words still visible. The great difficulty in the way of this theory was the fact that the "white" will had never passed out of Thomas's own keeping, until it had been placed in the Registry of Wills at Hereford; and under any circumstances, the Jury would probably have refused to believe that the will had been tampered with, and the suspicious pencil-traces introduced while the will was in official custody. As it turned out, however, they were not left without a perfectly adequate explanation of the facts. Mr. Holmes, the Queen's Librarian, states that pencil-marks are not completely erased by bread-crumbs. What happens is that the fibres of the paper are raised up so as to cover them. After a time, they get smoothed down again, and then the concealed marks come partially to light once more. Further and most complete corroboration to Priestman's case was furnished by a letter which his sister had received from Whalley, written a month after the date of the "white" will, and telling her that he had left all his money to Priestman, and none to her. Thomas maintained that this letter was forged, but in favour of this theory he had nothing to show, except that the letter had not been produced until late in the day. This, however, was explained in its turn by the fact that the letter contained a reference to an incident only known to Whalley and his daughter, which she would naturally desire to keep concealed. The whole story was thus unravelled, and the Jury had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the "white" will was Thomas's composition, though the signature to it was Whalley's. It is not a pleasant story, for every one concerned in it seems to have been quite ready to suspect every one else of perjury and fraud, without apparently there being any antecedent improbability in the suspicion. But there is no reason to doubt that the verdict given by the jury describes with substantial accuracy what actually took place.

THE TENNYSON PEERAGE.

IT seems tolerably clear that, whatever may be the actual result, the Poet-Laureate has been assured of the wish of the Crown to raise him to the dignity of a Peerage. We conclude, therefore, that the Prime Minister, on whom must devolve the duty of making such a recommendation as this to the Queen, entertains the view that the House of Lords should be a sort of reservoir of all the dignities of the nation, even without relation to any special fitness for the particular functions—the political functions—which are expected of its members. The late Mr. Bagehot used always to speak of the Throne and the House of Lords as the ornamental and dignified parts of the Constitution,—those parts of the Constitution which most impress the imagination of the people, and give them a certain pride in the national unity and life in virtue of the external magnificence with which it moves. Perhaps Mr. Gladstone holds that the addition of any really great national figure to the House of Lords,—whether it happen to be one distinguished on the political side or not,—adds to the scenic impressiveness of the House of Lords, and to the respect felt by the nation for its collective influence. We are far from denying that there may be something to be said for that view. It is certain that a good deal of just national pride in the possession of such a poet as Mr. Tennyson is felt, and also that Mr. Tennyson has a keen feeling for the statelier aspects of Constitutional liberty, and has given expression to that class of emotions in some of the finest verse of the last half-century. That he is one of our great national dignities, we should be the last to question. And yet we do question very greatly whether his accession to the Peerage would add to the weight of the Peerage, and, still more, whether it would not to some extent detract from the dignity which at present unquestionably attaches to his own name.

The truth is, that the dignity attaching to the name of a great poet, like the dignity attaching to the name of a great saint, has something spiritual about it, which does not seem to accord well with the kind of respect which the conferring of a Peerage is capable of expressing. We do not in the least mean to assert that there is anything necessarily inconsistent between poetry and a title. There are several poets, including one great poet, who have been Peers, and who have not been less esteemed as poets for their Peerage. Lord Houghton's poetry and Lord Lytton's novels did not fall in public estimation because their authors accepted a seat in the House of Lords, but then both Lord Houghton and Lord Lytton were made Peers chiefly on the strength of their political achievements and their social influence. Mr. Tennyson, if he is to be a Peer, will become a Peer solely because he has fired the imagination of the English people, and that is not the kind of distinction which seems to us to be at all naturally expressed by ranking him amongst the Barons or Viscounts of England. If Charles Lamb had been a man of ever so good a fortune, no one would have thought of making a Peer of him on the strength of his wit, his humour, and the delightful vagaries of his lively fancy. There is something incommensurable between the literary qualities of such a man as "Elia" and a Peerage; and the same remark applies, though probably in a less degree, to Tennyson himself. That the author of "In Memoriam" or "Break, break, break, break," should be made a Peer because he possesses the great poetic gifts needful to produce those marvellous productions, seems to us almost as incongruous as it would have been to confer a Peerage on Charles Wesley for writing some of the most beautiful hymns in the English language, on Wordsworth for his "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality," on Keats for his "Hyperion," and on Shelley for his "Skylark" and his "Adonais." There was dignity in all these poets, and great dignity in Wordsworth, but not the kind of dignity that you could aptly express by summoning him to take his seat beside the Earl of Lonsdale on the benches of the House of Lords. So far as we know, this is the first case in which poetry has been thought the proper title-deed for a Peerage. Doubtless, a baronetcy was given to Sir Walter Scott in some degree, we suppose, for his literary achievements; but even that was not given him till he had become a man of great social influence in Scotland,—a lawyer and sheriff of no small repute,—and till it was known that he attached at least as much importance to founding a family and getting together a landed estate, as he did to the literary achievements by which he had been enabled to compass these ends. Scott was already a magnate before he received the baronetcy,—it was because he was a magnate that the offer of the baronetcy seemed appropriate, not because he was a poet and a novelist. Our own view is that a Peerage is an appropriate distinction only for those who, in some degree, already wield and deserve political influence, and not as a mark of popular reverence for any qualities, whatever they may be, which justly deserve reverence. Keble deserved reverence for the qualities which enabled him to write "The Christian Year," but no one would have felt it a natural and fitting way of expressing that reverence to have raised him to the House of Lords. No doubt, there are certain qualities of poetic imagination,—the statelier qualities, we mean,—which seem less out of keeping with a coronet than devotional poetry like Keble's, and we are far from denying that Mr. Tennyson displays them. Still, make what you can of the magnificence of his verse, and it is not a kind of magnificence which seems to be in sufficient harmony with worldly distinction, to admit of expressing your respect for it by conferring a great worldly distinction. Make out what case we may, a Peerage conferred for poetic achievements alone will remain a 'faucy peerage,' which will seem not only to sit uneasily on a great poet, but to fit awkwardly into the entourage of the House of Lords. The King of Prussia might almost as well have made Kant a Graf for writing the "Kritik of Pure Reason," as the Queen confer a Peerage on Mr. Tennyson for singing his elegy on the death of Arthur Hallam, and writing the noble series of poems called "The Idyls of the King." Whatever distinction the Poet-Laureate may confer on the House of Peers, we fear it must be an incongruous distinction, like a patch of rich Oriental workmanship let into the centre of a solid Brussels carpet, or the illumination of a mediæval missal embodied in the pages of Caldecott. That Tennyson would be a great ornament to the House of Lords, we are far from denying. But he will be an incongruous ornament,—such an ornament as a wreath of roses round the brow of the Governor of the Bank of England, or a spiritual smile on the countenance of a London Lord Mayor.

THE COMPARATIVE POPULARITY OF LITERARY MEN.

THE Journal of Education recently offered a prize to that one amongst its readers who should give the best list of the first ten among living English men of letters, with special mention of the literary work which is supposed to constitute the chief title to the place assigned to them, the prize to be given on the judgment of Mr. Cotter Morison, certainly an excellent judge of English style, and himself a writer of great ability and no little charm. More than 500 readers of that journal,—no doubt, belonging in general to a special class, the class of Teachers,—have sent in replies; and the voting shows, on the whole, very great impartiality, and a considerable feeling for style, but it is certainly more or less biased by the didactic leanings of the class to whom appeal was made. Here are the ten who are the most popular of living men of letters, as appreciated by 500 readers of the Journal of Education, with the names of the works in right of which the place assigned to them is given:—

	No. of Votes.
1. Tennyson	501	{ "In Memoriam" (257). "Idylls of the King" (159).
2. Ruskin	462	{ "Modern Painters" (238). "Stones of Venice" (125).
3. Matthew Arnold ...	453	{ "Literature and Dogma" (137). "Essays on Criticism" (89). "Poems" (50).
4. Robert Browning ...	448	{ "The Ring and the Book" (253). "Paracelsus" (58). "Men and Women" (37).
5. J. A. Froude	391	"History of England."
6. A. C. Swinburne ...	262	"Atalanta in Calydon."
7. E. A. Freeman	241	"History of the Norman Conquest."
8. Herbert Spencer ...	235	"Study of Sociology."
9. Cardinal Newman	192	"Apologia pro Vita Sua."
10. John Morley	187	"Life of Cobden."

We should have thought it clear that Mr. Spencer, great as his influence as a thinker has been, has not gained his position by literary qualities, properly so called, at all; while Mr. Freeman, again, is much more of an historian than of a writer, much greater in learning and in judgment than in charm of style. We are astonished to see Sir Henry Taylor,—the author of "Philip van Artevelde,"—so low on the list; he stands only thirty-first, and received only twenty votes; whereas, in our opinion, he should certainly have stood sixth, and perhaps even higher. Even the winner of the prize does not include Sir Henry Taylor's name amongst the first ten, Mr. Cotter Morison having awarded the prize to a gentleman whose list is as follows:—

1. Browning	"Dramatic Lyrics."
2. Tennyson	"In Memoriam."
3. Swinburne	"Atalanta in Calydon."
4. Newman	"Apologia pro Vita Sua."
5. Ruskin	"Modern Painters."
6. Matthew Arnold	"Empedocles on Etna."
7. W. Morris	"Life and Death of Jason."
8. John Morley	"Voltaire."
9. Lecky	"History of Rationalism in Europe."
10. E. A. Freeman	"History of the Norman Conquest."

It is curious, too, that not ten votes have been given for any single woman, though in Mrs. Oliphant we have a novelist of great genius, whose history of English literature at the close of the eighteenth and the opening of the nineteenth century contains many chapters of singular brilliance, and whose mystical little tale, "A Beleaguered City," is a prose poem as original in conception as it is exquisite in execution. For our own parts, we confidently expect that Mrs. Oliphant will be put by the literary judgment of the future among the ten first writers now living, unequal as much of her work has undoubtedly been. It is significant, too, when such writers as Mr. Smiles and Mr. G. A. Sala appear on the list of those who have at least ten supporters, to note the complete absence of the name of so original a poet as Mr. Buchanan,—though he has done nothing recently worthy of his genius,—of so fine a dramatist as Mr. Aubrey De Vere, whose "Alexander the Great" will be read and admired when many of these popular favourites are forgotten; of a writer so full of the aroma of poetical feeling and refined knowledge as Dean Church; of so trenchant a controversialist and the master of so keen an invective as Goldwin Smith.

All these omissions surprise us, and yet, on the whole, we are better pleased with the voting than we should have supposed it possible that we should be, and have only this general fault to find, that the choice of the special books on which the place assigned is founded, looks to us not unfrequently to imply that the voters relied on the book which had made most stir in the world, rather than on the book which they would have chosen for themselves, had they really known thoroughly the author for whom they were voting. Take Cardinal Newman, whose name we should have certainly put immediately after Tennyson's, even if Tennyson's great superiority as a poet had put it quite beyond question that one who is a great poet, and nothing else, should stand first in letters. Both the prize-winner and the popular vote base Cardinal Newman's claims on his "Apologia pro Vita Sua." Well, no doubt the Cardinal is best known by that frank and fascinating book, but no one who knows his writings as a whole would think of regarding it as his most marvellous literary achievement. Some would say that his volumes of "Oxford Sermons" contained the noblest passages he had ever written; some would pick out that strange and beautiful poem, "The Dream of Gerontius," as the one in which he touched the highest mark; some would find in the caustic irony and cogent logic of "The Lectures to Anglicans,"—lectures concerning the true drift of the Puseyite movement,—the greatest feat of literary skill he ever accomplished; while one or two, including the present writer, would find in that brilliant and pathetic story of martyrdom, "Callista," the most substantial proof both of Dr. Newman's marvellous imaginative power and of the exquisite tenderness of his devotional genius. But hardly any one, we think, who knows the Cardinal's writings well, would hold that in his "Apology" for his own life, masterly as it was, he displayed his highest powers, unless it were in the piercing sarcasm of that imaginary dialogue with Canon Kingsley, which, with singular self-restraint, he has excluded from the later editions of the book. Again, how singular is the voting on Matthew Arnold's works. To put his "Literature and Dogma" above his "Poems," or even above his "Essays in Criticism," seems to us to put his most conspicuous failure above a conspicuous success. Even those who grant Mr. Arnold his virtual denial of the truth of the Bible, as many, no doubt, of the voters would grant it, cannot maintain, with the smallest hope of being supported by the judgment of the thinking world, that his pleas for that residuum of significance which he insists on assigning to the Bible, will hold water for a moment. To empty the most personal religion in the world of all its personality, and then to assure men that nothing is changed, that it is left more solid than before, is the enterprise of a conjuror, not of a man of letters. And of this we feel absolutely confident, that even if the negative school to which Mr. Arnold belongs, could triumph, that school will regard with a half-pathetic scorn Mr. Arnold's effort to save the teaching of a book which he has done his very best to undermine. We can only account for the popularity of "Literature and Dogma," by supposing that amongst the class of Teachers it had made many converts, who began with imagining that they were only asked to abjure dogmatism, and who did not find out that a complete abjuring of dogmatism means also a complete abjuring of faith, till they had been conquered by the irony and the unwavering arrogance of the book itself. Even the prize-winner's choice of "Empedocles on Etna" as Mr. Arnold's greatest work, though it shows indefinitely more insight than the popular vote for "Literature and Dogma," betrays an unfortunate leaning to the didactic side of Mr. Arnold's mind. "Empedocles on Etna" contains two or three lyrics of unsurpassed beauty, but the argumentative scepticism which constitutes the bulk of the poem is not always poetical, and certainly does not approach the level of such poems as "The Scholar Gipsy" and "Thyrsis," "The Grande Chartreuse," and the two noble poems to the "Author of Obermann."

The winner of the prize is wise in placing Mr. Browning's "Dramatic Lyrics" at the head of his poetical achievements; but not wise, we take it, in placing a poet who delights in harshness of construction, in a shorthand style, and in abruptness for its own sake, above the greatest master of form whom a self-conscious age ever produced. Again, did the unanimous popular vote which declared Mr. Browning's "Ring and the Book" his greatest work, really represent the adhesion of the readers' own imaginations to that most unequal poem,—a poem containing some of Mr. Browning's highest flights of genius, and a good deal, too, of his grittiest and most head-splitting work, the Roman lawyers, for instance, being as nearly unreadable as verse ever was in this world,—or did it only represent the satisfaction with which these readers regarded the achievement of a considerable feat in the reading and the interpreting and the admiring of a work of undoubted power, but equally undoubted difficulty? The decided preference for "Paracelsus" over "Men and Women" looks like it. "Paracelsus" is a hard nut to crack, and Teachers like a hard nut that they have cracked successfully. "Men and Women" are as much pleasanter than "Paracelsus," as poems, as a gallop in a meadow is more delightful than threading your way through a labyrinth. But then, no doubt, the intellectual triumph of threading the labyrinth successfully is much greater than the triumph of galloping swiftly over the soft turf. We almost wonder, seeing the preferences actually expressed, that "Sordello" itself did not get a considerable vote from the scholastic readers of the Journal of Education. Again, it would seem to us surprising that so fresh and fascinating a book as "Eothen" should not have been mentioned by the twenty-seven supporters of Kinglake, in preference—as regards literary style,—to the "Invasion of the Crimea," did we not reflect that "Eothen" is one of the kind of books which is alien to the didactic mind,—nay, which that type of mind regards as flippant. For ourselves, we regard "Eothen" as the most delightfully dashing book which any living author has contributed to English literature.

Still, take the voting as a whole, and we regard it as very creditable to the constituency who produced it. We doubt whether any other five hundred men in England,—unless selected specially by name for the purpose by a very good judge of critical ability,—would have made so sound and so catholic a choice as these, who are, we presume, the more energetic amongst the readers of the Journal of Education.

THE CLERICAL CASTE IN SCOTLAND.

THE deaths, a short time ago, of such prominent leaders of the Free Church of Scotland as Dr. Begg and Sir Henry Moncreiff must have suggested this, among many questions,—Is it not the Clerical rather than the Aristocratic caste that really governs, and long has governed, the Scotch Democracy? Dr. Begg belonged to the class familiarly and affectionately known in the North as "Sons of the Manse." Although Sir Henry Moncreiff was only the grandson of the Manse, his father having been an eminent Judge, the bluest clerical blood in Scotland flowed in his veins. His grandfather, popularly known as "Sir Harry," was in his time recognised as the stoutest advocate of the special doctrines of Andrew Melville; spiritual independence viewed as an ecclesiastical dogma, rather than as a party rallying-cry, is less identified with the name of Chalmers than with his. The late leader of Free-Church Conservatism was the seventh Member and the third baronet of his house who has devoted himself to the work of the Presbyterian ministry. His father and his brother, whose successful legal careers seem, at first sight, inroads upon the Moncreiff clerical tradition, belong to the order of laymen—laymen in the popular sense, not the academic—who are more ecclesiastical than ecclesiastics themselves. The elder judge played a great part in the "Ten Years' Conflict" that led to the formation of the Free Church; the younger has long exercised a guiding influence in that Church, which has now reached middle-age. So far as appearances show, too, the leadership of the Free Church is likely to remain with this caste. Principal Rainy, the successor both of Cunningham and Candlish, and whom the deaths of Dr. Begg and Sir Henry Moncreiff have left without a rival for the leadership of the Assembly of his denomination, is a grandson of the Manse. Dr. Robertson Smith, who led the New Learning or young Free-Church Party till he was ejected from his Chair, and Professor Candlish, who has taken his place, are sons of the Manse. The influence of the clerical caste in Scotland is not confined to the Free Church. Probably no names of clergymen of the present-day Church of Scotland are better known on this side of the Tweed than those of the late Dr. Norman Macleod, Principal Tulloch, and Dr. Herbert Story, the biographer of "Cardinal" Carstairs; all three are sons of the Manse. Broad-Churchism in the second of the Dissenting bodies of Scotland, the United Presbyterian Church, suggests the names of two clergymen, also clergymen's sons, Mr. George Gilfillan and Mr. David Macrae. Nor is it in the Church alone that the son of the Manse attains a position of eminence or leadership. The present Lord-Advocate and Solicitor-General, at once the chief Scotch officers of the Crown and the leaders of the Scotch Commons in Parliament, are sons of ministers of the Church of Scotland. So is the Lord President of the Court of Session, the first Judge in Scotland. So are some of his colleagues; of the second Judge, the Lord Justice-Clerk, it is enough to say that he is the brother of Sir Henry Moncreiff. So is the representative of Scotland in the Court of Appeal, who also held the office of Lord-Advocate before his appointment. The legal power in Scotland, which at one time was firmly lodged in such old families as the Hopes, the Boyles, and the Dundases, would almost seem to have passed into the hands of the sons of the Manse.

The influence of the Clerical caste in Scotland is not an affair of to-day, though, perhaps, it never was so marked or so widely extended as it is to-day. The Cooks and Hills of a generation or two generations ago were as influential as the Macleods and Tullochs are now; by sheer intellectual force they stormed the best endowed pulpits, secured the best Chairs, and, obtaining the Clerkships of the General Assembly, acquired a preponderating share in the government of their Church. There was a grim truth as well as a sly humour in the pun attributed by tradition to the poor licentiate who, finding that his professional fate virtually depended on a member of the ruling clerical family of the time, before whom he had to preach, "gave out" as the first psalm of his service, that beginning, "I to the Hills will lift mine eyes, from whence doth come mine aid." The Free Church is too young a body to have its clerical families; the Moncreiffs belong to the ante-Disruption period. But Presbyterian secession boasts, and justly boasts, of its generations of erudite and Evangelical Browns, that flowered into the delicate humour and pathos of the author of "Rab and his Friends" and "Marjorie Fleming." Even the Scotch Episcopal Church has had its Forbeses; John Skinner, besides giving his country "Tullochgorum," gave his Church two Bishops of note. Among Scotch clerical families, that of the Erskines held a remarkable place. Different branches of it figured both in the Church and in the Dissenting bodies, agreeing, however, in holding fast by Evangelical theology; and they were connected by blood with the legal and aristocratic brothers, Thomas and Henry Erskine, who were not only the leaders of the English and Scotch Bars in their time, but Liberals and Reformers before their time. Finally, the Erskines found their way into literature; the subtle spirituality of Thomas Erskine of Linlathen is quite as remarkable a product of Scotch Evangelicalism as the humour and the pathos of John Brown. The sons of the Manse of fifty or a hundred years ago did not, perhaps, so distinguish themselves at the Bar as they do now, although, to mention one remarkable case of such success, the son of Blair of "The Grave" became Lord President of the Court of Session. But they played a prominent part in literature, philosophy, science, in whatever, indeed, gave Scotland a special reputation in their day and generation. Thomas Reid, the true representative, in spite of Hamilton, of the Scottish school of philosophy, was a son of the Manse. So was Thomas Brown, the pioneer of Dr. Bain and the cerebro-psychologists of our day. Dugald Stewart, the friend of Burns and preceptor of Russell and Palmerston, was a grandson of the Manse. Robertson, the historian, and leader of the Moderate Party in the Church of Scotland, was the son of a clergyman. Through his niece he gave a little, though all too little, of the tradition and tone of the Manse to Henry Brougham. Sir David Brewster was of good clerical blood, and was educated with a view to the Scotch ministry. If the word "adventurer" could by any possibility be used in the proper and honourable and not in the popular and odious sense, we should say that as adventurers the Scotch sons of the Manse occupy, and long have occupied, a position of "undoubted paramouncy" among a community which history, and social and even physical conditions have made, to the extent of four-fifths, a nation of adventurers.

The success of the son of the Manse is easily explained. His father is, as a rule, a man of humble origin, who by natural force has made his merits known and rewarded. His grandfather the peasant—of whom the father of the late Dr. Duff may be considered a type—has saved and pinched to make his son a minister, not only that he may help to advance the religion which has proved his own support and solace, but that he may give his successors a position in his country which he has found unattainable by himself. Every Presbyterian minister is, or may be, as Chalmers puts it, "a tribune of the people;" and it costs less to make a son a tribune of the people in Scotland than to make him a barrister or a doctor. "Why did you send me into the Church?" rather querulously asks the Scotch minister of his plebeian father, in the novel, when he finds himself afflicted with theological "doubt." "I saw no other way of making you a gentleman," retorts the peasant, who snorts contemptuously at "doubt," because, like Dryden's "unlettered Christian," he "Believes in gross,

Plods on to Heaven, and ne'er is at a loss."

The peasant's son, having become "a gentleman," in virtue of a professional position attained by ability, generally marries into a middle-class family; not unfrequently, indeed, he marries the daughter of another clergyman. His wife brings middle-class notions into his household, and instils middle-class ambitions into her children. But as a rule, there is not much luxury in the manse, while there is oftener than not a large family. Its head may be able to command "gentility" when he marries, but seldom a fortune. He has to pinch himself to educate his sons, while "keeping up appearances" quite as much as his father before him, although on a less humble scale. Like Wallace at Falkirk, he can bring his young men to the ring of the professions; they must do the dancing themselves. But one thing he can do for them; he can see to it that they get the best possible education attainable in their position. To this, therefore, he devotes himself, and as a rule successfully; Scotch ministers may be sometimes bad fathers, but they are almost invariably good "coaches." The sons of the Manse, being put on their mettle, being as inevitably adventurers as their fathers, are as industrious as their plebeian rivals, and much more industrious than scions of the well-to-do middle-class; while they have a refinement and a social status that the representatives of their fathers' original class are without, and which always tell in the long-run, if other things are equal. The continued ascendancy of a clerical family in Scotland is explained by the fact that while sire may bequeath to son education, natural ability, even standing of a special kind, he cannot, in virtue of his position, bequeath him wealth or power. The one is unattainable in a poor Church; the other is attainable by natural capacity alone in a democratic Church. There is no evidence, on the surface of things, that the Clerical caste is on the decline in Scotland. If such evidence could be furnished, it would prove either that the position of a Presbyterian clergyman in the North is no longer what it was, or that the peasant's ideal of power, from being a moral, has become a material one.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

CHANGE OF RESIDENCE AND ELECTORAL RIGHTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Rowland Estcourt (whose letter on "The Reform Bill" appears in the Spectator of last week), seems to be under the impression that a borough householder loses his vote for the borough in which he resides, if, at the time of the election next following the registration of his right to vote, his place of residence is other than that in respect of which his name is registered. Permit me to point out that section seven of the Ballot Act, 1872, makes the Register (with certain exceptions unconnected with the question of residence) conclusive evidence of the right of any person to vote whose name appears therein. The fact of a registered elector having changed his residence between the time of holding the Registration Court and that of the election, is consequently immaterial.—I am, Sir, &c.,

PROFESSOR SEELEY'S "EXPANSION OF ENGLAND." —A CORRECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Pray allow me, if you think it worth while, to set right a small fact of history. Professor Seeley, in his "Expansion of England" (page 286), says, "At this juncture, the young Malcolm was sent to Hyderabad, and he succeeded in disbanding this [Raymond's] French force." The correct account is, that Captain James Achilles Kirkpatrick, the Resident at Hyderabad, conducted the negotiations with the Nizam for disbanding Raymond's forces, and the skill and firmness with which he overcame the reluctance and hesitation of the Nizam and his Minister were pronounced by Lord Mornington to be worthy of "public record." When Kirkpatrick's work was so advanced that the French camp was breaking up in mutinous confusion, he sent his assistant, young Malcolm, to disperse the men, which he did.—I am, Sir, &c.,

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

It is almost impossible to notice any exhibition of this Society without repeating a remark which is at once ungracious and antique,—namely, that the Society is sadly in want of new and vigorous blood. But the present is perhaps an average exhibition in point of merit, though there are even fewer sketches of striking interest than usual; and though several of the best members do not send, amongst these Mrs. Lyell, Alfred Hunt, Boyce, Frank Holl, George Fripp, and Lockhart, of the Scottish Academy. We will say nothing of the work, which seems to us to be unsatisfactory; but for the sake of hinting to our readers in what direction the shortcomings of the exhibition are most manifest, we would ask them to look at the four pictures from Nos. 12 to 15 inclusive, and compare them with the average Landscape Art of the present day. It will be seen that while they, on the one hand, fall very short of veracity to Nature, they, on the other, show even less appreciation of what is great in Art. They have even less of what is called "the grand style" than they have of pure realism; they belong simply and entirely to the school of the more or less conventional picturesque, which was once responsible for literary Keepsakes and Annuals, with their vignette illustrations.

Though it is only a monochrome, the most striking work in the exhibition, the only one which shows any trace of imagination directed to the representation of a great subject, is Mr. George H. Andrews's "Fighting Long Ago," a sea picture, representing two great galleons hammering one another to pieces at close quarters. Always at home with ships and shipping, Mr. Andrews has in this work (which, by the way, he has presented to the Society) shown himself to be equally at home with life and action. The picture has, indeed, something of the quality of a fine sea-story, and after looking at it one feels a distinct sense of disappointment in its somewhat too generic title.

Those who are interested in Henry Moore's painting—and every one who loves pictures or the sea must be—should compare Nos. 7 and 31 as specimens of the artist's good and bad work. Both are sea and sea-shore pictures, both have freshness and vigour,—and here all likeness ends. The first is good in colour, and good, too, though rough, in drawing, and is in tone good throughout. The second is most distracting in colour, is careless and inaccurate in form, and its tone is absolutely destroyed by unmeaning patches of dark colour and unnecessary splodges of white paper. Of course, a certain allowance must be made for the hurry of a sketch, especially when it is a sketch of breaking waves; but what we complain of here, is not the slightness or the roughness of Mr. Moore's work, but of the absence therein of the main facts for which really his sketch was made. No one could tell from this last-mentioned drawing what was intended to be the true curvature of the main wave breaking upon the shore, or, indeed, of any of the further waves.

We have so frequently discussed Mr. Albert Goodwin's work, that we must dismiss it here with a repetition of the remark we made last year. It is losing the fineness of its imaginative power, and becoming far too purely phenomenal. By this we mean that its records of nature—of light, shadow, &c.—are now being executed without any arrière pensée, almost as a meteorologist might reproduce them. The pictures of this artist are becoming scientifically interesting, rather than artistically. Let the painter of the "Siren Sea," "The Great Armada," and "The Voyages of Sindbad," look to it! If we turn from the most imaginative member of the Society to the one who is, perhaps, the least imaginative (of the younger men), Mr. Thorne Waite, we find an artist who has a very vivid, pleasant faculty for sketching. Will he excuse us, if we say to him that there are few practices in water-colours so radically vicious and wrong, as that of drawing carefully and finishing minutely all the stationary objects of the earth, and drawing carelessly, and not finishing at all, all the fleeting forms of the sky? Look at any of his contributions to this exhibition (and there are fifteen), and it will be found that whenever Mr. Thorne Waite wishes to draw a cloud, he proceeds in the following manner. He leaves, or "takes out," an irregular white mass in his blue sky, and in the centre of this he "dobs" a "dab" of greyish or purple paint, leaving a border of white. Now, if this was only done for purposes of swiftness, and grasping a momentary aspect of the sky, we might think it showed unskilful workmanship, but could not call it vicious painting. But we find, if we look at the rest of Mr. Waite's work, that it is in its way highly and solidly finished, and that it is the sky alone which is left in this ragged and unlovely manner. This must be wrong. Take the roughest sketches of Cox, sketches which, by the way, supply the key-note to Mr. Waite's work, and you will find without exception that the drawing of the sky is, with all its apparent roughness and rapidity of execution, more, not less elaborate, than that of any other portion of the picture. No instance can be cited, or ever could be cited, of a great artist who drew carefully only what was easy, and left undepicted all that was difficult.

Mr. Clarence White's "Thunder-splitting Peaks of Arran" is a powerful drawing, notable for its attempt at a full scale of colour, and for a certain grandeur of intention and composition, which a little reminds us of the late Samuel Palmer. This work, we are inclined to think, is not quite what the French call "sincere;" it is unduly forced for purposes of effect, but it deserves notice for its strength, and for the comparative elevation of its intention.

Mr. William Collingwood, too, has three drawings, all of which are interesting, and one of which, a picture of the rosy glow upon an Alp, is a very fine study of an intensely difficult effect. His second large picture, which is called "Going to the Spring," is in reality only another study of sunlight, this time of diffused sunlight, seen through thick foliage. As a picture, it is, we think, a failure; the figures, the tree-trunks, and the lower part of the work generally are feeble and uninteresting, but the foliage suffused with sunlight is finely and truthfully rendered. Look, for a contrast with this, at the moonlight study by Mr. Holman Hunt, a little sketch which he has painted, we should imagine, in as many minutes as he generally takes years. It is a curiously dull, dark effect for this painter to have chosen, but it is true, and has that indefinable touch of mystery and individuality which the work of a great figure-painter commonly possesses when he attempts landscape. There is upon the first screen another little work by Mr. Holman Hunt, called "Near Ashburton," which is more in his accustomed manner, and has all his wonted iridescence of colour. It is a lovely little drawing, of which the most hypercritical could only say there was a slight excess of purple in its shadows. Miss Clara Montalba has apparently been spending the autumn in Holland, and all her sketches here are of Dordrecht or Zyndrecht, or places of the same type. They are clean, brilliant, and strong as ever; but for some time this clever lady has been surrendering the finer qualities of her colour to the effectiveness of her contrasts, and why she does not work in monochrome is more than we can conceive. After all, no contrast is so strong as a blot of ink upon a fair, white piece of paper. Besides which, her work gets less human—if we may use such an expression—day by day. The skilful hand is still there, but nothing else. There is no trace of old William Hunt's maxim,—"Paint what you love, love what you paint." As with many clever women's work, its lack of tenderness is, perhaps, its greatest characteristic, and in this it is not so much masculine as it is unwomanly. A delightful pen-and-ink drawing of Mr. Du Maurier's should be noticed, if only for its sharp and almost crystalline beauty of line. Many artists have used the pen with greater power than Mr. Du Maurier, and with greater elaboration. No one, to the best of our belief, has used it with more "finesse;" and it is notable that though his work is, as a rule, almost over-finished, he possesses that rarest of artistic faculties, the power of suggesting all the details which could not be elaborately copied. Rarest, we mean, to find in combination with the power of elaborate work. As a rule, the artist who suggests best is least able to finish satisfactorily. There is a wonderful instance of this in one of his drawings for Punch's Almanack this year, the one which represents the great mesmeric duel between a Frenchman and a German. In this, Mr. Du Maurier has, in a way which is little short of marvellous, marked the national characteristics of each combatant, and has especially given to the German very hairy arms. Any one who will take the trouble to examine the few touches with which the artist has expressed this fact, and expressed it with the utmost power of which it was capable, will be surprised to find with how excessively few touches the effect has been produced. It is this union of elaborate with suggestive work which renders Mr. Du Maurier so great an artist, and gives to his work that combined elegance and ease in which it is, in illustration, unrivalled.

Mr. Poynter only sends to this gallery two heads in red chalk, both studies. These are interesting, as showing the growth of refinement which is taking place in this painter. Both are quite genuine pieces of work, without that somewhat strident muscularity which used to be noticeable in Mr. Poynter's studies. Less anatomical, they are equally right, and they have gained far more in beauty than they have lost in force.

Mr. Herbert Marshall, one of the younger members of the Society, is doing good, all-round work, and showing occasionally, as in his "Westminster," some fine qualities of colour. His "Westminster" is quite the best of his works, though the Victoria Tower, in it, does seem to be (we dare say it is our imagination) a little out of the straight line. There is also a little drawing of a City churchyard, with some black railings bounding its quietness, through which we see a street crowded with passers-by, and vehicles of every description. A good subject, this, tenderly touched; not with all its meanings dwelt upon, but one or two of the lightest prettily suggested. Mrs. Allingham, who is never so good as when her work is tiny in scale, and restricted almost entirely to landscape and cottage-scene—if we may use such a word—is here in great force. There are few English water-colour drawings which would not look either tawdry, brutal, or dull, by the side of "At Sandhills, Surrey," and there are several others of almost equal quality.

Mr. Wainwright (a comparatively recent Associate) is one of the cleverest young men in the Society, but his work this time is so unpleasant in its motive, and shows such a preference for the ugly or the offensive sides of Art, that we do not intend to speak of it in detail. His large picture of a hideous Frenchwoman, in high-heeled shoes, leaning back in a chair, with crossed legs, is, in our opinion, the most frankly ugly and abominable bit of clever genre we have ever seen. It is a pity that Mr. Wainwright, who has learnt how to paint, should have quite forgotten what a picture should be like. Certainly, "The world where we weary ourselves," as he calls this precious work, will not be made less bothersome by such pictures as this.

We should like to say a few words about many of the other works, but we approach the limits of a possible article, and must group all that remains together. Strange it is to see in the same exhibition the crudest of amateur pictures of the Falls of Niagara hung in the place of honour, and the most delicate studies by Ruskin on screen or the floor. Can it be that the fact of the one being by a princess and the other by a professor has anything to do with the arrangement? Strange to see a good picture by Mr. Brewtall, of a girl in the snow, entirely ruined by the introduction of an extraordinary, red head-gear, which is at least as large as an ordinary umbrella. Strange to see that Mr. Pilsbury's Farmyards and Hayricks are not yet exhausted. Strange to see a clever, faithful artist like E. K. Johnson wearying us by the 275th representation (or thereabouts) of his pretty little daughter. Strange to see Edwin Buckman degenerating from the decorative satirist, into the painter of the most mawkish common-place, for what could be more mawkish than a lamb picking up a badly-drawn rosebud from a child's grave? Strange to see that J. D. Watson's lover is still waiting in the same nice clean boots and breeches for his tarrying mistress. Strange to see Birket Foster's hand (which must be pretty well the oldest in the Society, now) still doing feats of such manipulative dexterity as few young painters could rival. Strange to see Mr. Thomas Watson wasting his delicate landscape drawing on such dull, uninteresting subjects, and many other strange sights are to be seen, as well as clever pictures to be enjoyed, in this gallery. But the strangest sight of all is to see the old and the new kinds of Water-colour Art, side by side, and to witness the unavailing struggle to maintain out-worn theories of beauty, and exploded conventionalities of treatment. For, indeed, the Royal Water-Colour Society, as a body, never seem to have read Tennyson, or any of the myriad poets who have expressed in different ways his saying of,— "The old order changeth, yielding place to new,

And God fulfils himself in many ways,
Lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

DUBLIN TRANSLATIONS.*

PROFESSOR TYRRELL, Dr. Ingram's brilliant successor in the Regius Chair of Greek at Dublin, may be cordially congratulated.

lated on this volume, in which he has had for his colleagues a picked body of the best Irish scholars. The 217 pieces which it contains represent forty-two contributors, all of whom are, or have been, members of the University of Dublin. Some of the translators are, or have been, connected with other Colleges and Universities; but Professor Tyrrell has their authority for stating that their versions have been "written under Dublin influences, and as the result of Dublin training." It is, then, in every way fitting that this handsome volume should have issued from the Dublin University Press, and no better proof could be afforded of the solid basis on which Classical studies rest in the chief seat of Irish learning. Men who can write verse of this stamp show that they possess far more than merely an exact knowledge of the Greek and Latin languages. They must also have seized, in a rare degree, the spirit of the Greek and Latin literatures. A mere grammarian's knowledge would not go far towards clothing Molière, as is successfully done here, with the garb of Aristophanes, turning a dialogue between Falstaff and Prince Hal into iambics which are really Plantine, or making the grandeur of the Prolog im Himmel resound through Greek anapaests of Æschylean force. At the present day, there exists a vast literature about the Classics. A show of erudition can easily be made by using the Germans, and a show of originality by abusing them. There is no reason why a manual of Greek literature should not be written by a compiler who could not construe a Greek sentence at sight, or write the simplest piece of Greek prose. But if Classical criticism is to have a really independent or original value, then it must rest on such studies as those of which this volume is the fruit.

While each of the principal contributors has his own traits, it may be said that the whole book has certain broad characteristics which distinguish it from similar collections. Here we recognise the justice of the claim made for it by Professor Tyrrell, that it is essentially a Dublin book. The first of these general characteristics, to our thinking, is exemption from bondage to the letter of the originals, and a resolve to aim always at an idiomatic reproduction of the spirit. It need hardly be observed that this "note" is common to almost all the very best work which has appeared in other books of this kind; but what strikes us here is that we find it as a nearly universal trait, present even in those pieces which do not otherwise reach the highest standard. The impression left on a reader's mind, after going attentively through the whole book, is that these translations arise out of a singularly genial school of scholarship, in which the enjoyment of the Classics as literature is fresh and keen, and in which, it may be added, a feeling for the music of language is highly cultivated. Another general characteristic which we remark is a love for tours de force, humorous or pathetic. For instance, we have "Tom Bowling" in Greek elegiacs; "Three Blind Mice," in Greek iambics; the "Meeting of Saint Kevin with King O'Toole, at Glendalough" (a racy ballad, by an anonymous bard), in Homeric hexameters. Masterly Latin elegiacs render the verses "You are Old, Father William" (Alice in Wonderland), Hood's "Bachelor's Dream," and the ill-fated love of "Billy Taylor." These efforts, and others like them, show a cleverness, a sense of humour, and a linguistic power which are, in themselves, quite admirable; but it should be clearly perceived, we think, that they belong to a distinct genre. They have nothing really in common, from the artistic point of view, with legitimate comic renderings into Aristophanic or Plantine verse. Their point depends essentially on the contrast between the grotesque original and the refined gravity of the new dress. In other words, the translator is mocking his own art. We know that some masters of expression contemporary with Isocrates and Aristotle displayed their resources by penning "encomia" on bees and mice, on salt and potsherds. An "encomium" of this class, if we found it placed between the Second and Third Philippic, would give us the same sort of sensation which we have once or twice experienced in turning over these delightful pages. "Juxtaposition is great," as Clough said; and its virtue is twofold.

When Lord Kimberley was giving the prizes at a London school last summer, he said that he did not often enjoy the pleasure of agreeing with Lord Salisbury, but that he felt satisfaction in corroborating some recent remarks of the noble Marquis about Classical verse-composition. "When I was at school," his Lordship added, "I wrote verses in all the metres of Sophocles; but I knew that they were not real poems." Next to Lord Kimberley, whose versatility in this way could only be equalled by his modesty, we should say that the most versatile composer we know is Professor Tyrrell. He seems equally at home in all metres and styles, and if his comic iambics, Greek and Latin, are perhaps the most striking, it is only because the special faculty which they show is rare even among the best composers. Professor Davies, whose share in the book is nearly as large as Mr. Tyrrell's, gives a preference to Greek iambics and Latin hexameters, which, in a style at once learned and individual, are very powerful. Mr. T. J. Brady and Mr. M. C. Cullinan—Mr. Tyrrell's colleagues in Hesperidum Susurri (1867)—are well to the fore in this volume, maintaining the distinctive excellences which have made their work well known to those who can feel the Classical χάρμις. Professor Hastings Crossley proves that his skill in composition, both Latin and Greek, is not inferior to that which he has shown in translating the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, a work which we hope to see him continue. Of Mr. R. W. West, we should be inclined to say that he shines by flashes, and then brilliantly; parts of his best pieces are unsurpassed. The quality of Professor Palmer's work is so first-rate as to leave no regret, except that there is not more of it. A peculiar interest attaches to Professor Maguire's versions. None in the book maintain a higher level throughout, and they have a certain cachet of style which suggests an original mind and character. Mr. Maguire is Professor of Moral Philosophy at Dublin, and there are probably few other living instances of philosophical and classical attainments being combined in a similar degree.

Space forbids us to dwell on other contributions which seem to us excellent, such as those of Mr. S. Allen, Mr. L. Dowdall, Mr. W. W. Flémmyng, Professor W. Ridgeway, and Mr. J. B. Bury. Mention is due to the one undergraduate, Mr. J. Dickie, who has the distinction of appearing in this goodly company—

"Corruttibile ancora, ad immortale Secolo andò"—

dividing with Mr. W. H. Kelly the honours of a fine version of "Lady Clara Vere de Vere." We sometimes hear "verbal scholarship" contrasted (by those who lack it) with a feeling for the "genius" of the Classical authors. A book like this is a good answer to such blustering cant. The "genius" of a literature is not likely to be finely appreciated by those who do not know the language in which it is written. The Dublin translators not only reproduce the tones, but interpret the inspirations, of their ancient models. And they also produce work which has not merely an intrinsic literary worth of exquisite quality, but also, for every real scholar, a delightful and permanent charm.

A PLAIN ENGLISHMAN ON AMERICA.*

WE have given the designation of "a plain Englishman" to the author of this work simply on account of its character; of Mr. Adams himself we know nothing, except that he seems to be a Newcastle, or, at all events, a North-country man. We should have preferred to style him "level-headed," only "level-headed" has not yet been naturalised on this side of the Atlantic, although it no doubt will be, one of these days. Mr. Adams may have had his fancies in the past; he tells (p. 293) how, "on the banks of the Coniston Water," he and Mr. W. J. Linton, well known as the author of The History of Engraving in America, "dreamed together of the establishment of an English Republic." But he has now, if we may judge from the general tone of his book, and also from his very sensible remarks on the secret societies and fantastic labour movements of the United States, got rid of some of his illusions, as, indeed, Mr. Linton seems also to have done, since he has come to the conclusion that the Union is not "the ideal Republic," and that "America is no country for the poor man." Mr. Adams is a "plain" writer in the sense that he indulges in no sentimentalising or philosophising. He speaks respectfully and even lovingly of "our American cousins," and so raises that phrase above the level of common-place; but he does not hesitate to indicate what he considers their political, social, and other weaknesses. Above all things, he does not dogmatise, or draw large conclusions from a limited experience. In other words, having used his eyes and ears to some purpose, when on a visit to the States in the spring and summer of 1882, he now uses his pen to equal purpose to record his impressions. Transparent truthfulness, modesty, simplicity of style, and readability are the characteristics of his writing. This book by a plain Englishman on America may indeed, be recommended to Americans much as The American Four-in-Hand in Great Britain, by a plain Scotchman, with, however, a turn for poetical quotation and viewy politics, who has made a fortune in the States, may be recommended to Englishmen.

Mr. Adams's book, as its title indicates, deals more with the inhabitants of the Union—their habits and institutions—than with the physical characteristics of the American continent. He makes some shrewd observations, however, on the effect of climate, the champagne-like exhilaration of the air, on life in the States. "When one takes into consideration the effervescent character of the air our cousins imbibe, one is less disposed to wonder at the vast schemes and speculations which find favour among them. The habit of 'rushing around,' common among all ranks in the West, is born of the Western climate." There is something of a warning, too, in the observation, which Mr. Adams tells us is a common belief in America, that "both Kingsley and Dickens, taking no account of the exhilarating influence of the atmosphere, exerted themselves so much when visiting the States that they considerably shortened their days." Nor do we remember to have seen the spirit of speculation which is the result of atmospheric intoxication in the United States better hit off than here:—"A stranger whom I met on the railway explained the difference between our countrymen and his own:—'An Englishman,' said he, 'when he gets a good thing, tries to keep it; but an American, when he gets a good thing, wants to sell it.'"

Mr. Adams necessarily travels over old ground, and has practically much the same thing to say as other travellers of American humour, political corruption, politeness, misgovernment, newspaper personalities, tobacco-chewing, sensational preaching, "square meals," and the like. Occasionally he puts some tolerably well known things in a very startling way, simply by his power of matter-of-fact exposition. Take, for example, what he says of the educational contrasts in the States:—

"The per-centage of persons unable to read is 5·3 in Massachusetts, 4·0 in Wisconsin, and 2·4 in Iowa; while the same per-centage is 43·5 in Alabama and 48·2 in South Carolina. Some alarm was naturally created when the statement was made before the National Educational Convention in August, 1882, that 32 per cent. of the voters of the country were unable to read the ballots which they cast. That there are two million voters who cannot spell the names of the candidates to whom they give their suffrages must necessarily be a subject of grave anxiety to the citizens of the Republic. Three-fourths of the two millions of illiterate electors live in the old Slave States, large numbers of whom, of course, were born and reared in slavery. But the trouble is that most of the children of the emancipated slaves are growing up in as dense ignorance as their parents. The extension of the suffrage in England was immediately followed by the establishment of a national system of education; but the enfranchisement of the negro has not so far been followed by the same happy result in the Southern States."

Mr. Adams thus pleasantly describes from his own experience one result of democratic institutions in America, although we are by no means certain that Mr. Adams is right in making these institutions the sole cause in this case:—

"The effect of the democratic institutions of America may be noticed in the total absence of that system of 'tips' which renders travelling both in England and Europe generally so disagreeable to most people. When you leave an American hotel, you are not surrounded by waiters and chambermaids, who expect to be rewarded for services which have already been paid for. Not the least annoyance of this kind meets the traveller from one end of the States to the other. The same comfort is experienced on the railways. There the officials have too much self-respect to hang about the carriage doors in expectation of having gratuities surreptitiously slipped into their hands. The conductor of a train, indeed, is as much a gentleman as any of the passengers. If you offered him money, he would deem himself so much insulted that he would—well, he would probably stop the train and order you to leave it! If you offered him a cigar, ten to one he would, if he took it, offer you another in exchange. During the whole time I was travelling about the States, I did not pay, and I was not expected to pay, a single cent for anything but services I had received. Even many services of a valuable kind were rendered, not only without payment, but without any expectation of it. An amusing instance of the independence which early in life takes possession of the American people occurred at a friend's house. My friend's son—a smart, intelligent lad of some ten or twelve years—had been put to a good deal of extra trouble on my account. On the day I was leaving I called him aside. But the moment he saw my hand in my pocket, he turned on his heels and disappeared. Nor could I get speech with him afterwards. I learned subsequently that his own explanation was, that he was too old now to receive presents from his father's guests. If this is the spirit of the youth of America, anybody can understand that the dignity of the elder people will forbid them from asking for what they have not earned. It is, perhaps, to this same spirit that the country is indebted for its freedom from another evil—beggary. There may be beggars in America; indeed, there is at least one State in the Union which has enacted penal laws against them; but I was never importuned for alms myself, nor did I see anybody else. What I did see, however, was a young lad who sold newspapers in the streets of Chicago, who kept and educated an orphan sister out of his earnings, and who was as proud of the girl as any father in the States of his own child."

If, however, any reader of these words should infer from them that Mr. Adams is unduly partial to Americans and American institutions and habits, let him read what he says about political scandals, the Tammany Ring, and the lenient treatment accorded to such ruffians as the James Boys, of whose atrocities in the West and South States we have not yet heard the last. The condition of the streets in New York he describes as "disgusting" and as "a disgrace to free institutions." "I could not help thinking that the citizens of Newcastle would go into fits if the state of Grey Street for a single week resembled the state of Broadway all the year round." Again, "The persons who ride in the trams are shaken and jolted about in a manner that reminded me of a ride in a spring-cart over a mountain bridle-path. When the driver turned a corner, one had to hold fast by the seat to avoid being flung on to the floor." Mr. Adams appears, moreover, to share, to some extent, Mr. Spencer's fears as to the immediate future of the Republic. Surely, however, there is not much to be alarmed at in the invasion of the States by hosts of persons belonging to European nationalities, at least on the ground that they may bring European, in the sense of aristocratic and even autocratic, ideas with them. Thus the Germans are the most formidable of these invaders; yet they go to the States not to propagate Bismarckism, but to escape from it. And, speaking of Germans, we could have wished that Mr. Adams, in the course of his remarks on the peculiar use in America of certain English words, such as "elegant" and "clever," (what about "lovely," by the way?) had told us something of the probable effect of German immigration on the English language as spoken in America. The present writer once heard a New York lady, of German extraction, describe as "majestic" a person who certainly did not seem to merit the adjective. It was subsequently explained that "majestic" meant at once well-built and neatly dressed.

While Mr. Adams was in America, he had an interview with Mr. Wendell Phillips, his account of which is highly interesting, even from the political point of view:—

"I found Mr. Phillips, as I found every other American of eminence to whom I was introduced, accessible and cordial. Although I was a perfect stranger even by name, although I had no other object than the satisfaction of making the acquaintance of a man whom I highly esteemed, he received me so kindly that I did not feel that my visit was in any way an intrusion. During the short time I ventured to inflict myself upon Mr. Phillips's attention, two or three subjects of interest to folks at home were mentioned. Mr. Phillips had taken a determined stand on the Irish question—favourable to Ireland, but somewhat hostile to England. When I told him that I thought the point on which all Englishmen were united was that of the integrity of the kingdom, Mr. Phillips remarked that he had told some of his Irish friends that Ireland was not big enough to make a strong self-reliant nation, that she might become a sort of Switzerland, and that it was perhaps better for her to remain united to Britain, and so continue part and parcel of a great country. The argument that the position of England was precisely the same as that of America when South Carolina wanted to secede, reminded Mr. Phillips of a conversation he had at the time of the war with the late Lord Amberley. The noble lord had contended, like his father, Earl Russell, that the North had no right to coerce the South. 'But,' asked Mr. Phillips, 'what if Ireland should want her independence?' Lord Amberley could only respond that that was a different matter! We talked also, however, about the condition of America. Mr. Phillips is probably no more satisfied with that condition than any other man who has entertained great and exalted hopes for the future of mankind; but he made one remark which seemed to indicate that he did not regard with the same misgivings as Mr. Linton the position and prospects of the Republic. 'We manage in this country,' he said, 'to work out a rough average happiness for the millions.'"

Mr. Adams found, indeed, the people of the United States as disposed to be friendly to the United Kingdom as Lord Coleridge seems to have done. The bulk of the persons he met appear to have taken a very sensible view of the Irish question, and instead of complaining of our action in Egypt, thought that action was not taken with sufficient promptitude. Alluding to the help given by Commodore Josiah Tattnall, of the American Navy, to the English Naval force engaged under Admiral Hope, in assailing the forts at the mouth of the Peiho in 1859, and to his exclamation, "Blood is thicker than water," Mr. Adams assures us that, "The sentiment that inspired that action would probably inspire the entire American people, should the old country ever find herself in need of help to preserve her existence or maintain her Empire." Should many more such assurances be given—and they are increasing every year—they will set even the author of The Expansion of England speculating about an offensive and defensive alliance of the future, which, if concluded, would be without a parallel in the history of the world, and would, indeed, as Lord Coleridge says, be “irresistible.”

GEORGE TINWORTH AND HIS WORK.*

THIS is one of the Art books published by the Fine-Art Society, and is produced as regards paper, print, and binding, with the usual good-taste of that Society. It consists of a series of photographs from Mr. Tinworth's terra-cotta friezes, panels, &c., and a comprehensive catalogue of his works. There is also a prefatory memoir, by Mr. E. W. Gosse, which tells the main facts of the artist's life pleasantly and plainly, though with just that tinge of over-sweetness which is apt to distinguish Mr. Gosse's biography, and which probably arises from the frequency with which his biographical notices are written of lately deceased artists,—concerning whom, of course, there must be nil nisi bonum.

Mr. Tinworth's life has been apparently one singularly devoid of excitement and incident. He was the son of a wheelwright, who was the victim at once of a gloomy religion and a taste for alcohol, both of which seem to have combined to render his life, and the lives of his wife and children, anything but happy. The son who is the subject of this biography was early apprenticed to his father's trade, and though his Art talent was evident almost from the first, he was only enabled to practise it by stealth, in the evenings, and when his father was away from the house. In one of the photographs of this book there is an interesting panel which shows young Tinworth modelling a little figure in his father's shop, while another youth is posted at the door to give warning of the wheelwright's approach. The great step in Mr. Tinworth's life seems to have been his joining the evening classes at the Lambeth School of Art, and there gaining the friendship and help of Mr. Sparkes, who was then master, and has since become the head of the South Kensington Schools. After working here for some time and exhibiting once or twice at the Royal Academy, he began to work for Messrs. Doulton, with whom he has continued ever since.

Mr. Gosse expends a good deal of unnecessary admiration over the fact that the artist has, despite his success, remained in the state of life to which he was born, and is still practically an artisan as well as an artist. No doubt, it is pleasant, in this age of competitive commerce, to find a man who is contented with his estate, and who simply lives to do his work. But from the artistic point of view it may be doubted whether this peculiarity of Mr. Tinworth's mind does not imply a great deficiency. It may be doubted whether any really great artist would be content to live in the narrow bounds of such an existence as that of a British workman, when he could, if he chose,—

And grasp the skirts of happy chance.”

And this leads us to the few words we have to say of his work, words which we would preface by saying that it possesses in an eminent degree three great qualities,—it is at once simple, fervid, and sincere. Its simplicity is, perhaps, its most evident characteristic, and in this it resembles nothing so much as the early German sculptures, such as those one may see to this day carved in the walls of St. Sebald's, at Nürnberg. Looking at these processions to the Cross, watchings in the Garden, casting lots for the garments of Christ, and all the other Biblical subjects in which Mr. Tinworth delights, is like returning to the days when we read “Line upon Line” in childhood at our nurse's knee. In the simplest literal interpretation of Scripture, no recluse of the middle-ages could have exceeded Mr. Tinworth. He is not one of those who, as Tennyson says, “after toil and storm” have “reached a clearer air,” but one of those rarely happy souls who have never known the “toil and storm” at all.

He is, too, in his work fervid and sincere, almost in the same degree as he is simple, indeed, his sculptures have an insistence, an almost proselytising vehemence, which is very apt to mar their artistic value. And in curious contradistinction to most artists, where he becomes most in earnest, his work becomes least admirable. There are many admirable qualities in Mr. Tinworth's sculpture, if sculpture is not almost too large a word to use of these terra cotta-figures, of which the majority are little more than six or eight inches high; they are full of ingenuity and invention, and the subjects, though, as we have said, treated with the utmost simplicity, are treated also from an original point of view. It is curious, too, to notice how Mr. Tinworth, though he will sacrifice scarcely anything to artistic convention, and though many of his works show an extraordinary capability of making the most elementary artistic blunders, manages to give in almost all cases a strong dramatic unity to his work. The composition is, with rare exceptions, in long, parallel lines, and is rarely satisfactory as a whole, but the unity of feeling is as rarely defective. All the actors in the scenes play their parts naturally and strongly, and we feel of each of them that he has a right to be there. This effect is the more curious, as every actor in Mr. Tinworth's dramas has a strongly marked individuality, and is almost invariably expressing it in some characteristic action. Our meaning as to the opposition in his friezes between unity of composition and unity of drama, may, perhaps, be exemplified by saying that the work has the completeness of a panorama rather than that of a picture. The action is consecutive and natural, rather than concentrated and conventional.

We do not propose to dwell to any extent upon the deficiencies of the work. They are such as any child can perceive, and are in many cases inseparable from its merits. Something of the mediæval, ascetic disdain for mere natural beauty hangs over all the panels, and is strangely interwoven with the natural feeling for beauty and grace which Mr. Tinworth evidently possesses. It is as if his religious emotions and needs were always trying to get the better of his artistic susceptibilities, and at the shrine of the first he is always struggling to lay down the prejudices of the second. And it is more than strange to see how seldom he is successful in his endeavour. Through the limits of his creed, his free artistic spirit breaks out again and again,—only to be again pursued and bound with formula and tradition. It must have been, and, indeed, must be, for he is still in the prime of his powers, a hard fight between the two great emotions of his life,—the art with which he was born, and the religion in which he was educated. And it may be,—indeed, in the opinion of the present writer, it must be,—that a religion, which was not only so sincere, but, if we may use such a word, so vociferous, as that in which Mr. Tinworth was educated, was bound to cramp and to pervert the Art genius which it sought to bend to its own peculiar uses.

GLADYS FANE.*

MR. REID has written a very good novel, though, strange to say, he has made a more living picture of his heroine than of his hero. We greatly prefer the wild and headstrong girl whose waywardness is so absolute a riddle to the conventional and squirearchical family into which she is born, to the sternly romantic Radical, who suppresses the story of his unhappy marriage, to his own great injury and that of others into whose company he falls, and who, though possessed of such overflowing power of will, has not the strength of mind to avoid either paying attentions he cannot justify, or fighting a duel against his own principles, without any conceivable advantage to anybody except his adversary, whose vindictiveness he gratifies, and therefore feeds, by his own fall. Rex Mansfield seems to us a melodramatic figure, without much substance or vividness; but though we regard the hero as little better than a failure, we regard the novel as a decided success,—lively and truthful in many of its characters, full of interest in its narrative, dramatic in its situations, and graphic without long-windedness in its scenic effects. Mr. Fane, the father of the heroine, and one of the heavy Tory squires who are included by Mr. Disraeli in the Tory Administration of 1874-1880, is a slight, indeed, but an admirable sketch; as is also the second wife, whom he so deeply offends his daughter by marrying, in order that he may give her a proper chaperone. The outline, for it is no more, of Lady Jane Craigallen, afterwards Lady Jane Fane, is no common one. It is both conceived and executed with an originality that raises our hopes of the story,—in this respect partly disappointed, for Lady Jane soon disappears, and is seen no more. In one or two of the secondary figures, notably in Prince Bessarion,—and perhaps in Mrs. Wybrowe and Lord Lostwithiel,—the same power of skilful etching is seen again; but in others of the minor characters, like Mrs. Carmichael and Mr. and Mrs. Lorrimmer, where life-like sketches would have added greatly to the effect of the story, we have nothing given us but the ordinary shadows of the modern novel. The vigour of the tale, which is considerable, depends chiefly on Gladys Fane, and the realism with which her home, her provocations to leave it, and her rash escapades after she has left it, are painted; though the picture of the accomplished Roumanian Prince, with his curious mixture of polish and brutality, his fierce gambling instincts, his dignified air, his insolence when foiled, his craft and his candour, his condescension to the swindler whom he used, and his murderous prematureness in firing at the rival whom he feared, greatly enhances the vivacity of a story which would otherwise depend almost wholly on Gladys Fane and her adventures.

The 'story of two lives' refers, of course, to the lives of Gladys and of Rex. But so far as the interest of the reader is concerned, the two lives whose images are likely to remain in his memory are those of Gladys Fane and Prince Bessarion. Rex Mansfield is melodramatic even in his view of the Press, which, potent as it is, and conscious of its responsibility for its right discharge of its duties as it ought to be, is, we think, both less and more than Rex Mansfield here describes it:—

"He was a journalist himself, and proud, justly proud of his vocation. It was one, he knew, which gave those who followed it a more potent influence for good or evil than any other which lay within the reach of the great mass of educated men. The newspaper Press of to-day, he had often thought within himself, is not merely what Carlyle called it in the past generation, the new Church; it is the new Parliament wherein the great problems that trouble a nation's life are threshed out more thoroughly than they can ever be upon the floor of the House of Commons; and it is the final Court of Appeal, in which the judgment of public opinion is pronounced upon every question, great or small, that engages the attention of the world. He himself was a mere subaltern in the great army of journalists. He had never wielded the editorial power. But he felt, as strongly as the most prominent of the great writers and editors of his day could do, the weight of that burden of responsibility that rests upon those to whom is committed, in even the humblest degree, the control of this mightiest of modern forces. Often as he sat, pen in hand, engaged in treating, with his large knowledge and masculine common-sense, some of those questions of the day in which he was more immediately interested, there would rise up before his eyes a vision that for a moment almost paralyzed his mind, until it stimulated it to fresh vigour;—a vision of the thousand homes into which these words of his were to go, as the voice of the unseen but not unheard teacher and guide, of the innumerable varieties of men and women upon whom he was to make some impression, however slight, and over whom of necessity he must exercise some influence, be it little or great, for good or for evil."

Yet this deep sense of responsibility which Rex Mansfield feels for his lightest words, he hardly feels for those far more effective deeds which, in their power of inspiring or discouraging others, go far beyond the most heartfelt words. These are his thoughts as he goes to keep an engagement of a kind which his principles wholly condemn,—so far at least as the scepticism hinted at in the concluding sentence has left him any principles,—to pick a duelling quarrel with Prince Bessarion:—

"Death! it struck him with a strange, weird sense of the triviality of most of the things of this world, that in very truth he was perhaps nearer to death now than any other of the men and women who surrounded him in that city of pleasure. To-morrow the moon would once more be shining high up in the heavens, shedding its glory as it was now doing upon sea and land, upon fronded palm and golden-fruited orange tree. And in all that world of mystery and sorrow upon which it would then pour its rays, it might be that there would no longer be one among the sons of men who answered to his name. Yet had not this grey earth lived for ten thousand years before he appeared upon it; and what difference would his going make to any human soul among all the hundreds of millions who breathed and toiled and suffered upon it to-day? He had left the Avenue de la Buffa behind him, and, taking a short cut, had reached the shore. It still wanted nearly an hour to the appointed time for his meeting with Bessarion. He spent that hour in slowly walking by the side of the sea, the solemn melody of whose waves harmonised well with his thoughts. Those thoughts had now travelled far, far away from all the faces and the scenes of these latter days. They had taken him back to the time when, as a little child, he nestled beside his mother's knee, and drank in there with the unquestioning faith of childhood some of those truths for the full acceptance of which, alas! the simplicity and innocence of childhood are needed."

The story, however, of Gladys Fane has nothing in it of similar unreality. How it is that Mr. Wemyss Reid has managed to conceive his heroine so much better than he has conceived his hero, we hardly know. He must have, we think, some touch of the poet in him, to be able to do so, for it is a mark of poetic feeling in men to portray women truly, and make the feminine essence of their nature really visible. From her first escapade, when she compels the old coachman to follow her to the meet of the hounds, up to her last, when she makes Prince Bessarion's stakes for him in the gambling-house at Monte Carlo, Gladys Fane is always herself, and always the first interest of the reader. The beautiful and terse descriptions of scenery which we find in this story themselves suggest a genuine poetic element in Mr. Wemyss Reid, whose study of Charlotte Brontë long ago rendered his name familiar to the literary world. We heartily welcome his success in this new field, even though we frankly recognise such deficiencies as we have indicated in his pleasant and fascinating story. We may well hope that this promising novel may be succeeded by others of still higher general power and still more vivid execution.

THE GRAVER MAGAZINES.

THE grave Magazines are doing their first work, the exhaustive discussion of the topic of the day, very well this month. They publish seven, or, we may say, eight papers on the "Rehousing the Poor," and those who read them will find their materials for thought upon the subject distinctly increased. The most important is, of course, Mr. Chamberlain's, in the Fortnightly, which we commented on last week; but Miss Octavia Hill's, in the Nineteenth Century, is full of experience and sense, Mr. Glazier's states the working-man's views, and Mr. Brooke Lambert and Mr. Mearns in the Contemporary once more dilate on the magnitude of the evil. The feeling of the man who reads them all will be, we think, that the physical difficulty—the actual badness of the houses—could be conquered, if we could get over the recklessness of the very poor about the state of the cloacæ, which again could, we believe, be mastered, if they were once shown how miasma affects strength, and this for less expenditure than is at present believed. Mr. Glazier, the working-man, presses the case against the tenants with especial force; and we have never been able to believe that his remedy, the removal of the poor to better working towns outside London, is impracticable. All the papers are worth study, and the tone of all is even strangely healthy, after the screaming we have heard, the strongest philanthropists having evidently learned wisdom from their experience. We do not exclude from this praise Mr. A. Austin's sermon on the duty of the rich to be more moderate in their expenditure on themselves. It is absolutely sound, though we fear that he will find his principles are only "laws without sanction." In a world in which a large proportion disbelieve in a future state, and another large proportion hold the cure of social evils absolutely hopeless, the advice to practise economy and give away surplus wealth is likely to be regarded by the rich as a counsel of perfection. It seems to those who spend as if they could not help it, and to those who save as if hoarding were so wise. The rich are not wiser than the prosperous, or the prosperous than the well-to-do, and to how many among those two classes is the great gift of financial fortitude given? Do we not all, Mr. A. Austin included, look forward with a certain dread, as if comfort were insecure? The publication of so many sensible and right-minded papers—none of them dull, either—upon such a subject, in journals necessarily anxious to be popular, is a good sign of the times.

So is the paper in the Contemporary, by Mr. S. Smith, the Liberal Member for Liverpool, upon "The Nationalisation of the Land." Mr. Smith has the reputation of a philanthropist who is in theory almost a Socialist. He is utterly opposed to great estates, to entail and settlement, and to the inequalities of assessment, which are very gross, and is favourable to the limitation of absolute property in land—forbidding, for example, clearances to make deer-forests—but he speaks of the destruction of private right in land with hearty detestation. In language which all can understand, he shows that civilisation begins when individual property in land is allowed, and that ownership by the State means universal pauperism:—

"We still have in active existence every form of human society, from the most barbarous to the most refined. We still see a large part of the earth tenanted by races as primitive in their habits as our forefathers were when they were clothed with skins of beasts and possessed the soil of this island in common. Nearly all Africa, considerable portions of North and South America, a large portion of Central Asia, the interior of Australia, New Guinea, and many other islands of Polynesia are all in that state of primitive simplicity. In these regions the land is not appropriated, it is either the common possession of the tribe or the battle-ground of contending tribes. Now, Mr. George gravely assumes that all our modern poverty and degradation are the result of private land-ownership, that all would disappear if we reverted to the happy Arcadian times when land-communism prevailed; and it is natural for us to ask whether we find an absence of poverty and degradation among those portions of mankind who have preserved the primitive tradition unimpaired."

He proves that in England all forms of wealth have increased much faster than rental, and that the condition of the people, tried by an infallible test, their consumption of food, has improved in forty years nearly one hundred per cent.; the average consumption of tea, sugar, wheat, and meat per head having been as follows:—

		1840.	1880.
Tea.....	ozs.	22	73
Sugar.....	lbs.	15	54
Wheat.....	"	269	358
Meat.....	"	84	118

Without private property in land, America and Australia would not have been settled, for such property is the settler's hope; and he shows conclusively that in practice the alternatives for this country, if it adopted "nationalisation," would be theft on a colossal scale, or severe taxation. Even if the State bought all private land by an issue of Consols, it must raise 2,000 millions at three per cent., to let the land again to the people at two and a half per cent., a rental which every voter would be striving to reduce. The whole paper is most able, and the more important, because Mr. Smith entirely acknowledges the misery around. M. Émile Laveleye's sketch of the position of the French Republic is interesting, but not novel. He sees the difficulty of managing foreign politics under a régime of change, and would have France adopt a policy of "frank neutrality;" but will Frenchmen permit that? He does not believe that any system will be accepted in France except the Republican, because any other must be clerical; but has he quite thought out the possibilities of Cæsarism? Does anything in nature forbid an Agnostic Cæsar, or a Marcus Aurelius? Would not a Julian Bonaparte be very nearly in his place in Paris? We commend to all readers Mr. Goldwin Smith's eloquent defence of Christianity as the most fruitful of creeds, to which we may hereafter recur,—a defence the more remarkable because it is not written from the believer's point of view. Mr. Seebohm, in his paper on proportionate representation, certainly shows that a city divided into wards might be unfairly represented, the majority of Liberal working-men, for instance, being congregated in special wards, while a small majority of Tories abode in the remainder, but he does not show that this is not an inherent difficulty in any scheme of representation which would be accepted. He himself is in favour of a large extension of three-cornered constituencies, but would, as regards them, adopt Mr. Fawcett's proposal:—"He suggests that each voter should have as many votes as there are Members to be elected, and that he should be able to give all these votes to one candidate, or to divide them equally between such candidates as he supports. He suggests that the division of the votes might be perfectly easily arranged in the counting-up of the totals." The effect of this would be in practice that the majority, disciplined by Committees, would return all three Members. If it did not, the old difficulty of the bye-election would recur; and Mr. Seebohm's suggestion for meeting it, that a vacancy should vacate all the seats, is hopeless, as, indeed, he himself perceives.

The diary of the Marquis Tseng, in the Nineteenth Century, and "The Ideas of an Exile," by a brother of the Khedive, in the Fortnightly, are neither of them of much interest. Prince Ibrahim Hilmy defends his father, Ismail, in a rather feeble way, as the author of Egyptian nationality and the founder of Egyptian Constitutionalism—he was probably the most utter and consistent despot who ever lived—and the Marquis Tseng indulges in vague reflections on the greatness of China. He is observant, however, and his remarks on the entire failure of China to obtain Western allies, and the success of the Japanese in the same object, reveal a certain impartiality. The Marquis sees clearly that the isolation of China is in great part her own fault, and is not, as most Chinamen think, beneficial. The most characteristic passage is an account of an interview with the Brazilian Minister, who called on him in London, and wanted a treaty, with permission to import coolies. It may be doubted if Tseng quite knew where Brazil was, but the serene politeness with which he snubbed the unlucky Minister, and told him to wait till the Treaties with the Great Powers were revised, is most characteristic. Sir Charles Duffy sends to the Nineteenth Century another of those long-drawn complaints of the treatment of Ireland which are so often true, but which always rouse in English minds the sensation caused in a husband by his wife's nagging. Sir Charles, admitting that education in Ireland is now denominational, complains that the teachers are starved, and denounces the unfairness with which Ireland is treated in the matter of the franchise. He repeats the old and melancholy story of the tithe war, exposes the imperfections of the municipal system, and denounces the Irish Poor Law,—mainly, it would seem, because it offers relief in poor-houses, instead of through public works. Most of the complaints are true, but Sir Charles nowhere makes the slightest allusion to the present readiness of the Liberals to reform them all, and that at once, if only the Irish Radicals would allow Parliament to get to work. His idea is evidently that the English never grant anything they can help, and when they do, spoil it by their meanness. A recent visit to the Boers, by Sir R. Loyd-Lindsay, M.P., is a very rough sketch of Cape society; but it leaves a distinct impression of the deep fissure between the Dutch and English in the colony, and of the craving among the Dutch for labour laws closely approximating to slave laws. Sir Robert evidently believes that severe treatment of the Transvaal might have induced both the Orange River Free State and the Dutchmen of Cape Colony to join them, and expects that the next elections will result in a Dutch majority in Parliament. The Dutch are everywhere in South Africa the landholding class, the English, though more energetic than their rivals, always retaining the hope of escaping from the colony. The general effect of the sketch, as of every other we have ever read, is one of regret that we ever took the country, or interfered with the struggle which must have arisen between the Dutch and the natives, who are becoming far too numerous to allow of true colonisation. A most amusing account of covert-shooting, by Mr. Bromley-Davenport, concludes the number. It is full of vivid sketches, and of stories like this:—

"Another host, who combined a highly religious temperament with an uncontrollable temper, on something going wrong with the beat, burst into paroxysms of fury with his keeper, to whom he used most unparliamentary language. A minute or two afterwards, having cooled down again, he called the man up to him, and asked in subdued and penitent accents, 'What did I call you just now, Smith?'—'Well, Sir,' Smith replied, not without a tone of pardonable soreness, 'you called me a d—d infernal fool!'—'Did I, Smith, did I really? I'm very sorry. Oh! to think that one Christian man should use such language as that to another! Heaven forgive me! But,' he shouted in stentorian tones, as his rage suddenly returned, 'it's God's truth all the same!'"

Mr. Auberon Herbert, in the Fortnightly, scolds away, in his character of "a politician in trouble about his soul," even more vigorously than ever. He writes so well, that we heartily regret he is not editor of a Tory daily paper, to wake us up to a sense of our sins every morning; but he has at bottom only one complaint,—that politicians are not individual enough. He would like each star to run its course by itself, and thinks a horse dishonest for pulling in team. Well, that side of the question needs stating, but if every representative is to represent himself only, where are the people to find representatives? A general acceptance of Mr. Herbert's views would end in the appointment of a Parliament avowedly composed of paid Delegates alone, which is not precisely what he wants. If a Parliament does not represent, what is the use of it? He says the Spectator would be happier for a little more courage in sinning; but he would be happier if politicians were a little more slavish, and admitted their intention to be slaves. He exaggerates, we believe, the deference paid to the democracy, and certainly exaggerates the consciousness of those who pay it. They think, for the most part, that they are expressing their own opinions. Mr. Andrew Lang's "In the Wrong Paradise" is a cynical joke upon the tendency of all races to evolve Heaven not out of their thoughts, but out of their instincts; so that an English Protestant, finding himself in the Ojibbeway or Mahomedan Paradise, might think himself in hell. But the most readable article of the number is, perhaps, Mr. A. Forbes's, on "Fire Discipline." This is a grave complaint that modern English discipline teaches the soldiers to shirk death, rather than to die. There is too much "dodging to cover," and, as a consequence, when brave men have to be met face to face, as on Majuba Hill, the English run away. Mr. Forbes hardly allows enough for the English necessity for sparing men. Very few Speichers would consume the British Army, and if we can win without losing a third of the soldiers, all is gained. There is, however, a truth in his view, though we should attribute the English occasional failures rather to a general deficiency of discipline than to a special drill. The modern Englishman forgets the Roman maxim that a soldier should be more afraid of his officers than of the enemy. The illustrations of his thesis from the Egyptian campaign, which was a creditable and not a discreditable one, are well worked out; but was there ever a victory which was not within a hair's-breadth of being a defeat? Suppose the French had won Gravelotte, as for one hour it seemed they would. Mr. Broad-ley, Arabi's counsel, exposes "Turkish intrigues in Egypt," which have for their object, he says, to support any one who will acknowledge the Sultan as direct Sovereign of the Delta. Mahommed Zafr, the Sultan's spiritual director, who at the time was all-powerful in Yildiz Kiosk, expressed this view to Arabi, in a letter published by Mr. Broadley, expressly saying that the Sultan trusted neither Ismail, nor Halim, nor Tewfik, but would confide in any one who gave "free course to his firmans." We do not know that any competent observer ever doubted this, but the evidence collected by Mr. Broadley is curious.

We have already mentioned Mr. Austin's paper in the National Review, but the most characteristic is Thomas Tantivy's, on the question "Will Party Government Continue to Work?" He maintains that the Whigs are dead, their real principle having been oligarchical government; that the Tories are transmuting themselves; and that a new party is rising, which at heart is opposed to the Constitution. This, though crudely stated, may be accepted for the moment as true, at least if by the Constitution is meant the aristocratic Constitution; but having stated this truth, what does Mr. Tantivy advise? That the Tories should attract the Moderate Liberals—who are officers without an army—by proclaiming their principles strongly, giving up the spirit of caste, and studying the ideas of the Democracy. "Courage, wisdom, and honesty, the hope of the future lies in these." Precisely; but how does that help Tories to see how their courage is to be displayed, what is the course of wisdom, and where honesty resides? The aristocracy, says Thomas Tantivy, must "lead the democracy," and the danger may be over; but whither?—"Two words came into my mind, as suggesting the most powerful defence against the antagonism of classes and the disintegration of Empire. They were, Noblesse oblige." But what are the nobles, if they accept the principle, to do? It is a little funny, by the way, to find the National Review saying of itself that the "dormant talent" has woken up. If it has, it is rubbing its eyes still, as if a little dazed with its untimely waking from slumber.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

GIFT BOOKS.

Cities of the World: Their Origin, Progress, and Present Aspect. By Edwin Hodder. (Cassell and Co.)—We have here the account of seven cities of Europe, four of the New World (contributed by Mr. M. F. Sweetser), and two in Asia, there being also a chapter on "Calcutta and the Cities of the Ganges." Some of these will be, of course, more familiar to the ordinary reader than others, but of all he will without doubt learn much that is new to him. None will, we take it, be found more interesting than the description of Peking, which, with its cities within the city, reminds one of Egbatana, as Herodotus describes the Median capital. There is a Chinese and a Tartar City, and within the latter, again, there is the Yellow City, and within the Yellow the Imperial City, intended as the ultimate stronghold of the ruling power. Kia-tsing, the founder, intended to make the walls of the Chinese City surround the whole, but this scheme was never carried out, for lack of means. We may note, also, as specially worthy of attention, the account of the two Canadian cities, Toronto and Quebec (these are included in one chapter), and of San Francisco and Chicago.

Choice Poems from Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. Illustrated from Paintings by his Son, Ernest W. Longfellow. (Cassell and Co.)—Here we have twenty poems, illustrated by more than twice as many engravings. The poems are, for the most part, familiar. Indeed, it was impossible to avoid the old favourites; still, on the whole, the selection displays the genius of the poet with a certain novelty of aspect. The frontispiece is a likeness of the poet, and more pleasing than any that we remember to have seen before, though it preserves at the same time the poetic nobility of the head and countenance. Of the other illustrations we cannot say much more than that they are agreeable specimens both of the draughtsman's and the engraver's art.

Michael Angelo; a Dramatic Poem. By Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. (Routledge and Son.)—"Michael Angelo" was written by Mr. Longfellow about ten years before his death, and published in the Century magazine. We have spoken of it before, and need only repeat on this occasion that, with all its merits—and it certainly contains fine passages—it is dramatic only in form. In the edition before us it appears with every advantage. The paper and typography are of an édition de luxe, though we must own to a preference for the dead-white, unglazed kind of the former over that which the publishers have given. The illustrations are thirty in number, and include the work of many artists and engravers of repute. Among the figure scenes we may mention "Cardinal Hippolito and Fra Sebastiano del Piombo," by T. de Thurlstruf; "Michael Angelo and Tomaso de Cavalieri in the Coliseum," by F. D. Millet; and "Michael Angelo and the Monk," by the same artist. Among the landscapes, a very effective little drawing of "Venice," by Theodore Wendell, and another, of "Vesuvius," by Ross Turner, in a different style, but also good. We should mention also a number of portraits, among them "Titian," "Benvenuto Cellini," "Sebastiano del Piombo," and "Vasari."

There is some power of expression, and a good deal of metrical skill, in The Forging of the Anchor. By Sir Samuel Ferguson, LL.D. (Cassell and Co.) Here a specimen of his verse:—

"O broad-armed Fisher of the Deep, whose sports can equal thine?
The 'Dolphin' weighs a thousand tons that tugs thy cable line;
And night by night, 'tis thy delight, thy glory day by day,
Through sable seas and breaker white, the giant game to play.
But, shamer of our little sports! forgive the name I gave,—
A fisher's joy is to destroy, thine office is to save!
O lodger in the Sea-King's halls, couldst thou but understand
Whose be the white bones by thy side, or who that dripping band,
Slow swaying in the heaving waves, that round about thee bend,
With sounds like breakers in a dream, blessing their ancient friend,— Oh! couldst thou know what heroes glide with longer steps round thee, Thine iron side would swell with pride, thou'dst leap within the sea!"

The illustrations are good, some of them, as that of the hammerers at work (p. x.), which is very effective. "Like men before the foe" seems a little out of place. It is not usual to illustrate a simile. The characteristic pictures of the work of forging, and of the sea-scenes which the anchor is to visit, are excellent.

The Swiss Family Robinson, in words of one syllable, and Robinson Crusoe, on the same principle, by Mary Godolphin (Routledge and Sons), are two volumes which we have, we think, noticed before. We think that to keep, without exception, to monosyllables sometimes positively makes a difficulty; and we should prefer to see exceptions allowed, and that not sparingly, to a rule which, on the whole, is salutary. Almost the first words which a child utters are words of two syllables.

Cheep and Chatter; or, Lessons from Field and Tree. By Alice Banks. (Blackie and Son.)—Here we are reminded of Mrs. Trimmer's efforts to enforce moral lessons by the history of "Pecksy," "Flapsy," and their kindred. Miss Banks' longest tale, for instance, begins by telling us how "Miss Mag Pye had an ungovernable passion for all kinds of bright things," and "how she was sentenced to imprisonment for life" for indulging this passion without restraint. There is amusing and, we may hope, instructive reading in these stories (there are ten in all), and at the very least the pictures will be found entertaining. Once or twice the author seems to forget the little folks for whom she is writing.

All Play. By Mary Thorn. Pictures by T. Pym. (Shaw and Co.)—Here is another book of the didactic kind. That "all play, no work, makes Jack an idle boy," is the obvious moral which it is intended to enforce. "Master Guy" comes home from school for his holidays, and makes himself very disagreeable, as boys sometimes have been known to do. Doubtless, this evil may be mitigated by a judicious amount of holiday task. If Miss Thorn can persuade boys and parents (the indifference of the parents, who are annoyed, but too careless to enforce the remedy, is chiefly to blame), she will have done no small service to the human race.

London Town, by Thomas Crane and Ellen Houghton (Marcus Ward and Co.), contains a number of brightly coloured illustrations, showing forth the various sights of London, accompanied by verses which are scarcely good enough. Little folks want their verses good quite as much as big ones, and it is a great mistake to try to foist off upon them an indifferent article.

Ingle-Nook Stories. By Mrs. Stanley Leathes. (Shaw and Co.)—There are fairy-stories and other stories here, the best, we think, being the tale how an Irish boy, Master Roby by name, comes to the house of his maiden aunt to spend his Christmas holidays, and, as may be imagined, turns it upside down. The illustrations are decidedly good.

Blue-Red; or, the Discontented Lobster, by Juliana Horatia Ewing, painted in colours by R. André (S.P.C.K.), is an amusing story in verse, with equally amusing illustrations. The lobster who was not satisfied with being blue, and would be red, and who became red, "but then—which he did not expect—he was dead," is an interesting person who met with a tragical fate, not wholly without honour, for

"He looked exceedingly nice,
With cream-coloured sauce, and pale-green lettuce and ice;"

while

"His claws were raised to very high station,
They keep the earwigs from our carnations."

There is really good nonsense, written and drawn, in this book.

At the Mother's Knee, by M. J. Tillaby (Dean and Sons), contains a number of gaily-coloured pictures for the little ones, describing life out of doors and at home.

Dainty Drawings for Little Painters. Outline Pictures, by T. Pym, with descriptive Stories, by C. Shaw. (Shaw and Co.)—These outlines are to be coloured, a process for guidance in which the artist gives some simple directions. It is a little volume which will, doubtless, give a great deal of pleasure, and the outlines are such that a child will not be unprofitably occupied in studying them.

Launcey Vernon, by the Author of "To the City" (S.P.C.K.), is another story of child-life. It is the tale of a friendship, strengthened by more than one adventure and by mutual services, between "Edie" and "Launcey," and should make pleasant reading for young folks.

Messrs. Shaw are publishing cheap editions of some of their successful stories for children. We have before us Mistress Margery, a Tale of the Lollards, by Emily Sarah Holt; and Scamp and I, by L. T. Meade; and Froggie's Little Brother, by Brenda. We have spoken of these on previous occasions, and may now briefly recommend them to our readers.

Of other books for children we may mention A Year at Coventry, by Annie S. Swan; and Fritz's Experiment, by Letitia McClintock (Blackie and Son); The Christmas Roses, 1883 (James Clarke and Co.), with its particularly spirited illustrations; The Fairies, written by Thomas Allingham, illustrated by C. Gertrude Thompson (Thomas de La Rue and Co.); and, from the same publishers, Clever Hands, by the Brothers Grimm; The Baby's Debut, by S. Smith, illustrated by G. C. Romton, G. Casella, and N. Casella; and The Fairy Horn, by S. Theyre Smith; Holly Berries, by Ida Waugh (Griffith and Farran).

We gladly make our annual acknowledgment of Sunday magazines which now appear collected in volumes. From the Religious Tract Society we get The Leisure Hour and The Sunday at Home, of which we can do little more than repeat the now familiar phrase that they contain abundance of good reading. The Sunday at Home well performs its very difficult task of furnishing young people with what is appropriate, without being wearisome. It may be confidently recommended on this score. Its fellow-magazine takes a wider range of subjects, but though its purpose is secular, it is not the less instructive and excellent in tone.—Cassell's Family Magazine (Cassell and Co.), with its particularly attractive paper and print, its stories, long and short, sketches of foreign places, practical papers (as those on "Remunerative Employment for Women"), poetry, music, and all the miscellaneous variety which it is quite impossible to classify, is as entertaining as ever.—We have also received Our Darlings, edited by Dr. Barnardo (Shaw and Co.), and telling us much about the good work to which the editor has devoted himself, and about kindred subjects, besides giving a great variety of useful and entertaining reading; and Little Wide-Awake, by Mrs. Sale Barker (Routledge and Sons), "a Coloured Annual for Children," and suiting them, we should say, admirably, both by letterpress and pictures.

Merry England opens appropriately with a powerful plea for national holidays, from the pen of Mr. George Saintsbury. The frontispiece is an excellent, etched portrait of Sir John Lubbock. "Master and Man," by Miss Alice Corkran, gives an account of an experiment, and apparently a very successful experiment, made by a French house in enlisting the true sympathies of its employés by giving them a share in the profits of the concern. It has been tried here also, notably by the Speaker, but the success has not been marked. "The Abbot's Gold" is a skilful imitation of the English of the early part of the sixteenth century; and "A Haunted House" is a ghostly, not to say ghastly story. But these things, to be interesting, must be records of real, or at least subjectively real, experiences. We see no editorial voucher for the genuineness of this story.

May Fair opens with the first instalment of a tale from the pen of M. Émile Zola. This, so far as it goes, is quite inoffensive; but it reveals the capability of becoming quite volcanic. This quiet Thérèse may develop into anything. Mr. Justin H. McCarthy contributes a very readable account of "The Life of François Villon." The short stories do not particularly impress us. There is undoubted truth in some of the arguments urged in "A University Career." But the control of a student's expenditure is not an easy matter. As for limiting the amount recoverable in the Vice-Chancellor's Court, it would be an entirely nugatory precaution. It is not on that means of recovery that the blood-sucking tradesmen depend. But the writer is evidently not quite up to University matters, or he would not make "Lord Dashaway" and "James Trumpington" date from "Ch. Ch. Coll."

The Journal of Education is always welcome, so intelligently conducted it is, and so sound are its judgments on educational matters. The short notes with which its first pages are occupied are always an admirable résumé of the educational subjects of the month. If there were nothing else in the number, it would be worth having for the two excellent pieces of translation which it contains. For ourselves, we differ from the judge, and feel inclined to place "E. D. A. N." before "J. R.," but both are very good. The piece translated is "Pompey's Dream," from the "Pharsalia."

Good Cheer and The Paths of Peace.—Good Cheer, the Christmas number of Good Words, and Paths of Peace, the Christmas number of the Sunday Magazine, are both capital this year. The stories in Good Cheer, by Charles C. Gibbon and Blatherwick, are just what Christmas stories ought to be, bright, fresh, and charming; and Joe (a dog), in the "Ducie Diamonds," is a touch of genius. "Her Gentle Deeds," the story in the Paths of Peace, by Sarah Tytler, though not as lively as those in Good Cheer, is much more of a story. The misfortunes of the heroine are almost unparalleled, as is also, in compensation, the piece of good-fortune which restores her inheritance at the close; and four years is rather a short allowance of time for such a complete business success as hers. In spite of all this, however, the story is exceedingly interesting, and Kirsten is a beautiful example of self-renunciation. The fire at sea is very well described, but the deep calm that fell upon Kirsten when she had resisted the temptation to save herself, and leave the children who had been thrust upon her care, ought to have been made more of, for the situation was very striking. "Her gentle deeds" do not rob her of her home and her lover in the end, we are glad to say. Mr. Barnard, the old banker, is a capital sketch of a scrupulously honest, upright, rich man, and we feel great sympathy with him.

The Five Wounds of the Holy Church. By Antonio Rosmini. Edited, with an Introduction, by H. P. Liddon, D.D. (Rivington).—Antonio Rosmini (1797-1855) was a compound, more remarkable in his days than now—and it is scarcely common now—of Ultramontane theologian and Italian patriot. His motto might have been the same as Cavour's, "A Free Church in a Free State," only, to his mind, the freedom of the Church meant liberty to yield an implicit obedience to the Pope, and the freedom of the State would have to be limited by the practical application of its fellow-principle. The work which Canon Liddon has here edited is devoted to a statement of the evils which, in the author's view, beset the Church, and to a statement of their remedies. The first wound is, in the author's view, the lack of sympathy in public worship between the clergy and the flocks which they serve. The second is the want of education in the clergy. The third is the spirit of division which separates the Bishops from each other, and from the clergy and the people. The fourth and fifth have to do with the appointment of the Bishops by the secular power, and may be taken to include what is commonly known as Erastianism. The system of concordats would, it will be seen, find little favour in the eyes of Rosmini. Gallicanism and the religious independence of nations generally offend his principles. To Gallicanism, indeed, he attributes the powerlessness of the French clergy to repress the frenzies of the Revolution, a suggestion to which the editor very rightly demurs. Louis XIV. had left very little Gallicanism behind him in France. Much that Rosmini has to say will commend itself to English Churchmen, though his extreme Papalism will offend all, or nearly all, and some certainly will see a safeguard of freedom in the State control to which he objects so strongly. Vigorous champion as he was of Papal supremacy and of the Temporal Dominion (other Bishops must be unworldly, but the Pope, if he is to perform his functions properly, must ever be a great Prince), he fell under the suspicion of the ecclesiastical authorities of his Church. Two of his works, "The Constitution according to Social Justice" and "The Five Wounds of the Church," were condemned by the Congregation of the Index. This ban was afterwards taken off. Canon Liddon has furnished the volume with an excellent preface.

Straight to the Mark. By the Rev. T. S. Millington. (Religious Tract Society).—This is in the main a story of school life, and a very excellent story, too, so far as this element of it is concerned. Of course, it is idealised—boy life must be idealised, to make endurable reading—but it is not idealised out of all knowledge. Tom Howard is a genuine boy, brave and honest, and not the less pleasing because he is not above a boy's weaknesses. The tale of his adventures—when he goes down over the face of the cliff to help a schoolfellow, being himself gifted with the kind of head that does not swim at precipices, and used from certain sea experiences to climbing—is admirably told. We have not read a more exciting story for some time; and it looks like a genuine picture. The contractor and his son, who act as a foil to Tom's honesty, are fairly enough drawn; but why this worship of wealth, that seems to make it necessary that a lad who is perfectly able to make his way in the world must turn out to be somebody's heir, and, instead of a profitable knocking-about the world, settle down into ease?

Jonathan Swift: a Novel. (Hurst and Blackett).—This ambitious attempt to read the riddle of Swift's unhappy life is made with so much presumption and so little judgment, so much boldness and so little skill, that it entirely fails. The book is full of anachronisms, extending to criticisms of literature of the present day by Jonathan Swift, and outbursts of wrath against the Irish Land Act and the Liberal Government; it also displays the author's ignorance of the practices of the Roman Catholic Church, although that Church is the prime object of his abhorrence. Here is an instance. Swift and Stella visit the cottage of a poor woman whose child has just died of a lingering illness. They find the bereaved mother in agonising grief, crying to God to take her soul as a ransom for her son's. This is Swift's interpretation of her feelings:—"It flashed across him that Mrs. Grey was a Papist, and that her boy had never been baptised. Did she fear she had lost him for ever?" A writer who is so ignorant of what Papists believe and do as not to know that the child would most certainly have been baptised, because, under the circumstances which he describes, the mother herself would have been perfectly competent to baptise him, would do better to leave these matters alone. The constant intrusion of himself between his subject and his readers would destroy the effect of the book, even if it had been a much better one; but it possesses no merit. The author's Jonathan Swift is a clumsy caricature, and all the other personages introduced—Bolingbroke, Steele, Prior, &c., are puppets jerked by an unskilful hand. The writer, we do not know on what authority, spells "Vanhomrigh" "Vanhomrich."

Seeing and Thinking: Elementary Lessons and Exercises, Introductory to Grammar, Composition, and Logical Analysis. By C. Schaible, Ph.D. Second Edition, revised, partly rewritten, and edited by T. F. Althaus, B.A. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—This useful and original teacher's guide well deserves the care and ability which Mr. Althaus has brought to its revision. A second edition cannot fail of a warm welcome, at a time when the development of the School-Board system has created so large a demand for skilled elementary teaching. Some of the leading ideas of the systems of Roobow and Pestalozzi, which have hitherto exercised but little influence upon English methods of teaching, are here put forward in a clear and telling manner, and Professor Schaible, by his array of carefully prepared exercises and examples, has not only brought his method clearly home to the teacher, but has also supplied him with materials for many useful lessons. It is difficult to say how far it is either possible or expedient for the child's mind to grapple with the logical aspect of grammar. Possibly, Continental educationalists lay more stress than is necessary upon the early inculcation of exactness in thought and expression. To any one, however, who remembers the mystery which surrounded such simple grammatical terms as "conjugation," "voice," and the like, long after he could conjugate "amo," it cannot but appear that some such simple and progressive series of object lessons as this which Professor Schaible has put together would have lightened very appreciably the dreary horrors of "parsing" and "analysis." Both teachers and taught will owe a debt of gratitude to Professor Schaible and his editor if, by a practical application of their method, the grammar lesson can be robbed of some of its tedium.

Messrs. De La Rue and Co. send us specimens of their beautiful Pocket-books, Card-cases, Purses, Diaries, Calendars, &c., for 1884. One of these contains the unwonted largesse of a pair of excellent scissors, and accommodation for a sort of small pocket dressing-case. The diaries and calendars are of all sizes, and are certainly the most convenient known to us.

Messrs. Hildesheimer and Co. (London, Manchester, and New York) send us a large box of Christmas and New Year's Cards, of great variety, floral and otherwise. There are groups of children, seaside pieces, comic pieces, and many others. But those we like the best are the little books of etchings taken on the Isis, on the Thames, and on the Wye, by Mr. Wilfrid Ball and other artists. These are very interesting, and are never spoiled with the too "gushing" Christmas greetings which sometimes spoil, for the fastidious, the Christmas and New Year's cards.

SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

IMPERFECTLY ADAPTED SPECTACLES are the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Mr. H. LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, 1A OLD BOND STREET, has made the Adaptation of Spectacles his special and sole study for upwards of 30 years. Sir JULIUS BENEDICT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Similar testimonials from Earl Lindsay, F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P., Thomas Cook, Esq., the well-known Tourist Agent, &c.—Pamphlet containing valuable suggestions, post free. City Branches—6 POULTRY, and 23 FENCHURCH STREET.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

MR. PARNELL received the tribute raised for him by the gratitude of the Irish people,—a sum already over £37,000, and which is expected to reach £40,000 before it closes,—at a banquet given to him on Tuesday night in the Dublin Rotunda, and in reply delivered a speech which came mainly to this,—that he was very grateful to the Irish people, and would prove it by hating the English people and the English Administration with even more than his former tenacity of detestation. He congratulated himself on the Land League movement, and was not ashamed to say that "never was there a movement formed to contend against such an infamous and horrible system" [as the land system of Ireland], "in association with which there was such an utter absence of crime, and the strong passions which lead to crime." As there has seldom been a movement of the kind during the present century in connection with which there has been more of crime, and of the strong passions which lead to crime, we suppose Mr. Parnell means that he can easily imagine a jacquerie more cruel and more bloodthirsty than the Irish jacquerie of 1881. No doubt he can, but moderation is not proved by falling short of such a standard of crime as an active fancy can suggest. "I do not think I exaggerate, when I say that the present Irish Executive is characterised by greater meanness and greater incapacity than any of its predecessors." "Mr. Trevelyan's great ambition seems to be to prevent any one in Ireland from doing what he has a legal right to do." In Mr. Trevelyan's speech at Galashiels, "it is easy to discover the self-satisfied chuckle of the man who exaggerates for his own purposes the danger likely to arise from the action of a few wretched Orangemen." The Irish party would never act with the Liberals until they conceded the cry, "No coercion, and no emigration!" coercion and emigration alike being murderous blows at the life of the nationality, and emigration being accompanied "by untold sufferings for the unhappy victims on whom the experiment is being tried." Mr. Parnell was resolved, he said, if he could not govern Ireland as he wished, to punish the Liberals by restoring a Tory Administration, and by inflicting on Great Britain the dangers and the taxation due to Tory foreign policy and Tory wars. "Sea-green Robespierre" himself hardly ever made a more thinly acrimonious speech.

Poor M. Ferry! The French Premier has just obtained his second "credit" for Tonquin, about one-twelfth of what he really wants, and is waiting anxiously for news from Bacninh, when he hears that Anam itself has risen behind Admiral Courbet. A hint from Peking has emboldened the anti-foreign party in Hué to poison the French nominee Tiep-hoa, to set up another King, and to declare formal war on France. As the French have only 500 marines in Hué, the effect of this rising is to compel them to reconquer Anam Proper, to throw heavy though inefficient bodies of guerrillas upon the rear of Admiral Courbet, and to legalise all Tonquinese resistance. The Black Flags are now Anamese troops, whereas they were Anamese rebels, a fact which makes this difference,—that they will be well instead of ill supplied. The French Cabinet speaks of further reinforcements for Hué, but practically everything waits for Admiral Courbet, who is still finishing his preparations. If his object is Bacninh, he has an ugly march of many miles—twenty, we believe—along a narrow causeway through the rice-fields, which may be cut in a dozen places, or rendered nearly impassable. If, on the contrary, his object is Sontay, his work may be easier; but he will still have Bacninh to take, before he can claim a success sufficient to extricate M. Ferry.

The news from Egypt is not good. The Mahdi remains inactive, but the Egyptians have suffered another ominous defeat. The Governor of Suakim, instead of waiting for General Baker, sent 700 men, 500 of them Nubian Regulars, to reconnoitre the road to Berber. As soon as they entered the passes behind Suakim, the hill Arabs swarmed down on them, and though the Nubians fought bravely, the whole force was destroyed, only a few officers escaping alive. The effect of this blow is to make General Baker's march to Berber most dangerous, to stop recruiting to such a point that pressgangs have been sent out to seize unemployed Negroes, and to take all heart out of the Egyptian Government. Rumours, probably false, are spread of Tewfik's abdication, but it seems to be true that military aid has been asked from Great Britain, the Egyptian Ministry acknowledging that they cannot defend the country. Of course, as the alternative is Turkish rule, we must defend Egypt, though not the Soudan; but how is defence possible, unless we stand forward as the protecting State, at least for a time? We cannot garrison Egypt and defend Egypt, and therefore tax Egypt, and then say that in Egypt we are only temporary guests. The Egyptian deficit for the year already exceeds £2,500,000, and the Four per Cents. have dropped to 62½.

The contest for Ipswich on Wednesday resulted in a victory for the Liberals, Mr. H. W. West being returned by 3,266 votes, against 2,816 given to Sir T. Charley. The poll was unusually heavy, only a seventh of the electors being absent; and, while the Liberals have gained 192 votes above the highest Liberal poll in 1880, the Tories have receded by 326, a total difference of 518. Part of this victory is due, we believe, to personal causes, the Cobbold family, with its long-standing influence in the town, being divided; while the feud between the Anglicans and Evangelicals, always bitter in Ipswich, had a distinct effect on the election. These side issues, however, exist everywhere; and, at all events till a local magnate comes forward on the Tory side, Ipswich may be considered Liberal. Sir T. Charley is very angry, and in the Times of Friday attributes much of his defeat to the "abuse and misrepresentation" with which he was visited on account of his connection with the City Corporation. Some impudent electors actually asked if Ipswich was prepared to vote for "the conger-eel candidate." We honour Sir T. Charley's courage in making that statement in a paper like the Times. A man who, in order to defend his party, is not afraid of affixing a nickname like that to himself—for he is sure to be called at future elections "Conger-eel Charley"—is a man to be respected.

Mr. John Morley met his constituents at Newcastle on Wednesday, and made a speech in which he first of all condemned the freehold vote. Faggot-voting was admitted to be bad, and the non-resident freeholder had through his property all the power he ought to have. He was distinctly in favour of the principle,—"One man, one vote." He smiled at the zeal of Tories to prevent future anomalies, while they are so willing that present anomalies should continue to exist. He was strongly in favour of extending the lower franchise to Ireland, pointing out that the hatred of the peasantry for England, which is the true reason for objecting to extension, has grown up under the restrictions now maintained. To pass a Reform Bill and exclude Ireland is, moreover, to render it certain that the whole question must be immediately reopened,—a fatiguing process, which he thought nobody in his senses could desire. Mr. Morley expressed his belief that the number of Parnellites returned under any suffrage would be about the same; and Mr. Parnell is, we perceive, of the same opinion. They may be right, but we have great doubts of it. Why should the labourers love the Parnellites, or how are the Parnellites to desert the farmers?

Mr. Morley, in the same speech, also advised the Government to leave Egypt as speedily as possible. We could not annex the country, he said, because of our solemn pledges, because of the heavy Egyptian Debt, and because of the number of foreigners within it protected by their strong Governments. The argument from pledges we admit, with the reserve that Europe could cancel them; but the Debt would be only £2,250,000 a year, if we guaranteed it; and the foreigners would be no more trouble than they are in London. Mr. Morley would, therefore, retire, maintaining that we have nothing to do with the Soudan, which is quite true; and that the Mahdi cannot invade Egypt because of the distance, and because his wild followers will not accompany him beyond the Desert, neither of them valid arguments. Oriental armies cross vast distances, and Arabs, so far as known, will go anywhere for plunder. Why should they not march out of El Obeid into Egypt, just as readily as they did out of Medina? Mr. Morley ridiculed the idea that if the British did not intervene the French would, declaring that if she did, "so much the worse for her, and none the worse for us." As to the Turk, he said, let him intervene, if he likes: We do not believe in French intervention, and the tribes can take care of the Turks; but we do not see why we should let the Turks conquer the Soudan. The Mahdi, if he will only keep in the Soudan, will govern a great deal better than a Turkish Pasha, for he will not plunder so much, not hoping to end his days on the Bosphorus with half a million in Italian Bonds.

Germany is greatly agitated by a report that the Crown Prince, who is going to Rome on his way home through Italy, will call upon the Pope. It is imagined that he will discuss ecclesiastical politics with his Holiness, and perhaps end the Kulturkampf, and the papers cry out that this is "going to Canossa." We thought it had been admitted that some modus vivendi between Prussia and the Papacy must be found, and if that is the case, why should not the Crown Prince arrange principles as well as any other diplomatist. The objection is not raised on constitutional grounds, and the Crown Prince, who is by no means a person of ecclesiastical proclivities, is not likely to give way unduly; while he will have this advantage, that if he gives assurances, the Pope will be secured against changes consequent on a new reign. A visit of courtesy, which, indeed, if the Prince goes to Rome, could hardly be avoided, is not in itself an act of submission.

The Hungarian Government has made a great effort to legalise marriage between Jews and Christians, but it has for the present been defeated, the Bill having been thrown out of the Upper House by 109 to 106. The higher Catholic prelates who have seats in the House of course resisted the Bill, not so much because Jews are Jews, as because they disapprove civil marriage altogether; and they were followed by the younger nobles, who came up from the country and voted from sheer detestation of the race. The Bill will, of course, be carried in a year or two, for even the stupidity of caste cannot long prevent the nobles from seeing the absurdity of their position. They detest the Jews for their separateness, and support a law which compels them to keep separate. Orthodox Jews are not displeased, but pleased with a vote which retains the most effective of all barriers between them and the surrounding Gentile world.

Lord Granville on Tuesday presided at a dinner of the London and Counties Liberal Union, and made one of his usual vol-au-vent speeches. There was very little in it, but it was nice. After praising the Union for organising Associations in the counties, he passed on to obstruction, and hinted that although the Foreign Office was not greatly interested in legislation, it had its share of the annoyance caused by obstruction. One method of obstruction was putting questions, and Mr.

Bourke felt such a keen interest in Egyptian affairs, that he asked in one Session three times the number of questions asked by Lord Enfield and Sir A. Otway during the whole six years through which the late Government were in office. Meanwhile, some of his friends took the part played in a Spanish bullfight by the picadors, "active young men, dressed in breeches and ribands, with little lances and flags in their hands, who do the irritating portion of the business." Lord Granville strongly defended the Corrupt Practices Act, declaring that the self-purifying process which it was hoped was going on, had not begun; that "a greater number of individuals were bribed in 1880 than ever were bribed before;" that the nineteen petitions tried revealed frightful corruption; and that two and a half millions of money were spent in that election,—an average, allowing for the uncontested seats, of about £5,000 a seat. Lord Granville doubted the speedy arrival of a dissolution, but bewailed the number of electors interested in abuses which it was the business of Liberals to abolish. He need not be frightened. For every man interested in an abuse, there is one concerned to abolish it, and the corrupt interests will no more expel the Liberals than the publicans did. The Tories trusted the innkeepers, and forgot that for every drinker in debt there are two "Blue-ribbon men." Even the great army of bankrupts, who do not like Mr. Chamberlain's Bill, is outnumbered by the greater army of those whom they have plundered.

Lord Granville, the President of the City Liberal Club, made a remarkable little speech on Thursday, after the unveiling of the statue of Mr. Gladstone which has been produced by Mr. E. Onslow Ford, and presented to the club by a number of its members:—"There is one point," said Lord Granville, "and one point only, on which I could speak with rather more authority than any one present. I have served with several Prime Ministers, men for whom I have had the highest respect, and I may add, the greatest attachment; but I can say this, that I never knew one who showed a finer temper, a greater patience, or more consideration for his colleagues than Mr. Gladstone, in all deliberations upon any important subject. In his official position, with his knowledge, with his ability, with the wonderful power of work which characterises him, he, of course, has immense influence upon the deliberations of the Cabinet; but notwithstanding his tenacity of purpose and his earnestness, it is quite extraordinary how he attends to the arguments of all, and how, except on any question of really vital importance, he is ready to yield his own opinion to the general sense of the colleagues over whom he presides." That, coming from Lord Granville, is very remarkable testimony, though testimony which we should have absolutely anticipated. The Tory tradition of Mr. Gladstone as the most arbitrary and imperious of statesmen is entirely overthrown by Lord Granville; but the Tory tradition will survive overthrowing, all the same. It is founded on that manifold root of all popular error,—the wish to believe it.

Mr. Forster made a very remarkable speech at Bradford on Thursday, with the important bearing of which on the great Reform question we have dealt at length elsewhere. But here we may add that he augured hopefully for such a settlement of the Transvaal question as shall really protect the rights of those chiefs who trusted to our support, that he defended warmly the policy of the Government on the Ilbert Bill, and that on the question of the Australian Confederation he strongly supported the Australian statesmen's prayer to the Government to guarantee them against foreign interference in the Australasian waters. Mr. Forster has not for many years made so powerful and sagacious a speech.

We are not surprised to find that Mr. Horton, the Nonconformist Fellow of New College who was nominated as Examiner in Religious Knowledge, and sustained by Congregation by 53 votes against 44, was rejected on Thursday by Convocation by the enormous vote of 576 against 155 (majority, 421). We do not ourselves think that Mr. Horton would have conducted the examination less well than the other Examiner, Mr. Pope, of Worcester College; but it was felt that if one Nonconformist was confirmed as Examiner in subjects which include the special Formularies of the Church of England,—the Thirty-nine Articles,—any other Nonconformist, even though he were a sceptic and a cynic, could hardly be objected to. Unfortunately, however, this possibility will not be in any way prevented by the rejection of Mr. Horton. Next year, a nominal Churchman, who thinks the Thirty-nine Articles a jumble of confused compromises, may be appointed examiner without a single protest, and may make the examination a farce. The truth is that an examination in the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England is a complete anachronism for young laymen. Scripture is still revered amongst us, and there is no practical danger that men who do not conscientiously object to an examination in Scripture would make a farce of that examination; but there is much danger in the case of an examination in the Thirty-nine Articles, and the only true remedy is to substitute a secular subject of no greater difficulty, for all who prefer it. Moreover, so long as the examination in the Thirty-nine Articles is continued, we must say that we think it more decorous to select as examiner some one who is understood heartily to accept them. But how many such—even among Churchmen—are now left?

We are surprised that the Times has had no article denouncing the weakness and imbecility of Monsignore Giambattista Savarese, who, lately a domestic prelate of the Pope, was received into the communion of the American Episcopal Church last Sunday by the Rev. Dr. Nevin, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Rome. It appears that Monsignore Savarese had belonged for twenty-six years to the Ecclesiastical Appeal Court at the Vatican, so that it is quite certain he must be of mature age,—and we all know what the Times thinks of “the poor and narrow-brained persons who are troubled at thirty with any question about the form of religion they have lived under.” Monsignore Savarese is much troubled, at an age that is probably double the Times' maximum, concerning the form of religion he has lived under, so troubled that because he sees no hope of reforming it, he has joined another religious communion. Why have we had no thunderbolt launched against this “poor and narrow-brained” member of the Roman Curia?

The Poet-Laureate is really to be made a Baron, and it is said that he will take the title of Lord Tennyson D'Eyncourt, an old title in the Tennyson family. The news has been received with universal and, we think, legitimate depression. It is felt that Mr. Tennyson is dearer to the English people than Lord Tennyson D'Eyncourt can ever be; nor is there anything to set off against this feeling in the probable gain of the House of Lords. It will not be easy to think of the great lyrical poet apart from the worldly distinction he has thus gained for himself by his poetry, and yet it will be still less easy to think of him as having naturally grown into that sort of distinction. The peerage will be at best an ill-fitting Court costume, which will be bewildering at once to the political and the poetical associations of Englishmen. We heartily wish that Mr. Tennyson had refused the graceful tribute paid to his noble genius.

We know of nothing more annoying than to be publicly accused of being richer than you are. Not to mention the tantalising nature of the charge, the applications for money are instantly doubled, your benefactions are at once considered stingy, and your dependants think they may spend without detection or remonstrance. Tenants become exigents about repairs, and debtors think a reminder, however gentle, proof of your unnecessary graspingness. We are really sorry, therefore, for a misconception, or rather a blunder, in consulting Domesday Book, under which, in our issue of December 1st, we imputed to Lord Shaftesbury a rent-roll of £40,000 a year. He has 20,000 acres, but they only yield him nominally £16,000 a year, and probably, at a time like this, somewhat less. The argument, to support which we quoted, as we thought, the official figures, is not, of course, affected by the error. Even were his rent-roll only £10,000 a year, Lord Shaftesbury would still be a man whose interests are opposed to any attack on landlords, and who, in condemning them as he does for letting uninhabitable buildings, must be disinterested.

Vice-Chancellor Sir Charles Hall died on Wednesday night, after a paralytic attack that came on near a year and a half ago, in June, 1882, from which he had in some degree recovered before the relapse came in which he died. He was one of the most sagacious of real-property lawyers, and in his earlier days might often have been seen drowsily nodding over a pupil's draft settlement or draft will, and yet as surely pulled up by any slip in the drafting as a dosing nurse who knows her business will be by the least change in the symptoms of the patient beside whose bed she sits. Sir Charles Hall never took silk, but gained a very large income as a stuff gownsmen—an income which is said to have passed £10,000 a year for the last few years of his life at the Bar—but accepted a Vice-Chancellorship in the year 1873. If “unconscious cerebration” ever rightly describes the process of intellectual judgment, Sir Charles Hall's greatness as a lawyer was due to the sure processes of his “unconscious cerebration.” It was not to intellectual vigilance so much as to an almost automatic sympathy with legal rules and legal methods of judgment, that he owed his almost unerring judgment on all questions of real property.

Mr. Richard Doyle, the artist to whom the world owes the admirable cover of Punch, was seized at the Athenæum Club on Monday by a fit of apoplexy, and died at four o'clock on Tuesday morning. He was the son of the famous caricaturist, “H. B.,” and was, till the days of “the Papal aggression,” one of the chief contributors to Punch, but retired in consequence of the violent anti-Catholic line taken by Punch in 1851. He was a great friend of Thackeray's, and illustrated “The Newcomes” for him,—the famous old “Lady Kew” was Richard Doyle's offspring, as well as Thackeray's,—and he also illustrated the earlier issues of the Cornhill Magazine. Middle-aged men will easily recall the pictures which he drew some forty or more years ago in Punch of “ye manners and ye customs of ye Englishes.” Mr. Doyle was not an old man,—fifty-seven at the time of his death,—but he was, perhaps unfortunately for the world, independent of his profession, and latterly had not added much to those playful studies of the grotesque, which constituted the charm of his various illustrations of fairy legend. That well-known procession of Punch riding on a donkey, and heralded by a comic Fame, while the hero himself clasps with a fatherly arm a young maiden who somewhat reluctantly attends him, two of her companions pulling him back by the bays which circle his reverend head, and a harp-playing nymph preluding some half-sentimental air as she follows in the train, will immortalise Mr. Doyle's genius as long as Punch continues to attract English readers.

Sir Thomas Acland, in an address to his allotment-holders at Broadclyst, on Saturday last, gave us a good illustration of what a good landlord can do to identify the interests of labourers and very small farmers with the land by which they live. There are but 440 householders in Broadclyst, and Sir Thomas Acland only owns about half the parish in which these 440 householders live; yet he provides 300 of the 440 householders of Broadclyst with patches of land out of his own half of the parish, though near nine hundred acres out of his half are taken up with woodland. His net receipt from these allotments—after paying tithe, income-tax, poor-rate, repairs, and expense of collection,—is about £1 9s. per acre, and he congratulated his allotment tenants on Saturday on the punctuality with which their rents were paid. The allotments are held by 170 agricultural labourers, 48 mechanics, 6 tradesmen, 10 gardeners, and 10 other persons, some of them widows. Sir Thomas, who, as a newly-made Privy Councillor, speaks with authority, gave his allotment-holders a little insight into the working of the British Constitution, together with some admirable advice as to the way in which they should use their suffrage, so soon as they acquire it,—especially warning them of the unpractical nature of such schemes for the nationalisation of the land as are proposed by Mr. Henry George; but we doubt whether any advice is so likely to keep them straight as that sense of having a bit of land to do their duty to, which he has secured for them.

Professor Sylvester is selected to succeed the late Professor Henry Smith as Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford. Professor Sylvester is,—with perhaps some question as to Professor Cayley,—the most brilliant and original mathematician of his time. Nor has the fertility of his genius, it is said, diminished with age, though he is believed to be already seventy. He leaves the John Hopkins University at Baltimore, where his genius has been greatly valued and has borne large fruit, at Christmas, and will, we suppose, assume his new duties at Oxford early in 1884. Oxford has chosen outside her own University, and has indisputably made a brilliant choice.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. PARNELL'S SPEECH.

THE meeting in the Dublin Rotunda on Tuesday was one obviously intended to be as unpleasant as might be in its effect on English statesmen and politicians. Mr. Sexton made a speech of which the purpose was to justify the hatred felt by Ireland for England; the address to Mr. Parnell expressly glorified him for the doings of the Land League, which it described by implication as achieved without sufferings or bloodshed, doings for some of which Mr. Parnell at one time,—we suppose in a weak moment,—had avowed something approaching to regret. And finally, Mr. Parnell's own speech was devoted to the expression of loathing for Mr. Trevelyan and for the whole policy of the British Government in Ireland, while it overflowed with malicious triumph at the anticipation that, even if he could not secure such an Irish policy as he wished, he could secure the fall of those statesmen who had granted Ireland all she has yet gained, and the return to power of those who resisted with all their might the passing of the Land Act, the Arrears Act, and the "Tramways" Act. To read the account of such a demonstration as this causes us, perhaps, even more dismay than those who arranged it would have desired;—though not more dismay,—indeed very much less,—springing out of the grounds of dismay with which they hoped to overwhelm us. What Mr. Parnell, and Mr. Sexton, and the Lord Mayor of Dublin desired, was to fill the hearts of English Liberals with disappointment and rage at the discovery of how closely their fate as a party is identified with that of the Irish Home-rulers. The venom of the stab which Mr. Parnell gave was all concentrated in that concluding passage, in which he told us that though he could not win for Ireland her independence, he could inflict on Great Britain the yoke of subservience to a party which is in a clear minority, and which involves us in wars which we condemn, and in a foreign policy which we abhor. He cannot, he admits, conquer what he calls her freedom for Ireland, but he can inflict both uneasiness and disaster on England and Scotland, by hoisting into the Administration men who not only coerce Ireland, but misgovern the Empire. Well, that is, no doubt, a formidable threat. It is very like Rehoboam's threat that whereas Solomon had chastised Israel with whips, he himself would chastise Israel with scorpions. But the most formidable part of it is not, after all, that which Mr. Parnell hints as its true sting,—not the dread of the Tory Government with which he threatens us, not even the dread of the unjust and disastrous policy of bluster which he holds over us. These things are formidable enough. We do not disguise from ourselves that he and his party may have the power to bring the Tories back, to undo all the Irish reforms with which the Tories dare to meddle, and to weave anew the web of confusion abroad. But, after all, we know very well that directly the retrograde policy in Ireland begins, half Mr. Parnell's own followers will desert him, unless he flings the Tories over; and that directly the selfish and hectoring policy begins abroad, the feeling in this country will surge up as strongly as it did in 1878-1880, and paralyse even Lord Salisbury's hand. We know that the Liberals may be turned out of office by Mr. Parnell, but that will be, we suspect, almost the last victory of his malice. In Ireland he will not dare, in the Empire he will not be able, to hold up the hands of those who propose to make the British Government pursue a retrograde and selfish career. To us, these threats, though we do not make light of them, cause a very small part, indeed, of the dismay which his speech inspires.

That dismay arises from very different causes, and chiefly from this cause,—that it brings out, as nothing yet has brought out, the political and moral ruin which our misrule in Ireland has caused, when it shows us the genuine enthusiasm of the Irish people for a statesman who can deliberately set this mean and vindictive ideal of action before his countrymen, and who finds that mean and vindictive ideal received with something like ecstasy by the emancipated serfs to whom he discloses it. We doubt if there is in the records of any political movement a more ominous sign than the "great laughter and cheering" with which the following sentences of Mr. Parnell, deliberately prepared no doubt for the great occasion on which the Irish were making a hero of him and lavishing on him the yield of a great national subscription, were received:—

"If there be one fact more certain than another, it is that if we are to be coerced again—if the present Coercion Act, or any part of it, is to be renewed—these things shall be done by a Tory Government, and not by a Liberal Government (cheers); and shall carry with them, in the shape of increased taxes and foreign wars, penalties in excess even of those inflicted upon us. Beyond a shadow of doubt, it will be for the Irish people in England, separated, isolated as they are, and for your independent Irish Members, to determine at the next general election whether a Tory or Liberal Ministry shall rule England. (Cheers.) This is a great force and a great power. If we cannot rule ourselves, we can at least cause them to be ruled as we choose. (Great laughter and cheering.)

That the idol of the hour should be not a man who is full of generous, if violent impulse, like O'Connell, or of passionate self-forgetfulness, like Grattan or Wolfe Tone, but a pallid and sneering schemer, who draws his companions apart to boast that if he cannot get what he wants, he can at least poison the peace of those who defeat his plans, is, to our minds, one of the most dismaying facts in the political history of Ireland, and one also that we should have least anticipated. We had always supposed that in Ireland at all events, popularity was impossible without the appearance, at least, of generous enthusiasm, and yet the ominous sign of the times is that popular enthusiasm is best evoked by an ostentatious display of vindictive political cunning and triumphant electioneering craft.

And the worst of the whole matter is that this is the result of the old English misrule. The Irish character, which, while Ireland was sunk in utter misery, displayed many of the virtues peculiar to a state of suffering, great cheerfulness under misery, great patience, and apparently great gratitude to those who brought any succour, is, now that it is beginning to taste of freedom and prosperity, losing apparently all its noblest features, and, for the moment at least, giving birth to no new ones. In place of the cheerfulness of the age of misery, we have now nothing but gloom; for its patience we have the fiercest impatience, under dwindling, instead of increasing evils; for the gratitude the Irish used to show to their true friends, we have nothing but the most virulent denunciation and political slander,—like Mr. Parnell's criticism, for instance, on Mr. Trevelyan, a statesman whose speeches will seem to the world at large as full of elevation and earnestness of purpose as Mr. Parnell's are ostentatiously devoid of both. And all this, as we said, is really the doing of our ancestors. It is our misrule which has so formed the Irish character that when it emerges from the semi-submissive era in which it displayed so many virtues, it seems suddenly to lose them all, and to put on a fierceness, an irritability, and a vindictiveness which, though they may be, as we believe they are, only temporary, seem to reflect not the new policy of greater justice, but the old policy of gross and selfish tyranny. Well, we must bear as well as we can the dismay which this condition of things not only does, but ought to produce on us, and perhaps even to produce in still greater measure than it does. Mr. Parnell's speech appears to us one that should cause genuine affright, not at the threats with which he plies us,—for they might well bring their own cure,—but at the type of political character which Irish politicians delight to honour, and even to glorify. We do not wonder that the man who is supposed to have gained for Ireland the recent Land Acts should be held on that account in reverence; but we do wonder that the more he vaunts his chill hatred of England, his thin indifference to the crimes and outrages of the Land League, his detestation for the English statesmen who have co-operated with him to give Ireland what she has got, and his acid calculations of revenge, the more heartily the once generous Irish people cheer him, and gloat over the astuteness of his statecraft. But if we can only bring home the lesson truly, even this bitter lesson may have its uses for us. That lesson we take to be that tyranny often bears its worst fruits after the tyranny has ceased; that it is in the atmosphere of independence that the cruelty of the past brings forth its bitterest consequences, and that the broken spirit, weary of its long suffering, turns to the gall of bitterness and the ecstasy of revenge. That ought to make our policy of justice only the more tenacious, unwearying, and complete.

THE SITUATION IN EGYPT.

WE doubt if the British public even yet see why the situation in Egypt is so serious. Clearly Mr. John Morley does not, for he speaks as if it were still open to us to retire at our own discretion; and the body of the people have neither his knowledge nor his thinking power. The true and novel difficulty is that our discretion has for the present been taken away, and that whether annexation or evacuation be the right course, we are forbidden by circumstances to adopt either. Up to the time of the disaster before El Obeid, the position of the British Government in Egypt was that they had entered the Delta to restore vitality to the authority of the Khedive, and thereby protect the people of Egypt, and certain English, European, and, we regret to add, financial interests. They thought they were advancing towards this end, and had ordered a reduction of the garrison, when an unexpected movement in the southern dependencies of Egypt revealed the fact that the Khedive's Government, so far from being sufficiently recovered to dispense with assistance, possessed neither the morale nor the physical power to perform the most ordinary duties of national self-defence. That Government cannot stand up against the rush of barbarism which threatens it from the south, cannot recover its provinces, yet is absolutely resolved, as the Khedive with his own lips told the correspondent of the Daily Telegraph on Wednesday, not to give them up. In fact, but for the British, the Khedive's Government would perish of combined weakness and perverse pride. The evidence of this truth consists not in the massacre before El Obeid, which might have been only a dangerous accident, but in what has happened since. The disaster outside Suakim was far more depressing to any observer than that in the desert before El Obeid. General Hicks's force had exhausted its ammunition, had no supply of water, and was assailed by clouds of fanatical enemies, who in the beaten condition of the men could, even if there were no submissions, slaughter almost at will. The force outside Suakim was crushed by hard fighting. It consisted, first of all, of 500 Nubian regulars, the pick of the old Egyptian Army, the men who for a moment, as Mr. Archibald Forbes tells us, flung back our own Highlanders at Tel-el-Kebir, and who, with their massive frames, indifference to heat, and splendid courage, could be turned into first-class soldiers. In addition to these were a few horse-men—Arabs—and two hundred "Bashi-Bazouks," that is, a "scratch lot" of recruits, well armed, but badly drilled, and with unaccustomed officers. This force was ordered by the Governor of Suakim to reconnoitre the passes through which any force from Suakim must march from thence to Berber or Khartoum, and as soon as it entered the hills was attacked by the mountaineers. They are not the Mahdi's men, though doubtless they sympathise with him, and are excited by his victory; but they attacked in undisciplined crowds upon their own account. The Bashi-Bazouks, who happened to be in advance, were thrown into confusion at once, but the Nubians, as usual, stood firm, and though hampered by the retreat of the advance-guard, fought splendidly, dying in heaps close together. They were, however, slaughtered out; some of their officers fled, and the whole force was, as the bulletin-makers put it, "annihilated." That means that the best Egyptian troops, well supplied, and fighting with the utmost resolution, can do nothing against Soudanese hillmen. Of course, the numbers were unequal; but so they must always be, and always have been. The tribes, whether excited by the Mahdi or not, can always, if they choose, produce ten fighting-men for every Egyptian soldier; and at present they do choose. The result is that Egypt has not sufficient force to restore order, and that any Egyptian expedition sent to enforce it will be cut to pieces. General Baker will be driven back just as easily as a native commandant, and if he is mad enough to divide his force in two—a statement positively made, but to us incredible—will by mid-January be "annihilated," as four separate expeditions have been before him. His gendarmes are not only not better than Nubians, but go unwillingly to the field, and will not fight half as well; while his small guard of Europeans—not 200 in all—are mainly Greeks.

The plain truth of the matter is that the whole of the Soudan is lost, and that nothing which Egyptians could do, still more, nothing which Egyptians will do, could stop the Mahdi for a week, if he chose to advance northwards. It is alleged that he will not advance, that he is intent on conquering Darfur, and clearing his road to the coast; and that may be true, as it may be true, as is also reported, that he is calling the Western Provinces of Arabia to arms; but what comfort does that bring to us? It is nearly the worst thing that could happen. The Mahdi's advance would enable the British to act, but for him to delay, and to consolidate his power in the south, to hang over Egypt for months like a thunder-cloud, which may burst without notice, is ruinous, if only from the expense it will entail. The Egyptian Government has nothing to gain from time. It cannot create a Native Army which will win. It cannot conciliate tribes whose just hatred, excited by twenty years of savage oppression, is now inflamed by the hope of retribution. It will not obtain an able Khedive, or a good General, or Pashas more honest than the men who, in such a crisis, can think of nothing better than making the biggest slave-dealer, Zebehr Pasha, their representative, and sending him to divide the Mahdi's influence. There is hope, it is said, "that the Mahdi may die," that he may irritate his people by taxes, that he may be abandoned by his successful followers; but all that only amounts to the usual trust in luck of perplexed, beaten, and irresolute men. "It needs but one chance to save the Khedive,"—but then, as Carlyle asked, "how many to destroy him?" The Mahdi may "die," of course; but to assassinate a spiritual leader among his followers is a most difficult task, if only because the assassin is mentally overawed. Taxation will not alienate men who are dreaming of plunder and victory; and what matter who retires, if the fanatics of North-East Africa are swarming up to the new leader? What matters anything, indeed, while there is no efficient resistance? and save through the British Army there is none. The heart is out of the Egyptians—recollect, our own instantaneous conquest was not calculated to develop self-confidence—and the ruling class has either lost its head, or is by nature unequal to the situation, or is treacherous to the core. We do not believe there is a man anywhere, whether friendly to a British Protectorate or not, who is competent to give an opinion who doubts that if the British withdrew, the Khedive's Government would be superseded by a new Arab régime, probably with the Mahdi at the head of it, and a black army at his disposal. As England has pledged herself not to permit this result—which would involve, among other consequences, war between the Mahdi and the Sultan, total repudiation of the Egyptian Debt, and great danger to the Suez Canal—she will be unable to leave Egypt until the matter is settled, which may take months, or even years, during the whole of which, according to the Khedive, Egypt will continue efforts to recover the Soudan,—that is, will waste her troops, her remaining treasure, and her residuum of energy, all of which is wanted for internal reforms.

We need not say we regard the situation with no pleasure. We should have preferred a clear Protectorate of Egypt, administered through a single Resident; but as that course was not adopted, we desire to see the British Government free to carry out its policy, and it is not free. Annexation is barred by pledges which could only be unbound by a European vote, the Protectorate is refused by the Cabinet, and the only alternative, withdrawal at the fitting time, is now beyond our reach. The situation has become most serious, and all the more because it cannot be terminated by an effort to extinguish the danger at its source. It would be madness to send a small force to the Soudan, for if they were Europeans they would perish of thirst before they reached El Obeid; and if they were Sepoys, they might be "annihilated" just as readily as the Nubians. The only way in which the Mahdi could be defeated within the Soudan is by sending an expedition to El Obeid on the scale of that which crushed the Emperor Theodore. We suppose that by despatching 15,000 men and 20,000 camp followers, with mountain artillery, and the means of sinking deep wells in the Desert, we might in three months master the Mahdi; but it is by no means certain, for he could retreat into regions whither we could not follow, and return the day after our inevitable withdrawal. Such an expedition, however, would cost this country twenty millions, and would be undertaken for the benefit of a foreign country which we have previously declared our determination neither to protect in the diplomatic sense, nor to annex. We do not believe Parliament would permit anything of the kind, and regard the constant incentives now being addressed to the Government to "restore British prestige in the Soudan" as so much waste of breath. The Spectator is no advocate of non-intervention irrespective of circumstances, but this country has enough to do without entering the endless expanses of the Soudan in order to restore the slave-dealers, who will at once recover all the power we may be able to wrench from the Mahdi. We are not going to remain there, and the Egyptian Pashas, if we entrust the country to them once more, will be overthrown within a month of our withdrawal. The invasion of the Soudan is impossible, and short of that, there is no summary way out of the difficulties. We can, as we believe, do nothing but wait, throw up works at Assouan, as we are doing, and leave it to the Mahdi to attack, if he will; and that waiting policy is not a pleasant one for us. It may last years, and we are fettered while it lasts, for we are responsible for Egypt, yet not its possessors, and unable, while invasion is feared, to insist on the carrying-out of the reforms which the Egyptian Ministry, so long as they have the excuse of war to offer, will declare the Egyptian Treasury too poor to undertake. There is, however, no other course to pursue, and fortunately Egypt, unless attacked from the Syrian side also, is the most defensible of countries. The river will not help the Mahdi, his march, when he moves, must be slower than the voyage of steamers from England or Bombay, and at Assouan the cultivated belt narrows, till five thousand Englishmen could hold it against any number of half-drilled troops, even if they are as brave as many of the tribes whom the Mahdi is supposed to lead. We can wait safely enough, but the waiting impedes the policy of the Government, and while it deprives Egypt of the advantages which would spring from a Protectorate, leaves us without liberty even to retire.

MR. H. GLADSTONE AT LEEDS.

IF Mr. Herbert Gladstone, as Member for Leeds, always represented his father, his speech of Saturday to the Bramley Liberal Club, Leeds, would be the most serious utterance of the Recess. That, however, as we all know, is not the case, Mr. H. Gladstone, like any other Member, speaking his own opinions, modified in a greater or less degree by those of the constituents who return him. Still, the junior Member for Leeds, besides being a man who thinks, hears a great deal, and when he points out a new and apparently practicable course of action which the Government may adopt, he is entitled to attention, more especially when his view either is supported, or seems to be supported, by hints in a very frank speech delivered by Lord Granville. Mr. Herbert Gladstone does not think, he told his electors, that the rejection of the Franchise Bill would entail an immediate dissolution. "It seemed to him that if the Ministry were to dissolve Parliament because the Lords threw a Bill out, however important it might be, they would be admitting a dangerous principle, and giving too much power to the House of Lords,—a power which, on many occasions, they might dangerously misuse. At an early period in the history of the present Administration, the Lords threw out the Compensation for Disturbance Bill; but the Government did not resign, because the interests of the country demanded that they should do a deal of work before they left office. He did not himself believe the House of Lords would throw out the whole of the County Franchise Bill. He believed they would throw out that part which related to Ireland, and if they threw out that part, it would be equivalent to rejecting the whole Bill. But he saw not the smallest reason why the Government should not then keep to their position for a time, and quietly go forward with other important measures, such as the reform of the government of London and the reform of local government in England and Ireland. And when they had done all in their power to pass those measures to which they had been pledged, then they could again take up the challenge, pass the Franchise Bill, and send it up to the Lords, when that House could choose whether they would accept the Bill, or accept the challenge of the Liberal Government to meet them in the face of the country." If the Lords threw out the Municipal Bills also, then he admitted they would be rejecting all legislation, and would force an appeal to the country; but then, said the speaker, "the Government would go to the country not on any particular measure, but as against the House of Lords." In other words, a reform of the House of Lords, a modification, direct or indirect, of its present absolute power of forbidding legislation, would become indispensable. Mr. H. Gladstone did not, however, believe the Lords would take this suicidal course, and evidently thought that the Government would be wise to take so excellent an opportunity of passing its London Bill and its County Government Bill, and utilising the next Session, or even an intermediate Session, to bring its Reform projects once more distinctly before the nation. Lord Granville possibly entertains the same idea, for he also hinted, in his speech to the London and Counties Liberal Union on Tuesday, that he had some doubts about a dissolution, and though he may have meant that he thought it possible that the Lords might pass the Franchise Bill, he must be well aware that Lord Salisbury thinks this a measure which ought only to be accepted after the Government has consulted the old constituencies. Lord Salisbury, in fact, thinks that the farmers, dreading the labourers' votes, and irritated about the foot-and-mouth-disease, will restore to the Tories a monopoly of the county seats, and is eager for a dissolution.

The course of action suggested is an astute one, and would, we believe, secure to the country the benefit of the County Government Bill and of a central Municipality for London at the earliest possible period, and with the fewest serious amendments. The rank and file of the Lords, who often show a truer instinct in politics than their leaders, will hardly throw out three great Bills, even if Lord Salisbury wishes, for they desire to preserve the Upper House, and are well aware that the English people, though distinctly favourable to the Upper House as an ornament to the Constitution—a part of its dress, like a Judge's robe, which adds scenic dignity to what otherwise might seem too bare and simple—would sweep it away at once, if it interfered with the more important business of life. Englishmen cannot bear, as Continentals can, to live always en blouse; but their love for black coats on occasion does not prevent their stripping to their shirt-sleeves, when there is work to be done. We agree, therefore, that the Municipal Bills would be passed, which would be a great gain; but we dread, as we have before observed, another and most dangerous result. From the moment the Reform Bill is proposed, it will become the single pre-occupation of the body of the people. They wish for the reform of county government, and in London they are much more anxious about the Municipality, which they think they will be able to influence, than Aldermen suspect; but they are guided by instincts which tell them that an extension of the suffrage is more important for them, will add more directly to their power than any local measure, however extensive, or however wisely planned. Their wishes will be concentrated on the Franchise Bill, and if it is rejected, and the Government does not dissolve, they will feel that emotion of distrust and suspicion of motives which, in England as everywhere else, is the temptation of a democracy. They will not distrust Mr. Gladstone, but they will fear that those men round him who are not anxious for the extension of the suffrage, and especially not anxious to extend it in Ireland, are rather pleased than vexed at a delay, amidst which anything may occur to make the people forget Reform. The suspicion will be utterly unreasonable, for the strongest Whig in the country knows that Reform is now inevitable, and that it must extend to Ireland, but a disappointed multitude is seldom reasonable. The lower householders know that many Moderates, in their dread of the Irish complication, have become half-hearted about the suffrage, they test the earnestness of a Government by its readiness to dissolve, and they will doubt if the extension of the suffrage is actually to be carried. That this will be the Irish feeling is certain, and we hold Mr. Herbert Gladstone's reference to the Disturbance Bill to be peculiarly unlucky. It was months before the Irish believed that part of the Liberals were not secretly glad of the Lords' action in that matter; and if they suspect that the Government is not energetic in pressing their claim, all readiness to wait will disappear, and we may even see the Municipal Bills thrown out in the Commons, to compel the Dissolution.

It is for the Government to decide, upon knowledge much fuller than any we can possess; but in deciding, we trust that this element of suspicion, exasperated as it has been by the known reluctance of many statesmen to include Ireland in the measure, will not be forgotten. We are ourselves most anxious for the speedy passing of the London Municipal Bill, and though we had rather the county voters were enfranchised before the County Government Bill was drawn up, we are ready to trust the Cabinet to make that measure liberal enough, but we do dread the effect of voluntary delay in passing the Franchise Bill, upon the constituencies at large. They expect to see the promise kept, and the Tories have taught them only too carefully to see what mere postponement, mere delay, may be made to mean. Their disappointment may seriously affect their confidence in the sincerity of the Government, and if it does, we shall at the next election have every Tory speaker contrasting the performance of the Government with its promises, and every Radical making excuses which will sound like censures. It is most annoying that such a difficulty should occur, and that business should be stopped by an election which would be wholly needless, if the Representatives of the people really controlled the action of Government by themselves; but then they do not. The people refuse as yet to take up the question of the reform of the House of Lords, and until they do, statesmen must reckon with that body even when it acts, as it will do in this case, merely to thwart and perplex them. There is absolutely no justification for the Lords' action in throwing out the Franchise Bill. The question was submitted to the nation in 1880, and was settled in the affirmative. Not ten Peers in the House believe that the opinion of the country has changed, or that if a Tory majority were returned they could avoid extending household suffrage to the counties. Yet because Lord Salisbury believes that a dissolution will weaken the Government, the Bill will be thrown out, and two Dissolutions rendered inevitable, instead of one, to the stoppage of all progressive work, possibly for three years. There is, however, no remedy, and will be none till the people perceive, as statesmen already begin to do, that the absolute veto of the Lords is an anachronism which may yet make the movement of the Legislative machine impossible, and which even now creates almost unendurable friction and delay. We are all so accustomed to it, that we hardly perceive it; but just consider the meaning of a situation in which a Government like this, entirely trusted and with an overwhelming majority, is compelled to consider not what course of business is best for the nation, but what will least irritate a few gentlemen whose ideas are almost avowedly out of harmony with those alike of the Government and the people. If that people woke up to it for a single week, the absurdity would end; but it has not awakened, and the Government is forced to think, first of all, of strategical tactics which may reduce to a minimum the opposition in the House of Lords. If Mr. Herbert Gladstone is right—and he may be right, though he speaks, of course, only for himself—the Bill creating a Municipality for London and the County Government Bill are to pass with unexpected ease, because a few dozen estated gentlemen think the County Franchise in Ireland should be kept up at a figure under which Mr. Parnell is the most powerful personage in the Island. Is a system under which such an absurdity is possible Representative Government at all?

MR. FORSTER ON REFORM.

MR. FORSTER'S very important speech at Bradford on Reform will give, we hope, the coup de grâce to more than one of the difficulties which beset the treatment of the Reform question by the Liberal party. In the first place, after what he has said—with his large experience of the Irish difficulty in its most envenomed form—it will be simply impossible for any Liberal "Cave" to hope for success in opposing the inclusion of Ireland in the next Reform Bill. Mr. Forster's remarks on this question are, indeed, so weighty that they will go far, we think, to convince all impartial thinkers who have any doubts on the subject that it would be a very serious mistake, both in the interest of Irish order and also in the interest of the union between the two countries, to exclude Ireland from the proposed Reform Bill. In the interest of Irish order it would be a great mistake, says Mr. Forster, because nothing would add more to the influence of the party of sedition—or to that of the outrage-mongers—than to force an agitation on Ireland, instead of removing the arena of agitation from Ireland to the floor of the House of Commons. Let the Parnellites be as strong as they can make themselves in the House of Commons,—by the use, we mean, of the same privileges as are granted to Englishmen and Scotchmen,—and whatever effect it may have on our legislation, it will, at least, remove all the excitement of the struggle from the soil of Ireland to the precincts of Westminster; and that must be a very great gain to the cause of order in Ireland. On the other hand, in the interest of the Union between the two countries, nothing could be more mischievous than to proclaim openly that there is no such political union at all, that we insist on governing the Irish on completely different principles from those which we apply to Englishmen and Scotchmen; and not only on governing them on different principles, but on principles becoming more and more different with every change which we make in our own franchise. As Mr. Forster truly hints, a union which is no union, which is violated flagrantly by the very people who maintain the Union, cannot possibly be defended on any excuse that will hold water for a moment. And for Liberals, as Liberals, to admit that they cannot pretend to justify what they, nevertheless, intend to do, is to give up the very principle of Liberalism, and declare for arbitrary government.

But Mr. Forster's speech has not only contributed something very considerable to get rid finally of this difficulty of Lord Hartington's; it has, we think, gone a great way towards getting rid of another difficulty too. Lord Hartington is much puzzled as to what the Government ought to propose concerning the property qualification for county voters. Mr. Forster's advice is clear,—abolish it. We entirely believe Mr. Forster to be in the right. So soon as you have a residential franchise for both counties and boroughs, you want no further franchise at all. A correspondent contends, in another column, that a son living with his father may fairly acquire a county vote by buying or receiving from his father a freehold in the county in which he resides; and he thinks that so long as you insist on his residing in the county for which he votes, this would not be subject to any abuse. But the answer is simple, and was given by Mr. John Morley in his speech at Newcastle on Wednesday. There is no pretence that will be tolerated by the boroughs for giving the county voters any qualification which you do not extend to the borough voters. If you are to allow of a residential property qualification in the county, you must allow a residential property qualification in boroughs too, and so you will admit a number of new scandals exactly akin to those which have so often been complained of in counties,—the manufacture of qualifications for their young relatives by rich men who wish to acquire a very prominent influence in the borough in which they reside. The question really is between the abolition of these manufactured qualifications for the county, or the legalisation of these manufactured qualifications for the borough. Is it desirable that either in the county or in the borough, a rich man should be allowed to manufacture qualifications for those who might easily obtain a vote for themselves, if they chose, and are too indolent to do so? Is it desirable that the number of these nepotist voters,—for in fact that is the danger, even though the condition of residence be enforced,—should be increased, either for the county or for the borough? We have always pleaded for abolishing them altogether, and we are delighted to get Mr. Forster's great authority for our proposal. "One man, one vote," is a very simple rule, and a very sound rule on which to found the franchise of the future. The faggot-votes must, somehow, be got rid of,—that every Liberal admits; but we shall weaken our hands immensely in sweeping away the faggot-votes, if we do not declare strongly against these nepotist qualifications for men who, though they may be residents, yet are qualified by their richer relations solely because these qualifications enhance their own political influence in the county or the borough for which they create them.

It is still more satisfactory to find Mr. Forster pleading so strongly for our own view that the true security against the extinction of minorities is to approximate, as far as is compatible with the proper regard for history, towards the principle of large electorates returning only a single Member each. We are as thoroughly persuaded as we can be that the objection which is raised against this proposal on the strength of the experience gained in municipal-ward elections, is a misleading one. Very few municipal wards would be so large and important as the new electorates for which we contend. If a population of about 50,000 is to be the ideal of an electorate returning one Member, that means something very different from an ordinary municipal ward, and implies the interests of a great borough, which, once excited by a general Parliamentary contest, would not admit of the kind of contests to which the story of some of our municipalities have accustomed us. Especially if the determination of boundaries were left, as we desire to leave it, to a Commission composed equally of men of both parties, with some moderate Constitutional President, and if they were told that they should endeavour to create political constituencies as characteristic as possible, we might, we think, easily secure in any great borough electorates as distinct and politically significant as Hackney and Westminster, the Tower Hamlets, Chelsea, and Marylebone, Finsbury, Lambeth, Southwark, and Greenwich. But the real difficulty is, as Mr. Forster puts it, what a good Liberal could propose as the alternative scheme for a great borough like Glasgow, Liverpool, Leeds, Birmingham, and the rest. We find some Liberals who seriously propose that Liverpool, for instance, shall have six Members, and every Liverpool elector six votes, without the right to give more than one vote to each candidate for whom he votes. The result, we say, would be that practically all Liberals would vote for the list of six most approved by the Liberal Party, and all Conservatives for the list of six most approved by the Conservative Party, and that during a Liberal wave of feeling, Liverpool would have only six Liberals to represent it, while during a Conservative reaction it would have only six Conservatives to represent it. We can imagine, as Mr. Forster can imagine, nothing more mischievous. Some of those who favour this scheme say that it would not be so, that all moderate Liberals would choose out four Liberals and two moderate Conservatives, and all moderate Conservatives four Conservatives and two moderate Liberals, and that in this way the majority would gain four representatives, and the minority two. We do not believe it. In a General Election, a great deal depends on the gain of a few seats. No hearty Liberal would be willing directly to cripple his party's chances by voting for two opponents, nor would any hearty Conservative tolerate such a proposal. The present writer happens to have had the chance of asking one of the most moderate Liberals he knows, and one of the most moderate Conservatives, whether anything would induce him so to mar the party influence of his vote, and in both cases the answer was a prompt negative. Besides, what this scheme means is delivering over the effectual representation of large boroughs to the mercy of political partisans, who, if they extended that mercy once, might repent them of their weakness on a subsequent occasion, and extend it no more. Whatever representation the people get, they should get by right, and not through the clemency of opponents.

Whatever plan is chosen, of this we are sure,—that the plan of allowing large constituencies to be represented by a group of Members all of whom may be returned by a bare majority of the voters, will find little favour in Parliament with statesmen of any school, and even the present thoroughly discredited minority principle of voting would be preferred to it. Mr. Forster is, we believe, right, that the judicious subdivision of very large constituencies, and their representation by a single Member, no voter having more than one vote, is by far the best solution of the problem which the nation has to consider.

ENGLISH JURIES AND THE CO-OPERATIVE STORES.

THE character of Irish Juries has been relatively vindicated in a very unexpected way. They have not been proved to be universally trustworthy, but they have been shown to be no worse than some English Juries. When a man, suspected on very good grounds of having murdered an agent or carded a tenant who had paid his rent, found that twelve of his neighbours could always be relied on for, at least, a disagreement among themselves, Englishmen used to moralise over the extraordinary inability of Irishmen to understand that the function of a Jury is simply to give an honest verdict, on the facts submitted to them. On Tuesday last, two English Juries in succession showed a similar inability to distinguish between fact and opinion. They were impanelled to decide whether a prisoner had really robbed his employers; but what two in one case and one in another insisted on considering was, whether they liked the way in which these employers carried on their business. Upon this question not one of the three had any difficulty in making up his mind. They all thought the conduct of the employers so bad as to exempt the Jury from the obligation of doing them justice. The issue which they put to themselves was not,—Is the prisoner guilty of theft? but,—Do his employers deserve outlawry? For outlawry, and nothing less, is what these jurymen really aimed at inflicting upon the unfortunate prosecutors. By refusing so much as to consider the bearing of the evidence upon the question of the prisoner's guilt or innocence, they pronounced, so far as they could, that the prosecutors were not men to whom justice was owing. They had put themselves, by their own act and deed, out of the pale of civilised society. If every man's hand was not against them, it ought to be so. Under any circumstances, this would be a grave conclusion for jurymen to come to. It would mean that they had taken the law into their own hands, and had inflicted the heaviest of social penalties, without hearing counsel plead or witnesses give their evidence. When the real offence of the employers in question is taken into account, the marvel is still greater. We wonder not merely that two, if not three, jurymen should have been found to pass such a sentence without trial, but that two, if not three, jurymen should have been found to think the offence attributed to the employers worthy of punishment at all.

The prisoner whose guilt or innocence was thus strangely put aside had been a shop-walker in the Grocery Department of the Army and Navy Co-operative Society, and in that capacity was alleged to have been concerned in a very extensive system of fraud. The trial went on as usual until the close of the prosecuting counsel's address; but at that point one of the jury rose and said that the foreman and himself were of opinion that Co-operative Societies were a "lot of blacklegs,"—a phrase which he afterwards explained to mean that the "military men and civil servants" by whom Cooperative Stores are carried on "cheated honest tradesmen out of their livelihood." It was in vain that the Recorder reminded the two jurors that the sole question for their consideration was whether the prisoner had really committed the offence with which he stood charged. What he defined as the sole question for their consideration was not the sole question that these jurors thought proper to consider. They chose to add to it the question whether men who had, so to say, pleaded guilty to the charge of carrying on a co-operative store, had any right to look for justice at the hands of their countrymen, and this question seemed to two jurors to be too plain to need discussion. The Directors and Managers of the Army and Navy Co-operative Society, being a "lot of blacklegs," had forfeited all right to the protection of the law. It might have been thought, perhaps, that this declaration on the part of these Jurymen was only an ingenious method of getting excused from further attendance. If their plea was accepted, they would get out of the box at once, and for that day, at all events, be free to go about their business. But when this had actually happened, another incident occurred which showed that this theory was, at all events, not universally true. Two other jurors took the places of the two who felt so much doubt of their own freedom from prejudice, and the rest of the day was spent in trying the case. When the Recorder had summed up, the Jury retired, and at the end of about an hour they came back into Court to announce their hopeless disagreement. Eleven out of the twelve, it seemed, had come to a conclusion, and were ready to give a verdict in accordance with it. But one still held out. He could not satisfy himself that the prisoner had not been the victim of a conspiracy,—the only ground, apparently, for holding this to be possible being the circumstance that his employers were the Army and Navy Co-operative Society. They were bad enough for anything; consequently, they were bad enough for this. With a juror of this way of thinking, there was plainly nothing to be done, and he and his fellows were accordingly discharged without giving a verdict.

The case has, no doubt, a ludicrous side to it, but it has a serious side as well. Justice in England largely rests upon the assumption that the average Jurymen may be trusted to give a fair verdict upon the facts as laid before him; that he will not be led away by any a priori considerations, such as his feelings towards the class to which the prosecutor or the prisoner belongs; that he will feel that the objects of his dislike and those of his love have an equal title to receive their deserts at his hands. Is it really true that English tradesmen are so completely a prey to class prejudice, that they are no longer willing to protect the members of Co-operative Societies against robbery? It is not the immediate result of this prejudice that is the worst feature of the case. That, if need be, can be easily remedied in the future. It may become necessary to exclude shopkeepers from juries which have to try a servant of a Co-operative Society, or to send all such cases before a special jury. But when one or other of these precautions had been taken, the fact would remain that English Shopkeepers—the natural representatives of the English Middle-class—are ignorant enough and dishonest enough to treat Co-operative distribution as an offence, which deprives those who commit it of that protection against robbery which it is the object of the laws against theft to ensure to every citizen. We say, ignorant enough and dishonest enough, but really it is the ignorance more than the dishonesty that is surprising. If the Co-operative Societies were really all that these Jurors think them, it would hardly be matter for wonder if English Shopkeepers regarded a charge brought by them against their servants as one of those quarrels among thieves which are chiefly interesting as helping honest men to come by their own. But the sole reason for affixing this character to Co-operative Societies is that they have undersold the Shopkeepers. That is the one thing that they have done to earn the title of blacklegs. It is not strange that the shopkeepers should be angry when they see members of the Services becoming traders on their own account. It is unreasonable, indeed, because a servant of the State has a right to spend his leisure how he likes; and unless the Government is prepared to make good the loss which its servants would sustain by being forced to buy at retail instead of at wholesale prices, it has no business to forbid his giving a part of it to getting the necessities of life at a cheaper rate. Still, unreasonable as the anger of the shopkeepers is, it is not unnatural; whereas, the ignorance which leads them to attribute pretty nearly every crime to men who have, in fact, done nothing but rival them in business, strikes us as something altogether out of the common. They would not refuse to convict a man who had robbed a brother-shopkeeper, though that brother-shopkeeper might have taken away half their customers. Why should they feel so differently when, instead of a brother-shopkeeper, the sinner is a Joint-Stock Company?

THE LONG VACATION.

TRULY, the pace of progress in England is "killingly slow." Among the good things which the Reform Bill of 1832 was expected to bestow upon its supporters and the country, were cheap law and speedy justice. It took close upon a quarter of a century before any attempt was made to reform judicial procedure, whether in the Courts of Common Law or Chancery. It took twenty years more until the "Courts that were manifold dwindled to divers Divisions of one," thereby avoiding one of the chief causes of delay and expense to suitors. It has taken half a century to bring about any abatement of another of the great legal nuisances, the suspension of all law for a quarter of the year. Now that the abatement has been made, it is a very halting remedy, indeed. The Council of Judges has been educated up to accept, at the dictation of the Lord Chancellor, a reform which it rejected by an overwhelming vote when proposed by the Lord Chief Justice two years ago, and has actually consented to shorten the Long Vacation,—by nearly a fortnight. The sittings are to end on August 12th, instead of the 10th, and are to begin again on October 24th, instead of November 2nd. After the tremendous flourish of trumpets with which the Lord Chancellor's intentions were promulgated in the leading journal, it is somewhat astonishing to find what a poor little result has followed. It is to be supposed that Lord Selborne knew what he was about, and that no better measure could have been extracted from his colleagues on the Bench. But it is to be hoped that neither he nor his colleagues suppose that they have satisfied the public demand in this matter. If a whole month had been bodily cut off the Long Vacation at the end, if the sittings were to begin on October 2nd, instead of November 2nd, it is possible that if the public would not have been satisfied completely and for ever, yet it would have had its mouth stopped for a very long time. As it is, in these miserable thirteen days it has only been given enough to make it ask for more.

What the public asks, and has asked for a century, and will continue to ask until it gets a satisfactory answer, is,—Why should there be a Long Vacation at all? Why for a fifth of the year should there not only be no Courts sitting, but the possibility of preparation for the time when the Courts begin to sit again be denied to suitors or would-be suitors? Why should not only the Judges, but the Registrars and other officials, get ten weeks' holiday at the public expense, and meanwhile the public themselves not be allowed to carry on their own legal business, and deliver pleadings, and so make their cases ripe for the return of the holiday-makers?

It cannot be said that Judges alone, of all public servants, require ten or twelve weeks' holiday at a stretch. They, no doubt, work their brains harder than the ordinary Mr. Ten-to-four; but then they also are paid in thousands, while he is paid in hundreds, and their work has considerably more variety and considerably less drudgery than his. Moreover, it is only the Judges of the High Courts who need this lengthy repose. The County-Court Judges, who are made of the same stuff, and work even harder, do not get more than a month or six weeks. But even if the work of the Judges were so tremendous as to need such lengthy relaxation, the holiday ought not to be taken, to the detriment of the public, by the whole body at once. If a Long Vacation be indeed necessary, it should be taken by the Judges in rotation. It may be urged that there are not enough Judges to be able to spare half a dozen at a time. This is, no doubt, true; but it is a reason for having more Judges, not for taking them all off work together. More Judges, indeed, are imperatively required. The abolition of the Long Vacation would make the requirement even more apparent than it is. A serious curtailment of it might, for the moment, make the requirement less apparent. But the relief, if any (which, in the present state of the Cause Lists, is doubtful), would only be for the moment. Every improvement in the law, and every increase of facilities given to the suitor, will for a long time to come increase the number of cases and of suitors. But the question of legal vacations must be treated independently of the question of the supply of Judges.

The present inadequate staff may be an additional reason for curtailing vacations; it cannot be an adequate reason for keeping them as they are.

Nor is there any reason why, even if the Courts are shut, there should be a stoppage put to pleadings which are matters between the parties, and would not interfere with the august repose of Judges. It is easy to understand, however, that the Judges are averse to any shortening of the Long Vacation, whether for themselves or others. Having attained to that haven of rest, the Bench, they desire to enjoy their dignity with as much otium as possible. Moreover, remembering the terrible wear-and-tear which, as leaders of the Bar, they have had to undergo, perhaps beyond all other professional men, they naturally carry with them a notion that the Long Vacation is an ordinance of Providence and a necessity of Nature. But though the exhausted "nature" of Queen's Counsel may require to "know no law" for twelve weeks, it is by no means clear that the hungry junior, the eager solicitor, and the anxious suitor are in need of the same vacuum. The hungry junior, indeed, has not given tongue on the question. He has no means of doing so. But if the silent evidence of his multitudinous presence in the neighbourhood of the Vacation Court can be trusted, he would plump for the abolition of the Vacation, if only because it might lead to a more equal distribution of briefs. The Solicitors have spoken with no uncertain voice in favour of the reform. Indeed, as solicitors mostly hunt in couples, if not in trios or quartets, and can, therefore, always have an alter ego to represent them when away, it is obvious that the closing of the Courts for so many days simply means the loss of so many chances of making money. It is pretended, however, that the anxious suitor is only anxious for his holiday as soon as August comes, and that he would be the first to cry out, if he was dragged back to recover his property or clear his character very long before November. It may be that in days when nearly all England was devoted to agriculture, and wanted to go off and do its harvesting and autumnal ploughing, and the inhabitants of cities could get all their cases heard in a few days of Guild-hall sittings or Assizes, that this pretence was a reality. But it can hardly be put forward as a serious argument to-day. Indeed, the suitor, as represented by the lay Member of Parliament, has shown dangerous symptoms of rebellion, and of taking the law into his own hands. Two years ago, a motion to curtail the Long Vacation was only defeated in the House of Commons by a few votes. A gallant attack on that institution, led by Mr. H. Fowler, last year, in the debate on the new Rules of Procedure, failed, because the actual motion made would not have had the desired effect, and was made in a House almost wholly consisting of lawyers, not because the sense of the House was against it. In fact, the Long Vacation is advantageous only to a score or two of leading barristers, to her Majesty's Judges, and perhaps to some of those ornamental young gentlemen who call, as it were, at the Bar, on the road to the county bench or a seat in Parliament. To every one else, it is an obstruction. To the suitors, it is an unmitigated wrong, a delay and denial of justice, clean contrary to the provisions of Magna Charta "in that case made and provided." Nor will it be long before another attack is made on this antiquated institution. The days of the Long Vacation will soon be cut even shorter than they now are. If the Council of Judges do not educate themselves up to the cutting place, as another august council is in the habit of doing, rash and irreverent outsiders may try their own hands at the scissors, and perhaps cut it off altogether. Some way or another, we may be quite sure that the reform will get itself effected, and our sons will wonder how it was that the interests of the many were so long sacrificed to the convenience of the few.

THE DOMINION OF AUSTRALIA.

THE Australian Conference has been in one way a success. It was supposed that the jealousies of the Colonies were still too keen to allow of Federation, but the pressure of events has been severe, the necessity for union in foreign policy has convinced the people, and the local statesmen are unusually resolute. The Delegates, by avoiding one or two delicate questions, one of them being the site of the capital, have obtained unanimity, and have resolved "that the time has arrived at which a complete Federal Union of the Australian Colonies can be attained." They have therefore drawn up a Bill, to be submitted to Parliament, under which all Colonies which accept the measure shall form a Federation, to be called, doubtless, either the "Australian Dominion" or the "Dominion of the Pacific," and to be governed, as regards most national matters, by a Federal Council. This Council is to consist of two members for each free Colony, and one for each Crown Colony, who will be appointed, we believe, by the Legislatures, though this is not stated in the telegrams. That is, however, the obvious intention; and it is expected, moreover, as we judge from some ad interim arrangements, that one of the Councillors will always be the Premier of the Colony represented. The Council will meet once a year, choosing as its place of meeting each capital alternately, and will control all relations with Pacific islanders, measures of defence, the laws of marriage, divorce, naturalisation, quarantine, patents, copyright, bills of exchange, the enforcement of criminal procedure, and "some other matters" not specified. Their decisions will be operative Acts, binding upon all subjects of the Dominion, and will be sanctioned by Her Majesty, through the Governor of the Colony in which the meeting is held.

It is obvious that this Constitution differs very widely from that of the Canadian Dominion. There is no provision for a Governor-General, and none for direct election, no Australian Ministry is contemplated, and, so far as the telegrams inform us, no Executive other than the Council itself is so much as hinted at. It is expected, obviously, that the Federal Council will act in Executive matters as a Cabinet, divide the work as a Cabinet does, and concede such headship as may be necessary to an elected Chairman. That scheme as an intermediate one may work, for the Councillors will, at first at all events, be the representative men of Australia, and will not be more numerous than a Cabinet; but, of course, it must be ultimately expanded. It will be nearly impossible to watch over Colonial Defence without permanent officials, quite impossible to create a Navy without a Minister of Marine, and most difficult to keep up the correspondence with the mother-country through Governors to be changed in each succeeding year. We do not believe either that free peoples like those of Australia will long permit vital questions like the laws of marriage and divorce, questions impinging closely upon religious sentiment, to be decided without direct popular representation. It will be necessary, moreover, very soon to create a central Exchequer, or the officers of the defensive services cannot be regularly paid; nor do we quite see how the Council can work, unless some method of increasing its powers, with the consent of the component Colonies, is embodied in the Act. These, however, are details, the main fact being that Australians recognise the necessity of a Federation, and of a common governing body, with direct and compulsory authority over those laws, marriage, divorce, conscription, commerce, and criminal procedure, which more than any others tend to create and maintain separate nationality. That is an immense step forward, and we do not doubt that when the plan has been reviewed in the Colonial Office, and re-debated in the Colonies, the details will be moulded into a definite and practicable shape. The central idea, that a Cabinet is to legislate as well as govern, only embodies the fact already existing in England and Canada; and a revisory power could safely be entrusted, subject to the veto of the Crown, to the Federal Council itself.

The Delegates evidently contemplate much correspondence before these details are settled, for they have arranged that until the Act is passed, the Premiers of the Colonies shall form a Standing Committee to watch over its progress, with power, should it be needful, to call a Convention to consider the proposals laid before them. Such a Convention will, undoubtedly, be necessary; but correspondence with Australia is now not long delayed, and we may hope that by next year the complete draft of a working Bill, unanimously accepted by the Colonies, may be sent home to be passed. The general sentiment in England is for Federation, the Australian Premiers are not likely to be dilatory, and the pressure of the convict question may prove most severe. There is a Declaration of Independence hidden in that question, as well as a possibility of European war. The Australians do not mean to allow all the worst villains of France to wander about their continent, even if they have to establish a Passport Law, or to defend their capitals by a torpedo service against a French fleet. They are, even as matters stand, and without English assistance, a good deal more powerful than the Tonquinese.

AGNOSTIC EXAMINATIONS IN RELIGION.

THE controversy which has been going on at Oxford is really due in much greater measure to the almost excessive Conservatism of English habits, than to anything like intolerance on the one side, or scepticism on the other. When Dissenters were relieved from the obligation of passing any theological test in order to obtain a University Degree, a strong feeling still prevailed that those who do not regard the old examination in religious knowledge as a test, and who are perfectly willing to undergo it, should be permitted to undergo it, and not be forced to accept the alternatives provided by the University for those who feel scruples on the subject. Of course, the assumption generally made was that none would undergo this examination in religious knowledge who did not in some sense regard the subject-matters in which they were to be examined with reverence, and who were not prepared to look at it as an examination in the foundations of their faith, rather than in antiquarian matters bearing on ecclesiastical history. When, then, it was announced that one of the Oxford Examiners in these subjects was to be a Dissenter who, even though he does himself look upon the subject-matter of the examination in this light, might very easily be succeeded by others who would feel an utter scorn for the credulity of any one who could regard it from that point of view, no wonder that a shock was felt by those who had retained their old feeling about the examination, and who very naturally dreaded lest that examination should be transformed into a mockery and a farce. It may be, and we suppose is quite true, as the Provost of Queen's wrote to Tuesday's Times, that this religious examination was formerly conducted by the Examiners in Classics, who need not have been members of the Church of England at all, and who might, therefore, have easily included Nonconformists like Mr. Horton,—though as mere classical proficiency would then have been put in the front of the battle, the fact of their Nonconformity might easily have escaped remark. But the fact that the shock to religious feeling was veiled under the old arrangement, and that it comes out into prominence under the new, is not one that makes any difference in the character, or even in the propriety of the feeling itself. The real mistake, as it seems to us, lies in making the religious examination compulsory on all who cannot profess a positive religious scruple against it. This of itself almost compels a great many agnostic Nonconformists, to whom such a scruple would be impossible, to pass through it; and if we understand the Provost of Queen's aright, a great many Nonconformists, some of whom may feel as Anglicans felt about the examination in religious knowledge, but very many of whom are as likely as not to be pure agnostics, and to look upon it much as they would look upon an examination in the Greek or Roman mythology, do as a matter of fact pass through the examination, and do not pretend to allege a scruple on the subject. The result is that a great deal more scandal has been caused by the exposure of the light in which both examiners and examinees practically regard the examination, than by the special nomination which brought the difficulty to light. Mr. Horton is admitted to be the last man in the world to make the examination an irreverent one, but it is clearly perceived that the sort of pleas offered for the examination, and the statements now officially made about it, show that the examination might easily become a very irreverent one, and that, too, in the hands of a man to whom there could not be any such formal objection than there is to Mr. Horton himself. So far as we can judge, the remedy is very simple. Either the examination in religious knowledge as a Pass examination should be abolished altogether,—leaving such candidates as choose, to go out in Honours in religious subjects, as they do in the University of London, where it very rarely indeed happens, we imagine, that any agnostic would think of showing his proficiency in subjects for which he feels something like scorn,—or else an alternative for it should be offered at the arbitrary option of the candidates, and not to such only as can profess religious scruples against submitting to such an examination. It is obvious enough that the very persons who are least likely to feel religious scruples in learning by rote the Articles of the Church of England, and writing out the regular book-knowledge about them, are those who are most likely to look on the whole affair as a bit of pure antiquarianism, without any relation to their own faith. And yet such men as these would hardly choose religious knowledge by preference as the subject of their examination, if any other subject which interested them more and was to no greater difficulty were offered as an alternative for it. If seems clear to us that the University of Oxford should either abolish altogether the Pass examination in religious knowledge, or at least offer an alternative for it which any man might choose without relation to moral scruples which he did not feel.

We do think there is a legitimate and a strong ground of objection to forcing on agnostics or quasi-agnostics an examination in subjects regarded by some of their contemporaries as sacred, while they themselves, with others of their contemporaries, may regard them as not very different in kind from the ancient mythologies. The mere fact that they are regarded as matters of faith by some, makes them something quite different from mere matters of history to those who would otherwise so regard them. It is hardly possible for those who look down on their contemporaries for believing, to get up the subject-matter of that credulous belief without a sneer in their hearts,—and that sneer seems to us much more dangerous to religion than any ignorance as to the external history of religion could possibly be. This is, we take it, what has alarmed, and rightly alarmed, the religious party in Oxford,—not the selection of Mr. Horton, who is probably as good a man for Examiner as could be found, but the evidence that there is nothing to prevent an agnostic, or a downright unbeliever, from being put in Mr. Horton's place; and worse still, that there is nothing to prevent even a reverent and orthodox examiner from feeling compelled to pass men who have shown a competent knowledge of the subject of examination, even though they should treat the whole subject as if it were a story of obsolete superstitions. We do not see that there was any remedy for this evil in vetoing the appointment of Mr. Horton. That appointment has been vetoed, but a very much less reverent man might be nominated in his place, and yet no one be the wiser. The only remedy is to extinguish at the very least the compulsory character of the examination, and to admit none to it who do not positively select it in preference to examination in a secular subject of equal difficulty. The "conscience clause" can have no application to a subject in relation to which the least sensitive consciences are the most cold and indifferent. You might as well make it the one legitimate excuse for escaping an examination in music that the candidate has so sensitive an ear that he could not pass through the practical tests without pain to his auditory nerve, as make it the only excuse for escaping a theological examination that the candidate must have spiritual scruples against encountering it. In the one case, you would oblige all persons of obtuse and unmusical ears to go through a musical examination precisely because they are unfit for it; and in the other case, you do oblige all those persons who happen to have obtusely unspiritual minds to accept an examination which will probably increase that obtuseness, and which will certainly illustrate it.

We should like to add a word on the very undesirable character of a Pass examination in the Thirty-nine Articles, even for members of the Church of England, at such a time as the present. In a day when the deepest points of faith are really at issue, and when nobody can pretend that the form of the Thirty-nine Articles is in any degree well adapted to clear up, or even lighten, fundamental difficulties, it seems to us an anachronism to ask young men to pass an examination in the Thirty-nine Articles as a part of their Degree examination. The truth is that this is a subject exceedingly ill adapted for an elementary examination in religious knowledge, and had it not constituted part of the examination, the present excitement could never have arisen. Mr. Horton would not have been in the least objectionable as an Examiner in Scripture knowledge, and would in all probability never have been objected to. That examinees in Divinity should be expected to understand something of the history of our formularies, is reasonable enough. But nothing seems to us so unfortunate as that Pass men should be examined,—unless at least they happen to feel a conscientious objection, which they are then least likely to feel if they have no sort of interest in the subject,—in antiquated formulæ which hardly express adequately the faith of a single living man of any earnestness, whether he belongs to the Anglican Church or not.

THE ULTIMATE RESIDUUM.

A CONTROVERSY arose a few weeks ago which, but that Editors rather shirked it, would have become a bitter one, about the possibility of complete retrogression from a civilised state. A Fantee negro, who had been educated in England, had embraced the Ministry, and had married a white wife, was represented by a novelist as, on his return to his own country, throwing off his clothes, relapsing into fetichism, and becoming once more in all respects a savage Fantee. A great many writers declared this to be impossible, and, moreover, an insult to Christianity; while a great many more bore witness that similar cases had been repeatedly known, both in Liberia and Australia, and the wilder parts of Spanish America. There is, we believe, no doubt of the facts, and as little that the easy theory of insanity does not explain them all; and if those who denied them had talked to experienced London philanthropists, the people who really know the very lowest class, their incredulity would speedily have disappeared. We do not believe there is a single man or woman engaged in benevolent work in London, whether clergyman, or missionary, or doctor, or manager of charities, who does not acknowledge that, below the poor, and outside the criminal class, there exists a residuum of men and women who are not bad, or corrupt, or vile, in any usual sense of those words, so much as distinctly savage,—who reject civilisation in toto, and in rejecting it make the work of improvement inconceivably hard. And these philanthropists, if exceedingly experienced, and reflective besides, as happens occasionally, will further acknowledge that of all small difficulties, the difficulty of convincing comfortable Philistines that such people really exist is one of the greatest.

We are all or nearly all aware that savages are, and that some of them prefer savage life; but then we are all convinced that this, in some unknown way, is a consequence of their dark skin. White savages, we hold, cannot exist, but only people who, if trouble enough were taken and money enough were spent, would become, at least to an endurable degree, civilised persons. They do not wish, it is alleged, to be savages, and are only forced into that condition by the pressure of circumstances, lasting, perhaps, for generations. That comforting theory may, of course, be true, as it may be true of the Digger Indians, the Veddahs, and the Andamanese, for we hardly know what effects generations of untoward circumstance will cause; but most philanthropists of wide experience would deny it. They say with one voice that in all European capitals there are a few thousands of persons who form a residuum, who hate civilisation with a hatred which is incurable by any fear, or any reward, or any searchingness of inspection. If the climate is cold, they will wear clothes—they will hardly do that in Naples—but that is the sole concession they will make to the claims of civilisation. They will clean nothing, and preserve nothing, and provide for nothing. If there are doors and they are cold, they will burn the doors. If they want a fire and no wood is handy, they will tear off skirting-boards, or burn the balusters of a staircase. It is useless to give them furniture, for they prefer to camp; hopeless to provide them cloacæ, for they will not use them—read Mr. Glazier in the Nineteenth Century, and remember what he means—vain to store food for them, for they will consume it all at once. They will work when there is nothing to eat, but if they are full, they abhor work until they are empty again. They are not criminals as a rule, any more than the wild tribes are; but they are savages, loving above all things to live lives untrammelled by the infinite series of minute restraints and obligations which, if you think of it, go to make up civilisation. It is possible to live without washing, or decency, or furniture, or foresight, or care; and they prefer so to live, though the result seems to the civilised unqualified misery and pain. They do not think it unqualified, but qualified very greatly by their freedom, holding only three things to be essential,—food, sleep, and wives; and only three to be luxuries, more food, drink, and tobacco,—just as millions do in Africa, Australia, and some rare but extensive tracts of Southern Asia. And the philanthropists will tell you yet another and stranger thing,—that these savages are not all hereditary; that they are recruited from above; that their life, with its contempt for wants and bonds, has an attraction; and that their own heaviest and most urgent task is to prevent the class next above suddenly giving up the fight, and dropping down despairing, yet relieved, among the savages whose lives are free from effort, and from thought, and from shame. Every day some family does so drop, and in bad years so many, that observers quietly looking on doubt whether even Mr. Glazier's tremendous remedy can be trusted, and whether the savages of the great cities will gradually kill themselves out. They have not done so yet, and it is doubtful whether they ever will, whether they are not protected by facts which have their roots deep down in human nature. Civilised man has not observed himself very carefully yet, though he has held the microscope over some savage tribes; but it is probable that in every civilised community there is a per-centage both of men and women to whom the first condition of external civilisation, the incessant taking of minute trouble, is utterly hateful, and who if left to themselves would not take it, but would prefer a condition of pure savagery. The rich, of course, seldom reveal the disposition, because others take the trouble for them; but every year the papers mention a few cases, some man or woman with money who has died camped on a mattress in a fireless room, so foul that the Sanitary Inspector has to send in scavengers. The unhappy inmate, it is generally said, had bread and milk brought every day, but never bought anything else, or cleaned anything, or attempted to secure so much as a change of raiment. The story is usually quoted as an instance of miserliness; but it is really an outbreak of the savage impatience of orderliness, decency, and petty restraint which breeds the savages of great cities, and which, as those who doubt our statements may remember with advantage, constantly breaks out in some children, and is denounced by perplexed mothers and bewildered servants as a passion of untidiness. There are children, as all doctors know, who seem half insane in their hatred of the minute but constant trouble which alone keeps children neat; and young men whom nothing can compel to the commonest observances of civilisation. The number of such persons, of course, is much greater in great cities, partly because those who feel this impulse fly to alleys for concealment, but chiefly because it is the miserable who are tempted by savagery, and find in it a relief. The unskilled labourer and his wife, who earn possibly only twelve shillings a week, who know nothing, and who are pressed by no public opinion, are constantly tempted to throw off the burden of respectability, abandon furniture, give up the small decencies and formalities of life, and camp in a room on straw, as uncleanly and nearly as free as savages would be. They live from hand to mouth, shift from room to room, are beyond prosecution for money, drink if they have the cash, smoke somehow whether they have it or not, and are as indifferent to opinion or society, or any earthly thing, except the order of an employer, often himself a labourer, as dogs or horses would be. When that process has commenced early, or gone on long, all enjoyments are superseded by the single one,—freedom from restraint; and the family are savages, Fantees, not incurable, it may be, but incurable by any effort such as is now made, as far beyond the reach of sanitary laws or the like as the majority of Africans. Put four such families into the neatest of houses, and in a week it will be like a sty in ruins. They defy taxation, evade inspection, and present to officious philanthropy a front which, especially just now, when they are irritated to madness by the suddenly aroused inquisitiveness of the police and the rich, is often very dangerous. If their rookeries are cleared, they will crowd still further together, descend into the cellars, as in Berlin, or, as in parts of Paris and Naples, abandon the pretence of house-keeping altogether, and live habitually in the open air.

What is the cure for such a class, which makes all effort to secure sanitary comfort futile, and constantly endangers the class just above, which, again, both hates and dreads it? We cannot find that those who know them best conceive of any. The Clergy say they are comparatively few, and hope, with Mr. Glazier, that as civilisation filters down they may die out; but of directly improving methods they say little, and they are, as we gather from many statements, secretly despairing, rather anxious to prevent the very poor from becoming savages, than ready to repeat efforts which they know by experience to be futile. There are tribes which Missionaries avoid, as being beneath the level at which Christianity can be understood; and there are groups of families whom the sanitary reformer prefers not to see, satisfied that his energy will be all in vain. We suppose force, directed by enlightenment, would cure them; but force cannot be employed, and without it the brain grows fatigued in the effort to think out any method which, if we had millions of money and unnumbered agents, would be of the least use. A religion might do it, as it has done in part for the Hindoos; but we cannot make a religion, and the Clergy already strain their consciences by talking as if the Evangelists had made cleanliness, or even the prevention of epidemics, part of the Moral Law. There is nothing to be done, that we see, except to cut off recruits by educating all above the savages, to insist on supplying drainage and water where we can, and to keep up an incessant worry on the landlords, who occasionally can exercise some sort of pressure.

And if we are to do the last effectually, we must let the wretched landlords make profits; and if they make profits, there are more miserable families ready to descend into savagedom, and so the weary round goes on endlessly. Only, if we keep on, we may hope that the round will become a spiral, perpetually growing smaller, until at last, some fine day, when savagery is reduced to a spot, we may treat it as a form of insanity, and so finally stamp it forcibly out. At all events, when we have done all we mean to do for the next ten Sessions, we shall not have cured this master-evil of all.

ATHLETIC GAMES.

IT is characteristic of the times that the refusal of the Nottinghamshire Cricket Club to play Lancashire next season, has produced as great an excitement and almost as many leading articles as if Mr. Gladstone had refused to meet Lord Salisbury at dinner, or the Opposition had determined never to divide against the Government next Session. Nor is it to cricket alone, among games, that this immense importance is attached. The victory of the Blackburn Rovers in the Association Challenge Cup contests at football last year, was hailed by thousands of the population of Lancashire with as much or more enthusiasm than the defeat of the Conservatives in 1880. The Oxford and Cambridge Boatrace and Athletic Sports almost drive politics out of the newspapers; and the state of No. 7's digestion, or the exact amount to which Bow feathers under water, become keener topics of public anxiety than "what the Swede intends, or what the French."

This public interest in games and sports seems to become keener every year. It has quite eclipsed the public interest in "Sport," so called, such as horse-racing, which is only kept alive by the fact that it supplies people with a convenient Stock Exchange, on which they may gamble and lose their hundreds or "tenners," or their shillings and coppers, according to their means. The importance of Athletic Sports grows, and is likely to grow for a long time to come. For the area of those who either personally take part in these contests, or who throng to them as spectators, is continually growing. The importance attached to games may, indeed, almost be said to be a test, it is certainly an accompaniment of civilisation. The Olympian Games did not become of real importance as games, apart from their importance as a religious ceremony, till the brilliant period of Greek life; and the triumph of Alcibiades in the chariot race was a fit emblem of the supremacy of Athens in the world of politics, literature, and art. Even the tournaments of the middle ages were not introduced into England till the age of chivalry, the brilliant period of the Edwards, when mediæval art and literature were at their highest, the days of the completion of Westminster Abbey and of the writing of the "Canterbury Tales." But there is one great difference between the sports of ancient Greece and mediæval Europe and modern England, in that the former had a direct reference to the most serious struggles of life. The cultivation of wrestling, and running, and throwing the quoit, the chariot race itself, were, like the mediæval tournament, all useful, and intended to be useful, as preparing men for war,—the real business of life. Our modern games owe their popularity solely to the fact that they vary the sedentary occupations to which the bulk of the middle classes is devoted. The interest in them we believe to be a growing one because of the spread of education, and the increase in the number of those destined to sedentary occupations. Games are the proper occupation of a large part of the time spent in education. From Plato downwards, every educationalist has recognised the necessity of training the body as well as the mind, and games are the best training for the body. The importance of games and the time devoted to them in Public Schools is, no doubt, often excessive, and boys are apt to leave school having, in Professor Huxley's phrase, acquired nothing but "good manners and gentlemanly proficiency in cricket." But the boys wholly devoted to games are better than the boys who are wholly devoted to loafing. Even Mr. Max O'Rell prefers the English boy with his soul which too often never rises above cricket and football, to the French boy with plenty of esprit, but with his desires set on unwholesome cigars, and still more unwholesome novels. The cultivation of games has now spread from the great aristocratic schools such as Eton and Winchester to the smaller middle-class grammar schools, and signs are not wanting that their importance is likely to be soon recognised even in the public Elementary Schools. The love of games and the appreciation of prowess in them thus developed in the boy cling to the man. No schoolboy whose heart has been in his mouth when there are four runs to get and two wickets to fall in the Eton and Winchester match can ever be unmoved afterwards at the sight of a well-contested game, whether of cricket or football, or lawn-tennis, even if when he leaves school he falls out of the ranks of active combatants into those of spectators. The glamour of youthful enthusiasm clings round games and the heroes of games for the rest of his life, and he always likes to see that his school or university has been victorious in the old contests. Hence the spread of education means also the spread of athleticism. Every widening of the circle of schools which take cognizance of games widens the circle of those who even in mature life are, if not enthusiastic, yet interested in watching or reading about games and the players of games.

But there is something more than mere memory which attracts men to games, even in mature life, and that is the desire of exercise, or if not of exercise pure and simple, yet of relaxation. There can, indeed, be little doubt that much exercise is not good for the man who has to use his brains much. Plato himself, advocate for gymnastics as he was, insisted that great brain work and great body work could not profitably be carried on at the same time. Still, even the hardest brain-worker feels the necessity of "breaking out" from time to time into body work, as a relief. Great numbers, too, of those whose occupations are sedentary do not have great brain work to do, and are not too old for games of even a violent order. To a clerk in an office, the checking of figures tends to become purely mechanical, just as much as the particular finger-work a man has who works in a factory. For both of these classes, a Saturday afternoon devoted to football or cricket is the best possible diversion, both from their work and from the otherwise inevitable pothouse. Both these classes grow with every social and commercial development. Every improvement in machinery, every improvement in the civilisation of the world, increases the number of those whose daily occupations are sedentary. If the physique of the human race is to be preserved, playgrounds and games must be increased in proportion. In this view, the invention of the bicycle and tricycle is one of the greatest blessings which mechanical ingenuity has lately conferred upon the lower-middle class, enabling as it does the denizens of great cities to get, with no expense but that of a little wholesome labour, within sight and smell of country scenes and country air. The Bicycle Club, like the football and cricket club, by adding the glory of distinction to success, increases the number of competitors, and therewith the number of those who are interested in and benefited by the contests. The result, no doubt, is that some people indulge in games to an excess which is hurtful to their constitutions, or to their morals and success in life. There are certainly not a few men whose prospects in life have been ruined or seriously blighted by their success at games. But these are but a very small per centage of those who have benefited by games in their youth or early manhood. It is true also that the true spirit of games is gone when they have to rely on professional assistance. The notion of paying people to bowl for you in a match is abhorrent to the true lover of cricket. The development of the professional element is a process that, if continued, is likely to reduce the game to the level of billiards or horse-racing, in which the sums which can be won are the chief incentives to either practising them or taking an interest in them. The disease, however, tends to cure itself. The Derby is not what it was, and it is not at all improbable that cricket will sink like horse-racing, if the professional element goes on increasing. But if cricket sinks, some other game will rise in its place. The necessity for sports which involve violent exercise is, as we have shown, likely to be a continuing one; and the more wide-spread it becomes, the more wide-spread will be the public interest felt in the more celebrated contests. We do not wish to see our rival Blues become the badges of partisans, like the Greens and Blues of the Circus at Constantinople. But within limits, the public interest in games is a wholesome one, and is a sign of a wholesome indulgence in physical relaxation.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The Spectator would not willingly be unjust, even to those who fail to see any close connection between the Channel Tunnel and the invasion of England. It is not quite fair to infer that we base our views on the supposition that treachery is now impossible, or that we are so ignorant of military history as to believe that formal declarations have invariably preceded war. Colonel Maurice's paper is very creditable to his powers of research, and it takes up a good deal of space in the Blue-book. It has only one fault, and even that is a negative one. It proves nothing whatever. In place of the hundred instances of wars begun without formal warning—it was merciful of Colonel Maurice not to go back beyond 1700—let us have a single case in which, of two nations circumstanced like France and England to-day, one succeeded in preparing an expedition against the other without a hint transpiring. Take one of the cases you cite. "In 1854, the British Fleet entered the Black Sea, with orders to compel the Russian Fleet to return to Sebastopol, before the British Ambassador had left St. Petersburg." Certainly, but how on earth does this prove that if England and Russia had been connected by a tunnel, and were carrying on continuous communication, as are France and England at this moment, Russia would not, long before this phase of affairs, have taken the very ordinary precautions necessary to guard her end of the hole? And do you not see, Sir, the logical outcome of the last paragraph of your article?—"Mobilisation has been reduced to a science. . . . Heavy corps d'armée can be collected without exciting remark. [By-the-by, is this really so?] We can see no reason why a French President should not collect 30,000 men and reach the British coast before a single Englishman was aware." If all this means anything, it means that our great southern harbours must be prepared for a French expedition any night. There is nothing, in your view, to prevent a great French fleet entering Plymouth or Portsmouth to-morrow night, and turning our defences. We depend for the safety of these great Dockyards, and for that of the country, on the assumption that we shall have a little warning. The defence of every country in Europe at this moment is based on the certainty of gaining the few hours you are calmly denying us. Germany is tolerably well prepared for war at this moment, yet she admits the necessity of forty-eight hours at least to put down her mines at Kiel and Wilhelmshafen. We do not need forty-eight hours to defend a tunnel; particularly little warning is required to defend a tunnel. It would be interesting, and much more to the point, had the Intelligence Department prepared a paper on the defence of defiles in history, commencing with that of Thermopylæ. A tunnel is an ideal defile.—I am, Sir, &c., S.

THE MINORITY VOTE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The only plan to secure the representation of Minorities is the simple one of having one Member to each constituency. The west end of Dundee would be sure to return a different type of Member from the eastern division of the town. So in Perthshire. The western division would probably return a Conservative, the eastern certainly a staunch Liberal. With these constituencies I am best acquainted, but I feel sure that other large constituencies would have the same experience. Residence alone should qualify for a county vote; any other qualification makes the manufacture of faggot votes certain.

I see a difficulty in regard to Ireland not named in Lord Hartington's speech of warning. I do not think Scottish Liberals are afraid of the extension of the suffrage in Ireland. We expect Mr. Parnell's influence to be lessened, and his difficulties to be increased, when he has a larger following, and especially entirely new constituencies with conflicting interests, to manage. What we want to know is whether, if a clear majority of Irish representatives desire a certain policy, Mr. Chamberlain is first of all to move heaven and earth to secure a true representation of Ireland, and then the moment he has secured it, to use the Scotch and English majority to outvote Ireland, and so condemn Irishmen to a hopeless and eternal minority. I have another reason for this question. I feel certain that the vast majority of Gladstonian Liberals in Scotland are in favour of immediate Disestablishment. I am sure that the Spectator is not aware of the strength of this feeling. Our loyalty to Mr. Gladstone, and the supreme issues of foreign policy, at the last election have caused us to refrain from urging this question. The existence of a Liberal Government is impossible, without the solid Scotch vote. That vote never will be given, unless indeed some national crisis again demands that we shall abstain from all division of the party. Now, if the great majority in Scotland are for Disestablishment, are we to be represented, and are our wishes to be given effect to; or is Mr. Chamberlain to permit us to express ourselves, and then quietly use the English majority to postpone indefinitely the measure we deem of most consequence? If so, I venture to predict that our allegiance to the Liberal party will not stand this strain, especially in the absence of Mr. Gladstone.—I am, Sir, &c., A SCOTTISH LIBERAL.

[For what purpose can the vote of the great majority of the people of the United Kingdom be used better, than to outvote a minority, however local and however united, on such a question as the disintegration of that kingdom? We should not allow Wales, nor Cornwall, nor even the Orkneys and Shetlands, to break up the United Kingdom. Nor ought we to let Ireland do so, unless we really believed it to be for the advantage of the whole kingdom, which we do not believe.—Ed. Spectator.]

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In an editorial note to a letter on "The Negative Vote," you say, "No doubt, minorities are over-represented now. In that we heartily agree." Now, I cannot see how you come to agree with this conclusion. A study of the returns of the last general election appears to me to prove that the Conservative minority at least is under-represented.

Take England and Wales. In 227 constituencies, returning 368 Members, the total vote, in round numbers, was 1,523,000. I arrive at that by adding together the highest Liberal and the highest Conservative vote in each case, and making a grand total of the whole,—perhaps a rough method. Of this 1,522,000, 823,000 were Liberal and 699,000 were Conservative votes. Therefore, of every 100 votes, 53 were Liberal, and 47 Conservative. Now, if each side were represented in proportion to their voting strength, the Liberals should have 53 per cent. of the 368 Members, and the Conservatives 47 per cent. But what was the fact? 230, or 62 per cent., of the Members returned were Liberal, and only 138, or 38 per cent., were Conservatives.—I am, Sir, &c., Bardolph Road, December 5th.

GEORGE W. SHEAVES.

[We never said that any particular minority was over-represented; we said minorities in general were, whether Liberal, or Conservative, or Radical, or nondescript, and that is a matter of mathematical demonstration when, as Mr. Chamberlain says, six millions and a quarter have only just as many representatives as a quarter of a million. But there is nothing to prove, as yet, which party is most misrepresented.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE NEGATIVE VOTE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Mr. J. Parker Smith objects to a negative vote, as carrying undue influence. He says, "Take the case of three candidates, A, B, C. . . . By allowing a voter to record a negative vote against A, you double his power, for the effect will clearly be the same as if he were able to vote both for B and for C." But the same argument may be used of a positive vote. A positive vote for A is equivalent to a negative vote against B and against C. Surely the objection is fallacious.—I am, Sir, &c., Southlea, Malvern, December 3rd.

S. LATHAM.

[A positive vote for A is a negative vote against both B and C, when there is but one vacancy to fill up. But it is not a negative vote against both B and C when there are two vacancies to fill up. But a negative vote against A is equivalent to a positive vote for both B and C, when there are two vacancies to fill up. And as in that case under our present system an elector would have two votes to give, undoubtedly by using one of his votes negatively and the other positively, he would exert more influence than the man who used both positively.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE RESIDENTIAL FREEHOLDER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your article on the county franchise, last week, you question if the freehold qualification, with a condition of residence attached to it, is worth contending for; because it matters little whether a man votes in respect of the occupation of the house he lives in, or the ownership of a house he does not live in. But you overlook the case of the man who does not legally occupy, but who, nevertheless, resides,—the younger member of a family who, by gift or by purchase, has acquired a freehold qualification within the limits of the constituency where he resides. The advocates of manhood suffrage claim in favour of their measure that it would enfranchise this, a better educated class than the average: the opponents of the faggot system do not fear residential faggot votes, whilst all parties would be anxious to retain or enfranchise those who acquire a qualification by their own exertions. The out-voter of humble means is already disfranchised by the operation of the Corrupt Practices Act of last Session; therefore, to disfranchise the wealthy out-voter, is only an act of justice; but to disfranchise the residential freeholder, is to raise an unnecessary obstacle in the way of Reform.—I am, Sir, &c., W. EATON YOUNG.

THE POOR-LAW IN THE EAST OF LONDON.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—It may not be generally known to your readers that in some of the poorest of our East London parishes—Whitechapel, Stepney, and St. George's-in-the-East—out-door relief is no longer given. It was scarcely to be expected that so thorough a measure of Poor-law reform could be carried out without entailing some injustice towards those whom age and misfortune had brought to the threshold of the workhouse, but who, by their character and antecedents, would be sadly out of place within its walls. For the relief of these, the Tower Hamlets Pension Committee was formed, some six years ago, and now helps to support ninety-one old men and women, whose character and homes are exceptionally good, and whose relatives are doing all they can to assist. The pensions are distributed by lady almoners, and their friendship and sympathy are as highly valued as the material aid they bring. The expenses of management are borne by the Committee, all contributions going direct to the poor. Funds are urgently needed to provide for the coming year. I venture to think that those who are seeking the opportunity of sharing their Christmas joys with their less fortunate brethren, could not do better than help to bring a little sunshine into the declining years of those whose life has been one long day of patient toil. Contributions may be sent to A. G. Crowder, Esq., 65 Portland Place, W.; or to Miss Townsend, St. Jude's School House, Commercial Street, E., from whom reports and all information may be obtained.—I am, Sir, &c., C. W. FREMANTLE.

DR. BEGG AND THE SCOTCH DEMOCRACY.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Many readers must have welcomed the thoughtful and comprehensive survey in last week's Spectator of the clerical conditions in Scotland. It suggests a few points which are worthy of notice. In the numerous sketches of the late Rev. Dr. Begg which have appeared, one side of his life and work has been almost completely overlooked. A Conservative of the most uncompromising type in matters ecclesiastical, he was a remarkable exemplification of an apparently incongruous character often met with in Scotland. On social and trade questions, Dr. Begg was entirely Democratic in his sympathies, and although in later years unable to take an active part in popular movements, he was at one time denounced by Tories and Moderate Liberals as a dangerous agitator, and looked upon in the same light in which similar critics now regard Mr. Jesse Collings and Mr. Joseph Arch. Twenty-five years ago he stumped the country, holding meetings in towns and hamlets, at which he denounced the "Bothie" system of housing agricultural labourers, urged the abolition of feuing markets, and propounded modes of reform which were considered revolutionary. For some years I had the pleasure of working with him in several industrial movements, and can bear testimony to the intensity of his convictions and his self-sacrificing zeal. On one occasion, he addressed a large meeting, chiefly composed of working-men, at which he strongly condemned the land-laws, exposed the miserable condition of the labourers and crofters, and in effect, if not in words, implied that the people, whose rights and claims had been so long ignored, would be justified in combining to demand the restoration of the property which had been stolen from them. He advocated Trades Unions, when to do so was a social discredit, and I have often heard him dilate on the tyranny of capital and the necessity that workmen should unite in the protection of their highest interests. When the Edinburgh improvement schemes had removed many of the poorer class of dwellings, and overcrowding was all-prevalent, Dr. Begg was one of the very few to aid a co-operative building effort which has, since 1862, provided comfortable dwellings for many thousands, at an expenditure of over half-a-million, and enabled the occupiers to become the owners, by the payment of a trifling amount over ordinary rent. He wrote a book, entitled "Happy Homes," giving an account of this interesting experiment, and earnestly advocating its adoption in other great centres of population. Had Dr. Begg not fallen under the influence of the clerical caste, he would have become a great Democratic leader, and we might have seen in Scotland, long ere this time, an extended franchise and the working-out of a Liberal measure of land reform. The name of Dr. Begg will form a conspicuous figure in the ecclesiastical records of Scotland, and his memory will be long cherished by the masses as that of a wise counsellor and a courageous helper.—I am, Sir, &c., H. G. REID.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY'S PESSIMISM.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I am going to ask a favour at your hands, which I fear you will think a great presumption; but the desire to call attention to a very significant utterance of Professor Huxley's is so irresistible that I must run the risk. I will be as brief as possible.

In the Times of December 7th, Professor Huxley is reported as observing "that the world was not constructed upon any plan which did, upon attentive consideration, produce amiable feelings in the breast of the philanthropist." Now, it must be remembered that philanthropy is, ex concessio, a product,—the ultimate moral product of evolution. We have, therefore, evolution becoming conscious of itself, and, as it does so, becoming, under the form of philanthropy, dissatisfied with itself; wishing, that is, that things were otherwise, and yet unable to remedy them. Now, what, I ask, is this but sheer, unmitigated, unmistakable Christianity? This one fact of the consciousness of incurable wrong is that which binds together and is common ground to every Christian utterance, from him who wrote the myth of the Fall to the latest Christian apologist. Moreover, the law that expresses it has been formulated by St. Paul, to whom it was given to discover the truth in this matter as surely as to Mr. Darwin it was given to discover evolution. In primitive man, the law takes the form of being under the displeasure of God; in moral man, it is conscience; in social man, it is the law; in evolutionary man, it is the sentiment of philanthropy. But everywhere it is the same,—there is something wrong in us, and we cannot cure it. Hence the justification of a revelation of power from above. The specific remedy for the burden of which Professor Huxley complains is obtained the moment any man can believe upon fair ground that we form part of a system very imperfectly understood, but other parts of which will explain the mystery that cleaves to one portion of the whole. But to be assured of this in any experimental way, we must have a revelation from those other parts sufficient to show that we have a living interest in them. This is what Christianity professes to do for us, and all arguments based upon its adaptation to man's spiritual and moral needs merely come to this,—that the Christian revelation starts from this admitted fact, restated once more by Professor Huxley, that it deals with it in a perfectly effective manner, that it meets the precise difficulty which philanthropy feels.

If further argument is needed to prove Christianity to the scientific mind, that can only be from analogy, i.e., by showing that the methods of revelation are such as might be expected from what we know of Nature, so that there is a fair presumption that both have one Cause. You, Sir, have told me that this yet remains to be done, and I most sincerely accept your decision. But will no one attempt it? Permit me to explain why I write thus. Years ago, when under the stress of philosophy, falsely so called, my "faith had almost gone, and my treadings had well nigh slipped," evolution came, and with a grasp that I had neither the will nor the power to resist placed me within the boundaries of the Christian faith. That some gifted man will enable evolution to do for others what it has done for me, is the hope of my life.—I am, Sir, &c.,

PROTECTION OF PAPER SECURITIES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The question discussed in your paper of Saturday last, namely, how best to protect from theft securities payable to bearer deposited for safe custody with bankers, is one of very great importance. I think I can throw some light on the subject, derived from my own experience.

Very many years ago, the public were shocked by the failure of an old-established London Banking-house, and the painful discovery that securities to a large amount which had been entrusted to their care had been dishonestly made away with, not by a subordinate, but by the partners themselves. I was at that time the head of a country banking firm, and we held on account of our clients a large amount of India Bonds, &c., which, for the purpose of receiving the half-yearly interest, we had transferred to our London correspondents. After such a heavy blow to public confidence as the disclosure I have referred to, I felt it to be due to our clients to be in a position to show them at any time that their property was safe, and accordingly I directed the return of halves of all their India Bonds, &c., the counterparts, with the interest coupons attached, remaining in our correspondents' hands.

The interest continued to be received as before, and when a sale was desired, the half-part held by us was sent up for the purpose. No inconvenience whatever resulted from this arrangement, which lasted for a long series of years, and, in fact, until our Bank was closed, by transfer to a Joint-Stock Banking Company.

The division of such securities as I have referred to (the separated parts being placed in different hands) seems to afford complete protection against fraud in respect of both sets of halves. Were I a London banker, I should decline receiving for safe custody any securities payable to bearer, unless thus divided. Had the River Plate Company adopted this simple precaution, the loss they have recently sustained would have been impossible. I may add that a perforated line carried through the security would render its division (when required) more easy.

The plan I have described has already been suggested in a letter to the Times, some few weeks back. I merely write for the purpose of showing that it has been acted on with perfect success.—I am, Sir, &c., A RETIRED COUNTRY BANKER.

[The plan looks perfect, but does not meet depositors' difficulty. They want to avoid keeping their bonds, but are left in charge of the second halves.—Ed. Spectator.]

THE LITERARY PLÉBISCITE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your interesting article on "The Comparative Popularity of Literary Men," you assume that the readers of the Journal of Education belong, "in general, to a special class,—the class of Teachers;" and you also imply that the 500 competitors for the prize were men. Now, so far as my personal knowledge enables me to judge, I should say that the readers of the journal in question belong at least as much to other classes as to that of teachers. Barristers, clergymen, and a great many ladies are among its regular readers; and, of about twenty of my own acquaintances, who, like myself, compete for the prizes offered every month, not one is a professional teacher, and almost all are girls or young married ladies.

I may add, as I was one of the supporters of Kinglake, that I placed him on the list on the strength not of "The Invasion of the Crimea," but of "Eothen," which, like you, I regard as one of the most brilliant books of the century.—I am, Sir, &c.,

"JONATHAN SWIFT."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In your critique of "Jonathan Swift" last week, you make a misstatement on a matter of fact, which I shall be obliged by your correcting. The book is not an attempt, ambitious or otherwise, to solve the riddle of my hero's life, nor any other riddle. It is an attempt to hold the mirror up to the grandest and most terrible phase of nature, nothing more. The musty investigation of details can safely be left to the chroniclers.

I may fairly ask you to make this correction, as many who are capable of understanding a prose poem would never think of reading the plodding investigation of an historical commonplace. It is for them I have written.—I am, Sir, &c.,

THE AUTHOR OF "JONATHAN SWIFT."

ALBANO.

THE Lake lies calm in its mountain crown,
 And the twilight star shows clear,
 And large and solemn it gazes down
 In the mirror of the mere.
 Was it here they rowed in their crazy craft,
 Where only the ripples are,—
 The strange Lake-folk of the floating raft?
 Was it yesterday? said the star.

And the mountains slept, and the nights fell still,
 And the thousand years rolled by.
 Was there once a city on yon low hill,
 With its towers along the sky,
 And the cries of the war-din of long ago
 Wailed over the waters far?
 There is no stone left for a man to know
 Since yesterday, said the star.

And the mountains sleep and the ripples wake,
 And again a thousand years,
 And the tents of battle are by the lake,
 And the gleam of the horsemen's spears;
 They bend their brows with a fierce surmise
 On the lights in the plain afar,
 And the battle-hunger is in their eyes.
 Was it yesterday? said the star.

And a thousand years,—and the lake is still,
 And the star beams large and white,
 The burial chant rolls down the hill,
 Where they bury the monk at night;
 The mountains sleep and the ripples lave
 The shore where the pine-woods are,
 And there's little change but another grave
 Since yesterday, said the star.

WEARING Aurora's robe, night after night,
 Some radiant spirit rules the western sky,
 Drowning the sun-tints with such rich supply
 Of colours weaved of unremembered light,
 That it would seem the Master-painter's might
 Had wrought anew His palette there on high,
 To tell the tired world rainbows shall not die,
 Which first His pledge of promise did indite.
 Forged newly like a steel-blue scimitar,
 The crescent Moon shines keener than of old,
 And, as the drawn sword of one armed for war,
 Marshals those hosts of crimson, green, and gold,
 Till underneath the quiet Evening Star
 The great review pales out into the cold.

BOOKS.

We think that both as a piece of literary work, and as a contribution to contemporary history, this book would have been a better one, if it had been less in the form of a vindication or apology. As a mere reply to Lord Campbell's Life of Lyndhurst, which was published no less than fourteen years ago, it seems to come rather late. As a biography, it is so constructed as to suggest to many readers that a biographer who is so perpetually excusing his hero, accuses him.

Political tergiversations at various times and upon various questions constitute the staple of most of the accusations that have been brought against Lord Lyndhurst. Charges of this nature ought always, we think, to be received with caution. A statesman ought to be a man of observation and receptivity, capable of profiting by the additions continually made to political knowledge, and of advancing with the times. If his active career extends, like Lord Lyndhurst's, over more than forty years, it is a serious defect, if he can apply to the questions arising in the latter part of such a period no more enlarged views than he set out with. It is only when changes of opinion can be attributed either to capricious feebleness of mind or character, or when they are so timed as to advance personal interests, that they are justly destructive of confidence.

We think that several of Lord Lyndhurst's most conspicuous inconsistencies may be referred to causes which do him no discredit. Upon the Catholic question, the reasons for a change of policy which convinced the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel may well have convinced him. So upon the Corn Law question, as his strength did not lie in political economy or statistics, he may reasonably have deferred to the opinions of such of his colleagues as were more deeply versed in those branches of political knowledge. He is said by Lord Campbell to have been in his early days a Jacobin. Sir Theodore Martin denies this statement, and shows good grounds for doubting it. But the matter is of little moment. It is clear from the dates that if Lyndhurst was a Jacobin at all, it was when he was very young. There is nothing to show that he had any personal end to serve by being a Jacobin, or by ceasing to be one. The really serious charge which weighed heavily against him during a considerable portion of his life has reference to a period many years later. It was, to put it with absolute plainness, this,—that shortly after his extraordinary abilities had become known to the world through the defence of Watson, who was tried for high treason in 1817, he, being and being known to his friends to be in political opinions a strong Liberal, went over to the then Tory Government, in consideration of having a seat in Parliament for a Government borough provided for him at once, and of the Chief Justiceship of Chester and the Solicitor-Generalship in near expectancy. We think Sir Theodore Martin has treated this charge far too lightly. He does little more than quote from Hansard, Lyndhurst's own defence, often repeated in the House of Lords, and pronounce it to be triumphant. But in truth the evidence on which the charge is founded is very weighty. Lord Campbell may be an inaccurate and prejudiced witness, though we cannot agree with Sir T. Martin in regarding him as a worthless one. But the first Lord Denman, whom Sir T. Martin sneers at as a bitter Whig partisan, was one of the most upright of mankind, in whom abhorrence of falsehood amounted to a passion. There must be many men yet living who remember enough of Lord Denman to be painfully surprised when his testimony upon a plain matter of fact within his own personal knowledge is pronounced to be of little value. Denman and Copley went the same circuit for many years and were intimate associates and friends. "I remember my father," wrote Lord Denman's daughter, Mrs. Hodgson, "coming home one day in deep dejection at the acceptance of office in 1819 by his friend Copley, under those who were in direct opposition to his known principles. He never could feel the same friendship for him in after years. On one occasion, when asked by Copley for his support at a Cambridge election, my father answered, 'If saying that I know your real principles are the same as my own will help you, I will do so.'" There is other evidence to the same effect, if we had space for it. For many years afterwards Lyndhurst was taunted over and over again with his political apostacy by men of ability and character, who had the best possible means of knowing the truth. Amongst them were statesmen like Lords Lansdowne, Grey, and Melbourne, and contemporaries of his own at the Bar, like Scarlett and Wetherall. Lyndhurst's answers to these attacks, which seem to Sir T. Martin so conclusive, appear to us to involve something not unlike a negative pregnant. They were all, as far as we have been able to refer to them, to the effect that before entering Parliament he had never belonged to any party or political society. We cannot find that he ever made what would have been the plain, straightforward answer, which he could surely have made if it was true, that before entering Parliament he had been what he was afterwards,—a Tory. A man may have strong political opinions, without formally connecting himself with any party or society. Lyndhurst nowhere goes so far as to assert that he had no political opinions up to the age of forty-six, at which he entered Parliament, nor would such an assertion be easy to credit.

Once in Parliament, his course of action was Tory enough. As Solicitor-General, he boldly justified the Manchester massacre, and assisted in carrying the memorable Six Acts through Parliament. He opposed Catholic emancipation, both under Lord Liverpool and the Duke of Wellington, though when the

* A Life of Lord Lyndhurst. By Sir Theodore Martin, K.C.B. London: John Murray. 1883.

Duke changed his views upon that question, Lyndhurst promptly followed him. It is related by Lord Campbell that when the Duke of Wellington's anti-Reform Administration fell in 1830, Lord Grey, the new Whig Premier, was desirous that Lyndhurst should retain the Chancellorship, and there is evidence in contemporary memoirs to the same effect. If this was so, Lord Grey must, of course, have been satisfied that Lord Lyndhurst was ready to support the Reform Bill, which, as events turned out, he so strenuously opposed. In 1831, Lyndhurst, having brought about the defeat of Lord Grey's Government on the Reform question in the House of Lords, was sent for by the King, and there were rumours that he was to be Prime Minister in a new Tory Government excluding Peel. Again, five or six years later, he is alleged, with great semblance of authority by the writer of his obituary notice in the Times, to have been in underhand communication with the King, with a view to the formation of a Tory Government in which he was to be Premier, and Peel was to be ousted from the Conservative leadership. We are unable to say upon what evidence these statements rest. That they should have been seriously put forward is suggestive of a certain want of confidence in Lyndhurst very generally felt during this period of his life, a want of confidence of which there are other indications. The author of the Greville Memoirs lived in intimacy with him, and evidently liked him. But he speaks of him more than once as participating in discreditable intrigues, and as adopting a highly factious course of action in Parliament. So cool and shrewd an observer as Lord Palmerston, who had just previously been Lyndhurst's colleague in the Cabinet, after mentioning in one of his familiar letters to his brother, written in 1829, that there had been strange stories current of malpractices of the Chancellor, amounting to absolute corruption (which stories were never in any way substantiated), goes on to say of these stories and of the Chancellor,—“I do not believe them, though I doubt his integrity of mind; but he would hardly place his existence so much in the power of any man.”

From 1830 to 1840 was the period of Lyndhurst's greatest activity in the House of Lords. He was the master-mind on the Conservative side, and commanding a great majority, cut down, as far as he could venture, the really popular measures of the Whig Government; throwing out altogether all such smaller reforms as he thought could be so dealt with without displeasing the constituencies. To his cutting and carving of the Municipal Corporations Bill of 1835, the public is, if we are not mistaken, indebted for the Permissive Bill and Local-option questions of the present day. Here is Sir Theodore Martin's statement of his argument against the establishment of County Courts, a measure which he succeeded in throwing over for many years:—

“He then dwelt upon the danger likely to result from placing the power of settling disputes, often involving intricate principles, in the hands of a tribunal composed of barristers of limited experience, where these securities” (arising from the central system of administering the law) “for knowledge and freedom from personal bias could not be expected to exist, and skillfully illustrated his proposition by reference to abuses both in this country and abroad, where tribunals of a similar character had prevailed. In conclusion, he said, ‘He had told his noble and learned friend, some time since, that he should consider this Bill with candour and fairness. To the best of his ability he had so considered it, and he now thought its principle so mischievous, that he felt himself bound, in discharge of the duty which he owed to his country, to Westminster Hall, and to himself, to arrest its progress at this stage.’”

In his policy as leader of the House of Lords he much resembled Lord Salisbury, and as Lord Salisbury seems likely to do once more, after the lapse of more than forty years, he forced into the foreground of political discussion the composition and powers of the Upper House. Himself a man devoid of rancour, he yet recklessly infused into the debates of the House of Lords of that day a deplorable amount of acrimony. His indirect contests with O'Connell and Shiel,—he attacking them with bitterest scorn in the House of Lords, and they denouncing him in like strain in the House of Commons,—added nothing to the dignity of Parliament.

Upon the formation of Sir Robert Peel's Government, in 1841, Lyndhurst resumed the Chancellorship. Thenceforward, he seems to have gradually laid aside his habits of pugnacity and invective. Immediately after the fall of the Peel Administration, in 1846, he (alone, we believe, of all the colleagues who had stood by Peel on the Corn-Law question) showed a disposition to lapse into Protection. He unsuccessfully attempted to get up a coalition to defeat the Sugar Duties Bill, brought in by Lord John Russell's Government. But after that time, though he lived for many years with his great mental faculties and even his wonderful memory unimpaired, and though he continued, till past the age of ninety, to address the House of Lords impressively and effectively upon questions that interested him, he assumed a position more and more outside the lines of party struggles. Advice and information were thenceforward sought and received from him by statesmen of every variety of opinion. The deference felt for his vast experience, combined with the influence of his admirable social qualities, won for him the unique position in which he is best known to the present generation. When he died, in 1863, there were few to remember that the man who had of late held this position had once been one of the most reckless of political partisans.

Sir T. Martin's estimate of Lord Lyndhurst's merits as a Judge appears to us to be wholly wanting in critical discrimination. Every Judge has his strong and weak points. Lyndhurst had, when he chose to exercise it, a marvellous capacity both of mastering and of lucidly stating the most complicated series of facts. But when he came to apply the law to his facts, and had to make up his mind by which of the various discordant principles of law urged upon him by counsel his decision ought to be governed, he was, as an Equity Judge at least, much less successful. Probably he was at his best as a Judge when he was Chief Baron of the Exchequer. As a Judge in Chancery, he had the disadvantage of having to administer a system of law of which he had no experience at the Bar. He was so long on the Bench that he might gradually have overcome this disadvantage by labour, had it not been for an indolence which we have never heard denied or doubted until we opened Sir T. Martin's book. During his last Chanceryship, at all events, it was well understood at the Bar that he affirmed the great majority of the decisions brought before him by way of appeal. It is, of course, far less laborious for a Judge of Appeal to express his concurrence with the judgment of the Court below than to grapple anew with the question involved, and, if necessary, show substantial reasons for overruling it. The present writer remembers, in Lord Lyndhurst's time, hearing a well-known Chancery barrister dissuade a solicitor, his client, from an appeal against a certain decision in bankruptcy, on the ground that the case was so crabbled and complex that it was useless to expect the Chancellor to take the trouble of mastering it. So little careful was he, that in one case, relating to the separate income of married women, he affirmed a judgment first and reversed it afterwards. It having been seriously represented to him that his first decision had caused great alarm amongst conveyancers, he quietly directed that the case should be reargued before him by one counsel on each side, and, this having been done, felt no difficulty in tranquillising the minds of the conveyancers by a second decision directly at variance with his first.

We should have been glad to have had from Sir T. Martin fuller details about Lord Lyndhurst's private life. He loved society, and must have had much intercourse with some of the most conspicuous men of his time. Like Sir John Leach, another Equity Judge of that period, but far more successfully, he affected the manners, dress, and deportment of a man of fashion, and did not like to be thought of merely as a successful lawyer. Even when he was past sixty he appears, from some descriptions quoted by Sir T. Martin—one of them by Samuel Warren—to have, when off the bench, looked like a colonel of cavalry. His tastes, habits, and style of advocacy when, a few years earlier, he was one of the leaders of the Bar, are thus described by Sir T. Martin:—

“Copley had a thorough contempt for the artifices of rhetoric, and too keen a sense of the ludicrous to resort himself, or to be tolerant of the resort by others, to the calculated tones of a simulated pathos, or to the plaintive appeals of a dameanour like what he once defined as the ‘wife-and-ten-children face of Parke.’ It was the same disregard of the small conventions and hypocrisies of the barrister's creed which made him disregard the staid airs and sober garb of the Inns of Court, show his handsome person in a dress turned out by a fashionable tailor, and drive about the streets of London in a smart cabriolet, with a tiger behind him. Lord Eldon, we may believe, was not the only lawyer who was shocked by what must, to people accustomed to accept traditional usages as sacred, have seemed an outrage upon decorum.”

Lord Lyndhurst was a most affectionate son and brother, and capable of much disinterested kindness towards men whom he knew and liked. As a dispenser of patronage, indeed, he would have better served the public if he had been a less compassionate man. If it was related to him of an old Queen's Counsel whom he had known at the Bar that he had lost his business, and was falling into poverty, he was very prone to make him a Bankruptcy Commissioner. And very indifferent Commissioners several of these worn-out old Queen's Counsel turned out to be. But while thus kind to individuals, Lyndhurst was of that order of men whose sympathies for their fellow-men can only be aroused by actual intercourse with them. He had no philanthropy, and never troubled himself about the wrongs or sufferings of masses of human beings with whom he had no personal acquaintance. No down-trodden class or race, between whom and himself there subsisted no personal tie, ever received any substantial help or protection from him. In this, as in most other features of his character, he was the reverse of the great political leader under whom he served so long. Sir Robert Peel was reserved and often ungracious towards individual men, but was powerfully moved by anything affecting the welfare of large masses. Sympathies like Peel's go to make a beneficent statesman; sympathies like Lyndhurst's can do no more than make a man what is commonly called "a good fellow."

Before the appearance of Sir T. Martin's book, we had been accustomed to believe of Lord Lyndhurst that he was a man who looked on life as a game, in which riches and pleasure, honours and power, were the prizes belonging as of right to the most skilful players. We had failed to discover that he ever had aims that were higher than these. We did not doubt that he desired to play the game of life as became a gentleman, or that he was free from petty meannesses and rancours. We cannot honestly say, on closing this book, that our opinion has been materially altered by it. We must still regard Lord Lyndhurst as a political adventurer. There have been men of that class who, surpassing him in cleverness, in intrigue, and in the power of befooling those who could be useful to them, have risen even higher than he did. But we must go back to Bolingbroke, to find amongst such men Lyndhurst's equal in solid intellectual power, eloquence, and range of acquirements. That Sir T. Martin has done what practised skill can do for the reputation of his hero needs scarcely be said. We do not mean to affirm that his book is without grave literary defects. We have already expressed our opinion that its apologetic form is a mistake. There is, too, a want of alternations of light and shade. Lord Lyndhurst stands out from first to last without fault or blemish, in the brightest glare of panegyric. The book is disfigured, likewise, by occasional remarks, both as to Lord Campbell and as to other persons, quite as ill-natured, as appears to us, as any that can be laid at Lord Campbell's own door. But these blemishes notwithstanding, it will be only after carefully weighing Sir T. Martin's views and arguments that the historians of the future will assign to Lord Lyndhurst his ultimate place, whatever it may be, in English history.

THE SECOND CRUISE OF THE 'ALERT.'*

IN 1878, the war-sloop 'Alert,' which had already secured for itself an enviable immortality by reaching the highest northern latitude ever attained, was recommissioned by the Admiralty, to proceed on a surveying expedition in southern latitudes. It left Plymouth on September 25th of that year, under the command of Sir George Nares, who was ultimately succeeded, however, by Captain Maclear of the 'Challenger' expedition; proceeded, in the first instance, to Magellan's Strait, investigated some reefs and islands of the Pacific, devoted about nine months to the north-west coast of Australia, visited the better known Falkland Islands, La Plata, Chili, Ceylon, Singapore, and Seychelles, and returned to England by Mozambique, the Cape, St. Helena, and the Azores, reaching Plymouth Sound on September 3rd, 1882. Dr. Coppinger was appointed medical officer of the 'Alert,' because, besides being duly qualified, he had knowledge of and an enthusiasm for natural science. The choice was a wise one; the authorities of the British Museum have been made acquainted with the thoroughness with which Dr. Coppinger did his work as a naturalist during the four years he was with the 'Alert.' It was natural that he should write a book giving his general experiences; and it is this that is now before us. It naturally recalls memories of Mr. Darwin, and the memorable voyage of the 'Beagle,' of half a century ago, and of the more recent adventures of Lady Brassey, Miss Bird, and others. In style, Dr. Coppinger will not compare with his lady predecessors, any more than as an investigator he will compare with the author of The Origin of Species. We are disappointed with him, too, on occasions, and think he might have used his eyes, and still more his ears, to greater purpose than he has done. Thus he was in Chili during the time of the war with Peru, and we should have been glad if he had told us a little more about the state of that country at that time, and a little less about the adventures of a railway-engine with bullocks. But Dr. Coppinger's work, if in every way unambitious, is an honest performance. While he was in the 'Alert,' his heart was in his trawling and dredging, as was only right. But he looked about him, too, and has written a very careful and clear statement of the results of his observations. We leave it to experts in zoology and the kindred sciences to judge of the value of what Dr. Coppinger has to say about Hiastemis, Strupocellaria, Plumularia, Goniocidaris, and the like; but we can testify to the fact that he has made some interesting additions to the sum of general knowledge of places and tribes of which, for a variety of reasons, we cannot know too much.

Dr. Coppinger describes the 'Alert' as having been in "Patagonian, Polynesian, and Mascarene waters." Its first experiences may fairly be said to have been the most, and the last the least interesting. That is, however, chiefly because the Seychelles, which are in Mascarene waters, have been so thoroughly "done" of late. Dr. Coppinger gives some curious information about the coco-de-mer, or double coconut, found on Praslin, one of the Seychelles. The Fuegians are decidedly Dr. Coppinger's best "find," for he managed when among them to compile a vocabulary of forty-nine of their words, mostly names of things. The Fuegians are a perfect contrast to the Patagonians, being only some 5 ft. 3 in. in height; and as for their climate, it is enough to say that they have rain six days in seven. They live on mussels and limpets, but will give away their scanty garments for tobacco. They catch fish and kill seals. Dr. Coppinger believes that they "bear away the palm as the most primitive among all the varieties of the human species," and it would be difficult to show that he is in the wrong. Their morals seem to be especially primitive. They have no conception of truth. Their treachery Dr. Coppinger illustrates by a story told him of an unprovoked attack made by them on a sealing schooner, which resulted in their repulse, but not before five of the sealers were killed. They are willing to part with their children for a necklace or a plug of tobacco, or a biscuit or two. Dr. Coppinger is not even willing to acquit them of cannibalism, believing the story of Admiral Fitzroy, that when they are in a strait they eat their old women, after killing them by "squeezing their throats while holding their heads over the smoke of a green-wood fire." Add to this that these savages have "a diabolical cast of countenance," due to their habit of knocking their front teeth out and growing their hair over their temples, and it will be strange if the reader of Dr. Coppinger's book is not glad to exchange their society for that of the mermaids of Tonga, who present their visitors with kava and pandanus cigarettes, after coquettishly testing their quality.

Dr. Coppinger has but little to tell that is fresh about Chili, but he was in Tahiti shortly after it was annexed by France, was "received" in Fiji by the late King Cacobau, made the acquaintance of the Queensland aborigines, and visited that Thursday Island whose magistrate lately attained celebrity for himself and it by formally annexing a portion of New Guinea. Dr. Coppinger, who is very cautious where matters of politics are concerned, does not pronounce upon the experiment made by the French in Tahiti—the officers of the 'Alert' having attended a ball given in honour of the annexation, he perhaps thinks it would not be in good taste to express an opinion—but from what he says about the expensive efforts made to convert Papiete into a good port, we should say that the French intend to do something more than turn Tahiti into a Pacific café. Dr. Coppinger was much taken when in Fiji by "Ratu [i.e., Prince] Joe," the youngest son of Cacobau, a really fine-looking lad, who spoke good English, and had had the advantage of a three years' course at the University of Sydney, to which he had been taken in 1875, when Fiji was annexed to Great Britain. Cacobau looks a rather rough old savage, in a picture of a group of himself, his wife, and "Ratu Joe," which Dr. Coppinger gives us; but he must have been a man of some sagacity and force of character.

"We were received in a small, smoky hut, in which the aged monarch spends most of his time during the cold season of Fiji. He seemed to be a feeble old man, aged about seventy, and almost entirely blind, yet evidently possessing his mental faculties in full vigour, for he put to us many shrewd questions concerning the work of our ship, and then, after a pause during which he seemed to be pondering over her name, asked if we could give him some information regarding her previous work of exploration in the Arctic regions. In this subject he seemed to take much interest, and like many other people, did not fail to put the rather puzzling question as to what could be the use of exploring the uninhabited and inhospitable polar regions. From time to time messengers came into the hut, who, after assuming a respectful posture on the floor, asked for his orders concerning various municipal affairs. To these functionaries his replies were short, sharp, and decisive, and were acted upon with such alacrity that it was fully evident to us that he still retains no small part of his former control over his subjects."

Our author's account of such of the Australian aborigines as he saw in their primitive condition is not calculated to impress one favourably with them. "Both men and women, especially the latter, seemed to be in a filthy, degraded state. They had just received their yearly gifts of blankets from the Queensland Government,—I believe, the only return which they receive for the appropriation of their land. It appears, however, that they do not much appreciate the donation, for soon after the general issue many of the blankets are bartered with the whites for tobacco and grog." They are very expert, however, with the boomerang; and Dr. Coppinger saw, in fair preservation, some of the native drawings discovered by Mr. Cunningham, of the 'Beagle,' in 1821. The objects delineated, chiefly in red ochre, are sharks, dolphins, dugong, turtle, boomerangs, waddies, shields, woomerangs, pigs, dogs, birds, jelly-fish, &c. Before leaving the native tribes of Queensland, we may say that the attention of the Aborigines' Protection Society, if not of the Colonial Office, ought surely to be drawn to the exploits of the black police, or half-reclaimed aborigines enrolled and armed as policemen, and distributed over the colony. "Their skill as bush-trackers is too well known to need description, and the peculiar ferocity with which they behave towards their own countrymen is due to the fact that they are drawn from a part of the continent remote from the scene of their future labours, and from tribes hostile to those against which they are intended to act. Through their instrumentality the aborigines of Queensland are being gradually exterminated. In the official reports of their proceedings, when sent to operate against a troublesome party of natives, the verb 'to disperse' is playfully substituted for the harsher term 'to shoot.'" Here is Dr. Coppinger's succinct account of Thursday Island, the shipping port for the produce of all the pearl-shell fisheries in Torres Straits:—"There is a small settlement at Thursday Island, consisting of about a dozen houses, wooden built, which are occupied by white families and their coloured domestics. There is a police magistrate, whose jurisdiction, as an official of the Queensland Government, extends over all the islands in Torres Straits; an officer of Customs, through whose hands passes all the trade of the Straits; a staff of white policemen, to enforce the Queensland law; a prison, for the incarceration of the refractory pearl-shellers; a store, for the supply of tinned provisions and all the miscellaneous requirements of the pearl-shell trade; and finally, there are two public-houses, which do a flourishing business, and supply ample material for the official ministrations of the police. The entire population, white and coloured, does not exceed a hundred." In concluding our notice of an interesting and useful book, we may mention that Dr. Coppinger makes some valuable notes on the flight of the condor and the albatross; and that he slays once more, but probably not finally, the fine, old superstition about the connection between the petrel and storms.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA AMERICANA.*

THE task of reviewing this volume—and to review an encyclopædia may, perhaps, be considered as reducing the function of the critic to an absurdity—is happily made easy by the prefatory announcement of the editor's or publisher's, that it is intended not to rival, but to supplement the encyclopædias which have appeared or are still appearing in Europe, and which command a large circulation in America. It is designed, in fact, to give American readers information, useful or interesting, that is but scantily supplied, or not supplied at all, in works "prepared, primarily, to command the attention of European readers." If it is perfectly understood by the American public that this function of supplementing the stores of knowledge contained in such a work as the Encyclopædia Britannica, and nothing but this, belongs to the volume before us and its proposed successors, their intention and execution may be almost unreservedly commended. This first instalment of the book (which is, we learn, to be completed in four volumes) gives a variety of information which certainly could not be found collected elsewhere. In the first place, we have in it what may be called an American gazetteer, and one which, as far as we can judge, is very careful and complete. Any one who, to take an instance, will compare the article "Alabama" in this volume with that which is given to the same subject in the Encyclopædia Britannica, will readily perceive that the newer is very much the superior of the two. It has the advantage of giving more recent statistics (and it is to be regretted that the slow, we suppose necessarily slow, progress of the English publication will make some of the earlier information obsolete before the later volumes can appear), but it is more thorough, and in some respects obviously more correct. There is, for instance, in the English account, a quite remarkable statement, which would make the maximum winter temperature of Alabama 86°, and the maximum of summer 104°. The figures now before us, which are obviously intended as a correction, run thus:—"The ordinary range of temperature during the winter proper is from 30° to 70° Fahr.; during the summer months, from 73° to 94°; in the intermediate seasons, from 42° to 85°; the mean annual temperature is about 66°. The exceptional extremes noted during observations continued for more than thirty years have been 14° and 99°." Here, then, we have one feature of the book, and one which makes it valuable to Europeans only in a less degree than to American readers. We may add that under the same word is given a history of the "Alabama Claims."

Another feature is to be found in the copious biographies of living celebrities, and, indeed, of persons who can hardly be called celebrities. These, of course, have been deliberately excluded by the conductors of English works, and we are, at first sight, inclined to think the exclusion right. The Americans' feeling in the matter is wholly different. They like to hear about statesmen, authors, and others whose lives and works interest them, without waiting for their death. There is something to be said for the demand, and if the canons of good-taste are rigorously followed in satisfying it, no great harm is done. These articles certainly make a very interesting addition to this volume, and as certainly they are likely to be useful. Who, whatever his feeling about biographies of the living, does not sometimes turn to Men of the Time, or some such book of reference? Such books are, in fact, the Peirages of literature, politics, and the professions. In these biographical articles, the English reader will find much that is interesting to him under American names, but he must not forget to read one of the not very numerous contributions which have come from this side of the Atlantic, Mr. T. E. Kebbel's account of "Lord Beaconsfield." No one could have been better qualified for the task than Mr. Kebbel. He feels for the great Conservative leader (how strange it seems to call Benjamin Disraeli a Conservative leader!) a more intelligent sympathy than anything of which the ordinary scribes of party are capable. Hence, we have read the fifteen columns which he gives to his subject with much pleasure, though we cannot allow that his conception of the political history of the fifty years through which Lord Beaconsfield's career was extended is either just or complete. But he states his case in a lucid and forcible way, and without bitterness against opponents. The interesting personal details which conclude the article will be read with especial pleasure. It is not a little amusing to find Mr. Kebbel, who is writing for a public of Protectionists, expressing himself with a candour which he is scarcely able to exhibit in his own country. He writes, for instance:—"It was impossible for Disraeli to allow that the corn-tax was a tax on the food of the people, for the benefit of a single class; on the contrary, it was like other taxes that contributed to the support of institutions conducive to the welfare of the public." Did he hold this belief to the day of his death? Does Mr. Kebbel hold it now?

Literary subjects, such as may be expected to be found in the older cyclopædias, are, of course, absent. The reader who may expect to find a complete work (he is distinctly warned, by the way, that he will not find it) will be surprised that the only "Athens" described is "the county seat of Athens, co. Ohio." Yet here, also, the new work sometimes hits an undoubted blot in the old. There is an article on the "Emperor Aurelian," for instance, an important person, who is not mentioned in the Encyclopædia Britannica.

AN AMERICAN POLITICAL NOVEL.*

THE English public is growing more and more familiar with novels by American writers, and there can be no doubt that these books have an immense sale and circulation. If it can be said of our novelists that they find hundreds of thousands of readers beyond the Atlantic, it is quite as true that certain Transatlantic novelists have thousands of readers in Great Britain. And, without disparagement to the ability of these ladies and gentlemen, we may fairly suppose that a part of their success among ourselves is owing to the foreign flavour of their work. Everybody in England cannot read French and German easily; and we all know that a translation is but a more or less feeble reproduction, therefore French and German books are certain of only a limited popularity. But an American book, however emphatically American it may be, is written in our own tongue (or what very closely approximates to it), and goes straight from the writer to his English readers; while at the same time it deals with people, scenes, and manners that are not English. In the reading of many, if not all American novels, we have a sense of making discoveries, of getting information, which adds a certain piquancy to the pleasure of the story. A good many of these discoveries, a good deal of this information, may be fallacious; we are rather inclined to think them so, because of the marvellously distorted pictures of English life, manners, and conversation which we know are given to the world by some of those English novelists whose books we understand to be popular in America, and whose delineations are, no doubt, accepted there as true to nature. But, with all our readiness to distrust, we cannot suppose that writers of a high class who are known to be conversant with certain phases of American life and society do constantly misrepresent and belie their country people. We cannot suppose that Mr. Henry James and Mr. Howells are engaged in a series of elaborate hoaxes, nor believe for a moment that the authors of Democracy and Through One Administration have deliberately undertaken to give scandalously false views of official life at Washington.

Mrs. Burnett was, we believe, born and partly brought up in England, and her two novels, That Lass o' Lowrie's and Haworths, show how intimate must have been her early acquaintance with the life of the lower classes in the Lancashire manufacturing districts. A Fair Barbarian, too, deals with English country-town life, and if it is a little exaggerated, it is not too much so to be amusing. It bears, however, evident marks of having been studied from books, and not from nature. We should credit Miss Austen and Mrs. Gaskell with the original creation of several of the characters. But Through One Administration is a purely American book, the scene, with one short exception, being laid in Washington, and the characters living in "tip-top parlours," and moving in the highest political circles of the Republic. The circumstances related are enclosed within the period of four years, during which a President holds office; the hero, as he arrives at Washington, remarks, "I come in with the Administration, I wonder if I shall go out with it, and what will have happened in the interval;" and accordingly, he does go out with it, being killed just at the moment of the next inaugural festivities. Thus the story ends sadly,—indeed, our objection to it is that it is sad throughout; the heroine laughs a good deal, but with small cause for merriment; while the hero is a miserably disappointed, if not a heart-broken man, from the end of the first chapter.

To quarrel with a book for being sad implies, however, that we are interested by it; and Through One Administration is interesting, its characters vivid, its style clear, pleasant, and vigorous. But, as we have already hinted, whatever is really remarkable in it is derived from its pictures of a society as frivolous as that of any European capital at any period, and corrupt with a sort of cynical corruption not, it is to be hoped, to be equalled by any other political society, at present. Here, for instance, is a passage in which one Senator expresses his views of another. Richard Amory and Senator Plane-field are interested in obtaining subsidies for a projected line of railway, and Senator Blundel's favour is of importance to them:—

"You can't expect a man like Blundel," said Plane-field, "to be easy to manage. Blundel is the possessor of a moral character, and when a man has a capital like that, and Blundel's sharpness into the bargain, he is not going to trifle with it. He's going to hold on to it until it reaches its highest market value, and then decide which way he will invest it. . . . The one thing you can't be sure of is a moral character. Impeccability is rare, and it is never easy for an outsider to hit on its exact value. It varies, and you have to run risks with it. Blundel's is expensive."—"There has been a great deal of money used," hesitated Richard, "a great deal."—"You had better go and see Blundel yourself," Plane-field said, after a pause; "you must settle what's to be done between you. I have done my best."—"By Jove," exclaimed Richard, virtuously, "what corruption!" It was an ingenuous exclamation. . . . He felt that he was being hardly treated, and that the most sacred trusts of a great nation were in hands likely to betray them at far too high a figure. The remark amounted to an outburst of patriotism. "Have they all their price?" he cried. Plane-field . . . glanced at him. . . . "No," he said; "if they had, you'd find it easier. If they were all to be bought, or if none of them were to be sold, you'd see your way."

We will add as a pendant to this a curious representation of the position of a clerk in a Government office, as sketched by one of the class:—

"If there is a good deal in him, he will begin by being hopeful and working hard. . . . He will keep his eyes open, and make friends of the men about him. He will do that for a few months, and then, suddenly, and for no fault whatever, one of these friends will be dropped out. Knowing the man to be as faithful as himself, it will be a shock to him. . . . Somebody else wanted the place and got it, not because of superior fitness for it, but because the opposing influence was stronger than his. The new man will go through the same experience when his time comes, that is all. . . . That such a thing is possible, that the bread and home and hopes of any honest human creature should be used as the small-change of power above him, and trafficked with to sustain that power, and fix it in its place to make the most of itself and its greed, is the burning shame and burden which is slung round our necks, and will keep us from standing with heads erect until we are lightened of it."

We could easily have given pleasanter extracts than these from Mrs. Burnett's volumes, but we have preferred such as have a greater flavour of originality about them than any merely connected with the love-story. That, we strongly recommend those who do not object to being made miserable to read for themselves.

SAMUEL PALMER'S ECLOGUES OF VIRGIL.*

THE late Mr. Samuel Palmer, of the Old Water-Colour Society, was in some ways an unique figure in the Art history of the present day,—he had little, if anything, to do with what may be called the competitive commerce of Art; he was pledged to no picture-dealer, and advertised by no society. Having a quiet, restful existence, in a small country village, with placid interests of family and friendship and the companionship of a few books, he passed the greater part of his long life; and there is, perhaps, no single quality of his painting so apparent, to all who care to look below the surface, as the atmosphere of peace which surrounds its splendour. Splendour is, indeed, almost universally present in Mr. Palmer's pictures; but it is splendour of a peaceful kind, always verging towards quietness and rest. The record of his life reads like a page out of bygone history, so free is it from all trace of modern restlessness and modern diversity. He seems to have spent his life in the very manner in which he would have chosen, had he had the power of choice, in designing and painting, reading and writing poetry, walking about country lanes, and sitting over the fire in the evenings with a few chosen friends. With the exception of the death of his eldest son, from which "it is doubtful," says another of his children, "whether he ever wholly recovered," his life was unmarked by any great sorrow, and was free alike from the cares of wealth and the pressure of poverty.

The work before us, a translation of Virgil's Eclogues, is one upon which the artist spent great labour in the latter years of his life, and there is a space of at least sixteen years between the time of its inception and completion. The book is one of those elaborately printed, papered, and bound volumes which are so plentiful at this season of the year, and deserves rather a special word of praise for the good and quiet taste which marks its binding and its type.

It was not, however, till within two years of the artist's death that the illustrative etchings were begun, and traces of failing power, are to be seen throughout the artistic portion of the work which, as it is here published, consists of etchings, more or less finished, and reproductions of drawings, from which the artist intended to etch. Of these the etchings are singularly inferior to those which Mr. Palmer executed in earlier days. We allude specially, in saying this, to their technical excellence as etchings. They lack delicacy of draughtsmanship, and have an uniform heaviness of shadow which is very unlike the soft, mysterious gloom of the artist's earlier work. The truth is, that nearly all the etchings were left unfinished at the artist's death, and have been completed (at his express desire) by his son, from his father's notes and memoranda. It seems unkind to say that he has spoilt the plates by this completion, but that he has done so, is evident, and any of our readers who take an interest in such matters, would do well to notice for themselves the manner in which the quasi-mechanical work of the son, takes all the real artistic beauty out of the father's work. Look at the etching which illustrates the seventh eclogue, which is one which was finished entirely by the elder artist (by the way, this is erroneously described in the index as a fac-simile of the drawing), and compare the gradation of shadow therein, with that of any of the other etchings in the book. The difference is too marked to escape even the most untrained eye. Look, too, at the work on the sunset sky, and contrast its softness and brilliancy with that of the comparatively coarse cross-hatching in the succeeding plate. Here, again, the difference is too great to be mistaken. Some of these plates have been very much more injured than others, but the one which represents the seventh eclogue, is the only one (of the etchings) which is in any way a true representation of Mr. Palmer's work, and the second illustration to the eighth eclogue has suffered more than any. The fac-simile of a drawing in illustration of the sixth eclogue, is one of the most interesting, and would have made a singularly beautiful etching. It represents a shepherd piping to his flocks on a calm summer's evening just after sun-down, and is bathed in a gentle glow of lingering sunlight which is very lovely. It may be noted that this is one of the few drawings in which Mr. Palmer has depicted an evening sky, free from clouds, and unbroken by heavy masses of trees. The composition, too, is of a more extended kind, and does not present the artist's usual characteristics of heavy masses of shadow to right and left, divided by a valley through which the light strikes across a dark hill-side, or through the thick foliage of a tree. If it is true that of this form of composition Mr. Samuel Palmer was a perfect master, and that he used it with the greatest science to intensify the meaning of his work; but it almost degenerated at times into a trick, and a change to a quieter and less accentuated form is very pleasant.

As we are on this subject of illustrations, we would ask why it is that where fine-art publishers produce in the same work etchings and fac-similes of drawings made by one or other of the photographic (or photogravure) processes, they should think it necessary to place round the fac-similes a sham plate-mark. It surely cannot be that they wish the public who are unlearned in Art matters, to suppose that the photographic reproductions are etchings, and so sell the book practically as one which is illustrated by etching, instead of photography. Of course, it is not for this reason, for this would be scarcely honest; but for what purpose it is done, we cannot understand. It is, however, a great mistake, for this reason, that in looking at the illustration the eye catches the plate-mark first of all, and so regards the picture as an etching; and looking for the qualities of an etching, and not finding them, is apt to be disappointed and put out of conceit with the whole work. And it is probably still more frequently the case that, owing to the want of technical acquaintance with the character of an etched plate, the casual inspector of the illustration takes the photograph for the etching, and so gets any little bit of instruction that he might have received from the work perverted and destroyed.

To conclude about these illustrations, the facts are as follows:—There is one etching of Mr. Palmer's own, which is good; there are five etchings begun by Mr. Palmer, and completed by his son, which are interesting, but of no value as works of art; finally, there are eight photo-engravings from Mr. Palmer's drawings, some of which have been touched by his son,—these are good of their kind, and better almost in inverse ratio to the quantity of alteration they have received. Compare, for an instance of this latter assertion, the two illustrations to the first eclogue. It will be seen that the horizontal clouds in the first have been reinforced by the etching-needle, and also portions of the foliage, and a little work on the ground. On comparing this with the second illustration, in which there has been no perceptible alteration made in the mechanical reproduction, it will be noticed how, in the first instance, the free-hand work stares out, in comparison with the uniformity of the photograph, distracts the eye, and renders the whole picture of uneven quality.

We have left all remarks as to the translation of the Eclogues to the last, chiefly because Mr. Palmer, though a poet-painter, was not, after all, a poet; and though the translation is very carefully and lovingly done, it will, we fear, only take a place amongst the curiosities of literature. It reminds us of Browning's "One word more," it is like Dante's angel or Raphael's sonnet,—a labour of love, done once in a lifetime by a hand and heart which had spent their best energies in other directions. Perhaps we cannot close this review more fitly than by quoting a verse in support of our estimate as to the kind of value which this version of the Eclogues possesses. The verse is one which we took by chance, as the book lay open before us, and in its concluding lines it seems to apply strangely enough to the painter who wrote it:—

"O fortunate old man!
Then these ancestral fields are yours again,
And wide enough for you. Though naked stone,
And marsh with slimy rush, about upon
The lowlands, yet your pregnant ewes shall try
No unproved forage. Neighbouring flocks too nigh Strike no contagion, nor infect the young.
O fortunate! who now at last, among
Known streams and sacred fountain-heads, have found
A shelter and a shade on your own ground."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

GIFT BOOKS.

Battle Stories from British and European History, by W. H. Davenport Adams (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.); Shore and Sea; or, Stories of Great Vikings and Sea Captains, by the Same Author (Hodder and Stoughton).—In the first of these volumes, Mr. Adams has told the story of thirty battles, the earliest being Hastings and the latest Inkerman, and has told it with spirit. He cannot keep quite clear of mistakes, which probably are due to haste. Why, for instance, speak of the Queen of Edward II. as the "She-wolf of Anjou"? Whence does he get the title? From "the Bard"? But on the whole, the book is a successful effort to give some striking scenes of history in a picturesque way. The second volume will be to many young readers more of a novelty than the first. The "Norse Sea-kings" is a chapter full of stirring adventure. Then we read about Sebastian Cabot, who is somewhat doubtfully called an "English discoverer." Another chapter is given to De Soto, the conqueror of Florida, and another, again, to "The Early Colonisers of Virginia." Drake, Hudson, and Morgan are the subjects of the three which complete the volume. Mr. Adams gives, we are glad to see, a list of his authorities. If he would omit his prefaces, which strike us as somewhat too self-asserting, he would make a still further improvement.

Stories of Young Adventurers, by Ascott R. Hope (Hogg), though not a book of this year, may be mentioned, if it should have happened to have escaped the notice of our readers, as full of interesting reading. These "young adventurers" take us to all parts of the world. One of them gets to Mecca; another is taken prisoner in Braddock's unlucky expedition; a third falls into the hands of Hyder Ali. One story tells again the terrible tale of the wreck of the "Medusa." As interesting as any is the story of the English lad who was adopted by Maoris.

Sir Walter Raleigh: his Life and Times. By F. L. Clarke. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—There is, of course, something to be put down on the per contra side, in balancing Raleigh's character. Such a balancing, however, the writer of a little book such as this is hardly called upon to do. It is sufficient for him to give the picture of a brave man and an adventurous life, and this he does with sufficient success.

From the same publishers, we also have received Lady Rachel Russell, by F. P. G. Guizot; and Biographical Stories, by Nathaniel Hawthorne, containing short sketches from the lives of Benjamin West, Sir Isaac Newton, Samuel Johnson, Oliver Cromwell, Benjamin Franklin, and Queen Christina of Sweden. The scene from Johnson's life, to give a specimen, is his refusal to keep his father's book-stall at Uttoxeter, and the penance which he did for his disobedience in after years.

With Clive in India. By G. A. Henty. (Blackie and Son.)—Here is a story built, and, as we may expect from so skilled a writer as Mr. Henty, well built, on the foundation of historical fact. Charlie Marryat, by the help of an eccentric but kind old uncle, goes out as a "writer" to India, some time about the middle of the eighteenth century. On the way out he sees something of fighting, the merchantman in which he sails meeting two privateers, and giving a very good account of them, and afterwards falling in with pirates. Arrived in India, Charlie, though he is scarcely the chief hero of the story, giving place to Clive, still sees a good deal of adventure. He is in the "Black Hole," and is one of the very few who get out of it; and the thread of his fortunes runs through the narrative. This takes him to Plassey and Masulipatam, among other places; and finally takes him home, with a very substantial result from the "shaking of the pagoda-tree." It would not be easy to find a better story than this.

Laila; or, Sketches from Finmarkens. By J. A. Friis. Translated from the Norwegian by the Earl of Ducie. (S.P.C.K.)—Laila is a little Norwegian, who is lost as a baby by being thrown out of a sledge pursued by wolves, and adopted by a rich Finn, in whose house in company with another adopted child, she spends her early years. When she grows to womanhood she has romantic adventures, but it is not the story so much as the singularly vivid pictures of a life which is almost wholly unknown to readers here that will chiefly please in Laila. The turning-point of the story is, or is, anyhow, closely connected with, the pride of race which makes the Norwegians look down upon the Finn as an inferior being. "This girl," cries Lind, "is not Logje's" ("Logje" is the name of her adopting father), "and she shall not wed a Finn."

The Robber Chief; or, Too Good for his Trade. By Edward Burton. (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—This is a romantic story, full of adventures and surprises, and ending, as such stories should end, with the happiness of the good and the repentance of the bad. The place is Scotland; as to the time, we need not inquire too particularly; there is, anyhow, no lack of incident.

The Will-o'-the-Wisps. Translated from the German of Marie Petersen by Charlotte J. Hart. (Chapman and Hall.)—The translation is made from the "thirty-fourth" edition of the German original. This is sufficient proof of considerable popularity, a popularity which, while we acknowledge the general merit of these stories, we do not quite understand. Walter, a young collegian, on his way home in the midsummer vacation, falls asleep by a pool, and hears the talk of a number of creatures commonly called dumb. But the chief talkers are the spirits of the lights,—the lights, that is, which are used on various occasions in human life, and which now meet to recount their various experiences. In them there is a more or less slender thread of incident, with plenty of sentiment. Everything is pretty, but one seems to miss the briskness and gaiety which these fairy stories should have.

Book of English Fairy-tales from the North Country. By Alfred C. Freyer, Ph.D. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—Here are eleven stories, some of them quaint and strange, some, as, for instance, the "Dragon Stories," of a sufficiently familiar type. "The Grocer and the Parrot," where a too truthful bird announces to customers his master's frauds, must surely be an invention of more modern times. This volume is a worthy specimen of the "Fairy Library of All Nations."

Marvels of the Polar World. Translated from the French of C. Lebazailles, by Robert Routledge. (Routledge and Sons.)—We read here about the natural history of the Polar regions; we have also the records, somewhat sad, on the whole, and if full of courage and steadfastness, full also of suffering and failure, of the attempts which have been made to explore, and even to colonise them. The life, too, of the tribes which some strange necessity drives into these inhospitable regions is a melancholy story. There is a long struggle against nature, which is nowhere so malign, and they are being slowly worsted in it. Of all these matters, M. Lebazailles gives us a very interesting account.

Gesta Romanorum, the Ancient Moral Tales of the Old Story-tellers. (W. Swan Sonnenschein.)—We are glad to welcome these old favourites, Fulgentius and Jovinian, and the kings, knights, maidens, magicians, and others, for whom the fancy of the monks invented this strange kind of fiction.

Madge Hilton. By A. C. Maitland. (W. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.)—Madge and her brothers and sisters are left behind in England, when their father and mother, for the sake of business and of health, pay a visit to Australia. This story chiefly tells how they got into trouble and how they got out of it, and may be recommended as a sensible, wholesome little book.

Weary-holme: or, Seed-time and Harvest. By Emily S. Holt. (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—This is described as "A Tale of the Restoration." The principal incident in this story is the career of Olivia, daughter of an Independent minister, who runs away to marry a fashionable young gentleman, and comes to great sorrow, and in the end to repentance. There is some pathos in this narrative, and, indeed, the whole book has merit. Miss Holt thinks very meanly of the Church-of-England Clergy, in the days which some people think to have been her best. She apologises to her readers for the non-appearance of an Evangelical clergyman in her pages, by the statement that at the time of her story there were none such in England. "The best style of man is sketched in Dr. Middleton," and Dr. Middleton is one who "read prayers with pompous stiffness, and preached sermons which were intelligible to about six people in his congregation." "Religion was a highly respectable thing," to him, and no more. Did Miss Holt, haply, ever hear of Jeremy Taylor and Thomas Fuller and Isaac Barrow?

Old Wives' Fables. By Edouard Laboulaye. (Routledge and Sons.)—These are very lively stories, with, perhaps, just a touch of satire in them, which would be well away, for a fairy-tale ought to be absolutely simple in intention, and never remind us of questions of the every-day world. Still, they are very amusing, and present us with a great variety of adventure. They come, too, from many parts of the world. Yvon, the hero of the first tale, is a Breton lad; then there are Bohemian stories, and tales from Italy, Finland, Norway, and Iceland. "Piff Paff, or the Art of Government: a Tale of All Lands," is perhaps as clever as any, but then it is of the satirical kind.

What's In a Name? by Sarah Doudney (Hodder and Stoughton). is a very romantic story indeed. One Henry Jervaux marries secretly a girl below him in social position, and thereby offends his family. He dies, leaving one child; and, we are led to believe, that his wife does not long survive him. The child is adopted by its grandparents. Then a widow lady, who undertakes her education, appears upon the scene. Who this lady is, how she is avenged on one who had wronged her in former times, we may leave for the readers to find out, if they will. The tale is certainly written with considerable power.

Daintree, by Bernard Heldmann (Nisbet and Co.), has too little incident. It really is little more than a story of how two sons leave their father, and the life for which their father had intended them, to devote themselves to more congenial employments. The tone in which it is written is all that could be desired, but it certainly lacks interest.

True Tales for my Grandsons. By Sir Samuel Baker. (Macmillan.)—The elephants, the dogs, and the animals generally, whose doings Sir Samuel Baker relates to us, are creatures with which we have been glad to make acquaintance. The San Francisco dog, in particular, a Good Samaritan among dogs, should have a niche in that chapel of the Temple of Fame which belongs to dogs. As for the human creatures, we must confess to not caring much about them. They help to make history for the more important creatures which it is the fashion to call "inferior." But everything about the book bears the impress of the quality which the author claims for it. Once or twice we are inclined to say "Too true!" as in the sad story of the Captain of the whaler, an Enoch Arden in real life. Truth, however, is no unpleasing change from the superabundance of fiction, with its nice arrangements of poetical justice, that has been overpowering us for the last few weeks.

Bek's First Corner, and How She Turned It. By T. M. Conklin. (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—Bek, or, at full length, Rebekah, is an American young lady. Whether the "corner" is the age of twenty-five, as we are inclined to think, or a difficulty with an unworthy lover, is not quite clear. Anyhow, this is a bright and entertaining little story. Sometimes the religious phraseology offends. "Father is not a Christian, and yet you married him," says Bek to her stepmother. As the father apparently professed to be a Christian, this sounds a little audacious in a daughter's mouth. But, on the whole, the moral of the tale is enforced with judgment and good-taste.

The Cabin on the Beach. By M. C. Winchester. (Seeley and Co.)—Miss Winchester always writes well, but she is scarcely at her best in this story. The characters and the plot are more of the conventional sort that we are accustomed to find in fiction of this sort, and have less reality than we now expect in Miss Winchester's books. The cause which produces the difficulty of the story seems hardly adequate, nor does the conduct of the lad who gets the young hero into trouble seem quite consistent with what we are led to expect of his character.

Alice's Pupil, by Letitia McClintock (Nisbet and Co.), is a pretty little story, illustrating the patience of true charity, and the reward which it attains in the end.

Peas Blossom. By the Author of "Honor Bright." (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.)—There are some very brisk scenes of school-life in the early part of this story, scenes which are vigorously described, and which will be read with amusement. The more romantic incidents which complete it are less noteworthy; but the whole may fairly be pronounced a success.

Cornish Stories. By Mark Guy Pearse. (F. Woolmer.)—These are stories of the "Christmas number" sort; moderately good of their kind, but not more. The anecdote of the miller who put the story of the walls of Jericho to a practical experiment, is the best thing in the volume.

In the English Illustrated Magazine this month, Art is well represented by a vigorous reproduction of Cranach's portrait of Luther; and by an interesting account, from the pen of Mr. Walter Armstrong, of "Some Forgotten Etchers." Two examples of the work of George Cuijt, both treating subjects in Chester, specimens of the work of more famous men—John Crome, Constable, and Sir David Wilkie—and two after Andrew Geddes, an etcher whose merits Mr. Armstrong vindicates, supply the illustrations. "The New Hero," speaking of the praises of childhood, how they have been celebrated both in prose and verse, is the most noticeable contribution to the literature of the magazine.

Through the Stage Door: a Novel. By Harriett Jay. (F. V. White.)—This is a regrettable book. The coarse vices of bad men are not material whereof women should weave their fictions. If they know anything about the matter by experience in their own families, they ought to conceal that sad knowledge; if they have to draw on their imagination for the facts, they render themselves unpleasantly ridiculous. The "Mr. George" of Miss Jay's novel, who is a married Duke, and the relation to him of two of the female actors in the story, are exceedingly repulsive features of a novel which has no attractive ones. The writer does her work so carelessly that she makes Mr. Fane, the father of her heroine, when he wants to escape the sounds of household contention, "stuff his fingers into his ears, and continue his writing;" describes a room as "luxuriantly furnished," and a young lady as being "fully as elated as if she had known, &c.," writes of "invitations pouring in fast and furious" on a fashionable young man, who is blest with "an overflowing card-basket," and of young ladies' "drinking down" champagne. The very vulgar company of this novel is, however, preferable to its fine company; a lady who intercepts letters, and bribes her nephew to ruin the reputation of her brother's betrothed wife; and another lady who tells her husband that she is sure their expected guest "will come to their house in the finery of a street-walker," are much more offensive persons than the Fane family. The latter are not at all original; we have met them in many trashy novels, in which grave and gallant English gentlemen—mostly military—select their wives from "the juvenile lead;" although it must be admitted there is something remarkable about Miss Lottie. It is not every young lady who figures in tights of whom it can be said, "The necessary stage training had added to her manner a naïveté which she might not otherwise have possessed." We have hitherto regarded stage training as a potent corrector of naïveté.

In the Hebrides. By O. F. Gordon Cumming. (Chatto and Windus.)—This is almost wholly a reprint of a work published some eight years ago. The book consists principally of a string of legendary tales and traditions of the West Highlands and Islands of Scotland, interspersed with descriptions of the scenery and people. A certain want of the arrangement and lucidity that characterise Miss Gordon Cumming's later productions is noticeable, and a little of the "gush" that travellers are so prone to indulge in, but which is so pleasantly absent from the pages of "At Home in Fiji" and "Fire Fountains," is also occasionally to be met with in the present volume. Nevertheless, the book is very readable and interesting, and some of the author's comparisons between the folk-lore of Western Scotland and that of the East are striking and instructive. To the more recent history of this remote portion of Britain some allusions are made, and among other events, the famous "Sunday War" of last June is described at length, without, however, any explanation being offered of this curious phase in the social annals of Gaelic Scotland.

Quatrefoil. By Mary Deane. (Chapman and Hall.)—This is a novel partly ponderous, partly æsthetic, and wholly pretentious. The heroine is "rather nice," and we wish she had not fallen to the much-too-good-for-him lot of a gentleman of the very "mixed" principles of Mr. Surcott, who is likewise a donkey. The mixture of names and places in the story is quite bewildering; we find Penartha in Surrey, for instance, and everybody has an impossible Christian name. Eythin, Gwilliam, Aurelian, and Moel may be scattered over the earth, but that they should all be collected into one story is too much. Likewise, it is too much that such a creature as Surcott should be seriously proposed to our acceptance as a fine spirit, touched to fine issues. If he has continued to talk to Eythin, since she weakly consented to renounce her well-dowered widowhood in his favour, as he talked to his much-enduring friend, Lanfrey, before that event, she must long ago have heartily wished her deceased baronet back again. Let us imagine this kind of converse, in a stroll on a country road, and we shall not wonder that Lanfrey exerted himself to induce Eythin by saying "yes," to get Surcott off his hands:—

"The cup of wine," says Surcott, "red as rubies balanced upon a sunbeam, trembled in the faintest breath; could it have been upheld through the level race of the years? I drank and prophesied; it was Love itself—no emptying of it into mortal wine-skins; it vivified my Art! Athene's name is written in gold in the Archives of the century. Perhaps since then I have had less to give, and a stronger desire has grown in me for the human life, apart from the artist's, combining both. But I will have no more fancy. I will tame that fiery-maned steed of the Sun once and for ever."

A Great Treason. By Mary A. M. Hoppus. 2 vols. (Macmillan and Co.)—We cannot answer for other English folk, but we can unhesitatingly say for ourselves that we have no kind of pleasure in reading about the American War of Independence. It is no comfort to be told that we were beaten by men of our own race. The fact of the shameful mismanagement and blindness that brought about the war in the first instance, and caused disaster in the second, still remains. And Miss Hoppus does not reconcile us to the subject which she has chosen by making her story culminate in the treason of Benedict Arnold and the hanging of Major André. This is surely the most painful episode of a painful history, and not all Miss Hoppus's literary art, of which, indeed, she shows a great command, nor her sympathetic treatment of her theme, can reconcile us to her choice. It is late in the day to discuss the propriety of Washington's act. Perhaps we may say that it would not have been done, except in the extreme exasperation which a war between nations speaking the same language always produces. The law of spies is always pushed in such wars to extremes, as it was by Jefferson Davis, when he hanged Union soldiers for attempting to break down a Southern railroad by running off with a train. But we are wandering from Miss Hoppus's book. Its subject apart, it is pleasing. Its heroine is one Althæa Digby, who comes over with her brother, a young English officer, to America, on the eve of the war. With the two there travels a certain Noel Branzholm, a young Virginian gentleman. The fourth important personage is Noel's half-brother, Jasper; and perhaps we may add a fifth, in Mary Fleming, cousin to the Branzholms. The tragedy of the story, apart from the historical element introduced in the person of Arnold and André, is the rivalry of the two brothers for the love of Althæa. This part of the story is admirably managed. We have seldom seen any scene equal to that in which Althæa is surprised into a confession of her love. Miss Hoppus has abundance of quiet humour, and relieves the graver portion of her tale, which, indeed, wants relieving, with much that is most genuinely amusing. The authorities for her subject she seems to have studied most carefully; and she certainly has the art of making her figures very life-like. The Virginia plantation, Flatbush Farm, where Althæa and her cousin Mrs. Mavinoh take refuge for a time with Mr. Jacob Quackenboss, Philadelphia when the British Army is in possession, are made wonderfully vivid scenes. Everything, in fact, about the story is delightful, except its chief motive. As Miss Hoppus, for all her careful study of Arnold's life and character, cannot find or imagine any clue to his conduct, except what we all knew before, his ill-treatment by the civil authorities, and as in her story, so valiant and devoted a soldier is he, he certainly repente fit turpissimus, the motive seems to us particularly at fault.

The Land Leaguers. By Anthony Trollope. 3 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—It was natural and, perhaps, desirable that the MS. which Mr. Trollope left behind him should be published after his death. He was certainly eminent enough to make the public anxious to have all that he wrote, and especially the very last work that came from his pen. But there is a certain defect of taste in the form which has been given to the book. It was, according to the author's intention, to have consisted of sixty chapters. As it is, the forty-ninth chapter is left unfinished. Under these circumstances, the form of the three-volume novel is a little out of place. It gives an air of completeness which is not real. For the rest, it is characteristic of the author, but not of his best style or his happiest mood. There was a certain limitation in Mr. Trollope's mind which, in certain circumstances, made him as shrewd and sensible an observer as could be found, but which disqualified him as a judge of higher questions of policy. Any policy that had any semblance of the heroic was utterly distasteful to him; and most people are agreed that in Irish affairs there was need of the heroic. Now, The Land Leaguers is really a long pamphlet, under the guise of fiction, upon Irish troubles, and the remedies which have been lately employed for them. If the pamphleteer had possessed consummate wisdom and insight, the novelist must not the less have made a failure. As it is, both pamphleteer and novelist fail. Yet, as need hardly be said, there is plenty of good work in these volumes. There are no signs that we can trace of falling-off. The book is a mistake, we think; and Mr. Trollope did, as we all know, on one or two occasions, in his highly-successful literary life, make mistakes; but it is not a weakness. Humorous, easy, clever dialogue, shrewd remarks on matters of the day, lively sketches of character, are to be seen in almost every chapter. And a considerable part of the action of the story takes place in England. The career of Rachel O'Mahony as a public singer has only this remote connection with the Irish question, that her father was a Nationalist; otherwise, it stands wholly apart. Her story is not, we must say, very pleasant reading, but it is quite free from the fault which we attribute to the rest of the novel. Still, on the whole, the book is a disappointment.

We have received a second edition of the Contract of Pawn, by Francis Turner (Stevens and Sons), brought up to date by the incorporation of such statutes as have borne upon the subject since the publication of the first edition in 1866,—viz., the Pawnbrokers'

Act of 1872, the Factories' Act, 1872, and the Bankruptcy Act of 1869 and 1883, as well as by reference to cases which have been decided.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ACTIVE operations against Sontay have begun at last. Admiral Courbet, in a telegram dated December 16th, informs the Minister of Marine that he left Hanoi with his force on December 11th, and by the 16th had carried the outworks of Sontay, consisting, we are elsewhere informed, of five stockaded villages. The French loss was thirteen officers and two hundred and thirty-three men, Marines and Turcos, killed and wounded. This is official, and the Admiral states that the enemy made an "intrepid resistance;" which, again, is proved by the unusual proportion of officers killed and disabled. The troops were supported by a heavy fire from the gunboats, which will not be available in the final attack. This was to have been delivered, according to the Admiral, on the 16th, but all other accounts fix the 17th as the day. No direct allusion is made to the presence of Chinese Regulars in Sontay; but the Admiral mentions that "the enemy are well armed." The Tonquinese "Black Flags" are notorious for their courage, but the presence of Chinese leaders, despatched from an Empire supposed by them to be irresistible, would greatly increase their determination. We fear, too, that the French commanders, acting on the theory that the Tonquinese are rebels against their own king, have committed the insane mistake of ordering that no quarter should be given, so that their enemies must fight like rats in a corner.

The intelligence from Sontay was received in the French Senate as almost barring discussion. The Duc de Broglie made a speech on the Votes of Credit, denouncing the general feeling that criticism was unpatriotic, but still that was the feeling; and Admiral Jauréguiberry was warmly cheered for a very Chauvinist speech. He thought China would accept accomplished facts, but if not, he would "follow the example of 1860," when Peking was directly attacked by Lord Elgin and General Montauban. That could be done without blockading ports, and "Europe would despise France if she passed under the Caudine Forks of China." M. de Freycinet was nearly as violent, asking that China should be called on to withdraw her troops, and that if she did not, "material guarantees" should be seized; and M. Ferry declared that "even the prudent Louis Philippe had affairs in the extreme East," and that "a country did not become great by finching from difficulties." The Senate voted the first grant, £360,000, by 211 to 7; and the second grant, £300,000, by 215 to 6. The Clericals and their allies did not vote, the Vatican having called attention officially to the position of Catholic converts in the Far East. This matter of the Anamese Christians has been overlooked, but it has a serious effect on French policy, as it impels a considerable section of society in the direction of war.

The wilder Irishmen of New York have been making threats of vengeance for the execution of O'Donnell, and the Home Office believes them to be serious. At least, the most elaborate precautions have been taken under orders from London to protect Mr. Gladstone. Hawarden Castle is full of armed police, and all arrivals are carefully scrutinised. The better Nationalist papers warmly denounce any threat against Mr. Gladstone, but the opinions of the better Irish, even when strongly hostile to England, seem to have no influence whatever on the Irish Enragés in any of the three countries. It should not be forgotten, however, that O'Donnell could not read, learning even his alphabet in prison, and that most of the money subscribed to the secret societies comes from exceedingly ignorant persons, who are under a permanent belief that accused Irishmen are always condemned before trial. There seems no limit to popular credulity. Not a fortnight ago, twenty grown men of a hill tribe in India—not savages, but ordinary Mussulmans—flung away their lives by rushing on British guns to prevent a surveying party from carrying away the Tukht-i-Suleiman, or "Throne of Solomon," a conical mountain more than 7,000 feet high.

Mr. Bright spoke twice at Keighley yesterday week, once at lunch and once at an evening meeting. At the lunch he declared his belief that the House of Lords was not absolutely unteachable, and that to speak of it as a Home for Incurables was needlessly harsh. They would hardly resist, he thought, the assimilation of the County and Borough Franchise, since that would weaken them for forcing a dissolution on the Redistribution Bill, which he believed that they would prefer. In the evening he made a rather feeble apology for the property qualification in counties,—the qualification of which the Anti-Corn-Law League made so effective a use forty years ago, but which will not be wanted when once household suffrage is extended to the counties. Mr. Bright apologised for the 40s. freehold, as a means of enfranchising widowers or young men who do not want to have a house of their own; but if the lodger franchise is not to be discontinued,—and we have never heard this proposed,—it would be easy for such men to secure a qualification by contributing towards the cost of the household in which they reside. The truth is that it will be really impossible to get rid effectually of the faggot-voters, unless we get rid effectually of the property qualification. Mr. Bright also declared himself hostile to universal suffrage. "I believe, if you cannot have a good Government with a representation based upon your household franchise mainly or generally, a good Government is not to be had for the people of this country."

In relation to the principle of the representation of minorities, Mr. Bright, as usual, became almost incoherently indignant. And yet he virtually admitted the abstract principle, when he suggested this as the proper reply to the demand made by its adherents—namely, that Tory majorities, in the places where the Tories get majorities, fairly represent the Tory minorities in places where they are defeated, and, mutatis mutandis, with the Liberals. Now, that is an exceedingly good reply, supposing you take care that your constituencies are numerous enough and various enough in their conditions to ensure that there will be enough majorities in some places to represent the outvoted minorities in others. But Mr. Bright, in the same speech, appeared to deprecate any equalisation of electoral districts, and to demand that all the six Members (say) to which immense towns like Glasgow or Birmingham may be entitled, should be elected in a solid list by the absolute majority of the electors, and without the smallest attempt to secure the compensation of a variety of constituencies, voting under different local conditions. Nothing could be more unfair than that, or less likely to secure that the minority of one place should be proportionately represented by the majority of another.

It is stated by a Conservative contemporary that, in the event of Sir Henry Brand's retirement from the Speakership, the Conservatives will bring forward Sir Matthew White Ridley as a candidate for the post. We do not know that Sir Matthew Ridley has had more special experience in this kind of work than Mr. Peel, though his great abilities have been recognised on both sides of the House, and though, no doubt, he would make an excellent Speaker, if he had been nominated for the Speakership by a Conservative Government. If a rival to Mr. Peel is put forward, it will doubtless be in the hope of testing the disposition of the Irish party. Probably Mr. Parnell's hint that he is ready to throw out the Liberals has dropped into eager ears. There would be no discredit in getting Mr. Parnell's suffrage for a Conservative Speaker, and a good vote for a Conservative Speaker would encourage the party to fresh efforts. If these be the tactics, we are sorry that so good a name as Sir Matthew Ridley's should be mixed up with them.

Prince Bismarck has gone a step farther on the "Socialistic" path. He has introduced two Bills into the Prussian Chamber, altering the incidence of the Income-tax. By the first, all persons with less than £60 a year are declared exempt, and the tax is graduated on all who receive incomes between £60 a year and £500, the highest rate being 3 per cent., or 7½d. in the pound. To remedy the deficit thus created, which amounts to £325,000 a year, an additional Income-tax is imposed on all incomes derived from invested money, beginning with 1½d. in the pound on dividends of £30 a year, and rising to 5d. in the pound on dividends above £500. The progressive scale goes no higher, but this is, of course, in principle, the impôt progressif, and differs wholly from our own system of exempting necessary income. The exemption of landed incomes is justified by the existence of the land-tax, but is really caused by the impossibility of getting such a tax through the Upper House. It is very doubtful if the second Bill will pass, and if it does, the Chancellor will find that he has given the Socialists a very dangerous weapon. There is a point at which taxation on sleeping capital drives money underground, like the taxation in Oriental countries, and a much nearer point at which investors invest abroad. Swiss capitalists do that already.

The Crown Prince of Germany has visited the Pope in state. A pleasingly absurd little fiction was kept up that he was living at the Prussian Legation to the Vatican, and not at the Quirinal, and Cardinal Jacobini gravely called on him at Dr. Schlözer's house, where he was not, and received the explanation that the Prince was absent without a smile. The party, moreover, drove to the Vatican in private carriages; but once there, all the formalities used in receiving crowned heads were carefully observed. The Crown Prince had a private audience of fifty minutes, and notes of the conversation were afterwards carefully taken down. As no one yet knows the topic of discussion, all rumours on the subject are untrustworthy; but neither Pope nor Prince was likely to lose such an opportunity. The Pope desires a reconciliation with Germany, and modern Princes always dislike religious divisions among their subjects. They cannot themselves feel enthusiastic about dogmas, being trained from childhood to tolerance; and they never quite forget the future, as Premiers sometimes do. They have descendants to think of, and know that every form of discontent will die out, except a religious grievance. Parties change rapidly, but sects can hate one another for centuries on end.

No intelligence has been received this week from Egypt, General Baker having been delayed in his departure for Suakim by want of money. He has, however, started at last, with full powers from the Khedive, but written orders to be as little enterprising as possible. It is expected that he will only hold Suakim until he can collect 2,000 of the Black Regulars still left in Suakim and other places in the south. Some application appears to have been made to the British Government, for all correspondents report that it has finally refused to interfere in the Soudan, and will protect Egypt Proper only. The Khedive is said to be afraid of a religious movement in Egypt, and to be asking assistance from Turkey; but nothing is accurately known, except that the Egyptian Government feels its new army to be quite incompetent to its work, and talks of "stiffening" it with 2,000 Turks or Circassians. The Circassians, however, will be an element of trouble, as they would speedily overmaster three times their number of Egyptians.

Mr. F. L. James, who has studied and lived among the tribes between Suakim and the Nile, writes to the Times to say they are not as yet influenced by the Mahdi. They are in insurrection to secure independence of the Egyptian Government, which they accuse, quite justly, of excessive tyranny, dictated by a desire for taxes. The tribes are, in fact, pillaged whenever a Pasha feels strong enough. The men are finely built and very brave, but armed mainly with shields, swords, and lances, their rifles being few. Mr. James believes that if their grievances were redressed they would keep the road to Khartoum open, but the Sheikhs say they will trust the Egyptians no more. They wish for pledges from the British Government, which, of course, they cannot obtain. They would, doubtless, accept black-mail, as the Hill tribes of India do, when it is necessary to open the passes; but the Egyptian treasury has no money to spare, and the British Government will advance none for any such object. What with the destruction of Hicks Pasha's Army, the successful attack on Consul Moncrieff's little force, and the slaughter of the Nubians a fortnight since, the Sheikhs will be apt to believe themselves invincible; and while they believe it, they are so. No force except a European one could force a way through the defiles stretching behind Suakim, even if the Arabs had not recently obtained large supplies of rifles. Indeed, with the experience of Isandhlana behind us, it is difficult to be quite certain that even Europeans, unless collected in great numbers, could do the work.

Lord R. Churchill began a series of speeches in Edinburgh on Tuesday by a furious attack on the Egyptian policy of the Government, his idea being that we should restore Arabi, repudiate the public Debt, sponge out the debt of the Fellaheen, and place Egypt under a truly Constitutional Prince. We have said enough of his extraordinary exaggerations elsewhere, but must add a note here on his remark that Egypt is not the route to India. In war-time, we must, he says, trust to our ships, and not to any transcontinental route. That may be true, though our ships are as useful in the Mediterranean as off the Cape; but Egypt, if not the route to India, is its gate. If it belonged to any other Power, we should have to keep a Channel Fleet in the Red Sea, fortify every Indian port, and then be everlastingly expecting attack.

Lord Randolph devoted his Wednesday's speech to a tirade against the agricultural labourer, as a person quite unfit for Parliamentary representation; and a demand for redistribution in the representation of boroughs, which he declared to be at present unjust, while the enfranchisement of the rural labourer is not only not just, but altogether "premature, inexpedient, unnatural, and, therefore, highly dangerous." The Liberals wanted to enfranchise the poor farmer and the agricultural labourer, because they counted confidently on seducing their "uneducated minds and feeble political intelligence with their worn-out sophistries and fallacies." He would wait, he said, with his usual sobriety and wisdom, till the agricultural labourers marched on London and pulled down the Hyde Park palings, before enfranchising them; for that would constitute the kind of qualification for the franchise which it would be wrong and foolish to resist. Mr. Chamberlain's speeches were so "boastful," and Mr. Trevelyan's so "gushing," that Lord Randolph Churchill took no account of them. Further, Lord Randolph thought minority representation gross humbug (especially as, according to him, it gives the Liberals twenty seats, and the Conservatives only two). He concluded by expressing a confident hope that the Government's "sinister machinations" in proposing a Reform Bill as a last resource for retaining office would be foiled, and that the constituencies would "refuse to renew to these unmasked impostors the confidence which they so unblushingly demand." Lord Randolph's Parliamentary Billingsgate is not in any degree mitigated. Of increased exasperation it was intrinsically incapable.

Lord Randolph concluded on Thursday what the Times calls his "trilogy" of speeches in Edinburgh by a speech on Ireland, on which we have said almost enough in another column. We may add here that he accused the Government of having brought Ireland into the state of misery from which it required the Coercion Act to redeem her; and declared that from 1875 to 1879 Ireland was quiet enough, but that directly Mr. Gladstone came into power, Ireland fell into anarchy. The truth, however, is that in the autumn of 1879 and the spring of 1880, Ireland was fast falling into the condition which Lord Beaconsfield himself, in the spring of 1880, described as one of "veiled rebellion;" and this Lord Randolph knows as well as any one, though it suited his purpose to conceal it. The disastrous famine of 1879 produced that crisis in the agrarian problem which the conduct of the Lords, in throwing out the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, turned into a political and social catastrophe of the first magnitude. "We have gone in three short years," says Lord Randolph, "too far, and we have gone too fast; the hill is very steep, the drag has not been sufficiently weighted, and unless we take a long pull and a strong pull, the horses will get away from us, and there will be a terrible smash." Perhaps so, but why, then, did the mischievous speaker so often double-thong the leaders of the Irish coach, when, according to his own account, he ought to have lent a hand to pull as hard as he could at the reins?

Lord Randolph has infected the Fourth Party, and the hangers-on of the Fourth Party, with his own choice language. Sir Henry Drummond Wolff spoke at Birkenhead on Wednesday of the time having come when the people should unite to get rid "of the imposture of a Government which had ruled the country for four years;" and expressed his profound surprise that "so notorious an incapable as Lord Ripon" should have introduced the Ilbert Bill. Whether that was meant as praise of the Ilbert Bill or not, we do not know, but one would suppose that Sir H. D. Wolff would have felt no surprise if a "notorious incapable" had introduced an exceedingly bad Bill, and would have felt much if such a one had introduced an exceedingly good one. Mr. MacIver, M.P., at the same meeting, remarked that the Government cared "for nothing but the loaves and fishes of office,"—a very dull sort of taunt, which it is difficult to conceive that even Mr. MacIver, M.P., seriously levelled at them. Not that we would pretend to fathom Mr. MacIver's capacity in that direction.

Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain addressed the Liberals of Birmingham on Monday. We have said enough of Sir Charles Dilke's singularly able speech elsewhere, but we wish to quote from Mr. Chamberlain's a sentence or two which are worth recording:—"Of all those who rejoice in Sir Charles's success, there can be no one who should do it more cordially, or with greater reason, than myself. During our acquaintance, now lasting through a considerable period, we have been united by a close political and personal friendship, which has known no break or interruption, and which has been one of the greatest pleasures of my public life. During all that time, I do not recollect that we have ever had a serious difference of opinion upon any important subject. Since I have been in the House of Commons, we have never voted in different lobbies. On the other hand, we have often stood shoulder to shoulder in many a contest, sometimes in a small minority, sometimes entirely alone, always with mutual trust and confidence, and without a trace of those petty personal jealousies which so often spoil the intercourse of public men." That is finely said; and yet, if we mistake not greatly, the ultimate drift of thought in the two minds will be found one day to be widely different.

The difficulty which the rich have in quite understanding the position of the poor was well illustrated in a speech of Lord Lorne at Glasgow on Tuesday. He has been making many speeches on emigration to Canada, often very good, though with a little too much of the gazetteer in them; but on Tuesday he propounded a new idea. He thought wealthy citizens at home could not do better than assist emigrating families with £50 or £100 each. "Families with able-bodied men and women among them might rest assured of success, if they could get any of their wealthy fellow-citizens to give them £50 or £100." Does Lord Lorne really think that the hard-working, rough-living, industrious families, who succeed as agricultural emigrants, would fail here, if they had £100 of capital each? His father's crofters would tell him a very different story, and so would the ploughmen and thatchers of the South.

The Pall Mall Gazette has introduced a new horror into public life. It has addressed a circular to all Liberal unofficial Members, asking whether they are in favour of making the Franchise Bill the first item in the programme of next Session, and whether they would extend the Bill to Ireland, with some other matters. A return of the answers is to be published when they are complete, but the editor already reports an approach to unanimity. Only ten per cent. of the Members as yet heard from object to put Franchise first, and only one Member objects to include Ireland in the scheme. The facts are interesting, but our contemporaries should reflect on the reply received by a Boston editor to a circular asking all members of the State Legislature to state their religious faith. One senator told him that he believed in a God, and humbly hoped there was a heaven, "a place where there is less friction than in this world, and no editors."

Mr. Tupper writes to Wednesday's Times in enthusiastic delight at the peerage conferred upon Mr. Tennyson, and indeed in a style of eloquence so elevated, that it appears to reveal him as the probable author of a remarkable article in a weekly contemporary concerning the appropriateness of an English peerage for men of the stamp of Julius Cæsar and Michael Angelo, at which literary folks have been laughing for the last week. Mr. Tupper is shocked that success in literature has not been more generally recognised in England as a title to political distinction, and refers to China, France, and the United States as countries where a very much higher estimate of literary ability prevails. But if England be an exception in this respect, it is because the English people have not been found eager, like the French people, to single out literary men for Parliamentary distinction. Where they have been so singled out, their literary distinction has certainly aided rather than held them back. Lord Macaulay owed his political eminence chiefly to his speeches, but the popularity of his speeches was greatly aided by the popularity of his essays. Mr. Disraeli and the late Lord Lytton certainly stood higher in Parliamentary repute through their novels than they would have stood without them; and neither Mr. Cowen nor Mr. John Morley has found his journalistic fame anything but a help in the House of Commons. Why literary success which does not minister to political services should be any special title to political distinction, it does not seem easy to say. We do not make Peers of great geologists or great electricians, and it is not easy to understand why we should make Peers of great poets. Perhaps the author of the "Proverbial Philosophy" might have a claim of his own to represent, with even exceptional distinction, that delight in platitude, which in the English middle-class rises almost to a passion; but Mr. Tennyson, fortunately, has no such claim.

Mr. Plunket, M.P. for the University of Dublin, opened on Wednesday a Beaconsfield Club at Shrewsbury, and in doing so made a very elaborate speech on the Irish policy of the Government, bitterly condemning it for the past, indeed, calling it a policy of "high hopes, reckless optimism, and wild adventure," and still more bitterly condemning it for the future, that is, for the proposal, which it seems likely to make, that household franchise shall be given in Ireland as well as in England. He declared his belief that, with the present distribution of seats, this would swell Mr. Parnell's party, in case of a dissolution before any redistribution of seats had taken place, to a phalanx of ninety to ninety-five Members; and that, with such a party, Mr. Parnell could prevent any redistribution of seats in Ireland which could in any degree redress the balance by increasing the weight of the soberer and wealthier North. What Mr. Plunket really argued for is to hide from ourselves, so far as we can, the real condition of popular opinion in Ireland, and to keep Ireland misrepresented or unrepresented, while we accord a full and fair representation to England and Scotland. Could there be a stronger plea for separation than the serious wish of British statesmen to falsify the Parliamentary representation of Ireland, though they do not dare to ask straightforwardly for its suspension or abolition?

It has been shown in letters to the Times that, so far as the statistics can be trusted, the marriage of deaf-mutes very rarely indeed results in offspring who have the same congenital defect; while Mr. Dalby, the aurist, reports it as his own observation that congenital deafness is very much commoner among the offspring of marriages between cousins, than even among the offspring of marriages between persons unrelated to each other of whom either one or both are congenitally deaf. If this can be amply supported on scientific evidence, it would certainly go to prove that even a striking coincidence of constitutional defects arising from different causes has but little tendency to reproduce itself in the offspring; while a weakness of constitution which is due in both parents to one and the same origin, though manifesting itself in no such coincidence of defect, results in unexpected deficiencies. But are the statistics on these subjects really adequate and accurate?

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. BRIGHT AS CONSERVATIVE.

BOTH in the speech at Keighley yesterday week, and in the speech near Padiham on Tuesday, Mr. Bright posed as, what in many respects he really is, a good, sound, English Conservative. This will be a new aspect in which to regard him for those who remember his eloquent denunciations of the British aristocracy and the Bishops,—those creatures “of monstrous, nay, even of adulterous birth,”—and his fierce attacks on the wealthy in the name of the poor, not only during the time of the Anti-Corn Law League, but also during the Reform agitation of 1858 in the many splendid but often very bitter speeches by which Mr. Bright signalled it; but it is nevertheless a true one, and we think we can show that in a very real sense Mr. Bright is by nature as good a Conservative as exists in England.

But when we call Mr. Bright a good Conservative, we only mean this,—not that he loves to wear all his life a shoe that pinches him because he has worn it once, but only that he loves to wear the shoe that does not pinch him, at least till it is worn out, rather than get a new one. No doubt, the whole influence exerted by the aristocracy over the House of Commons, and all the traditions of an Episcopal Church, have been to Mr. Bright as politically galling as tight shoes are physically galling, ever since he was a boy. He is not so Conservative as to cling eagerly to a galling incident of life of any kind. But he is so Conservative that he does not really desire to change that which he would never have created, but to which he has so far got accustomed that he looks upon it with a certain moderate satisfaction, as a familiar feature in a scene that he has learnt to love. We believe that it was, indeed, in some measure, Mr. Bright's strong feeling that under the Ten-pounders the British Constitution was not broadly enough based to inspire any hearty national Conservatism, that made him so anxious to popularise it and gain it a hold on the affections of Englishmen in general. Undoubtedly, there is a kind of Conservatism which insists on width of basis, as well as one that exults in the exclusiveness of narrow privilege. There was a middle-class Conservatism which would have gone no farther than the ten-pounders, but which could not feel that there was any basis for Conservatism at all while the unreformed Parliament was in existence. Mr. Bright's Conservatism was wider than that. He felt that he could not really regard the English Constitution as one to be clung to with all the Conservative elements of the English character, till it rested on a basis so wide that any father of a family might claim to represent his family in choosing the Member of Parliament for the locality in which he lived. But this once achieved, Mr. Bright's main feeling will evidently be a Conservative one. He will still, of course, reserve to himself the right to level the Episcopal Church with the Churches of the Nonconformists. He will still, of course, claim the right to find some machinery by which the Commons may overrule the Peers. But for the rest, he will be disposed to cling to what he has, rather than to venture into the region of new and “new-fangled” ideas. Mr. Bright is as Conservative as any Englishman ever born, of any habit that has associated itself even with the prejudices of a great multitude. He is by theory a Republican, but no English statesman of the day has shown more hearty and personal loyalty to the Throne, and it is probable that none would be more grieved than he by a revolution which would shake the Throne. He is by principle a Democrat, but Mr. Bright has never in public even mooted the idea of abolishing the House of Lords, though he has mooted the idea of passing a constitutional amendment which would render it impossible for the Lords to veto the same Bill a second time. He likes a wide suffrage, but he tells us honestly that he does not wish to go beyond household suffrage; that he thinks if the principle that the father of the family shall vote for the family is not wide enough for the United Kingdom, representative institutions in the United Kingdom will never be improved by widening that wide basis. He has often praised the American system, but he will not hear of equal electoral districts, and evidently thinks Mr. Forster something like a mere revolutionist for advocating an approximation to that plan. As for the minority representation, he loathes it, without discussing it, not, as it seems to us, because it is in principle anything but strictly democratic, but because it is something to which he is unaccustomed, something which appears to challenge,—what it does not really challenge at all,—the right of the majority to rule. In a word, though Mr. Bright cannot feel Conservative towards anything which does not really attract a very large popular sympathy, yet that condition once satisfied, he is amongst the most Conservative of the Conservatives, and would rather retain any number of theoretic anomalies than make too violent an inroad on what had endeared itself to the imagination of the masses. Even in relation to a matter so alien to all his own convictions as Church-rates, it was he who advocated the retention of the form of a Church-rate for those who voluntarily accepted it. There is a great deal in the observance of a traditional form even after the significance of it is gone, which recommends itself to the heart of a true Conservative, and in this sense Mr. Bright is amongst the truest of Conservatives. “The ancient principles of the Constitution,” is a phrase which is as often found in Mr. Bright's speeches as in those of any Conservative orator. “You want those you are admitting to the franchise to be guided by the ancient principles of the Constitution, in all that they do when they have power,” he said, in 1867, “in order that they may not depart from that great chart which I hope, in some degree, they have studied, and which was laid down by our forefathers in this House.” Could you find in the speeches of Burke, or Pitt, or the late Sir Robert Peel, a more thoroughly Conservative aspiration? “I profess,” he said to the Conservatives in 1859, “to be in intention as Conservative as you,—I believe infinitely more so, if you look forward twenty or thirty years into the future;” and he urged the cause of Parliamentary Reform expressly on the ground that Reform would “confer a lustre which time could never dim, on that benignant reign under which we have the happiness to live.”

There is no paradox in saying that Conservatism of Mr. Bright's kind is extremely popular with Englishmen, that though they will not as a people approve what is without a broad popular base, that broad popular base once secured, they cherish a dislike to experiments, a prejudice against superfluous tinkering, a deep suspicion of clever suggestions. They like to tread on the beaten track, and though when they feel a grievance, they will try to remove it, they will try to remove it with as little change as possible, and will certainly prefer extracting its sting to any attempt at abolishing its cause. They love to patch their house rather than to rebuild it, to keep as ornament what was originally meant for use, to turn to constant use what was originally meant only for precaution,—to do anything, in fact, rather than alter the forms to which they are accustomed, and discard the usages whose drift has become obsolete. And Mr. Bright represents the English people in nothing so much as in this Conservative bias. He smiles at the old Gothic tower, but proposes to retain it. He will never again use the drawbridge, but he is not a little proud of it. He has secured the portcullis so carefully that it can never be let down, but nothing would induce him to remove and destroy it. He is a Conservative, sympathising with the mass of the people; and if Sir Stafford Northcote really wishes to prosper, he might do worse than follow somewhat anxiously in many of the footsteps of Mr. Bright.

THE NEWS FROM TONQUIN.

WE fear the French are at last committed to a most serious enterprise, the conquest of Tonquin in the face of Chinese resistance. It is conceivable even now that the peasantry may interfere, or that the Chinese Cabinet, with its deep reluctance to avowed war, may at the twelfth hour agree to partition Tonquin; but the news from Sontay, and still more, the reception of that news in the Senate, taken together with the extraordinary result of General Camponon's appeal to the French Army, diminish our hopes to the lowest minimum. It is clear that immediately after the vote in the French Chamber, stringent orders were sent to Admiral Courbet, with the stimulating information that when fresh reinforcements were despatched, General Millot would supersede him in the land command. Upon receipt of these orders, Admiral Courbet, who had been hesitating, apparently in response to the hesitation in Paris, proceeded at once to action, and determined to risk everything upon a forward movement. He swept up his scattered garrisons so completely, that both Hanoi and Haiphong, his two dépôts, must, if the Chinese at all understand their business, be in serious danger of surprise, and with 7,000 men moved up the branch of the Songkoi upon which Sontay stands. On the 15th inst. he reached the outworks of the fortress, a line of villages connected by stockades, and at once attacked. The post was defended by the Tonquinese Militia, or Black Flags, with a hardihood admitted by the Admiral,—who was himself, according to one report, wounded—and though the houses were carried by a determined rush, the French lost 233 men and thirteen officers, killed, or seriously wounded. The loss is by itself of little importance, but the houses were under the fire of the gunboats from the river, and the statement shows both that the Tonquinese will fight bravely under a storm of shells, and that the French officers found it necessary to expose themselves with reckless gallantry. The proportion of officers killed and wounded is out of all precedent, even in French campaigns. The immediate defences of the citadel and the citadel itself have still to be carried, and as the gunboats can render comparatively little assistance,—the works being a mile from the river, and the Chinese Regulars, if present at all, are within the fort,—this will be a formidable operation. The attack was to commence on the 17th inst., the Admiral resting for a day, we presume to bring up heavier guns, and long before our next issue appears the result will be known in London.

This news, showing the actual commencement of hostilities, is most serious. In the first place, it scarcely leaves to the Peking Government any alternatives except a declaration of war, or a submission which will extremely irritate their people, and will completely destroy the influence of their Ambassador. The Marquis Tseng stands pledged to the lips to fight, if Sontay is taken. In the second place, victory will encourage M. Ferry in the policy he has put forward, and which he cannot carry out without, as he openly avows, storming Bacninh and Hung Hoa, the third fortress higher up the river, and at least threatening Mang Hoa, on the frontier. The fortresses are of no use by themselves, for the Chinese can close the river at Mang Hoa, and so prohibit the hoped-for trade,—and can, at any convenient moment, stop the productiveness of the import duties. There is no success in a half-result like that, and M. Ferry obviously feels this, for he is at last sending out serious reinforcements, which will raise the French Army to 15,000 men, under an experienced General. In his speech of Thursday to the Senate, he virtually defied China; and his former colleague, Admiral Jauréguiberry, "whose plans of 1879," said M. Ferry, "I have taken up," openly threatened Peking, not only with war, but with invasion. The French Premier, indeed, evidently feels his hands set free by the commencement of hostilities, and though we may distrust his view of French rural opinion—and we do distrust it—he has much that is plausible to allege in its favour. Some very important indications of opinion have occurred since we last wrote, and are sufficient to show that, whatever the reluctance of the peasantry to go to war, the classes dirigeantes are of opinion that the war should be prosecuted energetically. Those classes are represented most fully in the Senate, and the vote of the Senate for the Tonquin credit was crushing,—215 to 6. Then the Clericals are shaking—probably from sympathy with the 400,000 Catholic converts said to exist in Anam—Bishop Freppel, their representative in the Chamber, a most determined reactionary, and a bitter opponent of M. Ferry's Ministry, declaring, amidst the dismay of the secular Right, that it was a simple duty to vote for the second Credit, as the honour of France was pledged, and that he should perform his duty. The Duc de Broglie evidently felt this an almost mortal blow to the opposition, and in fact, in the Senate all the Clericals abstained from voting, though they knew that abstention would make the vote of the Senate seem almost unanimous. And finally, General Campenon's appeal to the Army has received a most unexpected response. It is officially stated that 3,000 officers and 30,000 soldiers have volunteered for Tonquin, and though this may be an exaggeration, intended to show that the Army is favourable to the war, it is certain that 1,700 men volunteered in the garrison of Paris alone—Paris being just the place soldiers are loth to leave—and that the number required at once, 6,500 men, was filled up in an instant, the men having already reached the ports. The election is still far off, and with this tone among the Respectables and the Army, M. Ferry may feel that he can go forward without endangering his Ministry. He may not go forward, for there is some singular arrangement under discussion, amidst all the din, which may yet prevent war; but if he does, nothing can avert a great campaign. We do not believe that the Chinese dynasty could keep on the throne if it surrendered Tonquin—which, owing to the magnitude of its rivers, is the true gate of Southern China—without a war; and with Hanoi, Haiphong, Haiduong, Sontay, Bacninh, and Hung Hoa all occupied by French troops, Tonquin is lost to China for ever. There is still, of course, the chance of partition, but that will be in reality a French surrender, and will ensure the precise result which Chinese statesmen dread, namely, an actual contact between the boundary of their Empire and that of the most restless of European Powers. If that is to be the solution, we have all over-rated both the nerve of the Cabinet of Peking and its dread of being compelled to organise a standing army in Southern China. A very few days, however, must now make the prospect clear.

SIR CHARLES DILKE ON LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

IT is a genuine pleasure to any Liberal politician to read a speech like that delivered by Sir Charles Dilke, at Birmingham, on Monday. Liberals are suffering just now from a depression of a peculiar kind. They have not the slightest fear, as their opponents fancy, of seeing their Party shattered by defections, or of being beaten on the hustings, or of seeing the kingdom entrusted to Lord Salisbury, whose place in politics is, as they know well, a guarantee of safety for any Liberal Administration. But what with the Irish Extremists, and with Tory obstructionists like Mr. Bourke, and the Members for villages, and with the House of Lords, they are dispirited by the amount of friction through which they are compelled to advance, by the disproportion between talk and work, and by the "worrit" involved in the new system of resisting details after the principle has been conceded. They feel sometimes like men who are growing old, and who weary of the burden of enterprises which, nevertheless, they can think out more clearly than ever before. To men in such a mood, a speech like Sir Charles Dilke's, a speech by a born administrator, who knows how details will press, but who is nevertheless young in his mind, and can face the toil of dealing with them with cheery confidence, is a true refreshment. The President of the Local Government Board is not alarmed a bit at all the talk about the impossibility of carrying big Bills. He says nine measures of the first importance, controversial measures rousing huge debate, were passed in 1870, and eight in 1871; and three measures, the Franchise Bill, the County Government Bill, and the Municipal Bill for London, can surely be passed in 1884,—and they shall, or, at all events, they shall either be accepted or rejected. There is a ring of courage and "go" about that utterance which delighted the meeting, and will be appreciated by the whole country, more especially as Sir Charles Dilke makes no effort to conceal the magnitude of the task to be accomplished. On the contrary, though he says the Franchise Bill will be "short and simple," and though he intimates that the London Bill has fewer opponents than the world imagines, he devotes the larger part of his speech to a careful explanation of the greatness of the County Government Bill, of its wide scope, and probable immense effects. He wants it to be, and hints that it will be, a thoroughly decentralising Bill, creating local administrations everywhere, and relieving the central authority of great masses of work. "It is a ridiculous fact," said Sir Charles, that in the chosen home of free elective institutions we "have a vast number of large towns with no true and simple form of urban institutions." We not only have no system under which such places can be organised at once, but "we have an overlapping of areas, and a confusion of bodies, and of functions, and of taxes, and of debts, which bewilders every man who attempts to grasp the principles upon which it rests." All such confusion should be swept away, and the powers of the Local Government Board should be transferred in great measure to Elective County Councils, supervising District Councils which will do the direct municipal work, and which will gather to themselves the powers of all manner of separate bodies. "It is universally admitted that below the county you find chaos, and it would be absurd to pretend to deal with local government, and leave the chaos chaos still." There "must be, if possible, a division of rates between occupiers and owners," the "present subsidies should be replaced by a sounder financial system," and the local taxes "now collected for the State should be assigned to local authorities," all of them principles carefully laid down by the Liberal chiefs in the debate of 1883 on local government. "To prevent multiplication of elections, and consequent cost, worry, and loss of interest in elections, district councillors and county councillors should be elected at the same time." All this points to a large, even sweeping reform, a Bill of many clauses, each one of which will arouse hostile interests, excite passionate party debate, and give endless opportunities for deliberate obstruction. Nevertheless, Sir Charles Dilke, who will have all the work to do, is ready to do it, thinks he can pass the Bill, and amidst hearty cheering calls upon the Liberals of Birmingham to stand shoulder to shoulder, and insist upon the three great measures, besides two smaller ones which he named, being made law next Session.

We are convinced that this is the right tone to take, when it is taken by a serious statesman, not suspected of being cheerful from mere levity, and this for two reasons. One is, that when the Government is lugubrious or despondent, or visibly harassed by apprehensions of obstruction, resistance by delay comes to be expected, and therefore to seem natural, and therefore to be tolerated. It ought to be considered as what it is,—a great treachery, forbidden by the unwritten law of Parliament, and injurious to the welfare of the country, and therefore no more to be expected than a dynamite explosion under the floor of the House of Commons. It should not be received with dreary tolerance, as if it were a mere bore and a weariness necessary to be endured; but with hot surprise and indignation, as an assault on Parliament to be immediately put down by the use of all the machinery that the Houses can justifiably set in motion. The permanent idea ought to be that any necessary work can be done in the Session, and that to leave it undone is a failure which reflects discredit either upon the Government, or upon the machine through which its work has to be done. The other reason is that the importance of a measure is no test of the difficulties that will impede its path. Very often it is so important that it attracts the attention of the whole people, and then, if they approve it, they lend it a momentum before which difficulties vanish. Members who wish to resist are informed that the Bill must pass, upon peril of their seats, and accordingly it does pass, with what seems to outsiders unintelligible ease. It is quite possible that this may be the case with this very County Government Bill. It is certainly desired, ardently desired, by all Liberals, and if it is anything like as thorough-going as Sir Charles Dilke implies, it will be so popular in Ireland that the Liberal majorities in the House of Commons will be overwhelming. Every clause may be supported by a majority of more than a hundred, and the Tory Lords, merely to clear the Bill out of the way of the constituencies before the election, will have nothing to do but to submit. In this case, the very magnitude of the Bill will have given it the necessary weight, and Sir Charles Dilke's hopefulness will have been based not only upon temperament, but upon reason.

At all events, his is not the cheeriness of a man who goes to battle with a light heart, never counting up the cost. It is, we hope, going to be a mark of the new Radicals that they know how to administer, and certainly if Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain are specimens of them, the hope is justified. Sir Charles Dilke finished up his weighty speech by a statement which might have come from the most effective of middle-aged Permanent Under-Secretaries. He is going to help the rehousing of the poor by working the existing law. He is quite certain that, under that law, much may be done for the abolition of rookeries, and he is going to do it. He has asked a "local authority," which has apparently consented, to purchase a London slum under its compulsory powers, and has found that compensation, which is, of course, the great difficulty, can be reduced under Torrens's Act to reasonable proportions. Under that Act he can appoint a valuer, "who must take into consideration the condition of the property, the probable duration of the buildings in their existing state, and the state of their repair." With those data fairly taken into account, such buildings will be cheap, the local authorities are willing to buy cheap buildings, and the rookeries may be attacked in succession, almost without any fresh legislation. That is true administration, and our only fear is that Lord Salisbury will quote Sir Charles Dilke's efficiency as a reason why a Municipality for London is really not required. It is, however, the efficient man who says that the new and great local Assembly is absolutely indispensable.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL ON EGYPT.

WE confess to a keen disappointment at Lord Randolph Churchill's Egyptian speech. We have hoped against hope that this young man—who, though he chose to present himself as a sort of Puck in politics, and imitated Mr. Disraeli's earliest and worst manner, and countenanced the Parnellites whenever they were degrading the House of Commons, had in him some "go" and separateness—would some day shake off his Harlequin skin, and appear, clothed and in his right mind, in the character of a man at least pretending to be a statesman. He was said to be ambitious, known to be audacious, and he possessed that first of useful faculties, the power of compelling enemies to pay him some degree of attention. He might have developed at least into a Parliamentary critic, with whose outspoken version of affairs more reticent and solemn politicians would always have to reckon. That hope has disappeared. No man ever could have a better chance than Lord Randolph Churchill enjoyed in Edinburgh on Tuesday. An Edinburgh audience, if Tory, will hear anything; and if Liberal, is so earnestly Liberal, that the wildest attacks upon its faith will only produce a smile. He had for his subject the one topic upon which the Liberal Government is open to scathing criticism, the one great experiment it has made which has hitherto apparently failed, the one portion of its policy which has landed it to all appearance in an impasse from which it can neither honourably retire nor profitably advance. Mr. Gladstone's Government could have been attacked as to Egypt most effectively, and best attacked by a rather unconventional speaker. There are plenty of things to be said about the incapacity of the Khedive, which hampers us at every turn; about the injustice of the Law of Liquidation; about the effect of our presence in strengthening usurers; about the paralysis of administration which dual government produces; about the hopelessness of expecting to reinvigorate the morale of the Egyptian Army by kindness and attention to drill. We have re-established the Khedive, and he is powerless; "reinvigorated" the Army, and it cannot defend the land; reformed the administration of justice, and nobody can get any. A solid case, requiring answer, could have been made out against the method adopted by the Cabinet in Egypt; and Lord Randolph, of all men, was free to make it. He was not bound to adhere to Lord Salisbury's ideas, or to defend Liberal advice, or to be faithful towards Tories, or to be tolerant towards Radicals; he was a Free-lance, able to utter his own thought, and certain, if the thought were an able one, or even a clear one, to find it sufficiently respected. He has uttered his own thought, and it will be years before he is again believed to be capable of a sound one. It is the thought of a schoolboy of fifteen, who has got up a little of his subject by two nights' study of a half-understood Blue-book, but who knows absolutely nothing either of men or politics, of what is possible and what impossible, of what Governments attempt, and what, however willing, they are compelled to leave alone. His invective, instead of being an ornament of debate, is hotter and sillier than that of the last Irish importation; his reasoning is only absurd conclusions from imaginary premises; and his plan is as foolish as if he had proposed to solve all English Constitutional difficulties by restoring the Heptarchy.

Throughout, Lord Randolph Churchill exaggerates in the style of some Anarchist who, in a Parisian wine-shop, denounces all capitalists as blood-suckers and all politicians as the purchased enemies of the people. Not believing Egypt to be the route to India, he does not approve interference in the country; and therefore declares that Mr. Gladstone went there only as the agent of the Bondholders, that he struck at commerce by bombarding Alexandria, by occupying Ismailia, and by devastating the country—the latter an incident which never occurred;—that he has committed "a great crime," and "that he has returned to the detestable foreign policy which preceded the great Reform Bill." The natural conclusion of that outburst is, that Mr. Gladstone ought never to have gone to Egypt at all, a conclusion which is, at least, intelligible and consistent; but then, perhaps, therefore, it is not Lord Randolph Churchill's. Mr. Gladstone, in his judgment, was wrong, criminally wrong, in entering Egypt; and, therefore, he ought to have gone there as the ally of Arabi, whom the French or the Turks would infallibly have put down, if we had not. Next, Lord Randolph Churchill disapproves the selection of Tewfik as the instrument of government, and therefore he must denounce him twice over as the vilest of mankind, "a being not worthy the name of man," the "author of the massacre of Alexandria," "one of the most despicable wretches who ever occupied an Eastern throne," "the conspirator against his father, the robber of his family, the banisher of his brother, the dealer in human flesh and blood, the betrayer of his allies, of his Ministers, and of his country, the man of magic and of sorcery." Why not call him Caligula, Gen. Arnold, and the Witch of Endor at once, and be done with it? We are not concerned to defend Tewfik, who is obviously a rather feeble Egyptian fellah, possessed of passive courage, but no energy, and quite unequal to his place in the world; but no man capable of becoming a serious politician would use such language about a Sovereign who, whatever his incapacities, has adhered loyally to his alliance with the British, and who is indispensable, if only as an instrument to avert serious disasters. Lord Randolph Churchill, however, can only express disapproval by imaginary accusations. He thinks, apparently, that we might have compelled the Egyptians to manage the cholera better, which is possibly true; so he accuses the British, first of taking the cattle-plague to Egypt, and then, when it had produced the cholera, of drawing military cordons round infected places, so that no doctors could get in, and finally, "when every Egyptian who had to die was dead," of sending too late a dozen doctors to attend the people's funerals. He thinks, as we also think, that the restored Pashas executed too many people, and therefore declaims about the hundreds whom "Mr. Gladstone's Judges"—who do not exist—"have either hung or condemned to penal servitude, or sentenced to a living death in the regions of the White Nile." There was once a Bloody Assize in England, and that was bad, and therefore William of Orange sent Judge Jeffreys into the West.

It is impossible to criticise such nonsense, and we turn, therefore, with relief, though not with hope, to the alternative policy which Lord Randolph may have to suggest. We will do him the credit to say that, unlike most of his party—if, indeed, he has a party, and is not, as many of his sentences suggest, just crossing the chasm between ultra-Toryism and the extreme Radicalism—he does not confine himself to abuse, but actually suggests a policy. And his policy is to admit a gigantic blunder, to expel the Khedive and all his followers, and to decree "the recall of the exile from Ceylon, the resurrection of the National party, the formation of a genuine popular Government, at the head of which shall be placed the Prince, either native or European, as you will, who shall be in deed and in truth constitutional, enlightened, and just. I advocate a great rearrangement and reduction of the Egyptian National Debt, and a clear sweep of the debts of the victimised, the bankrupt, and the ruined Fellaheen. I advocate the placing of Egypt under the guarantee and guardianship of united Europe, so that no one single Power shall be able to exercise there superior influence to another, so that collective authority shall restrain individual ambition. In a word, I advocate—I plead for—the real emancipation of an historic land, and the true freedom of an ancient race." The Government is to turn its back upon itself, and because it was wrong to go to Egypt, it is to stop there in order to carry out a revolution,—to secure order by expelling the legitimate Government, and to restore freedom by restoring a military despot to the control of the country. After all our efforts, we are to undo our work; and after risking war to abolish the Dual Control, we are deliberately to turn Egypt into the cockpit of European diplomacy. It is the plan of a child, who does not know Europe, or Egypt, or Englishmen, or diplomacy, or war, but wishes to attract attention by some proposition at once bizarre, annoying to his audience, and impossible; and such a child we at last believe Lord Randolph Churchill to be. He has had one of the greatest chances he can ever have in this life, and we do not hesitate to say that Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett would have used it better. The Member for Eye would probably have advised that the British Fleet should be sent to capture the Mahdi in Kordofan, but at least he would have understood that the one miracle which was never yet accomplished is the cancelling of the past. Lord Randolph Churchill does not understand even that, and screams that the misery of the Egyptian people will at once be terminated, if only Mr. Gladstone, that criminal of criminals, will exert his magic power, and give them back yesterday.

LORD RANDOLPH versus MR. FORSTER.

"HARK, hark, I hear the strain of strutting Chanticleer!" says Ariel, in the Tempest; and the ears of the canny Scots who listened to Lord Randolph Churchill's speech of Thursday on Ireland must have been assailed by very similar music. Every sentence in that speech has a strut in it, every climax is a crow. But the remarkable feature of the speech is that its best part consists of a spoiled edition of Mr. Leatham's recent speech at Huddersfield, on the inviolability of the Union; while it concludes with a shrill denunciation of the Liberals for not being guided by Lord Hartington's, Mr. Forster's, and Mr. Goschen's view of the Irish question, though the fact is that Mr. Forster, whose experience of Ireland is really large, has supported with all the great weight of his authority the very policy for Ireland which Lord Randolph Churchill describes as so evil, that it would, in his opinion, be better even to return to power a Tory Government "as wicked and as stupid as their foes declare them to be," than to give a renewed lease of power to the present Administration.

Let us deal with the part purloined from Mr. Leatham, and spoiled in the purloining, first. Mr. Leatham, as our readers will remember—for we called their special attention to his speech—made the following declaration on the Irish question, on October 23rd. Lord Randolph Churchill gives us a revised version of that speech, but he deliberately spoils it of its weight in the revising:—

"We must persist in our policy of absolute and unfaltering justice; but, on the other hand, there must be no trifling about the maintenance of the Union. . . . Sincerely as I am attached to the Liberal party, and warm as is my allegiance to those who lead it, I would renounce both, rather than admit that upon this supreme and cardinal question it was possible to give way. The country which begins to parley with its own dissolution is lost. The obligation to maintain the body politic is vital; it is this which made the Americans of the North struggle to the death in order to maintain the Union, and the same obligation compels us. To maintain their great America whole and indivisible, the Americans of the North changed for a time their whole nature. God grant that it may never be necessary for us to change ourselves. A nation of unarmorial shopkeepers and of patient farmers became at once the most resolute, the sternest, and perhaps the fiercest amongst men. They flung economy to the winds; they turned their backs upon prosperity; steadfastly they looked death in the face. Is it nothing—a sentiment which is so great that it should so seize upon a whole people and change and transform them at its pleasure? The whole world trembled with the shock and shuddered at the carnage. But they saved their country. And so, if the worst comes to the worst, we can save ourselves."

Now, observe how Lord Randolph treats that masculine and statesmanlike passage in his shrill parody:—

"In this difficulty learn a lesson from the United States, which possess the most purely democratic Government the world has ever seen. It is generally supposed that the War of the Secession was caused by the question of slavery. This is a great error. Slavery had little to do with the war—certainly not more than the Irish Famine had to do with the repeal of the Corn Laws. The cause of the war—that long and bloody war—was the demand put forward by the South for what were called 'State rights.' Now, 'State rights' were very plausible. They merely meant that Virginia wanted one sort of government, Carolina another, and Texas a third; that what was suited to other States was not suited to them; and that Virginia, Carolina, and Texas should be governed according to Virginia, Carolinian, and Texan ideas. . . . What did the Northern States do with these demands? Did they tamper with them, palter with them, yield to them little by little? Not they; they knew that 'State rights' were death to the Union; they knew that the whole future of North America hung upon the maintenance of the Union; they said 'No,' shortly and simply, and they fought. Nor did they shrink from any sacrifice. If there was a people on the face of the earth who loathed war, it was the citizens of the Northern States. They carried on a bloody war for four years. If there was a people on the face of the earth who dreaded a large standing army, it was the citizens of the Northern States. For more than five years they maintained a military force of over half-a-million of men. If there was a people on the face of the earth who had a horror of debt, public or private, it was the citizens of the Northern States. They incurred a debt of seven hundred millions sterling, and depreciated their currency 70 per cent. If there was a people on the face of the earth who loved and worshipped their Constitution, with all its rights and liberties, it was the citizens of the Northern States. For four years and more they suspended that Constitution, and placed themselves under the dictatorship of one man. So they went on; they fought for four years; they fought desperately, bloodily; 250,000 men lost their lives in the fight; innumerable towns, and villages, and homesteads blazed and were destroyed; wealth, property, credit went down and vanished. Still they fought, and at last they won. 'State rights' were conquered, and the Union emerged triumphant from that awful four years' battle. And who will say now, comparing the United States of 1860 with the United States of 1860, who will dare to say that the citizens of the Northern States were not right, were not justified, were not rewarded?"

Now, Lord Randolph Churchill may be excused for being very ignorant about the American Civil War. He was not so old, even when it concluded, as Mr. Jefferson Brick, the war correspondent in Martin Chuzzlewit, whose style he sometimes emulates, and certainly knew even less of the United States than that worthy. But he should not lug into his speeches statements of facts on which he happens to be completely ignorant, and rear a great superstructure on them. Nothing can be more ridiculously absurd than to say that the South fought for State rights, and the North against them. Mr. Lincoln was absolutely opposed to any interference with State rights. If the South had stuck to their State rights alone, the North would not have moved a finger against them for another quarter of a century, even though the whites had clung to slavery in every Southern State. But the South was not content with State rights. It wanted to condition for the free extension of slavery, and to insist that slavery should be as fully tolerated, and that slaves should be as easily recovered by their owners, in the Free States as in the South. Rather than concede that, the North fought, not against State rights, which the Southerners had to the full, and have had restored to them again for many years back, but against the right of the South to dominate the whole Union with their policy of slavery. Rather than concede that, the North fought,—fought on behalf of the Constitution,—and though they extinguished slavery as an incident of the war, it was because it had been notorious that it was slavery which had prompted the aggression of the South, and that till that malignant sting was extracted, the South would never respect the conditions of the Union. Well, what bearing has all this on the Irish question? A very clear bearing, but one absolutely fatal to Lord Randolph Churchill's analogy. Mr. Leatham said, 'give Ireland absolutely the same rights under the Constitution as England, as the South had the same rights under the Constitution as the North; but then fight, rather than permit her to violate the Union, of which equality of treatment is the reasonable condition.' Lord Randolph says, 'Deny Ireland the same rights under the Constitution as England, and then fight to prevent her gaining the same rights;' and he probably thinks that he is saying what Mr. Leatham said, in a better form. He is really advocating the one injustice which would make the enforcement of the authority of the Empire unreasonable, and unjust. And yet he mimics the firm and patriotic language of the man who had insisted first on treating Ireland as we treat ourselves, and, only on that condition, on refusing to Ireland a liberty which we would not accord to any portion of Great Britain.

But Lord Randolph appeals to the authority of Mr. Forster, against whom, as he declares, the Liberal Cabinet "conspired" and ejected him from their ranks. Mr. Forster is the one unanswerable witness on our side. In the masterly speech at Bradford, which we criticised at length last week, Mr. Forster scouted the idea that we could afford to insist on the Union, if we did not fulfil in spirit the condition that Ireland should be treated in that Union like any other integral portion of the United Kingdom. If any man understands the evil lurking in Mr. Parnell's movement, it is Mr. Forster. If any one knows what the mischief would be of increasing materially Mr. Parnell's Parliamentary strength, it is Mr. Forster. Yet "I shall be told," says Mr. Forster, "'You will increase the number of Home-rulers, and Home-rule will be passed.' Well, Home-rule will be passed when the majority of the Members of the Imperial Parliament think it ought to be agreed to. But did the members for Virginia and the members for Louisiana force the disunion of the American Union? The Members for the various parts of Ireland will not be able to force Home-rule against the convictions of the rest of their fellow-countrymen. . . . What, after all, is the real and greatest argument against separation? It is that we believe it to be to the interest of both islands that they should be one country. How can we treat them as one country, unless we treat them with equality on such a question as this of the franchise? How can we call them one country, if we should declare that the Irish franchise should be partial and artificial, should be so framed as to exclude the masses from participation, and that the English and Scotch franchises should be—as I trust they will be—general and impartial, and based upon the grand, great principle of hearthstone suffrage?" What Lord Randolph Churchill cries out for is that we should fight to the death to keep Ireland in the clutches of a Power which absolutely refuses to give her that equality to which, under the Act of Union, she is entitled.

Lord Randolph may, perhaps, say that he protested most strongly against the idea of suspending the Parliamentary rights of Ireland. No doubt, he did. But though he protested against suspending the Parliamentary rights which Ireland already has, he protested also most strongly against conceding anything more to Ireland, even though the concession demanded is the concession of something already enjoyed by England,—like household suffrage in the boroughs,—and he proposed, by way of set-off, to bribe Ireland, as much as the Government can be persuaded to bribe her, with money grants. In other words, though Lord Randolph would not incur the scandal of establishing a despotism in Ireland, he would refuse her equality in one breath, offer her bribes with the next, and threaten her with military conquest with the third

if she did not accept the inequality and console herself with the bribes. A baser Irish policy we can hardly conceive. And for our own parts, we doubt whether it will be acceptable to any one, Tory, Liberal, or Radical, compounded as it seems to be of the most ignoble elements of all those creeds. Lord Randolph Churchill has crowed his loudest in Edinburgh; but now the din is over, Midlothian will calmly return to the Irish policy of Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Forster, with a sense of relief that the Tory accuser has found nothing better to say against it than was contained in this shrill and ignorant speech.

THE WOES OF THE SHOP-ASSISTANTS.

THE Daily News of Monday contained a terrible disclosure of the miserable conditions in which labour is carried on in shops, and especially in the shops of Retail Drapers. "Disclosure," indeed, is hardly the right name to give to this statement, for disclosure implies previous concealment, and here there has been no previous concealment. We have been told it all before; we were as well acquainted with it ten years ago as we are to-day. But it is this very fact that makes the statement so terrible. A whole generation—as generations are counted in these trades—has suffered and died, or has lived on with broken health and weakened constitutions, since the facts were first made known. The common delusion that when once the great, wise, benevolent, self-denying British public has its attention drawn to undoubted and preventable misery, a remedy is sure to be found, has once more been dispelled. The hours of labour of Shop Assistants are no shorter, the surroundings in which those long hours are passed are no more bearable, than they were when the evil was first pointed out. The story that these young men and women tell is always the same. Their hours are from seventy-five to ninety a week, they have no half-holiday, and their meals have to be taken in intervals which, all told, do not amount to an hour. To begin work at eight every morning, and go on till half-past nine at night, except on Saturdays, when the hour of closing is midnight; to remain on their legs all this time, except during the fifty or sixty minutes into which breakfast, dinner, and supper have to be crowded; to be so weary on the Sunday morning that the greater part of the day is passed in bed,—this is the life which all the witnesses describe themselves as leading. To many of our readers, the story will seem incredible. The shops with which they are familiar close at seven on five days of the week, and at two on Saturdays. But the shops with which they are familiar are but a fraction of those which supply London with the goods it wants. Early closing may be the rule in the fashionable quarters of London, though even here it is so only in a minority of shops; but it is not even the exception in the other quarters. If all traders would agree to keep their shops open for a reasonable number of hours, the thing could be done, but the temptation of stealing a march on a rival is irresistible; and if all the shops in London were closed this afternoon, some of them would be opened next Saturday, in the hope of catching the customers shut out from the rest. For life, it must be remembered, is often hard even to the proprietors of these shops, though not hard in the same way that it is hard to their assistants. Competition is very keen, and in many cases profits are small and uncertain; and when this is so, the temptation to make these profits a little larger by working when others are resting is extreme. The proprietors of these shops are not cruel; they are only eager and careless. Their whole thoughts are bent upon making both ends meet, and if possible overlap; and if they often succeed, they sometimes fail, and while they are actually working, the possibility of failure is what is most present to them. It is of no use, we fear, to appeal to the owners of shops to put an end to this state of things. Emancipation must come from without, not from within; from the classes which supply the workers, or from those which supply the consumers, or from the Legislature, which represents both.

As regards the last of these sources, there would be no chance of help, if it were not for the extreme youth of many of the workers. A large number, it is said, of the girls employed in shops are under sixteen, and about two-thirds are under twenty. Fourteen is a common age for apprenticeship to begin. It is bad enough to lead the life just described when the body is fully developed, but it is worse to lead it when the frame is still incomplete and the strength imperfect. The result is that these children—for they are really no more than children—die off, or have to leave in broken health. The shopkeeper is not troubled at this, for he knows there are plenty more where these came from. The supply is constantly increasing. Each gap is filled up with a readiness which, if they only knew what is before them, would be worthy of a forlorn hope. Now, there is no reason why the restrictions imposed on the labour of children and young people in factories should not be equally imposed on the labour of children and young people in shops. Or rather, there is only one reason,—the increase of inspection that this would involve. We are not at all blind to the mischief of a state of society in which those who are watching, and those who are being watched, divide the world between them; but where children are concerned, inspection seems the only thing that can meet the case. They cannot help themselves; the choice lies between making laws for their special benefit, and letting them go altogether uncared for. Now, a law which only allows a helpless person to help himself is but a mockery of a law; consequently, a law designed to protect children must be worked by Inspectors. A Bill is to be brought forward next Session which will extend the provisions of the Factory and Workshops Act to shops of all kinds, and if the measure goes no further than this, it will be worthy of all support. Where women are concerned, the situation is surrounded with difficulty; but where children are concerned, it is all plain sailing.

Still, the protection of children, though it would do something towards a cure, would not do very much. As child-labour became less available, adult labour would supply its place, and for this form of the evil, legislation can furnish no cure. Nor, we fear, is any help to be looked for in the quarter from which it has come to the skilled artisan. Perhaps the greatest benefit of Trades Unionism has been the much decried limitation which it imposes on the number of apprentices. In view of the insuperable objections which lie in the way of any general check upon population, great good is done by any check imposed upon its increase in particular occupations. In this way, some trades, at all events, are lifted above the miserable level at which all would otherwise be kept. But, for the application of Unionism, there must be a demand for skill in the workman. If the knowledge how to serve in a shop could only be imparted by those already serving there, they might have it in their power to keep the shop population down. As it is, they are powerless to do this, because they have nothing to impart which cannot be equally well learnt without them. The only remedy that we can suggest is, it must be admitted, a very imperfect one. But when there is nothing better to be had, even an imperfect remedy is better than none. It is to reduce the number of those employed in shops, by bringing the trade into discredit. The almost universal cry of those thus employed is that they wish they had gone into any other employment, no matter what. "Should never think," says a forewoman, aged twenty-eight, "of going into a shop, if she had to begin again. Would rather be a servant in a good family." "Wishes," says a draper's assistant, "that he had stayed in the country, instead of coming here, to slave every hour that God sends, in a close and unhealthy shop." Now, something, we think, might be attempted to make warning do the work of experience. In country villages, for example, the parson and the parson's wife might speak to parents of the folly of sending their girls to London shops, as a more genteel employment than domestic or farm service. They would have an ample supply of texts, and if they used their opportunities well, they might keep a good many girls in the country who now flock to London. The Managers of the Shop Hours' League might themselves do something in this way. Such plain accounts of what life in shops is as that which Mr. Sutherst, the President, gives in the Daily News might be scattered liberally over the country. When the object is to distribute telling statements of plain facts as widely as possible, fly-sheets are not at all an instrument to be neglected. They often take more hold of the poor than either books or newspapers. We fear that the Treasury of the Shop Hours' League is not as full as we should like to see it, but in the long-run we believe that this might prove a very profitable mode of spending such money as the League may have. Another plan which, if it were energetically worked, might effect some improvement, is to appeal directly to the poor to help the poor. It is not, for the most part, the shops at which the rich deal that are now the greatest sinners in the matter of hours. Well-to-do people do not want to shop after seven o'clock, and by this time they are pretty well used to the Saturday half-holiday. It is the poor who habitually shop at night, and for whom Saturday is the busiest day in the week. If urgent and constant appeals were made to them in the newspapers they read, at public meetings held in the districts where they dwell, by deputation to the Unions which have influence over them, late shopping, except on Saturdays, might come to be regarded as an injury to their own class. If this could be brought about, late shopping would be doomed. Saturdays we would leave them with little or no diminution, but if hours were shortened on other days, and a half-holiday secured, say, on Mondays, the change for the better would be very marked. The protection of children by law; the creation, for the benefit of adults, of a healthy class opinion; and the lessening, by information and argument, of the influx from the country into London,—these are the three objects at which those who wish to bring about a reform will do well to aim.

CANON LIDDON ON SECULARISM.

CANON LIDDON, in the fine sermon preached last Sunday in St. Paul's, on the comparative influence exerted by the seen and the unseen on the quality and energy of human conduct, maintained most justly, we believe, that spiritual faith much more than counterbalances, in the stimulus it lends to human activity, even that loss of secular energy which the time spent in religious exercises appears to entail. "It may well be," he said, "that a man who is undisturbed by any sight of the eternal future might thus get through, after his fashion, more manual or mental work having reference only to this life, than a man who believes what the Christian revelation tells him about a life after death. But this admission is counterbalanced by the moral enrichment of life which is the fruit of sincere faith in a future existence. The ground which might appear to be won for this world by saving thought and time, against the demands which the future world must make on them, would be lost by the absence of those commanding motives which belief in another life supplies. The things that are not seen—Almighty God and the eternal future—make large demands upon the head and heart; they also, or rather thereby, make the kindred duties of this life serious and noble, since all are a preparation for that which is to follow. There is a scene in the life of our Lord which is apparently related by the Fourth Evangelist with the view of impressing this upon us. St. John tells us how, 'Jesus, knowing that the Father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and went to God,'—with his thoughts resting on these vast subjects of contemplation, did what?—'he riseth from supper and laid aside his garments, and took a towel and girded himself. After that he poureth water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.' No duty is too humble to be inspired by the grandest conviction as its ruling motive. No faith is too sublime to consecrate any portion of a life-work that is meant for eternity. . . . Positivism may say, if it will, as it watches us Christians kneeling before the altars of the Eternal and the Crucified, 'See how these men waste time which might be given to social, economical, sanitary, moral improvements.' But if man does not cease to exist at death, we are working on a basis of fact which Positivism ignores. Let us kneel on. Let us kneel on, for most assuredly the time is not lost; we gain more in moral power than we lose in minutes or hours. Heaven irradiates, with a meaning not otherwise to be had, the monotonous drudgery of many an earthly lot; and it is better, in the long-run, for 'the things that are seen' that we should thus look mainly at the 'things that are not seen.'" Canon Liddon has hardly ever said anything with nobler and simpler eloquence than this. And though we cannot in any way emulate the power of his language, we may illustrate his teaching from one or two different points of view which it did not enter into his line of thought to include.

Although, then, a gain of faith is a gain of power for this world, no less than the other, it is not a gain of power in that sense in which it is a gain of power laboriously to pump up water which you wish to spread far and wide, to a height from which it will, by the mere pressure of its descending column, distribute itself to all the needful centres. That is not Canon Liddon's meaning, and certainly completely out of keeping with the fine illustration he gave of it. Faith is no artificial heightening of emotion in order that it may be equal to the tasks required of it. That would be the sceptic's view of faith,—a useful but manufactured fiction, not the Christian's view of it, namely, a recognition of revealed truth. Canon Liddon's lesson we take to be this,—that, as a matter of fact, whether a man believes in the Christian revelation or rejects that belief,—whether he agrees with Canon Liddon, or ranges himself with Mr. Frederic Harrison as an ardently religious Positivist, or scoffs at all religion with Mr. Bradlaugh, he cannot rid himself of the impression, which is ingrained deep in the facts of his inmost nature, that the manner of life which would be most appropriate to the secular view of things,—the easy-going manner of life which weighs the value of our lot by measuring its known pains against its known enjoyments,—is not the true one; that, however you may account for it, the man who trifles with life,—as life ought to be trifled with if the visible part of life were all,—is ignoring, or trying to ignore, one of the most constant and inevitable warnings to which our nature is subjected, and only deserves to be treated as a man hiding from himself. Mr. Leslie Stephen, secularist as he is, admitted this, as we ourselves, we believe, pointed out, when reviewing his book on “The Basis of Ethics;” and as Mr. Goldwin Smith, in the very striking article published in the December Contemporary, has eloquently reminded us. Mr. Stephen expressly declares that secularistic ethics can say no more than this,—“Be good, if you would be happy,” adding, however, “in an emphatic aside, ‘Be not too good.’” Yet Mr. Leslie Stephen is obviously not in the least satisfied with his secular ethics, for he does not echo on his own account the advice, “Be not too good;” indeed, he evidently despises it, though he does not in the least know where to find the intellectual leverage with which to justify the contempt he feels for those who adopt it. Well, that is a good illustration of what we mean. Even those to whom the vision of what Christ revealed is no vision at all,—nothing but the shadow of a cloud,—are often just as much pressed upon by the obligations of the eternal world as those who recognise it in full. Some of them no doubt contrive, by continually turning away their attention from the burden, to make the least of it, and get as much distraction in the world as they can; others are rendered simply restless and feverish by it, and plunge into fictitious religions with Mr. Frederic Harrison; or into ambiguous moral, social, and political movements with Mr. Bradlaugh; but all who have any sensitiveness to social obligations at all, do practically recognise that human life is not, and cannot be, made a trivial affair of; that there is an immeasurable pressure of obligation resting on it which, whatever your theory of life, you must feel, and, if you are honest, recognise; that you can only satisfy your own heart by treating life as if it were vastly more important than, on the common secular theory, it ought to be; and that the man who is willing to accept the utilitarian form of the command, ‘Be good, if you would be happy, but be not too good,’ is a person whom, whether you are bound to justify him or not in theory, you can only pity and despise in practice.

Nevertheless, Canon Liddon’s position, that the Christian, and the Christian alone, really husbands to the utmost the force derived from this supreme pressure of invisible things upon the heart, seems to us strictly true. The Positivist recognises, but rationalises it, explains it away, in fact, as due to ideals which, when we come to look at them closely, disclose nothing but an “infinite sigh of the human heart,” as one of the earliest Pantheists termed ‘God;’ and no one can long continue to fulfil strenuously an obligation which he refers to nothing more potent and more permanent than a sigh of the heart, infinite or finite. The better kind of Secularist recognises it chiefly in the heat and restlessness with which he tries to sweep away injustice, seeing that injustice not swept away in the life-time of the living, is, for them, in his belief, never swept away at all. And unfortunately, heat and restlessness of feeling are just the least favourable of all conditions for coping with and removing injustice. It is really only the theologian who is convinced in his inmost heart that justice and righteousness, though defeated temporarily, can only be defeated temporarily in order to triumph for eternity, who can bring to the war with evil at once that absolute trust, and that calmness under disappointment, which give the best guarantee of victory.

The real difference between the believer in the Christian revelation, the half-believer, and the unbeliever, is this,—that while all of them, if in any degree good men, fight boldly in the battle against evil, only the first has absolute confidence that the obligation under which he is laid to fight it, is a sure guarantee of final success. That secret pressure on the will which the others obey with hope at best, and with despondency at worst, faith obeys gladly, as the soldier obeys the call of a General by whom he has been led again and again to victory. Faith is not, however, the power itself, but the right understanding of the source whence the power comes. The sense of obligation itself descends on every will which is open to the appeal of good; but while the unbeliever is fevered by it, and made far too restless for cool and careful conflict; while the half-believer is rendered only wistfully hopeful by it, and lives on the strength of ambiguous and often feeble aspirations,—the genuine believer is steeled against all discouragement, knowing that eternity is long enough to give the true interpretation to temporary failure, and the true significance to all success.

THE INFALLIBILITY OF EXPERTS.

IT is sometimes a misfortune for a man to have a confirmed habit of lucid statement, or such a command of words that his meaning can never be mistaken. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge is distinguished for that command, and often as it has assisted him in life, on Saturday it betrayed him. Subtle as the thought was which he had to express upon the most material evidence in the Belt case, he did express it with admirable clearness, and, as a consequence, the educated public understood him thoroughly, and with unusual unanimity decided that, whatever his accuracy in the case before him, he was wrong in his general principle. The issue left to the Jury in that case mainly depended upon a single question of evidence. Could Mr. Belt impart to a piece of sculpture that artistic quality, that impress of something spiritual and beyond mechanical skill, which undoubtedly belonged to certain works professedly his, with which he had secured orders, and as undoubtedly did not belong to other works which were certainly of his doing. Mr. Belt’s Counsel, understanding juries, produced in his favour witnesses “of good social standing”—that is, witnesses likely to be disinterested and truthful—who saw him actually at work without help upon the disputed works in question. That they did so see him repeatedly and continuously is beyond demur, and indeed is not denied either by counsel or by the bitterest partisans. In answer to this, his assailant’s Counsel produce, so to speak, the whole Academy, an entire body of experts in Art, who, giving evidence under compulsion, and being wholly disinterested, declare that the alleged fact is an impossibility, that if Mr. Belt did those busts, which nobody doubts, he most certainly did not do the busts disputed. The artistic quality, the mental impress, the quid mirum, which is as patent to them as the correctness of a note is patent to those who understand music, is present in one set of works, and wanting in the other set. It could not have been so wanting in a man competent to do the work which attracted orders, and was wanting in the undisputed work, and therefore Mr. Belt could not have done both. He must choose, and as he certainly did the poor work, he as certainly did not do the work of artistic merit. The Academy was all on one side, but the Judge and Jury rejected the experts’ evidence, and, mainly upon this ground, a new trial was demanded.

The positive result of the application is a compromise which, though accepted, may break down, and upon which we have, therefore, nothing to say, except that it is a sensible compromise; but Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in his judgment, which was wholly for a new trial, laid down a doctrine which concerns all artists and all literary men, and which certainly is one of exceeding breadth. It is nothing less than this,—that, as regards the existence or non-existence of the artistic quality, the mental impress, in a work of art, the evidence of experts must override that of any other witnesses, even of those who have seen the work done, and must be considered final. We give the words as reported in the Times:—“Now, the character of genuineness of works of art is not, in my judgment, matter of opinion. Anything, no doubt, may be said to be a matter of opinion as to which men will not take the trouble to inform themselves. But a knowledge of art is like a knowledge of science; it is matter of education and experience; and it seems to me that you might almost as well disbelieve a body of astronomers, who tell you that the earth moves and the sun stands still, on the ground that very eminent members of society tell you, as a fact, that they have seen the earth stand still and the sun rise up in the east and go down in the west, as disbelieve a body of great artists who tell you that the same man did not make two works of art, because persons very high in the social scale, but with no knowledge or training in art, tell you as a fact that they saw the same man at work upon them. It is what I think (with deference) the fallacy of opposing 'fact' to 'opinion' in this matter that constitutes, to my mind, the error of the summing-up of my learned brother, and which has led the jury to a conclusion against the weight of the evidence. I do not doubt that one fact is worth twenty opinions, 'fact' and 'opinion' being each used in its proper sense. But the words are not used in their proper sense, if 'fact' is confined to the physical fact of working manually on a bust, and the scientific conclusion of a body of men as to an artistic fact is called 'opinion.' It is not 'opinion' at all; it is evidence of fact." That is surely a dangerously wide dictum, for it amounts to this,—that no evidence whatever can overthrow the evidence of experts, and would involve this extraordinary conclusion,—that if Mr. Belt had executed a bust from first to last in Lord Coleridge's presence, and the Academicians testified that he could not have executed it, its artistic quality being too great for him, Lord Coleridge would have been bound to believe that he did not execute it. In presence of the "fact" stated by such a body, his own eyesight would be no evidence at all. Will the Lord Chief Justice go quite that length, and if not, why should he declare other evidence, admittedly honest, to be so absolutely untrustworthy? If, indeed, he would reject himself as witness, he is consistent, and most complimentary to the critical power of the Academy; but then, does he not push the limits of that faculty, which, no doubt, exists often in high perfection, beyond right reason? It seems to us he does, for not to press further an argument which, though unanswerable, will be said to be ad captandum, Lord Coleridge's extreme confidence in experts would involve a denial of the possible occasionalness of genius, the conceivable chance of a man existing who could do under one set of circumstances what he could not do under another set. An artist of that kind might give us, say, to-day, a soulless bust of the Queen, a work absolutely lacking everything but mechanical ingenuity; and next month produce a bust of Mr. Tennyson instinct with the artistic somewhat which differentiates art from manufacture. Surely the possibility of such intermittent power has always been acknowledged. The writer is unwilling from self-distrust to quote examples from the domain of Art, but he certainly believes that Haydon's fame and failure are best accounted for in this way, and has seen pictures by far greater artists than he which were unrecognisable. Certainly it is so in literature. There is not a living poet who has not produced verses of which critics depending on their faculty alone would not have said, with perfect confidence, that be their author whom he might, he certainly was not—their real author. Criticism is only opinion, even in extreme cases, and if Miss Braddon and her publisher swore that she wrote "Middlemarch," and four or five trustworthy amanuenses swore that she dictated it to them two years before its appearance in print, we could not, on the testimony of her other novels alone, swear that she did not. Suppose, to put a vulgar supposition, that an artist were one of those men whom nothing but a prospect of competition, or of large gain, or the stimulus of wine, woke out of a certain machine-like habit, or induced to put any mind into his work at all. Such persons undeniably exist in literature, as we can testify; and why should they not exist also in art? That error in such criticism of experts is infrequent and improbable must be admitted heartily, but that it is impossible, so impossible that criticism ought to override direct and unsuspected evidence, is too wide a doctrine. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge would hardly lay that down about any individual artist, however great, and what is an Academy, except a collection of individuals trained in such matters to think very much the same thoughts?

Let us take the commonest of all kinds of evidence by experts. The art of M. Chabot and his confrères is, in substance, a power of criticism exactly akin to that of Sir Frederick Leighton, though applied over a more limited field. M. Chabot is incessantly studying handwritings, he knows precisely the differences of artistic quality in them, and he can, we imagine, produce most handwritings himself. Well, suppose M. Chabot and three other experts of equal rank swear to Dr. Benson's signature, and the Archbishop swears that it was not his, which would Lord Coleridge believe? The experts would be scorched up, in his judgment; yet what do they lack to evoke confidence in their testimony which Academicians possess? Experience? It is all on M. Chabot's side. The power of criticism? It has been shown and justified by subsequent confessions in a hundred Courts. Scientific knowledge? M. Chabot's art is nearer a science, resting as it does on calculations which are always the same, than criticism either in literature or art can possibly claim to be. Yet M. Chabot's evidence would be rejected, and properly rejected, in the face of evidence morally much stronger. It would be, in fact, opinion, and though usually right, so usually as to create a violent presumption in its favour, is not entitled to that infallibility which Lord Coleridge, on his own principle, must claim for it. It was necessary, and very right, for the Lord Chief Justice to point out that, in his judgment, in this case the violent presumption in favour of the Academicians outweighed the evidence of eye-witnesses, who, of course, could not say they saw the spiritual impress given; but in his effort to do this effectively, he has been led to say something far too strong.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

CHANGE OF RESIDENCE AND ELECTORAL RIGHTS.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The letter of "J. J. H. S.," which appears in the Spectator of Dec. 8th, shows that the real drift of my former communication was not quite apparent. I intended my remarks to relate to the non-attainment of a voting qualification by successive occupations in different constituencies. For instance, a change of occupation from Fleet Street to the Strand would cancel a partial qualification obtained in the former place. When we bear in mind the fact that Michaelmas is a favourite time for change of residence, and that persons commencing an occupation then could not be registered until after the expiration of twenty-one months, and could not vote under that registration until the following year, it is easily seen that the twelve months' voting qualification is a very different matter from the mere payment of rates for twelve months. You, Sir, have often pointed out the unwisdom of enfranchising those who do not value a vote, and there I think your readers will agree with you. The question, however, which I have here raised was first brought to my notice, with any force, at a public meeting of working-men who were most anxious to become voters, but whose employment necessitated frequent removals into different constituencies.—I am, Sir, &c.,

OXFORD AND THE THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Will you allow me to relate a short anecdote illustrative of the wise position taken in your recent article on "Agnostic Examinations in Religion"?

I well remember what happened when I went in for my own examination in the Articles at Oxford twelve years ago. One of the ablest scholars in my college, a Dissenter, went in at the same time, and to him, though an earnest and sincere man, the Thirty-nine Articles were matters of the most undisguised amusement. So confident did he feel of sympathy on this point, that he even had the audacity to communicate his views to his Examiner in the Preliminary College Examination, a distinguished member of the University. "Don't you think, Sir," said the candidate to his examiner, "that these Articles are really very amusing?" A frown for the sake of decency, and a slight remonstrance, followed this free expression of opinion; but it was a perfectly open secret that the examiner agreed with the candidate.

May the Church of England speedily realise that examinations conducted in this spirit are indeed perilous to the interests of religion.—I am, Sir, &c.,

A COUNTRY CLERGYMAN.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—As a Nonconformist minister, who has been for some years in the habit of reading the Spectator, I am delighted to find an article on the "Horton" case without your usual covert sneer at Dissenters. You seem, this week, unusually benevolent, all round. You certainly have cast the shield of that "charity which thinketh no evil" over the country parsons, who rushed in such great numbers to veto Mr. Horton's appointment. I should be glad to agree with you, that "intolerance" had little to do with the matter. But the principal arguments used by Mr. Horton's opponents forbid, I think, such a conclusion. It is evident, from the entire tone of the controversy, that the victory in Convocation was largely an anti-Dissenters' triumph. When once it was known that Convocation would have to decide the matter, the result was known beforehand. The event has proved that Convocation still remains true to the illiberal traditions which drove from Oxford the finest statesman of this century.

The fear that Mr. Horton's appointment would pave the way for an agnostic examiner is both childish and unjust. When an agnostic examiner is nominated, then let Convocation reject him. But why should Mr. Horton, who declares that, in the main, he accepts the Thirty-nine Articles, suffer for the sins of a hypothetical successor? I heartily endorse your decision,—the religious examination for a Pass Degree ought to be abolished. When a theological examination has lost its true character, and is regarded with more or less open contempt by those who submit to it, even Anglicans must surely see that it ought to be done away with.—I am, Sir, &c., GEORGE E. CHEESEMAN.

Hatherlow, Stockport, December 18th.

[We are entirely unconscious of ever sneering at Dissenters, and of covert sneers at anybody whatever, we are absolutely guiltless.—Ed. Spectator].

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—We have heard a good deal lately of the incongruity of nominating a Nonconformist to examine in the "Rudiments of Faith and Religion" in the University of Oxford. We do not hear quite so much of the incongruity which distinguishes this examination, when considered with regard to the present circumstances of the University. The incongruity consists in the following particular. This University, which, in its lay aspect, has no official connection with any one form or profession of religion, requires all candidates for the B.A. Degree, except those who object on religious grounds, to pass an examination in the Thirty-nine Articles, the distinctive formularies of one religious body. All are required to present themselves, except those who "object on religious grounds." The result is that the University in this Examination has not only to consider the sufficiency of a candidate's intellectual knowledge, which is its proper province, but is forced to take cognisance of the attitude of mind held towards certain subject-matter of the examination by examiner, as well as examined. Now, I maintain that the University, in dividing candidates into two classes, those who do not object, and those who do object, "on religious grounds," is interfering with matters with which it has no concern. In doing so, it invades the private domain of the man's personal religious life, and has to do with the secrets of the soul's beliefs, with which no stranger may intermeddle.

I hope it will not be very long before we look facts fairly in the face, and realise the changed position of the University with regard to the State Church. We shall then see that an University Examination in the Thirty-nine Articles, a subject which may be objected to by the candidate "on religious grounds," is an incongruous survival from a past state of things,—a state when in civil life men were compelled to qualify for municipal office by receiving the Holy Communion according to the rites of the Established Church, and when in the academical world boys were forced to subscribe to certain formularies as a preliminary to matriculation.—I am, Sir, &c., 18 Bradmore Road, Oxford.

A. L. MAYHEW, M.A.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—There is one reason against examining laymen in the Thirty-nine Articles which you have not noticed. The Church of England nowhere requires her lay members to profess their belief in them. The Apostles' Creed at Baptism, the Catechism before confirmation, and the Nicene Creed at Holy Communion, are all that laymen have to assent to. They need not decide whether Pelagians do vainly talk, or Anabaptists do falsely boast. Why, then, should, a University, which is not now a handmaid to the Church, require of lay Churchmen more than the Church itself?—I am, Sir, &c., D. L. I.

THE IPSWICH ELECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I would ask whether, in your notice of the Liberal victory at Ipswich, you have not omitted to mention a cause which surely had something to do with that result, namely, the temperance vote? Mr. West, I see, declared himself a local optionist, and in full sympathy with the growing temperance sentiment of the country, whilst Sir T. Charley displayed marked hostility to legislative interference with the liquor traffic. I venture to think the temperance vote carried the day at Ipswich, and I fully expect to see the same factor operating with like effect at coming elections, wherever temperance issues are involved.

It is beyond question that Mr. Samuel Smith's strong temperance views assisted in bringing about the surprise of the late contest here. Mr. Forwood is probably in advance of his party in this matter, but Conservatism and beer have so long been allied in this city that he had to suffer accordingly. Within the last two or three years, thanks mainly to the efforts of total-abstinence workers, thousands of electors throughout the country have become strongly imbued with temperance principles, and the sense of the whole community has been quickened in a remarkable degree in regard to this question.

As a Liberal, I rejoice that the Liberal party is to-day the party of Temperance reform, as I believe that this is becoming more and more a crucial question at election times, and that the triumph of Liberal candidates holding decided temperance views, and otherwise suitable, may be looked for with increased confidence. The attention now being directed to the condition of our poor and outcast population is to bring the temperance question, and the need for legislative action in connection with the liquor trade, still more to the front; and time, too, if there be even approximate truth in the contention of such men as Mr. Spurgeon and Mr. Samuel Morley, that nine-tenths of the poverty and misery of our large cities is due to the effects of drink. I am only surprised that the growing power of the temperance vote as a factor at election times is not more generally realised. That it will, ere long, be so, I have no doubt whatever.—I am, Sir, &c., Liverpool, December 17th.

THE LONG VACATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In an article on "The Long Vacation," in your last number, you say,—"It is only the Judges of the High Court who need this lengthy repose. The County-Court Judges, who are made of the same stuff and work even harder, do not get more than a month or six weeks."

Permit me to say that this is a complete mistake. The High-Court Judges have in all about sixteen weeks' holiday in the year, which the recent change will reduce to about fourteen. The County-Court Judges have more than six months' holiday. They go circuit eleven times in the year, each circuit occupying about a fortnight, which gives them twenty-two weeks' work. They need not go circuit at all in September, and by taking their August circuit in the first and their October circuit in the last half of those months, they may give themselves a vacation from August 15th to October 15th, which is a day or two short of nine weeks. The holidays of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates are very nearly as long. They sit only three days a week. The High-Court Judges thus work very much harder than either the County-Court Judges or the Metropolitan Magistrates, yet the work of the latter has been regulated by very modern statutes, which presumably proceed upon the principle of getting a fair amount of work in return for a fair salary.—I am, Sir, &c., JUDEx.

["Judex" has greatly overstated his case. The statutable Long Vacation of County-Court Judges is a month. By judicious arrangements, such as "Judex" describes, it may be true that some of them who have country circuits with little work to do manage to get a good deal more. But the Judges who are stationed in great centres, like London, or Liverpool, or Birmingham, certainly do not pass such an intermittent existence as he suggests. To sit five days a week, often till six or seven o'clock, and to get at the utmost eleven weeks' holiday a year, may fairly be called working harder than to sit five and a half days a week, rising punctually at four o'clock, and getting sixteen weeks' holiday, even if no account were taken of the difference in the work. But on the easiest circuits, the racket of travelling for a fortnight every month would more than make up for the gain of days; and there can be little doubt that while on the Bench, the County-Court Judge is much harder worked than his High-Court brother. He gets little or no help on legal points from counsel; he has himself often to act as counsel for both sides, and seize the real points at issue out of torrents of irrelevant talk; and has to skip from common law to equity, and equity to bankruptcy, and in some cases, Admiralty law, with a ready omniscience which no one thinks of demanding from a High-Court Judge. Nor does it often fall to his lot to be able to write his letters during the long-winded addresses of counsel to a jury, or to sit in the happiness of divided responsibility in Banc. Take it all round, we submit that our statement is correct, and that the County-Court Judges work harder and get a very much shorter Long Vacation than those of the High Court.—Ed. Spectator.]

SAMUEL PALMER'S "ECLOGUES OF VIRGIL."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—The review of Samuel Palmer's version of Virgil's "Eclogues," which appeared in your issue of the 15th inst., contains some statements which fill me with surprise. I must ask you to allow me to correct them.

1. The seventh eclogue is illustrated by a photogravure. The eighth eclogue is illustrated by the one etching which was completely finished by my father. "The difference is too marked," says your reviewer, "to escape even the most untrained eye." So I should have thought. But a misprint in the preface (corrected by the list of illustrations), appears to have led him to mistake the one for the other, and to distribute his praise and blame accordingly. The "softness and delicacy" he admires belong to the photogravure, and the "comparatively coarse cross-hatching," which has the misfortune to meet with his disapproval, is the work of my father's own needle.

2. The reviewer goes on to say:—"There are eight photo-engravings from Mr. Palmer's drawings, some of which have been touched by his son. These are good of their kind, and better almost in the inverse ratio to the quantity of alteration they have received." He unfortunately instances in support of this observation the illustrations to the first eclogue, the first of which, he thinks, has been injured by my retouching, especially in the horizontal clouds. These clouds are absolutely untouched. The second, which he prefers, under the impression that "there has been no perceptible alteration made in the mechanical reproduction," represents about three weeks of careful work.

3. Unconsoled by his singular success in discovering the "qualities of an etching" in a photogravure, your reviewer appears to be exercised in mind by "sham plate-marks," which he thinks surround the photogravures. As a photogravure is produced upon a copper-plate, I fail to see how it is to be printed without showing a plate-mark. I should have supposed it quite impossible for "even the most untrained eye" to mistake an impression from a copper-plate for anything else in the world. The modern invention of photo-engraving is excellent for the reproduction of drawings, but that a professed critic should not only be altogether ignorant of its nature, but should mistake a photogravure reproduction of a pen-and-ink drawing by Samuel Palmer for a finished etching by the same hand seems, to say the least of it, astounding.

I must confess to having derived considerable amusement (which has been largely shared) from the remarks of your reviewer, and though I cannot altogether refrain from pitying a writer whom a single oversight of mine appears to have led so easily into such an unpleasant predicament, I must confess to enjoying some malicious pleasure in being able to contribute "a little bit of instruction" towards the neglected technical education of the judge before whom I have been arraigned.—I am, Sir, &c., Farnborough, Kent, December 19th.

A. H. PALMER.

SIR,—Kindly allow me to say a few words with reference to this letter of Mr. A. H. Palmer's; they shall be as few as possible. I am, of course, bound to accept his correction that the etching finished by his father was wrongly described in the preface, and I am quite willing to admit that I followed Mr. Palmer's mistake too incautiously; but I would point out to him, at the same time, that the mistake in the preface goes much farther than any mere misprint of "seven" for "eight," for in the eighth eclogue there are two illustrative etchings, and, therefore, it could hardly be imagined that a sentence which said, "The etching illustrating the seventh [meaning the eighth] eclogue was, as I have said, completely finished by Samuel Palmer himself," could refer to the eclogue to which there were two illustrations. With regard, however, to the more important point of the "comparatively coarse cross-hatching" of the clouds in the first etching illustrating the eighth eclogue, I have simply to state that my opinion is not in the least changed by the fact that the plate was wrought by Mr. Palmer himself. My statement in this respect is absolutely correct, and I am only sorry that the work should have been that of the deceased artist, and not attributable to the completion of the plate by another hand. The truth is, no doubt, that Mr. Palmer's dexterity with the etching-needle, necessitating as it did a marvellous accuracy of hand and intensity of eyesight, failed him before his power of drawing with pencil and pen; and hence the superiority in this book of those reproductions which are fac-similes of the designs alone. With regard to the illustrations to the first eclogue, surely Mr. Palmer must be confusing the drawing upon which he did "three weeks' careful work." Does he not refer in this to the third illustration, and not to the second, of which I was speaking? If this is not so, I can only say that I am unable to see any trace of the etching-needle in this illustration, which has the peculiar softness of a photogravure in every part, and in which there is not a single line which has the quality of an etching. And if this is not the case, why does Mr. Palmer call it in the list of contents "reproduced from a copy of the water-colour drawing"? If, as he asserts, he has spent three weeks' work upon it, why does he not say so? Indeed, in this matter, Mr. Palmer seems to contradict himself, for in the preface, where he speaks of this illustration, he calls it simply a reproduction of a water-colour drawing; and goes on to say of "the other drawings which had not been etched," that they have "passed through his hands, in order that they should do the more justice to the originals." With regard to the plate-mark upon photogravures, I have only to say that there are so many different photo-engraving processes which superficially resemble woodcuts and etchings, that it is highly desirable that the kind of reproduction employed should be stated plainly upon some portion of the margin surrounding the illustration, and that this is especially necessary when the photo-engraving or photolithograph, or whatever it is, is mixed up with etchings, and even worked upon afterwards with an etching-needle. And lastly, with regard to Mr. Palmer's statement that he finds it "astounding" that a professed critic should mistake a "reproduction of a pen-and-ink drawing for a finished etching," I would remind him that critics are scarcely to be blamed too severely for accepting as matters of fact the statements made by the author of the work which they are criticising. The actual criticism made upon these etchings was, to the best of my belief, absolutely correct, the only error being that I attributed to the natural inferiority of the son's workmanship that decline in skill which was really due to the failing power of the original artist.—I am, Sir, &c., "THE REVIEWER."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In the notice of Samuel Palmer's "Eclogues of Virgil," which appeared in the Spectator of December 15th, the reviewer asks, "Why it is that where fine-art publishers produce in the same work etchings and fac-similes of drawings made by one or other of the photographic (or photogravure) processes, they should think it necessary to place round the fac-similes a sham plate-mark?"

The answer is simple. The plate-mark is not a sham. All the illustrations in the book bear a plate-mark, because all, whether etchings or photogravures, are printed from copper-plates. A photogravure is an engraving on copper, produced by a process in which photography plays a certain part. It is printed exactly as other copper-plates are printed. There are other strange mistakes in the review, about which Mr. A. H. Palmer will write to you shortly; but as we are unwilling to remain for a day longer than necessary under the imputation made by the reviewer, we trust you will kindly insert this letter in your next issue.—We are, Sir, &c., SEELEY AND CO.

POETRY.

"THE NEW JEREMIAD."

BY AN OLD YEAR'S TORY.

WE are a merry family, we are, indeed we are!
We feel that we were born beneath the true prophetic star;
For north and south, and east and west, and everywhere we go,
By day and night, and no respite, denouncing bitter woe.
We are a cheerful family, we are.

The griefs we wail are something stale, but none less dear for that,
It's not our fault if nothing new turns up to grumble at;

So let us raise the historic dirge about Midlothian still,
And gloat o'er Britain's honour lost upon Majuba Hill!
A patriotic family, we are.

We ran up bills for England's sake, but Credit did it all,
And bills (unless you pay them) are practically small;
But in the hands of reckless Rads, to ruin England glides;
Not only do they pay their own, but settle ours besides!
We're a financing family, we are.

We fought like Jingo where we could, but find it none too strong
To swear that fights in Egypt are something very wrong;
And though we voted to a man, Rebellion to coerce,
The other side, that did so too, are clearly Brutes and worse.
We're a consistent family, we are.

We coax and flatter the dear Whigs, but they will not be caught;
We make appeals to Hartington, apparently for naught;
He will not sever from the Rads, or shun the deadly lists
Of Atheists (speaking mildly), and Thieves and Communists.
We are a soft-spoken family, we are.

For how can man believe in God, or His true praises sing,
If he doesn't worship ground-rent as the really sacred thing?
No property in brains or work, where man has lent a hand,
Is due entirely to His grace, like property in land.
We are a righteous family, we are.

When Eloquence is bound to burn, in after-dinner flames,
It's always easy work to call old Gladstone vulgar names;
From Birmingham vile Chamberlain a fearful sport affords,
Forging base nails to drive into the coffin of the Lords!
We are a civil family, we are.

We toss poor Ireland up and down, the shuttlecock of State,
And there, to make things pleasanter, stir up religious hate;
We stand upon King William's stone, Faith's protestants to be,
Although it must be owned we're not the Silent, as was he.
We are a scrupulous family, we are.

We send our travellers right and left, with unremitting zeal;
Our Northcote, and our Richard Cross, for patronage appeal,
And stump and spout so steadily, the farmers to appease,
As they had caught, for Conscience' sake, the foot-and-mouth disease.
We're an unselfish family, we are.

They puff our wares and specimens, they hawk them up and down,
But no new patent in the lot, for county or for town:
So purchasers look shy and skance, and turn their eyes away,
Oh, for one hour of Beaconsfield, and something new to say!
We are a brilliant family, we are!

SONNET.

ON THE "ECCE HOMO" OF CORREGGIO.

THE parted, livid lips, the soft brown hair
That falls about His neck, the thorny crown
Wounding his brow, the blood-drops trickling down,
The mocking purple robe, cold Pilate's stare
And pointing finger, the crossed wrists that wear
The cords, with upturned face that melts in pain,
The swooning Mother, and the Magdalen,
The rapt, rough soldier's gaze,—all these are there.

These could another paint. But who, save thee,
Supreme Allegri! with his brush could limn
Those eyes that speak an elemental woe,
Pent up, till, thrilling sadly from the Tree,
The Son's prayer rose, while Calvary grew dim,—
"Father, forgive, they know not what they do."

ART.

THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN OIL COLOURS.

[FIRST NOTICE.]

THE first exhibition of the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours opened its doors to the public on Monday last, with a collection of about eight hundred pictures, and it is worth while to say a word or two as to the formation of this new Society. It has grown, as its name denotes, out of the old Institute of Painters in Water-Colours, and is modelled upon the same lines as those upon which the elder Society was reconstructed last spring. No member is allowed to exhibit more than three pictures, and the works of outsiders are equally eligible with those of the members. The Society consists of a President, Vice-President, Council, and members, the number of the latter being (we imagine) not strictly limited. At present, there are, including the Council and Presidents, about one hundred Members, amongst them several Associates of the Royal Academy, and many artists of at least equal importance.

A great deal of notice has been excited by this exhibition, but its full significance has hardly, we fancy, been perceived. The truth is that the Society might very easily become a rival, and a very formidable rival, to the Royal Academy, and will, at the very least, probably affect, to the public benefit, the conduct of that institution. Even in this first exhibition, it is, perhaps, more fairly and fully representative of English Painting than is the great May show at Burlington House, and though there is but little which is very remarkable in the way of imagination, very perfect in the way of execution, or very sympathetic in the way of feeling; yet the show is, as a whole, more free from glaring defects than that of the Academy. Anyhow, we would have our readers realise that this new Society includes a hundred artists, chiefly young men, who may be said to represent English Art and its present tendencies more than any other body which has yet been formed in England; and we see no reason why, if they chose, they should not supplement their Winter Exhibition by a Summer one, which would prove at least equally attractive.

This Society has been well advertised and well managed by business men, and is likely to be a financial success; but it is none the less true that it gives to young artists the very opportunity which was so much needed,—the opportunity to show their works, under favourable conditions, side by side with those of acknowledged and accomplished painters. It is, indeed, in this first exhibition, owing to the restriction of the number of pictures to be sent by the members, a more fair and open show than any other which we know of in England; and it is undoubtedly true that the thanks of all English artists are due to the three or four energetic men who have organised and carried out the scheme of founding this Oil Institute.

And now as to the character of the works exhibited. In this first notice, we do not intend to speak in detail, but rather to say a few general words as to the chief defect of this exhibition, and of the present condition of oil-painting in England.

We get almost tired of saying, and no doubt our readers are still more tired of hearing, that there is a woeful lack of imaginative art in England, and especially in the special Gallery of which we happen to be writing. But we shall continue so say it, on the Gutta cavat lapidem principle. Perhaps there is not really less imagination in this collection than in most, but the deficiency is certainly more evident. There are an enormous quantity of futile figure pictures, which seem, apart from various technical qualities (good, bad, and indifferent), to have no reason for their existence. Sitting upon a sofa in the middle of one of the galleries, and looking at the opposite wall, we noticed that out of the eighty or ninety pictures which faced us, there were about twenty-five in which figures formed the principal part, and that almost without an exception these represented girls with large hats doing nothing, girls with bare feet carrying something, girls with pretty faces sitting down, and holding a letter or a rosebud; or else children playing with pegtops, or babies dressed out for portraiture. "Que diable!" as Lawrence used to make the valiant dragoon say in Maurice Deering, "we are men, and not school-girls." And why should we have such a sickly sentimental and inane representation of our race as this? A foreigner might walk round these eight hundred pictures, and look in vain for a trace that the people who painted them had ever had a history, a passion, or a feeling of any kind beyond the region of the domestic virtues. A fat, well-fed triviality is "the trail of the serpent" over them all; they sink in a Slough of Despond where beauty has given place to prettiness, and feeling has been destroyed by sentiment. One man, a Mr. Stock, honestly tries to be imaginative; he fails, but his failure is delicious, compared to the successes with which he is surrounded. One woman having a strong love for poetic art (Miss Eveleen Pickering), gives us a picture of the children of Night, which is equally pleasant in imperfection, and with these exceptions, none of the hundred members, or of the two or three hundred outsiders, seeks to exercise our intellect, or to touch our hearts with any subject beyond the scope of a pensive woman or round-eyed child. Here are the subjects of the first ten figure pictures, which are selected (on account of their superior interest, we suppose!) for the illustration of the catalogue. Several women with dogs,—one ditto, with a distaff; back-view of ditto, with a curtain; ditto, with spinning-wheel; ditto, with baby; ditto, with sick baby; ditto, with child; ditto, with child and fruit-stall; ditto, with lover; ditto, with basket of lunch; and so on, to all eternity.

The old Indian story about the blue sky is applicable here; the sky is too blue, it is,—monotonous. Is it conceivable that the intelligence of the average picture-buyer is so low that it cannot rise to a subject of any other sort than the ones we have noted above? It is quite right that dogs should wag their tails in expectation of food, and that cats should rub their heads coaxingly against the hand that feeds them; that children should play pegtop, and infants be dressed in blue bonnets and frocks, and mothers nurse their babes, and girls eat, as well as “smell of, bread and butter;” but surely painters might find better subjects for immortal art than such as these?

It is not the painters who are to blame, or at least not chiefly; the painters are but tradesmen of another kind, who supply the wants of their customers. It is the fashionable, enlightened patrons of Art, who have produced this pining-woman and playing-baby species of picture, who won't buy anything unless it is pleasant and pretty, as if their galleries were but big sweetmeat boxes, and must be stuck over with bright, meaningless colours, and objectless forms. And the dealers who minister to them are, perhaps, even more to blame, since they do all in their power to foster this foolish taste. There are a couple of lines pregnant with suggestion in an old artists' song which used to be, and we dare say still is, sung by Academy students. It refers to the way to make an unsuccessful picture sell, and if all else fails, the student is instructed to,—

“Rub it down
With madder-brown,
And sell it to a dealer.”

Any one who has had the least to do with the artist fraternity knows well how this painting of pretty pictures is forced upon artists by the dealers and by the public. As a rule, the artist worthy of the name, has in him, at first, “a strong voice which no one will hear;” and to him, in his unsuccess, frequently almost in his starvation, enter the public and the dealer, with the cry, “Why don't you work like other people?” And as his strength is, he resists a longer or a shorter time, and, perhaps, if he is exceptionally brave or fortunate, he wins the day, and revenges himself by painting a hundred times at an exorbitant price, the thing he likes best; but in far the greater number of instances, neglect, circumstances, friends, and dealers are too strong for him. He accepts the conventional prettiness as his ideal, and so he joins that ignoble army of martyrs who have killed not themselves, but the best portion of themselves.

This is not, perhaps, noticing the Gallery, but we cannot see this effect of fashion and frivolity seizing hold of all our best artists, and creeping over the work of our young, enthusiastic men, without raising a protest. “Every one is saying all good things” of the progress of Art in England now, and we disbelieve (at least, partly disbelieve) in the truth of the saying. A tremendous impetus has been given to Art industries, and in proportion to their previous stagnation they have leapt forward at a bound, and every society that can be formed to produce art is formed throughout the kingdom; and yet painting is not progressing in anything, save technical excellence. Our landscape painting, which forty years ago led the world's Art, has crossed the seas, and is only to be found in France; the nearest approach to Constable and Cox is to be traced in Daubigny and Rousseau. Turner has not only left no equal, but not even a successor; and De Wint, one of the greatest, as well as one of the most English, of our painters, has no rival to-day. The pre-Raphaelite influence, which might have given us a splendid modern type of figure painting, is dying quickly day by day, and nothing is taking its place; and even the domestic art of such men as Wilkie and Mulready, was better and truer in feeling, as well as more splendid in execution, than the women and the babies which have taken their place. As to still-life painting, the only substitute we have for old William Hunt is a Frenchman called “Fantin,” who paints our roses and chrysanthemums as if they had just tumbled from a cocotte's bonnet.

Go and look round the National Gallery, or South Kensington, and then see if you can talk about our progress in Art! Why, “Old Chrome” himself was a better landscape painter than any who is living now; and we have not, out of all our hundreds of “genre” painters, one who can touch the work of the “Wilkie” or the elder “Leslie.”

The truth may be expressed very shortly as to the present state of painting, as exemplified in the Academy and in this Gallery, which, as we have said, is even more representative of the present state of English Art. Figure painting has ceased to be heroic on the one hand, and domestic on the other, and become either dramatic or sentimental.

Landscape, in the old sense of the word, has ceased to exist, and its place has been taken by natural-history painting (as Ruskin calls it), which may be defined as the collection within a frame of all the materials for a (landscape) picture, as one collects in a basin all the materials for a pudding. They want stirring up, boiling down, and putting into shape.

In our next notice, we propose to speak at length of the best pictures in this Gallery; but we would say, in conclusion of this article, that every one of our readers can, if he or she will, do something towards bringing about a better state of feeling with regard to painting than that which obtains at present. Do not want a picture to be pretty, and nothing else, but want it to express some special beauty, and possess some not too trivial meaning. Do not praise the work for its dexterity rather than its accomplished power. No really great painter ever suggests instead of finishing, anything capable of being fully rendered. Do not mistake melodrama for action, and sentiment for feeling, and do not, above all, try and drive young and immature artists into the same round of thinking and painting as their elder and more famous brethren. Let them be crude, as long as they are earnest, and exaggerated, whilst they are sincere.

BOOKS.

MR. SAYCE'S “HERODOTUS.”*

To show what light has been thrown by recent discoveries in the East on the earlier books of Herodotus, and to see exactly the point to which Oriental scholars and excavators have been brought by their researches, is the object of Mr. Sayce's present work. If he has successfully executed the latter half of this task in his appendices, it is well. On that point, we pronounce no judgment. He has certainly developed his own theories with sufficient confidence, but the notorious diversity of opinion which exists among Egyptologists and Assyriologists prevents us from sharing his confidence. In any case, he appears to us to trust too much to what he calls “monumental authority;” and without going back to prehistoric times for an illustration, we will take an event which occurred only five-and-thirty years before the battle of Marathon. In 525 B.C., Cambyses publicly flogged the priests of Apis at Memphis, and gave the sacred animal a death-wound in its thigh with his dagger. It was a deed that must have filled all Egypt with horror, and one not easily forgotten by her people. Herodotus was at Memphis some sixty years or so after this deed was done, and he tells the story of its details, and says that the Egyptians believed that Cambyses was driven mad, as a punishment for his impiety. In or out of Egypt, it was no one's interest or business to invent such a story, and it seems impossible to doubt its truth. Mr. Sayce thinks otherwise, and says that “the stelé which commemorates the death of the Apis bull, said by Herodotus to have been slain by Cambyses, shows that, on the contrary, it had died a natural death, had been buried under his auspices, and had monumental authority for accounting him one of its worshippers.” Lord Burleigh's nod was nothing to that stelé, but we prefer the testimony of the historian. The priests, moreover, as is probable enough, may have preferred not to put on record such a dismal fact as the murder of their Apis. It is one thing to decipher inscriptions and hieroglyphs, but quite another thing to determine their exact value when deciphered; and the engraver's tool has perhaps, in proportion, cut more “rousing whids,” as Burns calls them, than have ever been engrossed by the pen. But Mr. Sayce is willing to trust “monumental authority” in more ways than one. He has allowed the testimony of inscriptions to have its full weight in his text, and writes ταύτα, for instance, instead of ταῦτα. Textual critics, he says, may think such a procedure heretical; but it is possible that if textual critics condescend to notice Mr. Sayce's labours at all in this field, they may be less polite than he imagines. The question, however, of spelling reform, as applied to Herodotus, is one that we must leave untouched, though we may have a word or two to say, if space permits, on Mr. Sayce's contributions to the reform of English spelling. The indictment which he has drawn against the author whom he has selected to edit, is what we shall mainly deal with in the present notice.

* The Ancient Empires of the East.—Herodotus, I.-III. With Notes, Introductions, and Appendices. By A. H. Sayce. London: Macmillan and Co. 1883.

The literary genius of Herodotus has never been called in question. His history, next to the Odyssey, is the most delightful work that has come down to us from antiquity; and this fact alone should make his editor cease to wonder at its having "escaped the wreck from which but a few excerpts of his critic Ctesias have been preserved." But the truthfulness and honesty of "the Father of History" have often been arraigned, and quite as often warmly defended. With his defenders and with his other assailants we shall not now concern ourselves, further than by remarking that Mr. Sayce might as well have omitted Thucydides from the ranks of the latter. The greatest of all historians did but correct a single error in Herodotus, and that, too, one of the smallest possible importance. We cannot help saying, also, that when Josephus, "that learned Jew," said that "all" Greek authors acknowledged Herodotus to have "lied in most of his assertions," he lied himself "most consumedly." But now for Mr. Sayce's indictment, or rather for a portion of it, for we really cannot trouble ourselves to answer his wooden criticisms on the speeches, narratives, and stories which lend so unique a charm to the old Greek's history. The three main charges, then, which his editor brings against Herodotus are these:—He affected knowledge which he did not possess; he laid claim to travels which he never made; and he pilfered freely and without acknowledgment from Hecataeus and others, whom he sought to disparage and supersede. In short, he was a liar and a humbug. He affected a knowledge which he did not possess,—for while making himself out to be a "marvellous linguist," he was ignorant even of the language of Egypt. He may have been; and in Mr. Sayce's notes there is always "a half-caste dragoman at his elbow." But the only statement (for we may dismiss the Colchians) which Mr. Sayce makes in favour of his own view might be characterised by any one who loved Mr. Sayce's style of epithet, to use one of his own phrases, as "flagrantly dishonest." He says that Herodotus asserted that the Egyptian language resembled the chirping of birds. Now, we grant that if Herodotus did make that assertion, he was, on his own showing, ignorant of Egyptian. But Herodotus made no such assertion at all, as the reader will see, if he turns to ii., 57, and decides for himself whether it is Mr. Sayce's Greek scholarship that is weak, or his sense of fairness that is blunt. Again, because Herodotus, from religious or superstitious scruples of his own, declines to mention the name of Osiris in connection with embalming, burials, or mysteries, Mr. Sayce and Wiedemann—in this instance, Arcaades ambo—declare that he had not caught the name when taking notes, and deliberately deceives his readers with his faithless silence. So that, in the face of the fact that Herodotus elsewhere explains that Osiris—he knew the name well enough—was Dionysus, Mr. Sayce asks us to believe that the reason why the scrupulous Greek would not "divulge the name of a deity known to every child in Egypt, and appearing on myriads of sepulchral monuments," was because he had not got it on his tablets; and Herr Wiedemann, with native amenity, says that Herodotus, who really was a gentleman, "had not understood the name, and tried to conceal his ignorance under an affectation of secret knowledge." So much for the first charge. As to the plagiarisms from Hecataeus, we may treat them very briefly. Mr. Sayce again shows that he has one measure for himself and another for his author, for he erroneously declares that Herodotus "makes himself responsible for the truth" of the famous tale of the Phoenix, the fact being that Herodotus explicitly says that he did not believe a word of it. "Still more damaging to his veracity," Mr. Sayce goes on to say, "are the conclusions to be drawn from his descriptions of the crocodile and hippopotamus." But here we can spring a mine on Mr. Sayce. The illustrious Cobet—the first Greek scholar in Europe—has recently expressed an opinion that the fragments of Hecataeus which correspond so closely with Herodotus are forgeries manufactured out of Herodotus; and till that opinion is controverted, the mystic bird and the mighty amphibians need not trouble us.

The last charge we have to answer is that Herodotus lays claims to travels which he never made. Babylonia and Upper Egypt are the countries which Mr. Sayce sets prominently forth in his introduction, as among those which Herodotus fraudulently wished his readers to believe that he had visited. Mr. Sayce is a poor logician, and wastes words in proving that the historian was never in Babylonia, but the arguments which he advances to prove the question really at issue are few and feeble, and it is ludicrous to find him proposing to give Herodotus the benefit of a correct translation of ὡς ἔλεγον οἱ Χαλδαῖοι, and complaining that "the majority of the commentators" have been deceived by expressions which they misinterpreted. A broad answer to his baseless theory would be this:—In his account of Egypt, the personality of Herodotus, so to speak, is ever present. He is always asking this, or learning by inquiry that, and seeing things with his own eyes. We venture to say, therefore, since his personality, again so to speak, is always absent in Babylonia, that he cannot by any possibility have wished his readers to believe that he had been in that country. Upper Egypt raises an entirely different question, but here, too, we think that Mr. Sayce is in the wrong. It is quite certain that Herodotus never visited Elephantine, yet he says that he "came on as an eye-witness as far as the city of Elephantine." This, Mr. Sayce says, is "a deliberate falsehood," and "a flagrant example of dishonesty." Let us see. The damning words, for damning they are, if genuine, are omitted in one MS., but we should hold it very poor criticism to suppose that their omission in that MS. clears Herodotus. Moreover, we think they are wrongfully omitted, though we rather sympathise with the acute but dishonest copyist who saw that they could not possibly be correct. For immediately before them comes the story which Herodotus heard from the sacred priest of Sais,—the marvellous story of the Nile rising from a bottomless pool at Elephantine, and flowing thence in two directions, north and south. "He seemed to me to be jesting," says the historian, with his usual grave politeness, much in contrast with the ill-bred pertness of Mr. Sayce's note. But is it conceivable, is it common-sense, to suppose that, immediately after recounting this marvellous tale, he should say that he went on as an eye-witness to Elephantine, and then make no further sign? Mr. Sayce, who, we repeat, is a poor logician, says that if he had gone on to Elephantine, he would not have cared to mention the story of the sacred priest of Sais. In the name of patience, why not? No; if Mr. Sayce's hypothesis were true, if Herodotus had determined to say that he had been to Elephantine without going to Elephantine, then and then most indubitably he would not have mentioned the story of the sacred priest of Sais. The text, therefore, must be corrupt; and as the words Ἐλεφαντίνης πόλιος are found there twice, with only ten words between them, we venture to suggest that the corruption lies in the first Ἐλεφαντίνης.

We trust that we have shown that Mr. Sayce's contempt for the knowledge, veracity, and honesty of Herodotus rests on rather slender foundations. But we hold it not respectful to the memory of the Father of History to express any indignation with the present Deputy Professor of Comparative Philology at Oxford. One word, however, about his spelling, before we part from him. He talks of "a correct transliteration of Greek proper names." He does not know what correct transliteration means. Αἰσχῦλος, correctly transliterated, is "Aiskhulos." Mr. Sayce gives us "Aeskhylos"! And what shall we say of his "Akhaeans" and his "Josephos"? Fancy "Flavius Josephos"! Inconsistency with themselves and with each other is the badge of all the tribe who better the instruction of Grote's foolish "fad," and we have often wondered why they make such geese of themselves. Mr. Sayce gives the reason why he does, and it has at least the merit of being preposterous. He misspells Greek proper names, because he hopes that by so doing he "may possibly help to contribute to that most desirable of objects, the reform of English spelling."

Ἦς οὐδὲν ἡ μᾶλλον, ἢ μὴ νοῦς παρῆ.

Hester is hardly one of the best of Mrs. Oliphant's novels. It wants more compression, especially in the first volume, more incident, a little more of what art critics used to call "pyramidal form." The story is too level, too like actual life, with its trivial incidents which are yet so important, and its personages who have so little that is dramatic in them, yet are always making up scenes, and its catastrophes so cruel yet so ordinary, and so easily foreseen. And yet the narrative is far superior in interest to the ordinary run of novels. Throughout, Mrs. Oliphant has such a perfect comprehension of her characters, of what they will and will not do, of their true springs of action, and of the way in which they would meet unexpected or menacing circumstances, that her personal scenery is as real to the reader as if he stood among the group. The central figure is, as usual with Mrs. Oliphant, a woman, and, as usual, too, an elderly, unmarried woman, with wealth and brains and a will, a "woman of character" so strong that she ought to have been Scotch. When we first lighted on Catherine Vernon, the capable woman who saved a bank and managed it, and gave herself to benevolent despotism, and reigned in Redborough feared yet worshipped by half its people, we felt as if we had once more seen an old friend, and said, "Ah! here is Catherine Douglas, Millicent Mortimer, or Sarah in Whiteladies, or Phœbe Junior, grown old and resting from her labours, and placed in novel circumstances!" Mrs. Oliphant loves that kind of strong, half-masculine, clear-sighted woman, blind to nothing, not even to her own foibles, and loves, too, to place her in the position of a man, and show how much better she can control both circumstances and people than a man—who with her is essentially a feeble and impulsive creature, or else vaguely strong but shadowy—would, if so situated, be likely to do. The impression, however, soon disappears. Catherine Vernon is herself strong, like her predecessors, and healthy and competent to do man's work, but a separate being, is, in fact, that rare character, a female cynic, a woman full of benevolence and active kindness, but au fond sardonic, expecting little in return, aware that gratitude is infrequent, seeing through all the pettinesses, and spites, and falsehoods of her protégés, but tolerating all, and deriving from all an amusement which in a man would have been saturnine. In her cynicism, too, she becomes a little base, rules her dependents too hardly, is too apt to believe that their motive must be bad, and to tread her subjects down with a contempt which is not altogether unconscious, for she sometimes gives it voice. She has filled a great house with dependent relatives, to whom she is all kindness, but whom when she entertains them she grossly neglects; whom she snubs when needful remorselessly; and whose consequent dislike she regards with a large-hearted yet contemptuous understanding. Nevertheless, she is, of course, taken in, that being, in Mrs. Oliphant's theory, more or less women's destiny. She has adopted one of the Vernons, placed him at the head of the bank, and made him her son, and he, outwardly all deference, in reality despises and almost hates her, fretting under the restraint of her affection, deeming her watchful care espionage, and believing her loving control to come from a desire to govern,—which is partly true as regards all but himself,—from which his only passionate impulse is to be free. Her large, yet spoiled nature, wonderfully like all intimate sketches of the Empress Catherine II., though of course without her vice, is drawn with the firm, free hand which tells of perfect comprehension, and in her ability and her weakness, is as real as any character in history. We never tire of her and her ways and her acts, unpleasant as the latter often are, and never for an instant fail to see in her the largeness of nature, force of character, and mental insight which forbid all around, even when she is doing or saying small things, ever to think her small. She is the true heroine of the story, and her relation to her adopted son, whom she trusts implicitly, but who all the while is secretly speculating with her money, not out of roguery, or malice, or avarice, but in an ungovernable desire to be independent of her, and to rule his life for himself, is described with almost tragic power. Mrs. Oliphant does not succeed in this son quite so well as in Catherine, failing always, as she usually does, to give the impression of manliness, which must have been in the real man, but the woman's side of the story is wonderfully told, and culminates in this new form of tragedy. Edward, after speculations which nearly ruin the bank, succeeds in a big one, and flies with the money:—

"Miss Vernon had believed in no one else. She had laughed and seen through every pretence—except Edward. Edward had been the sole faith of her later life. He had loved her, she believed; and she had been able to give him a life worthy of him. Heaven and earth! She had heard him raving, as she said to herself, outside. The boy had gone wrong, as, alas, so many have gone: out of a wicked, foolish love, out of a desire to be rich, perhaps. But this was different. A momentary temptation, even a quick recurring error, that can be understood. But that his life should have been intolerable, a monotony, a bondage, that change had been what he longed for—change from her house, her presence, her confidence! She gave vent to a cry like that of a wild animal, full of horror, and misery, and pain. The girl (Hester) did not mean to hurt her. There was sincerity in every tone of her voice. She thought she was making his sins venial, and defending him. Oh, it was true, true! Through Catherine's mind at that moment there ran the whole story of her later days, how she had used herself to the pretences of all about her, how every one around had taken from her, and marled at her, eaten of her bread, and drunk of her cup, and hated her—except Edward. He alone had been her prop, her religion of the affections. The others had sneered at her weakness for him, and she had held her head high. She had prided herself on expecting no gratitude, on being prepared, with a laugh, to receive evil for good—except from him. Even now that she should be forced to acknowledge him ungrateful, that even would have been nothing, that would have done her no hurt. But to hear that his past life had been a burden, a bondage, a monotony, that freedom was what he longed for—freedom from her! The whole fabric of her life crushed together and rocked to its foundations. She cried out to Heaven and earth that she could not bear it—she could not bear it! Other miseries might be possible, but this she could not endure."

The heroine, Hester, is not quite so good. She is intended throughout to be, and is, a repetition of Catherine herself, though without the cynical humour, which, of course, only experience, and experience of a peculiar kind, can develop, and placed in far different circumstances. She is as competent as Catherine, but has nothing to do with her competence, being wretchedly poor, and surrounded by feeble people,—her mother, who is a washed-out creature, originally a lady and a beauty; a cousin Emma, pretty, stupid, and mercilessly frank in her avowals that she is husband-hunting, and "ought to have her chance;" the spiteful or very old inmates of the genteel almshouse, the Vernons, as the neighbours call it; a suitor, Harry Vernon, who is good, kindly, and faithful, but a fool; a second suitor, who hardly comes forward; and a third, the Edward Vernon, Catherine Vernon's adopted son. He wins, of course; and it is in the relation between the two that we have the only sense of disappointment in the book. We do not know why he wins, and do not believe he would have won. Pride of a sound and healthy kind is the strongest feeling in Hester, and we can hardly believe that she would have borne Edward's calculated neglect whenever he meets his love in his adopted mother's company, or his silence towards his adopted mother,—unless, indeed, Hester's love had been stronger still, strong enough to defy all things and induce her to cling to Edward when he asks her to elope, even though she is aware of, as she has long half suspected, his guilt. He dominates Hester, with her quick brain and strong character, far too completely, yet incompletely; and neither success nor failure is satisfactorily accounted for. The truth is, Mrs. Oliphant sees no necessity for explanation. Girls of fine nature are always giving themselves to the unworthy, just as wise men are always marrying fools, and her own explanation of the fact in her heart is that men are mostly fools, and that women have not yet completely found them out. We cannot recall among all her books one picture of a thoroughly competent man who is also good, or one—unless it be Tom in Miss Marjoribanks, who is the slightest of sketches—whom a male reader thoroughly likes. As, however, she does not wish to press this theory too strongly, she leaves explanation out, sometimes, as in this case, to her readers' bewilderment and annoyance. The facts granted, however, the situations are clear and exciting, and Mrs. Oliphant's power of writing bright and interesting dialogue, dialogue with thought and purpose in it, never fails her any more than her power of creating side figures. This time the book is full of them,—Captain Morgan, the old officer, whose life has been one long benevolence, but who, in extreme age, has come to the conclusion that altruism may be pushed too far, and holds, as a theory often breaking down, that every man should have a life of his own beyond destruction or spoiling by others; Mrs. Morgan, the gentle, old wife, who against this theory is immovable; Emma Ashton, their grandchild, a really wonderful sketch, the girl who has nothing bad in her, is, indeed, simple, and truthful, and unmalicious, but has in her an incurable coarseness of fibre, a Zolaish realism which has the effect of badness; Ellen Merri-dew, the spirited, active, vain butterfly, without evil in her composition, but a ruinous wife to own; Roland Ashton, the self-conscious, vain, young stockbroker, who flirts by instinct with all accessible women, yet had sense and heart somewhere about him; and Harry Vernon, the good man, who has a certain strength derived from principle and feeling alone, but is always conscious that when brain is required he is "out of it;" there is a whole gallery of such people, all sketched successfully and apparently without pains. Among them all, the reader loves Hester, the proud, able, pure girl, who protects her mother, and defies Catherine Vernon, and would protect her lover if only he would be protected, yet hardly follows her impulse when she gives herself away to such a man, one who, though full of intelligence and capacity of various kinds, is still essentially a mere hypocrite. That, after all, is the true defect of the book. The adopting mother would not have detected the hypocrite element in Edward, for adopting mothers never do, but Hester would have done, and would have despised it. That she does not, gives the reader pain, not because of Hester, who, he feels certain, will be rescued at last, but because it creates an impression of a defect in art.

We have said nothing of the plot of the story, because there is practically none, except the catastrophe produced by Edward Vernon's hunger to be free, and because we cannot consider Mrs. Oliphant from the point of view of the story-teller. She has risen far beyond that, though she has not reached her true level yet; and never will till she determines to put all the wealth of imagination at her disposal into some one book. She still beats out her gold, thinking the clever scenes she makes up so easily good enough for Mudie. So they are,—too good; but they are not good enough for her own reputation, if she is ever to be recognised for what she is,—at least the second female novelist of our time.

ROMAN LIFE IN THE DAYS OF CICERO.*

MR. CHURCH has in this book taken a quite new step in his very successful project of popularising, without vulgarising, the great Greek and Roman Classics. In some, indeed, of his tales from Livy, and tales from Herodotus, he was on historic ground; but in these sketches of life, taken from the speeches and letters of Cicero, he is on the ground of history as attested by contemporary evidence of the most minute and most authoritative kind, and a more charming selection of scenes from the life and times of Cicero it would be difficult to find. The only fault of the book is that it opens, rather unfortunately, with a slightly dull chapter on the Roman boy, which is not quite of a piece with the rest of the book, and which looks rather as if Mr. Church at first sketched out for himself a different plan, which he subsequently found it undesirable to pursue. He disclaims in the preface any intention of writing a book illustrative of the social life of the Romans, and yet the first chapter would seem to have been conceived from that point of view, though it is almost immediately changed for a very much better and livelier design,—that of illustrating the times of Cicero by sketches of Cicero's own achievements, and of those of the great men who were either his friends or his rivals. After this first chapter, however, which is a little too much in the style of a manual of Roman manners and customs, Mr. Church keeps much closer to the events or incidents of the times of the great Roman orator and statesman, and then the interest never flags. The account of those celebrated causes in which Cicero pleaded,—the defence of Roscius, the impeachment of Verres, and the exposure of Catiline's conspiracy,—is singularly vivid and lively. Of Cicero's country retreats, of his anxiety to adorn his library at Tusculum, of his Sabine farm near Arpinum with its island study, of his more fashionable sea-side home near Cape Caieta, where he was bored by too attentive friends; of his dreariness and complainingness in exile, and of the furtive way in which he reproached his friends under pretence of reproaching himself, indeed of the curious mixture of courage and vacillation in his character generally, Mr. Church gives us a most graphic picture in this interesting little book, which to the present writer, at least, has had all the interest of a novel. Some of Cicero's contemporaries, too, are sketched in with few but effective strokes,—Sulla, Pompey, Catiline, Atticus, Cæsar, and Antony. In all these delineations, there is enough detail to produce a vivid impression, but not more than enough for the purposes of a sketch in which some one feature, whether it be one that concerns the character of Cicero, or that of his friends and rivals, or the society which they kept and the constraint or freedom with which they treated each other, is brought out. Thus we get a most effective picture of the corruption of a time in which juries were bribable, indeed, and often bribed, but yet not so utterly bribable but that ability and courage, and still more, audacity, might foil the most deliberate and apparently well-planned attempt to defeat justice. Cicero himself often defeated such attempts at corruption, and defeated them when his own life was the stake for which he played. At the same time, it is pretty clear that he did not despise the arts of the advocate, even though those arts were of a kind to mislead the jury into the conclusion which he desired them to draw.

We will illustrate the descriptive power of the book by one passage, in which Mr. Church gives us a picture of one of Cicero's country retreats, and by another in which he condenses the story of the indictment drawn against Verres. Here is a sketch of the country house near Arpinum:—

"A Roman of even moderate wealth—for Cicero was far from being one of the richest men of his time—commonly possessed more country-houses than belong even to the wealthiest of English nobles. One such house at least Cicero inherited from his father. It was about three miles from Arpinum, a little town in that hill country of the Sabines which was the proverbial seat of a temperate and frugal race, and which Cicero describes in Homerio phrase as

'Rough but a kindly nurse of men.'

In his grandfather's time it had been a plain farmhouse, of the kind that had satisfied the simpler manners of former days—the days when Consuls and Dictators were content, their time of office ended, to plough their own fields and reap their own harvests. Cicero was born within its walls, for the primitive fashion of family life still prevailed, and the married son continued to live in his father's house. After the old man's death, when the old-fashioned frugality gave way to a more sumptuous manner of life, the house was greatly enlarged, one of the additions being a library, a room of which the grandfather, who thought that his contemporaries were like Syrian slaves, 'the more Greek they knew the greater knaves they were,' had never felt the want; but in which his son, especially in his later days, spent most of his time. The garden and grounds were especially delightful, the most charming spot of all being an island formed by the little stream Fibrenus. A description put into the mouth of Quintus, the younger son of the house, thus depicts it: 'I have never seen a more pleasant spot. Fibrenus here divides his stream into two of equal size, and so washes either side. Flowing rapidly by he joins his waters again, having compassed just as much ground as makes a convenient place for our literary discussions. This done he hurries on, just as if the providing of such a spot had been his only office and function, to fall into the Liris. Then, like one adopted into a noble family, he loses his own obscurer name. The Liris, indeed, he makes much colder. A colder stream than this indeed I never touched, though I have seen many. I can scarce bear to dip my foot in it. You remember how Plato makes Socrates dip his foot in Ilissus.' Atticus, too, is loud in his praises. 'This, you know, is my first time of coming here, and I feel that I cannot admire it enough. As to the splendid villas which one often sees, with their marble pavements and gilded ceilings, I despise them. And their water-courses, to which they give the fine names of Nile or Euripus, who would not laugh at them when he sees your streams? When we want rest and delight for the mind it is to nature that we must come. Once I used to wonder—for I never thought that there was anything but rocks and hills in the place—that you took such pleasure in the spot. But now I marvel that when you are away from Rome you care to be anywhere but here.'—'Well,' replied Cicero, 'when I get away from town for several days at a time, I do prefer this place; but this I can seldom do. And indeed I love it, not only because it is so pleasant, so healthy a resort, but also because it is my native land, mine and my father's too, and because I live here among the associations of those that have gone before me.'"

And here is the close of the spirited account of the impeachment of Verres:—

"Verres had still one hope left; and this, strangely enough, sprang out of the very number and enormity of his crimes. The mass of evidence was so great that the trial might be expected to last for a long time. If it could only be protracted into the next year, when his friends would be in office, he might still hope to escape. And indeed there was but little time left. The trial began on the fifth of August. In the middle of the month Pompey was to exhibit some games. Then would come the games called 'The Games of Rome,' and after this others again, filling up much of the three months of September, October, and November. Cicero anticipated this difficulty. He made a short speech (it could not have lasted more than two hours in delivering), in which he stated the case in outline. He made a strong appeal to the jury. They were themselves on their trial. The eyes of all the world were on them. If they did not do justice on so notorious a criminal, they would never be trusted any more. It would seem that the senators were not fit to administer the law. The law itself was on its trial. The provincials openly declared that if Verres was acquitted, the law under which their governors were liable to be accused had better be repealed. If no fear of a prosecution were hanging over them, they would be content with as much plunder as would satisfy their own wants. They would not need to extort as much more wherewith to bribe their judges. Then he called his witnesses. A marvellous array they were. 'From the foot of Mount Taurus, from the shores of the Black Sea, from many cities of the Grecian mainland, from many islands of the Ægean, from every city and market-town of Sicily, deputations thronged to Rome. In the porticoes, and on the steps of the temples, in the area of the Forum, in the colonnade that surrounded it, on the housetops and on the overlooking declivities, were stationed dense and eager crowds of impoverished heirs and their guardians, bankrupt tax-farmers and corn-merchants, fathers bewailing their children carried off to the prator's harem, children mourning for their parents dead in the prator's dungeons, Greek nobles whose descent was traced to Cecrops or Euryathenes, or to the great Ionian and Minyan houses, and Phœnicians, whose ancestors had been priests of the Tyrian Melcarth, or claimed kindred with the Zidonian Jah. Nine days were spent in hearing this mass of evidence. Hortensius was utterly overpowered by it. He had no opportunity for displaying his eloquence, or making a pathetic appeal for a noble oppressed by the hatred of the democracy. After a few feeble attempts at cross-examination, he practically abandoned the case. The defendant himself perceived that his position was hopeless. Before the nine days, with their terrible impeachment, had come to an end he fled from Rome. The jury returned an unanimous verdict of guilty, and the prisoner was condemned to banishment and to pay a fine. The place of banishment (which he was apparently allowed to select outside certain limits) was Marseilles. The amount of the fine we do not know. It certainly was not enough to impoverish him. Much of the money and many of the works of art which he had stolen were left to him. These latter, by a singularly just retribution, proved his ruin in the end. After the death of Cicero, Antony permitted the exiles to return. Verres came with them, bringing back his treasures of art, and was put to death because they excited the cupidity of the masters of Rome."

It is curious to note how many of the great Romans of this era seem to have depended on their youth for the brilliance of their genius. Sulla's genius certainly paled before that of Pompey. Cicero was never again the man he was before his exile; and, indeed, was himself conscious of showing weakness and vacillation at a time when he might have defeated the design of Clodius, if he had had but the audacity of his earlier self. Pompey, the most brilliant of youthful generals, seems to have lost all nerve and presence of mind towards the close of his career. And even Caesar's assassination prevented his genius from being put to the test of age. Surely, in the closing days of the Republic, there was a strange want of those fixed convictions on which had rested the iron tenacity of the Rome of an earlier period; and, except where the place of these convictions was supplied by something of the dash of youthful daring, there seems to have been a vein of weakness in Roman genius, quite unlike the sterling patriotism and self-confidence of earlier periods. There was a touch of Alcibiades in even the best, as well as in the worst, of the great men of the last days of the Republic.

DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA.*

WE have observed with some regret an apparently authoritative announcement to the effect that the publishers of Don John of Austria do not intend to issue a popular—and it was also to be hoped an easily portable—edition of it. Both the folio edition, which was published immediately after the death of Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, and the library edition which has followed it at an interval of a few years, are, in point of paper, type, and illustrations, truly magnificent. But they are for the connoisseurs in books, rather than for the students of them. It is surely a matter for regret that Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, as a historical writer, and above all in his latest and greatest work, should be kept as a close preserve for connoisseurs. He is not a great historical writer, indeed, in the sense in which, we shall not say Thucydides and Tacitus, but even Macaulay and Motley, are great historical writers. "The over-soul," as Emerson rather affectingly called it, does not brood over his writings; they are deficient even in the sense of proportion. It is men, not movements, or even periods, that he can understand, and, in consequence, do justice to. He is fascinated by the picturesque and the romantic, he has no longing to get behind the scenes to the spiritual, or even to that profounder real which Emerson affirms too dogmatically to be the only true spiritual, and to which the romantic and the picturesque are but as the feather in the hat, or the rose in the button-hole. Sir William Stirling-Maxwell seized on Don John of Austria for a subject much as Bulwer Lytton seized on Rienzi. His position in literature—and it may be added, in politics also—may, in fact, be defined as that of the least affected and the most painstaking and erudite of the school of which Lord Beaconsfield was first the exquisite and then the man of action, and Bulwer Lytton, with his "heroes of hemp and glories of the gallows," even with his Richelieus and Rienzis, was the phrasemonger and playwright. But let Sir William Stirling-Maxwell be taken with his limitations and as he presents himself, and he will be found a delightful writer, and a man of great, if one-sided historical learning, who wore it, too, with easy grace, as a scholarly country gentleman wears his Latin and Greek. Don John of Austria was Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's magnum opus, if not his favourite son. All his other writings, his Cloister Life, his historical and Spanish artistic "Studies," led up to it, though not quite by a direct route. Moreover, Don John, if not exactly "the last Crusader," as Mr. Motley has styled him, was the last of the chivalric figures of Catholic Christendom; even the in many respects greater, Alexander Farnese was little better than the tool of an essentially ignoble tyranny. The hero of Lepanto, the rival and opponent of William the Taciturn, the ambitious dreamer, who first proposed to revive the glories of Carthage, and then, repulsed by Elizabeth, contemplated the conquest of England as the consort of Mary, Queen of Scots, who yet died at little over thirty, had a story worth telling, and it has never been told with such fullness and enthusiasm as by Sir William Stirling-Maxwell. Besides, this work is valuable for other reasons than as containing the story of Don John. Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's learning overflows from his hero on everybody and everything connected with him. There are chapters in it on the Morisco rebellion against Spain, on the fleets of the sixteenth century, and on the relations at that time between Islam and Christendom, that are of the character of historical embroidery, and that may be read and deserve to be read apart from Don John. It is still to be hoped that Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's literary executors or publishers may, at some time in the future, see their way to issue Don John of Austria in such a form as may place it within the reach of that large and increasing section of the public which finds its chief delight in serious historical literature.

Our purpose is necessarily at this time to recall, rather than to call, attention to Don John of Austria. Its strong and its weak points are easily pointed out; many of them, as characteristics of Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's literary work generally, we have already hinted at. The second half of this work is the less interesting of the two, though that is, perhaps, more Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's misfortune than his fault. In dealing with the struggle of the Netherlands with Philip II., he necessarily provokes comparison with Mr. Motley, and not quite to his advantage. Mr. Motley has grasped the moral meaning of that struggle better than Sir William; and, beside William the Taciturn, Don John appears a grandiose, rather than a grand figure. The closing portion of the narrative telling the events that led up to the death of Don John of a broken heart—or was it of poison?—seems to flag. In spite of what Sir William Stirling-Maxwell says, Don John appears to us to have towards the last become so weak and querulous, that one cannot help suspecting that he had grown convinced of the injustice of the cause he was sent to fight for by his half-brother, as well as of the selfish view Philip took of himself as of all his agents and emissaries. There was something of the Bayard in Don John; why, then, did he not try to break the chain that bound him to Philip, and declare, like Bayard, that the greatest of a nation's interests is not peace, but justice? Going backwards through the melodramatic scenes of which Don John's career was composed, we come to the war of the Holy League of Catholic Christendom against the Ottoman Empire, of which the battle of Lepanto was the most brilliant, but not the concluding episode. Here we find our author at his best, and also at his worst. His portraits of the leading figures in this great historic struggle,—Pius V., the savage debauchee Selim II., the various commanders at Lepanto, including tough old Andrea Doria, against whom Sir William Stirling-Maxwell seems to have had something like a grudge, are without exception excellent. This portion of the work, too, is a perfect mine of information upon the battle of Lepanto, and the events which preceded and succeeded it. But the description of the fight itself, looked at as a battle-piece, is disappointing. It is not such a piece as Macaulay would have given us, or Mr. Freeman, or Carlyle, each in a different style. It is rather a series of sketches, than a bird's-eye view of the whole engagement. No doubt, the battle itself was an affair of "sections;" but this is precisely the kind of difficulty that a higher art than Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's would have delighted in overcoming. His style, indeed, shows to much better advantage in the account of the Morisco rebellion, that remarkable rising of a brave but fated race against Spanish bigotry and tyranny. Here Sir William's very discursiveness helps him. For patient historical treatment and for picturesqueness it would be difficult to match his detailed narrative of the singular struggle in the Sierras, in which, by the way, Don John's part was rather an unimportant one.

But we find that, on the whole, the most enjoyable portion of this work is the narrative it gives of the early life and training of Don John. Charles V. was really at great pains with the education of the son born of his liaison at Ratisbon in 1546 with Barbara Blomberg, who seems now beyond all question to have been a daughter of a good family there, and who proved, as Philip II. found to his cost, a woman of many whims and of strong will. Don John was placed under the care of Luis Quixada, one of the truly noble-minded Spanish gentlemen of the time, whom it is one of the tragic "pities" of history to find working and dying for one of the worst of masters, and perhaps the very worst of causes. Quixada faithfully discharged the duty imposed upon him by Charles V., and duly acknowledged, it is only fair to say, by that cold fanatic, his son. The time came for Philip to proclaim to the world that Quixada's pupil was his half-brother, and Sir William Stirling-Maxwell's description of the rather dramatic way in which he did this at an auto-da-fe at Valladolid, is one of the most effective bits of writing in the book:—"A group of gentlemen came in sight. As they drew near, Quixada once more halted, and alighting from his horse, caused Don John to follow his example. A short, spare man, in black, with a pale face and sandy beard, advanced towards them alone, and checked his horse when within a few paces. 'Kneel down, Don John,' said Quixada, 'and kiss his Majesty's hand.' As the youth obeyed the instruction, he found bending over him a pair of cold, grey eyes, and a pointing underlip, which may well have recalled the features of the august invalid whose gouty fingers he had knelt to kiss at Yuste. 'Do you know, youngster,' said the King, 'who your father was?' The abashed youth made no reply. Philip then dismounted, and embracing him with some show of affection, said, 'Charles V., my lord and father, was also yours. You could not have had a more illustrious sire, and I am bound to acknowledge you as my brother.' He then turned to the gentlemen behind him and said, 'Know and honour this youth as the natural son of the Emperor and brother to the King.'" Don John's position was now assured, and we soon find him placed in very delicate relations towards Philip, and his savage and indeed mad son, Don Carlos. There need be no longer any mystery about the death of this wretched lad. Carried away by his own passions, he offended his father, who, to bring him to his senses, put him in prison. There he lived in an insane way, and finally starved himself to death. Don John was the steady friend of Carlos through the short and stormy period of their acquaintance, though he declined to help his projects of rebellion against his father. So many sins have been rightly laid to the door of Philip, that one is glad to acquit him of the murder of his own son, though he was very nearly as bad a father as he was a politician. In regard to this portion of Don John's story, Sir William Stirling-Maxwell recalls Gachard, as in others he more forcibly reminds one of Motley's invaluable work, and also of M. Fournier's comparatively recent Philip II. But viewed simply as a piece of independent and thorough historical research, it need fear neither comparison nor criticism.

MR. BESANT'S NEW NOVEL.*

WE recently referred to Mr. Walter Besant as one of the two novelists of the day who are at once realistic and romantic, Mr. Clark Russell being the other; here is a new story of the practical-poetical kind, with one of the ingeniously applied titles which we always expect from this author, come to support that remark.

All in a Garden Fair has not the lively interest of The Chaplain of the Fleet, the serious, social purpose of All Sorts and Conditions of Men, or the satirical meaning and comicality of The Monks of Thelema; but it is a very pretty story, and an exceedingly good book, one which is as pleasant to read as any of its predecessors, and has greater smoothness and literary polish.

There is something about this story that reminds us of the immortal White Cat. Mr. Besant may, perhaps, not have been consciously thinking about that delightful tale—one that may be read with profit and pleasure at any age—but it was lurking somewhere in the recesses of his mind, when he started off his three "swains" from the pretty village of portentous bankruptcy in the Forest of Hainault, to seek their fortunes in the three different regions of Tom Tiddler's Ground, the Island of Sweet

Fancies, and a Far Country. Are they not all, the reader asks himself, to meet at the bridge, to ride together over the palace green, and to bring home to the King, who is so provokingly vacillating about his abdication, the little pink dog, the web of cambric, and the loveliest princess in the world? At all events, the glow of romance is shed over the story from the first, and the realism of it is as remarkable as the realism of the author's East London studies in his recent novels, and the seafaring scenes in several of his Christmas books. The sweet little heroine, who might be the king's daughter, but is the child of a wise and gentle-hearted French political refugee, lives with her father, Hector Philipon, on the borders of Hainault Forest, and the three "swains" with whom we make acquaintance as children, have unlimited resort to the wild region that the author describes delightfully, and whither they go with the little Claire, like Poucet and his brethren in that sad, old story of the big little family, the empty larder, and the scattered bread-crumbs, in which, we suppose, we shall presently be invited to discern an allegory of overcrowding, depreciation of labour-value, and the resources of emigration. The following passages are taken from a chapter devoted to a lovely scene within the reach of us all, but which few of us have ever visited:—

"Hainault is not a very great forest, but it is real; it is wild. There are endless things to explore in it; there are creatures which may be started in the underwood; among them are the tame cats who have grown wild, and now pass precarious lives in great discomfort; in the spring and summer, the air is musical with birds, of which these children know every note; in the winter, there are the donkeys who run loose and keep themselves,—they will let themselves be ridden in hard times, bare-backed, and never a kick for a crust of bread; and there are things, yea, tritons and evets, and wriggling things in the pools, and jack may be caught in the River Roding; there are butterflies and moths to be chased; there are flowers in the spring and blackberries in the autumn. Besides the creatures, and the trees, and flowers, there is scenery; here and there, hill-sides clothed with wood; slopes on which, as you stand upon them, and look among the trees, the sun produces strange and wonderful effects; stretches of elastic turf; places where the forest seems to recede and still to recede as you walk along, great trees, avenues of oak, gatherings of beeches, with ash, and elm, and sycamore; everywhere, the underwood of hawthorn, honeysuckle, and wild rose; everywhere the freshness and fragrance of the wild wood; always light and colour, even in January, when the delicate purple bloom lies upon the masses of bush and shrub and the late leaves linger on the sheltered branches, and always silence and rest from the talk of man."

The opening scenes of the story take place during the childhood of Claire and the three boys, and are partly amusing and partly poetical. The talk of the congregated bankrupts on the village green, with their contempt for mercantile failures at a low figure, is humorous rather in Mr. Besant's former than in his present style; the boys are very real boys, and Philipon is quite an original.

Allen Engledew's poetic faculty is early indicated; we find it out when he sits on the bench in the churchyard, "on which should be sitting none but old men, contemplating with faith and resignation the place where they soon must lie." But Allen wanders there, and if he goes alone and sits there long enough, there presently comes to him a vision:—

"He sees a fierce battle, with men in armour, and armed with crossbow, longbow, pike, lance, and heavy sword. There is a great shouting and clashing of weapons; there is the heavy tramp of chargers carrying knights in iron armour; there is the rushing to and fro of men who charged and men who fled; there is the hurdling of bolts and arrows in the air; there is a flight and a slaughter. It is the vision of Senlac fight which comes to the boy, because somewhere at his feet there lie the bones of King Harold and his brothers."

The different destinies of the three boys are traced out with the author's accustomed skill. We know from very early in the story which of the three we prefer, and we are pretty sure that Mr. Besant also favours him in his heart; for has not the novelist always the power of according the hand of the beautiful maiden to his own particular favourite, in spite of the perversity of events, the machinations of enemies, and the apparent implacability of fate? Now, the hand of the beautiful maiden is not, in the end, bestowed upon the poet. This trifling breach of confidence we permit ourselves, because we are bound to say we are very glad of it. Mr. Besant binds us over to believe that Allen is a poet, a novelist, and a dramatist hors ligne, and we agree to it all; but he cannot disguise that he was also a bit of a prig, and egregiously befattered by Isabel Holt. He would have disappointed Claire, but the swain who went to the Far Country is worthy of her. We wish it to be distinctly understood, however, that we have nothing against Allen, and that we do not grudge him the happiness and prosperity in which we leave him. The story is full of happy allusions, piquant bits of acute and humorous observation, incidental people who are very amusing, and sketches of life in that "East End" of London which the author first made known to the Western world. Among the best incidental sketches is that of Gertrude Holt, the grey-haired, old, literary lady, who comes of an inky family, and has been writing all her life. Of the modern aspects of so-called literary society, and the experiences of aspirants to literature, there has been something too much of late; but Mr. Besant invests the subject with freshness which is rarely, if ever, wanting in his writings, and teaches (without preaching it) a wholesome lesson of patience and hard work. All through the story runs the sweet strain—now plainly audible, now in an under-tone—of the romance of Hainault Forest, and the dreams of the French humanitarian, democrat, philosopher, and refugee. The author will not disappoint any of his already-won admirers, while there are certain attractions that are quite novel about All in a Garden Fair.

THE EXPANSION OF ENGLAND.*

THIS book sets forth a view of modern English history which may fitly be called original. For, although more than hinted at by Ranke and others, it has never yet been presented with such force, or so developed, as it is in these pages. Assuredly, too, the moral which Professor Seeley draws from his reading of historical events is original, in the best sense of the word. We can find, therefore, no better way of praising the book than by letting its argument as much as possible speak for itself.

The book is made up of "Two Courses of Lectures," the first of which deals generally with the whole subject, the second being devoted particularly to our great Indian dependency. Interesting as is this latter part of the book, it cannot, from the nature of the subject, compare in interest with the first part, which treats of the foundation and development of the colonies inhabited by Englishmen. We purpose, then, while noting the value of the second course, to consider only those views which Professor Seeley propounds in the first eight lectures. At the outset, Professor Seeley tells us that it is a favourite maxim of his that "history, while it should be scientific in its method, should pursue a practical object;" it should "modify the reader's view of the present and his forecast of the future." The method should be scientific, that is, history should treat of the most important events, and these events should be considered in relation to their cause or causes. Further, Professor Seeley gives us a test of the importance of events; "it is their pregnancy, or, in other words, the greatness of the consequences likely to follow from them." Now, inasmuch as there are already "ten millions of Englishmen beyond the sea"—and "those millions are scattered over an enormous area, which fills up with a rapidity quite unlike the increase of population in England"—Professor Seeley looks upon the foundation of Greater Britain as "the great fact of modern English history." And this fact suggests its own explanation. Has it not been said that "Europe is a group of States of which the five westernmost have been acted upon by a steady gravitation towards the New World, and have dragged in their train great New-World empires"? Greater Britain, then, has arisen from the contest of these five Western European States for supremacy in the New World. But inasmuch as in this race for an empire beyond the seas, Spain and Portugal had "the start by a whole century, and even Holland was in the field before England," how came England to outstrip her competitors? Holland and Portugal, we are told, "laboured under the disadvantage of too small a basis;" and Spain and France were too deeply involved in European matters, they "both had too many irons in the fire:"—

"In one word, out of the five States which competed for the New World, success has fallen to that one not which showed at the outset the strongest vocation for colonisation, not which surpassed the others in daring, or invention, or energy, but to that one which was least hampered by the Old World."

But Professor Seeley is not satisfied, even after making such generalisations as these; he appeals to facts, and depicts, at least in outline, the chief incidents of the contest. The Armada, he says, marks the time when the apprenticeship of the English as sailors closes; from this time on England becomes "maritime and industrial," here is "the beginning of modern English history." Under the first Stuarts "there is no decline," as is commonly imagined, "there is continuous development." John Smith, the Pilgrim Fathers, and Calvert establish the colonies of Virginia, New England, and Maryland. Precisely stated, Professor Seeley's belief is that,—

"The seventeenth century is controlled by two great forces, of which one, the Reformation, is decreasing; while the other, which is the attraction of the New World, is increasing."

That the influence of the Reformation is decreasing, is evidenced by the war between the two Protestant powers, England and Holland, and when later, England joined hands with Holland, the alliance is not only against the Catholic Revival which bore fruit in the Edict of Nantes, but also against the growing power of France, which threatened both States in like degree. For, "from about 1660 to 1700, France had been the first State in the world, beyond dispute." This, then, is the aspect of the race towards the end of the seventeenth century. Portugal has fallen hopelessly behind; so has Spain, which was tripped up by Cromwell; and Holland has been so hustled by England and France acting in combination against her—the one under Charles II., the other under Louis XIV.—that she soon afterwards becomes exhausted. The prize, which is the possession of the New World, now lies between England and France. Here we find the chief virtue of Professor Seeley's conception; it rehabilitates the eighteenth century, making the "dismal period" one of the most interesting in English history. He directs attention to the fact that out of the 126 years, counted from the Revolution of 1688 to the peace of 1815, "sixty-four years, or more than one-half, were spent in war." He covers all these wars with one formula:—

"The truth is these wars group themselves very symmetrically, and the whole period stands out as an age of gigantic rivalry between England and France, a kind of second Hundred Years' War."

The culminating point of the struggle is to be sought in the three wars waged between 1740 and 1783:—

"In the first of them, the issue is fairly joined; in the second, France suffers her fatal fall; in the third, she takes her signal revenge."

Well may Professor Seeley say that this trilogy of wars supplies the grand feature which the eighteenth century seems so sadly to want. Nor is the period lacking in the interest due to a great personality. Chatham was the statesman who "guided us to victory." Again, as regards our wars with the French Revolution and with Napoleon, "the possession of the New World was among the grounds of quarrel." For this explains why the French incited Tippoo Sultan to war with the Calcutta Government, why Napoleon insisted upon the evacuation of Malta, and why the English, in defiance of treaty, refused to give up the island. It explains Napoleon's Continental system, and his violent seizure of Spain and Portugal.

No one, we think, will deny that this reading of modern English history has much to say for itself, it therefore remains for us to consider briefly "the practical object" which Professor Seeley insists upon as the outcome of his conception.

"For, if this English Exodus has been the greatest English event of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the greatest English question of the future must be what is to become of our second Empire, and whether or no it may be expected to go the way of the first. . . . Like a bubble, Greater Britain expanded rapidly and then burst. It has since been expanding again. Can we avoid the obvious inference?"

Professor Seeley thinks that we can, and he rejects Turgot's simile of the fruit-tree. "I think," he writes, "we mistake the moral of the American Revolution, when we infer from it that all colonies—and not merely colonies of religious refugees under a bad colonial system—fall off from the tree as soon as they ripen." While making it clear that England lost her American Colonies chiefly because her colonial system was a bad one, Professor Seeley shows that its badness consisted in looking upon the Colonies as a possession from which a profit should be made, and not as an integral part of the State. But now, as Free-trade "condemned in toto the old colonial system, as the wrong theory is given up," it only remains to decide upon the right theory and apply it. Professor Seeley assures us there is only one right theory:—"If the colonies are not, in the old phrase, possessions of England, then they must be a part of England; and we must adopt this view in earnest." Professor Seeley goes to prove the necessity of such a union:—

"If the United States and Russia hold together for another half-century, they will at the end of that time completely dwarf such old European States as France and Germany, and depress them into a second class. They will do the same to England, if she persist in thinking of herself as simply a European State, and not as a World-Empire."

It is, therefore, possible (steam and electricity having annihilated distance), that England should make herself the centre of a new United States; it is even necessary, in the interest of her own security.

Now, while agreeing in the main with Professor Seeley, we cannot overlook, as he does, the obstacles which stand in the way of such a federation. Great as those obstacles unquestionably are,—the indifference of English statesmen to colonial aspirations being among the greatest,—yet signs are not wanting which show that Englishmen are now beginning to realise that a little more unselfishness in their daily actions would be advisable. The rich are coming to understand that it would repay them, in every sense of the word, to rehouse the poor. But the sympathy just now showing itself in home legislation may be expected within a short time to make its power felt in England's treatment of her colonies, and this expectation of ours is heightened by the earnestness of Professor Seeley's pleading. This book, then, must be looked upon as a "sign of the times," and so regarded, it becomes a political event of real importance, and of good promise for the future. As long as such books can be written, it is possible to hope that Mr. Arnold may be mistaken when he describes England as "the weary Titan,"—

"Bearing on shoulders immense,
Atlantean, the load,
Well-nigh not to be borne,
Of the too vast orb of her fate."

It is still possible that England may yet realise the expectations called forth by her past history in those who love her, that she may yet establish a World-Empire within whose bounds the liberty of the few shall not have as consequence the degradation of the many.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

GIFT BOOKS.

The Book Lover's Enchiridion; Thoughts on the Solace and Companionship of Books. By Alexander Ireland. (Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.)—This is a delightful work. Both as touching contents and outward appearance, the "Enchiridion" can hardly fail to please the general reader as much as it will undoubtedly please the lover of books, and everything relating thereto. Mr. Ireland's book consists of sayings about books, garnered, as he tells us, from writers of every age, for the help and betterment of all readers. The extracts have been most judiciously selected, and are evidently the result of years of careful reading and close observation. It is impossible to open the "Enchiridion" anywhere without finding some wise, witty, or pleasant saying; and the highest commendation we can give it is to say that the compiler's object, as described by himself in the preface to this (the third) edition, has been fully achieved. "My object," he says, "has been to bring together, from the reading of a lifetime, a body of thought, old and new, which cannot fail to be welcome to those who find their purest and highest enjoyment in studious contemplation; who love to retire from 'the fretful stir unprofitable, and the fever of the world,' and dwell for a time in 'the heaven revealed to meditation;' and who feel their inner life sustained and refreshed, by a knowledge of the consolations which the most gifted minds have ever found in books."

Outline Pictures for Little Painters, by Helena Miles, (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.), sufficiently explains its object by its title. Thirty drawings of various domestic scenes present outlines which young folks are to fill in with colour. The outlines are correct, and even spirited; and something may be taught, as well as amusement given by them. Along with this may be mentioned, Dainty Drawings for Little Painters. Outline Pictures by T. Pym, with Descriptive Stories by C. Shaw. (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—Here, again, the drawings are pretty, somewhat in the style of Miss Kate Greenaway. The accompanying stories give hints as to the colouring,— "Can yer tell me what time it is, little master?" asked that big boy in the blue coat and brown trousers," e.g.;—and there are, by way of preface, some useful instructions, which may help the young artists to make their work fairly harmonious in colour.

The Pharaohs and their People. By E. Berkley. (Seeley and Co.)—Mrs. Berkley gives in this volume a connected history of Egypt from the earliest times down to its conquest by Alexander, interspersing the narrative with sketches of manners and customs. She says very little, acting, doubtless, in this respect of set purpose, on the points of contact between the Egyptian dynasties and the Jewish people. To have dealt with them satisfactorily would probably have carried her beyond her limits, and we must be content with what we have; and this is certainly very interesting. We do not know of any book in which the main outlines of Egyptian history are so conveniently given. The volume is amply adorned with illustrations both plain and in colours, which considerably increase its value.

London Cries. By Andrew W. Tuer. (Field and Tuer.)—There is a considerable literature of "street cries," going back to the seventeenth century. Into this Mr. Tuer has made diligent inquiry, and has now given the results to the public in this handsome volume. Not a little information about the social and economic side of history may be picked out from these quaint records of the city life of the past. Our ancestors were accustomed to have their streets made much more musical with these announcements than are the streets of the present. Some things are still sold in this way, though the chief commerce is of a kind that has sprung up in this generation, the sale of penny and halfpenny newspapers. But the cries have, for the most part, been silenced; in the main thoroughfares they have ceased entirely, and in the back-streets they are less frequent. The disappearance of some of these articles of sale speaks of an improvement; for one of the cries was a cry of scurvy-grass, for instance, which was still prized at the end of the last century, and another was of "New-River water," which it is not now necessary to buy in the street. Herbs generally have gone out of fashion, "Chickweed and groundsel, for your fine singing birds," being almost the only cry that one commonly hears. Somehow, these chickweed-sellers seem to be the most miserable of the human race. Among prices, we find, "New-laid eggs, eight a groat," (but were they new-laid?) "Cherries, black and white-heart, twopence a pound" (but we sometimes find the price as high as sixpence); "Mackerel, four for sixpence;" and "Four pair for a shilling, Holland socks!" The gems of Mr. Tuer's illustrations are the "Two Charming Children," given in duplicate in red and brown, and very pleasing specimens of the engraving of seventy years ago. Quaint pictures in the "Dr. Syntax" style, rude coloured prints, and other miscellanies make up a curious volume.

His Mother's Book. By the Author of "Little Freddie." (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—The boy who took such good care of his mother's book, "Little Bill" by name, is almost too good and clever, perhaps, at seven years old; but he is so lovable as well, and meets with such interesting friends in the old bird-seller and "Lame Margaret," that every one may read about him with pleasure, and those who pride themselves on their godless respectability with great profit.

The Golden Magnet, by G. Manville Fenn (Blackie and Son), is a gorgeous-looking book, with many pictures. The one in which a girl is sitting fascinated by a huge snake may be of doubtful scientific value, but is intended to illustrate the wonderful escape of the young lady, who, it seems, was partly saved by the preference of the snake for a jaguar, which was also close at hand. The author has, we believe, written several books of the kind before, and no doubt finds it increasingly difficult to minister to the puerile craving for the dreadful, and yet to keep things sufficiently probable. And, after all, if heroes and heroines are in South America, there is no knowing what may happen to them. Some of the most exciting incidents turn on the finding of treasures long hidden, belonging to ancient temples. But did they belong to the finder?

Hannah Turne: a Story. By the Author of "Mr. Greysmith." (Macmillan and Co.)—Though "Hannah" is but twelve years old when her adventures begin, they are of a kind to interest those chiefly who are beyond childhood. The account of her sojourn in Germany is well told, and true to the manners of the country. "Cousin Ada's" vulgar affectation of French phrases is carried rather too far, to be equally true to the manners even of would-be fine ladies in England; but on the whole, it is a nice little tale, and well written.

"The Babe at the Mill" and "Zanina." By the Hon. Mrs. Green. (Nelson and Sons.)—The first of these stories—laid so far back as 1648—is full of English country pictures, which hardly need the engravings to illustrate them. It is just the kind of story for Christmas, as, though its opening incidents are very terrible, the ghostly weirdness kept up throughout, and its sweet ending, make it very attractive. "Zanina" tells of the later time of the Tuscan revolution, and in the course of the sad little tale one of the many causes which led to that most desirable event is unfolded; and yet, spy though she was, one cannot hate poor Zanina, the flower-girl.

The Fan. By Octave Uzanne. (Nimmo and Bain.)—This is a book of elegant trifling, making pretensions to learning which are not always justified (as when Helioabalus is described as the son of Caracalla), but quite frank in what we may call its indifference to morals. The illustrations are mostly in keeping with the text, save that they are now and then somewhat more pronounced in the same indifference. Some must certainly be condemned when judged by any standard of decency commonly accepted in this country. The translation is ill done, though its obscurity, we must allow, is not always to be regretted.

A Tourist Idyll, and other Stories. 2 vols. (Sampson Low and Co.)—The first of these stories is a somewhat amusing account of the perplexities which arise from a mistake made in a friendly exchange of cards. One of the parties gives a card which he had himself received on a similar occasion, and which bears a name that, rightly or wrongly, is odious to the family of the new receiver. Next in merit to this is "A Quartet of Queens," in which an elderly gentleman comes home from a long sojourn in India to find himself the nominal head of a house, in which four young ladies, of very marked personalities, are really the rulers. His helpless inadequacy to support the rôle of a father is amusingly described. We must protest against the moral, if there be a moral, of the third story, "King Minor." It is horrible to read of a sweet creature like the heroine of this tale wasted in the hopeless attempt to reform a drunkard. It is a mischievous trifling with truth to talk of this madness being cured by "love and music."

Our Own Country: Descriptive, Historical, Pictorial. (Cassell and Co.)—This is the sixth and concluding volume of a very meritorious work. "Canterbury," with its magnificent cathedral, which disputes with Westminster Abbey the distinction of being the most interesting monument of English history; "Colchester," with its Roman remains; "Carlisle," "The Upper Trent," "The Tyne," and "The Thames, from Windsor to Reading," are among the most interesting of the English chapters; in Wales, we have "St. David's"; in Scotland, "Iona, Staffa, and Arran"; and in Ireland, "Donegal and Connought." Interesting descriptions, and illustrations which seldom fall below a satisfactory standard of excellence, distinguish this volume, as they have distinguished its predecessors. The whole is a work of standard value, published, too, at a price which is almost incredibly low. The sum it is not, we suppose, etiquette to mention in these columns, but we may say that it does not much exceed the conventional price charged for a three-volume novel.

The Fables of La Fontaine. Translated from the French. With Twenty-five Original Etchings, by A. Delierre. (Nimmo and Bain.)—The translation here republished, "after extensive and careful revision," is that which was published in Paris by Robert Thomson in the early part of this century. This translation has the recommendation of being sufficiently easy and readable. As we have not compared it with the original, we can say no more in its praise. The merits of the etchings wherewith it is illustrated are evident. The frontispiece is a fine rendering of La Fontaine's portrait, a face which seems to accord more with the humorous qualities which we find in his work, than with the tradition which ascribes to him an eccentricity of demeanour almost amounting to folly. Among the other etchings, we may notice "The Lark, her Young, and the Master of the Field," "The Waggoner Stuck in the Mud," and "The Woman and Secret," as particularly good.

Jack Archer. By G. A. Henty. (Sampson Low and Co.)—This is a very lively tale. After some preliminary adventures, our heroes land in the Crimea, and go through the battles of the Alma and of Inkerman. So far, we follow the track of history. Then they are taken prisoners, and pass through a series of surprising adventures, hair-breadth escapes, and the like, in the course of which they contrive to do some good service for right against wrong. There is, of course, a thread of love-making that runs through the story. Of this, it may suffice to say that we wish that all lieutenants in her Majesty's Navy that deserve such good-fortune as fell to the share of Jack Archer, may get it. The tale, generally, is up to the high average of merit which Mr. Henty contrives to maintain.

A Christmas Pudding for Young Eaters. By L. C. Skey. (Griffith and Farran.)—There are various tales, some of the fanciful, some of the real kind in this book. "The Kettle and the Pot" is a fairly successful imitation of Hans Christian Andersen. In the "Crown of Roses" the fairy machinery is used, but hardly with so good a result. But Mrs. Skey always writes gracefully, and with the best of purposes.

The Way of the Cross, and Other Tales. By Emily S. Holt. (J. F. Shaw and Co.)—Here we have three tales of early Christian days. The first has to do with the kinsmen of Our Lord who were accused before Domitian. But is it true that only one of them was persecuted, after the Emperor had dismissed the charge? Miss Holt may be right when she says that the "outlines of the tale are historically true," and we shall be glad to have the reference.

Only a Girl: a Tale of Brittany. Adapted from the French by C. A. Jones. (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.)—This is a pathetic story of the Breton maiden, Françoise Dano. We find her an orphan in the first chapter, and leave her in the last solitary, with her hopes of happiness disappointed, yet not unhappy, because her heart is wholly given to caring for others. Miss Jones has not only made a good choice, but done her task well.

Strawberry Hill. By Clara Vance. (Gemmell, Edinburgh.)—This is a story of a decidedly religious kind, not wholly to our taste, but certainly well intentioned.

Peter Parley's Annual (Ben George) is, as we have before taken occasion to explain, a real annual, as that word used to be understood, and not the collected issue of a magazine that has been published throughout the year. It is, therefore, interesting as a survival; apart from this, it has merits which should ensure its continuance.

School-girls all the World Over. Par E. Berthet. (Routledge and Sons.)—It is by something of an effort of imagination that these sketches are styled sketches of "school-girls." Daphne, the Greek girl, and Izanani, a young lady of Japan, do indeed learn something, though their education is mixed up with plenty of adventure. Emma, "the little Hawaiian," may also claim the title; but the Montenegrin and the negress and the Mexican have little or nothing to do with education. The book, which apparently comes from a French source, is, perhaps, not the less amusing that it does not answer very closely to its title. The illustrations are particularly spirited.

Spanish Ways and Byeways. By W. Howe Downes. (Cupples, Upham, and Co., Boston, U.S.; Trübner and Co., London.)—This is a volume of slight, pleasant sketches of travel, just touched with humour of the quietest sort. Of humour, indeed, the Americans have in perfection the two extremes, the most extravagant and the most restrained. Here we have a graceful specimen of the latter. Exactly in keeping with the text are the illustrations. Quaint corners of Spanish towns, little glimpses of scenery, characteristic figures and bits of costume, are the subjects, almost all of them showing a skilful and tasteful touch.

Catalogue of the Fine-Art Department: New-England Manufacturers and Mechanics' Institutes. (Cupples, Upham, and Co., Boston, U.S.; Trübner and Co., London.)—This "catalogue," as it is called, is really a valuable work of art. After the list of "exhibits," numbering in all between seven and eight hundred, comes a series of sixty illustrations, reproduced from the originals by the various processes of etching, albert-type, and photo-engraving. Singularly effective many of these are, the landscapes perhaps bearing the palm, as they are by far the most numerous, though there are some fine figure pieces, too, as "Chloe and Sam," from the Thomas B. Clarke collection. Essays on "Various Phases of American Art" follow the illustrations. The first, on "American Wood Engraving," touches a subject about which there is a good deal of difference, and on which we are glad to get some information at first hand. Mr. Charles de Kay takes a very hopeful view of the future of American art, and Mr. L. C. Knight pronounces a condemnation, in which he is, we believe, joined by the large majority of American artists, on the Art tariff. The present rate is 30 per cent., ad valorem. This makes a serious addition when the price amounts, as in a recent purchase of a Rembrandt, to five thousand guineas. (It would be £1,575.) As a "substitute," a proportional per-centage, decreasing according to the value of the work," seems the best; but with a plethoric treasury, why not abolish it altogether?

It is difficult to give an idea of the varied contents of L'Art, Neuvième Année, Tome III. (Remington), but we may mention as specially noteworthy among them M. Emile Michel's two articles on "Rubens in the Munich Museum," with the fine etching, "Portrait d'un Savant," by M. Daniel Mordant, that accompanies the first; the reproductions of the relief of Luca della Robbia in the Campanile of Giotto, and the tomb of Benozzo, Bishop of Florence; M. Lenormant's article on ancient numismatics, with its very admirable representations of the coins described. The etchings generally are admirable, especially the portrait after Franz Hals by M. Courty, and two scenes at Marseilles (the new Cathedral, the entrance to the old harbour), by M. Maxime Lalaune. The excellence of L'Art is all the more praiseworthy because it is a weekly journal.

Prayers and Meditations for the Holy Communion. By Josephine Fletcher. With a Preface by C. J. Ellicott, D.D., Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol. New edition. (Rivingtons.)—This is not the kind of book which it is possible to criticise. Indeed, a criticism of devotional books is hardly within the literary province. But it is one which the present writer can honestly say that he has found full of the spirit of true devotion, and animated by a certain rare depth and freshness of feeling, which the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol has quite rightly described in his short preface.

The Young Zemindar. By Horatio Bickerstaffe Rowney. 3 vols. (Remington and Co.)—The "young Zemindar" is led by a fakir or dervish—we feel rather hazy as to his precise status—to join in a rising against the British Government. The rising fails, as might be expected; and the associates renew the attempt elsewhere, with the like result. In the end, they come to the conclusion that the British rule, if it is not perfect, is better than any that they see in the present elsewhere, or can anticipate as likely to be established in the future. The lesson is not learnt without passing through many adventures, through which the reader would follow the heroes of the story more easily, if the way were not so beset with obstacles in the shape of Hindoostanee words. Interspersed are some tales of Rákshasis (Anglice, vampires), and the like, which do something to enliven the narrative. The novel is not very cleverly constructed, and would be greatly improved by compression; but there is a certain freshness about it, and it is, anyhow, a relief from the tedious fictions of society which crowd our shelves.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1883, by Henry Hobhouse, M.A. (Maxwell and Son), is a full account and explanation of the Act of last Session. Mr. Hobhouse has given an introduction and notes, and has illustrated the provisions by reference to former Acts.

A New Commercial Map of the United States and Canada (Rand, McNally, and Co., Chicago), is of proportions suited to the continent of which it figures a part. We have not seen anything like it before. The best maps of our ordinary atlases are dwarfed by it. It is clearly printed too, on tough paper, is of really pocket size, and with its binding weighs little more than four ounces.

The Post-Office London Directory for 1884. (Kelly and Co.)—This admirably compiled business, Court, and official directory has now reached its eighty-fifth annual issue, and the area of the metropolis with which the present edition deals extends from the western boundaries of Kensington and Chelsea in the west, to Bow, Blackwall, and Cubitt Town in the east, being a distance of about nine and a half miles, and from Highbury and Holloway in the north, to Kennington, Walworth, and Deptford in the south, being a distance of about six miles. The extra information relates to 51 new streets, 19 of which have been renamed, and 34 renumbered; to 173 "new trades;" and particulars anent parcels carriage and delivery. From the commercial and business point of view, the compilation seems to be perfect. The maps for London, the suburbs, and the six home counties can be had together or separately, on paper or mounted on linen. The Directory can also be had bound in two volumes at a small extra cost.

Fulcher's Pocket-Book. (A. Pratt, Sudbury.)—We have received this, the oldest, we believe, of all the country pocket-books. It is full of engravings, sometimes very good; of poetry, for which we can say but little, though here and there we find a pretty verse; and of enigmas and double acrostics, of mixed merit. We do not quite understand the attraction of such publications, but they must possess some, or they would not appear so steadily year after year through long lives. There are families in Suffolk which possess entire shelves full of Fulcher's Pocket-Book.

Messrs. De La Rue and Co. have published a number of pretty Christmas and New Year's Cards, of which the landscapes seem to us much the most attractive.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE Black Flags, having been defeated in the stockaded villages round Sontay, evacuated the citadel on the 16th, and on the 17th Admiral Courbet took possession of the fortress. No further progress is reported, nor is it known whether he will next attack Hong Hoa, as is most probable, or will proceed at once against Bac Ninh. It is reported that he lost 1,000 men in the original assault, but that the numbers originally given were those of Frenchmen, the Admiral either caring nothing for his native allies, or, as is more probable, regarding them as soldiers of Anam, for whom he was not responsible. The Marquis Tseng has not demanded his passports, but is awaiting in England instructions from Peking, where a summons has been issued to the Grand Council, consisting of the Imperial Princes and other notables. They may advocate war, but it is more probable that they will advise a determined resistance, without any formal declaration of hostilities. In that event, the French Government will endeavour, through the Fleet, to seize some "material guarantee," possibly Canton, but possibly also the island of Hainan, without which their control of the Tonquin river system must be incomplete. Hainan, which is as large as Wales, and healthy, would then be their great maritime station. This is the probable origin of the preposterous reports that Hainan is to be ceded to the English.

Rumours have been in circulation all the week that the Mahdi is advancing on Khartoum, but they are wholly unverified. The only European correspondent there, however, the one who telegraphs to the Times, reports that steamers close to the town have been fired at, and it is probable that the disaffected friends of the Mahdi are closing in on the city. The garrison has been reinforced by 1,300 Egyptian soldiers from Fashoda; but there is no evidence that they will fight, and the outlook is very gloomy. If Khartoum falls, the agitation in Egypt will increase, and it is already great enough to paralyse the Egyptian Government, which declares that without foreign assistance it cannot cope with the Mahdi. The rumours of the Khedive's intention to abdicate increase in frequency, and the European officials complain that they can get nothing done. The truth seems to be that the Pashas, Tewfik included, want to reconquer the Soudan, and are sulky because they see no way to do it. If left alone, they would suspend dividends, and use the money to buy the Arab chiefs; and this being forbidden, they are powerless. They have, according to the Standard's correspondent, discovered that Zebehr Pasha, the slave-dealer whom they had appointed Governor-General, has sent away his wife; and suspecting treachery, they have arrested him, only to release him again. That is all in the regular way of an Asiatic Government, when it finds its Head incompetent, and cannot choose another.

Note, as a remarkable indication of the swing in opinion about Egypt, that the Pall Mall Gazette, which has been consistently forward in urging evacuation, now admits that it may be indispensable for the British Government to govern Egypt Proper directly for a time. The Egyptian Government is paralysed, our contemporary says, by fear of the Mahdi, and will either expend its whole resources in an effort to reconquer the Soudan, or, if we forbid that course, will "strike," and leave us to govern Egypt as we may. That is very probable, and we shall be fortunate if we escape a rising as an accompaniment of the strike, but we are a little surprised to see that the Pall Mall regards the contingency without alarm. Does it really imagine that if we take the control, and give Egypt sound finance, civil order, and a new tenure—the very first things we must do—we shall throw all into disorder again by retiring? The Pall Mall is as likely to make "pie" of its columns after they have been set up, and before printing them. We have, however, if the Khedive abdicates, one alternative,—the appointment of an able Regent during his son's minority. It is a bad one, but it is there.

Mr. Cowen made a very eloquent and elaborate speech to his Newcastle constituents this day week. He declared that we ought never to have gone to Egypt, but that having gone, we could never retire, whether it were a false prophet, or any other cause which constituted the excuse for our remaining. Mr. Cobbett once offered to be roasted on a gridiron, if Mr. Spring Rice's financial predictions should be fulfilled. Had he been alive now, he might with still greater safety have offered to be roasted on a gridiron, if our dominant influence were ever withdrawn from Egypt. Mr. Cowen predicted a collision between Austria (backed by Germany) and Russia in the Balkan peninsula, and appeared to think it not far off. As regards South Africa, he taunted the Government with falling between two stools by vacillating between giving up the Transvaal and not giving it up, and declared that we must at least protect our native allies, and prevent them from being "robbed and ruined by pious, slave-driving Boers."

Passing to home policy, Mr. Cowen dilated on the miserable failure in Ireland, and declared that nothing but Home-rule would mend the mischief there. He asserted that the English people were, as Gpethe called them, "practical, but pedantic,"—i.e., that they understood money matters, but were otherwise governed by "phrases," and that one of the phrases which had excited their terror was "Home-rule." Nevertheless, the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands and almost all our Colonies had Home-rule, and were all the more loyal for it. Ireland, too, would be all the more loyal for it. And so, we suppose, would Wales and Cornwall. On the subject of Reform, Mr. Cowen spoke very sensibly. He did not like the working of the present minority principle, but he thought some care should be taken to secure the proportional representation in the House of different sections of opinion; and he suggested the division of the counties into many more divisions with one Member each, and the division of the great boroughs into sections, such as those of London, as a step in the right direction. In a very eloquent peroration, he called on the working-class to show a life and political conviction of its own, and not to follow slavishly in the steps of the richer classes.

On Saturday last, a deputation from the Liberal working-men of Derby waited on Mr. Gladstone at Hawarden Castle to present to him a dessert service of Derby china, specially designed for him, as a commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of his first election to Parliament, and as a recognition of his long and arduous career of public work. The deputation, consisting of twenty working-men, was introduced to the Prime Minister by Sir William Harcourt, M.P. for Derby, who was staying at the Castle, and they then presented the beautiful dessert service, each dish and plate being adorned with some landscape from the scenery of the Peak, or one of the famous old castles, of exquisite workmanship. Mr. Gladstone, in thanking the deputation for the gift, remarked that Derby and Worcester had been the first English towns to put the manufacture of fine porcelain on the right basis of completely self-supporting production, all the previous English manufacturers of porcelain having been more or less dependent on Crown grants-in-aid. In reference to politics, Mr. Gladstone intimated that the time was close at hand when the Cabinet would solicit her Majesty's permission to lay their proposals as to the franchise before Parliament. The previous grants of an extended franchise, he said, had been made in the spirit of men who had to take physic, and who took as little of it as they could help. Now, they could extend the franchise in the spirit of men who knew that they were taking food, and not physic,—food that would bring health and strength to the constitutions.

The Times on Thursday published a telegram from its Calcutta correspondent stating that Lord Ripon contemplated the "disestablishment" of the English Church in India. "This policy," he added, "if persisted in, is sure to give rise to an agitation equal to that about the Ilbert Bill, and the fact of its being entrusted to a Roman Catholic Viceroy will add fuel to the flames." This statement is almost nonsensical, for the Church is not established in India, though there are a few Chaplains and four or five Bishops paid by the State, just as the doctors and medical Directors are, for the benefit of their own soldiers and servants. A few Chaplains are, however, sent to large civil stations, though nominally borne on the Army rolls, and the expediency of doing this and of paying Bishops out of native taxes has been discussed for half a century. On the same day an official denial of the story was published in Calcutta, from which it appears that though the India Office at home did recently reopen the question, no decision even as to general principles was arrived at, or is likely to be arrived at soon. The Europeans in India rather like the present system, which exempts them from demands for the payment of preachers; but as there must be military chaplains, and there are plenty of missionaries, they care very little about it, and will certainly not agitate for its continuance.

M. Bocher, the "business man" of the Orleans family, and a Senator, is supposed to be the shrewdest man in France, but he is not always wise. On Wednesday, he induced the Royalists to agree to pass the Estimates en bloc and in silence, alleging that the Senate had not been allowed time for serious discussion, and that he would not mislead the country by a semblance of debate. There is pettishness in a resolution of that kind, as the Senate could have discussed any items it found especially objectionable. It did, indeed, replace the salary of the Archbishop of Paris in the Estimates. The only result will be that the Ministry of Finance, which would be delighted if its Budget were never debated at all, will have a motive the less for urging the Estimates through the Chamber. The Senate could, we imagine, do as the Chamber under M. Gambetta once did, and accept the Budget up to a fixed date and provisionally.

An extraordinary official project was brought forward on Thursday in the French Chamber. The French do not settle in Algeria fast enough, and the Government accordingly desires to settle there some 25,000 vine-growers, who have been ruined by the phylloxera. To effect this purpose, it asks for 50,000,000*f.*, and proposes to take away a quantity of land from Arab proprietors, and give it to French settlers, either without compensation, or with a very low one. M. Terman, the Governor of Algeria, specially stated in the debate that no Arab would be "entirely expropriated," and that the value of the land remaining to each proprietor would be so enhanced that he would gain, not lose by the scheme. M. Picard, too, who resisted the Bill, based his argument on the necessity of respecting Arab property, which he clearly believed was being taken away. If it is remembered that the Algerians own and value their estates just as Englishmen do, that they detest the near neighbourhood of the colonists, and that their agriculture is quite as good as that of Frenchmen on a new soil, the nature of this proposal will be understood. And then the French are shocked because their Arab subjects break into rebellion, whenever they see a chance!

The Berlin Correspondent of the Times states that Herr von Stosch, the late Minister of Marine, was suffered to resign because his new ironclads, upon which part of the French Indemnity was spent, were found unfit for service. The new Minister, General von Caprivi, has inquired into the matter, and it is found that a new double-screw gunboat built at Elbing could not move beyond Kiel, that the ironclad corvette 'Hansa' is about twice as slow as a trading steamer, and that five ironclad corvettes of a new type, intended for Baltic service, and thirteen ironclad gunboats of 1,100 tons each, are almost entirely worthless. The German Navy, moreover, possesses no corvette which makes more than fourteen knots an hour, and no torpedo-boat making more than sixteen, though other nations possess boats making twenty. These statements have all been made in the Frankfurter Zeitung, and are, it is affirmed, substantially accurate, the root of the mischief being the determination of the Department to borrow and buy nothing from other countries, and to make its dockyards self-contained. The oddity of the matter is that Germans are excellent sailors, and their commercial marine ranks next after that of England. The merchants, it is true, do not entrust the control of their building-yards to a General of Infantry; but then, it is to be presumed, he has skilled professionals under him.

Sir Charles Dilke, it is stated, intends very shortly to put the tenant clauses of the Sanitary Act of 1866 in force over the whole of London. The nuisance authority of the district may then place the whole of the lodging-houses within it under inspection, compel cleansing and white-washing, limit the number of lodgers, and enforce some strict regulations for the separation of the sexes. Hitherto this Act has remained partially inoperative, from the reluctance of the local authorities to apply for permission to put it in force; but the Local Government Board, emboldened by the growth of public opinion, has now acted over their heads. We fear the number of Inspectors must be increased; but the Act, if severely worked, will prevent the worst instances of overcrowding.

Mr. J. Henniker Heaton forwards from Sydney a complete account of the resources of which an Australian Dominion would dispose. The seven Colonies now own 3,000,000 square miles of territory, or three times the surface of Europe west of the Vistula, inhabited by 2,936,000 persons of European descent. These three millions have placed 7,128,000 acres under tillage, in addition, of course, to their grass land; and own 1,219,000 horses, 8,429,000 cattle, and 78,493,000 sheep. They have a trade of £114,000, and a revenue of £21,911,000 a year; and although their Debt exceeds £99,000,000, the State Railways are valued at more than this sum. They have placed £62,000,000 sterling in Australian Banks as fixed deposits bearing interest, and exclusive, therefore, of current accounts; and they spend 12 per cent. of their entire revenue, heavy as the taxation is, upon public education. In a very few years, probably before 1900, the Dominion will be a powerful State of 5,000,000 of people, with a practically limitless territory for settlement, with a revenue of £35,000,000, and the power of training a permanent militia force of 150,000 men, by drilling only the young men from nineteen to twenty-two. Such a State, so isolated, will dominate the South Pacific, whatever Europe, or even America, may have to say to the contrary.

The final Report on the Census of Bengal, taken in 1881, gives a remarkable picture of the only province in India where the British Government might possibly be elected by a plébiscite. The Lieutenant-Governorship is nearly as large as France, or 193,000 square miles; and contains double her population, or 69,500,000 souls. The average density of population is 371.41 to the square mile, and the rate of increase is within a fraction of 11 per 1,000 per annum. Of the total, 45,000,000 are Hindoos, 21,500,000 Mahomedans, 135,000 Christians, and a little above that number Buddhists, while most of the remainder profess various savage creeds. Polygamy, though allowed by law to all but Christians, is in practice extremely rare, the number of persons with more than one wife being only 2 per 1,000. Out of every 1,000 persons, 955 are altogether illiterate, and only 29 can both read and write, the average of illiteracy being of course swelled by the nearly complete ignorance of the women, of whom only 16 in 10,000 can read and write. Natives who cannot read are not necessarily as ignorant as Europeans in the same position, but the figures strongly support the arguments of those who think that the whole strength of the Education Department should, for a generation at least, be devoted to primary vernacular instruction. The return, too, throws great light upon the supposed influence of the Native Press, which cannot greatly affect a population unable to read. It would not take much money to start a school for reading and writing only in every village, nor do we believe natives would object to a compulsory law of attendance for boys.

Those who were at all startled by Mr. Parnell's declaration that Mr. Tuke's Irish emigrants were, for the most part, languishing in dreary attics in the great American cities, should read Mr. Tuke's interesting letter to Monday's Times, with its ample store of evidence that success had attended the steps of all those of whom news had been received. The Bishop of St. Paul, Minnesota, writes in the most gratifying terms of the emigrants sent thither; Mr. Howard Hodgkin and Captain Rutledge-Fair, who have just returned from a visit of inspection in Canada, were perfectly satisfied with the prospects of the Canadian emigrants, which they had carefully investigated; while of the prosperity of the emigrants to the United States,—two-thirds of the whole,—the many letters and remittances received from them in Ireland are the best evidences. Mr. Tuke himself, the soberest of philanthropists, is perfectly satisfied not only that the experiment has succeeded admirably, but that the people in the West of Ireland are well aware of its success, and are eager for the chance of following where so many of their friends have already entered on the path to prosperity. Mr. Parnell probably only desires to hear of the cases where, from one cause or another, the experiment has not been fruitful of good. And amongst 5,400 emigrants, some such there must be.

It is stated that two new dioceses are shortly to be made. The sum has been raised which was fixed by the recent Act of Parliament as the minimum for the endowment of the See of Southwell, broken off from the diocese of Lincoln. And now it is confidently said that the Government mean in the ensuing Session to divide the See of Bristol from that of Gloucester, including within the new diocese North Somerset. It is conjectured that the new bishop may be called the Bishop of Bristol and Bath, and that as his diocese would relieve the diocese of Wells of much of its present area, the Bishop of Wells might have Dorsetshire added to his diocese, and might be entitled the Bishop of Wells and Sherborne; in which case, Berkshire might be given back to the diocese of Salisbury, in lieu of Dorsetshire, which is now contained in it. These are at present only speculations, but if Bristol is to be erected into a new diocese, there is little doubt that there would be some parings and interchanges of districts, to lighten the burdens of other Sees.

Sunday was brilliant with one of those wonderful sunset skies,—Sunday's was golden, with a gold such as Cuyper himself never painted,—which have been the glory of the late autumn; but since Sunday, the neighbourhood of London at least has been wrapped in a cold and deathlike mist. A dank and a darker Christmas has seldom been known, almost more oppressively dank than dark. But the gloom has been all the more felt for the magnificent dawns and sunsets which had preceded this grim season of festivity. During most of the week the shops have been shut, and London looking as ghastly as a mighty city with nothing to do, and a murky wet-blanket wrapped round it, can manage to look; its streets, on the whole, empty; its cheerfullest lights—those of the shop-windows—extinguished; its bustle silenced, and its dreary passengers hesitating whether to put up umbrellas, or to absorb patiently the passive moisture which hardly amounted to a drip.

Mr. Holloway, one of the now not inconsiderable number of millionaires, died on Wednesday, in his eighty-fourth year, with a fortune variously stated at from two to five millions sterling, but more probably,—at least if we count in it what he has spent on his Surrey lunatic asylum and his ladies' college,—approaching to the latter sum. Only the basis of his fortune was made by selling the famous pills and ointment. Mr. Holloway was a shrewd investor, and seemed almost unable to fail in selecting a profitable investment. During the last ten years of his life he had been endeavouring to spend his great fortune beneficently, by building near Virginia-Water Station a great asylum for curable lunatics,—who are, we believe, only to remain there for a limited period,—and by building near Egham a vast ladies' college, containing upwards of 1,000 rooms, which he is also said to have endowed handsomely. It will, however, need an exceedingly handsome endowment, if it is to succeed at a distance of twenty miles from London, and a much greater distance from either Oxford or Cambridge, for the teachers must be first-rate, and must be paid far more than the fees would pay them. In the neighbourhood of Oxford or Cambridge, such a building would have been a great success. Where it is, its success will probably depend on its endowment. Of Mr. Holloway's benevolent intentions there is no doubt, and though we have made elsewhere some unfavourable criticisms on the original source of his great fortune, we do not wish it to be doubted for a moment that we heartily respect the motive which impelled him to execute the works of his declining years.

The Dean of St. Paul's should publish his Christmas-Day sermon. The Times of Wednesday gives just enough of a sketch of it to make us desire to read the whole, not enough to satisfy that desire. It seems to have been a sermon contrasting the ideals,—often very high,—by which men measured themselves before the time of Christ, with that realised ideal of human life in the closest possible union with the Source of all life, by which they have measured themselves ever since. He showed how much of the moral ideal of the ancient world was lavished on loyalty to the State, the public life of men,—how little of it was expended in loyalty to even such divine beings as were recognised by the ancient philosophers, who thought of man as being his own ideal quite outside the sphere of the divine. All this was altered by the Christian revelation, and no doubt the State lost the ideal light which was then first transferred to God, and to man as transformed by God. But every one who knows how the Dean of St. Paul's treats subjects of this kind would like to see his treatment of the Greek and Roman ideal of life, no less than of the Buddhist and the Christian ideal, which he contrasted with it.

We cannot conceive why so much fun is poked at the Society for Psychical Research (14 Dean's Yard, S.W.), for asking these very business-like questions on the subject of hallucinations and dreams:—"1. Hallucinations.—Have you ever, when in good health and completely awake, had a vivid impression of seeing, or being touched by, a human being, or of hearing a voice or sound which suggested a human presence, when no one was there? 2. Dreams.—Can you recall that you have ever, in the course of the last ten years, had a dream of the death of some person known to you (about whom you were not anxious at the time), which dream you marked as an exceptionally vivid one, and of which the distressing impression lasted for as long as an hour after you rose in the morning?" The object is, of course, to get some light on the question whether or not prophetic dreams of more than usual impressiveness which are afterwards fulfilled, or hallucinations suggesting the presence of distant people, when they do occur, may properly be explained as coincidence, or not. If they can be explained as coincidence, there ought to be a vast number of such impressive dreams and startling hallucinations occurring in common life, as Coleridge used to say that he could assert to have occurred in his life, but without further significance and without deserving to be specially noted. The present writer could answer both questions in the negative, even without the qualification as to health,—excepting only as regards one period of delirium, during a typhoid fever,—and we fancy that the great majority of Englishmen and Englishwomen would answer them in the same manner.

Sir Theodore Martin shows more zeal than wisdom in his controversy with Mrs. Hardcastle as to the late Lord Lyndhurst's social attitude towards Lord Campbell. In his letter to the Times of this day week, he denies that anything but the most formal visits were exchanged between them. Yesterday Mrs. Hardcastle published the letter to which she had referred, which certainly shows that in 1854, at least, Lord Lyndhurst treated Lord Campbell with cordial familiarity, and invited his visits as a friend, not as a legal colleague. Indeed, we hardly understand Sir Theodore Martin's zeal for his own side of the great cause of Lyndhurst v. Campbell, unless, indeed, it be the zeal of an ardent Conservative for a brilliant quondam chief.

TOPICS OF THE DAY.

MR. COWEN.

IN the eloquent and effective speech which Mr. Cowen delivered at Newcastle-on-Tyne this day week, he reproached Englishmen with their "pedantry," remarking that it is the note of pedantry to be controlled by phrases, rather than by the realities which the phrases denote. His illustration of English pedantry was not, however, very fortunate. He adduced Englishmen's dislike to "Home-rule" in Ireland as an instance of being afraid of the name, not the thing; asserting that since the Isle of Man has Home-rule under another name, and the Channel Islands have Home-rule under another name, and since so many of our Colonies have Home-rule under another name, we cannot be afraid of the thing "Home-rule," though we are so terribly afraid of the name. We should say that Mr. Cowen's illustrations upset his own case. Every Englishman knows that "the House of Keys" is home-rule for the Isle of Man, and he is not afraid of it. Every Englishman knows that we do not legislate for the Channel Islands in Parliament, and no one is afraid of leaving them to provide for their own needs. Every Englishman knows that the Parliament of the Dominion and the Parliament of Victoria do for Canada and for that part of Australia, just what our Parliament does for us, and that the consequences are beneficial, not injurious. There is no kind of excuse for saying that we disguise from ourselves what we dislike in such cases, by giving it a misleading name. On the contrary, the proper inference from the facts named obviously is that there is something either in the smallness of the islands and the petty scale of their resources, or in the great distance of the Colonies from England, which renders Home-rule in the cases referred to innocuous, though it would not be innocuous in a substantial portion of so small a kingdom as our own. If we permit it—not only without the least attempt to hide the thing under a false name, but in the case of our Colonies at least, with the most emphatic assertion of the real significance of the freedom we confer—it seems obvious enough that it is not the name of Irish Home-rule that we dread, but the reality. And so, as Mr. Cowen should know very well, it certainly is. It is he who is misled by the apparent innocence of the name. It is he who does not see that to give up Imperial control of so large a part of the focus of our Empire, might be both to strengthen and to arm a powerful enemy at the very heart of that Empire. "Home-rule" is a mild phrase enough. But it is Mr. Cowen, not England, who is beguiled by the phrase. Home-rule for Ireland means antagonism between England and Ireland in finance, in commerce, in education, in general policy, and in foreign policy, and this in a next-door neighbour who, if she were organised for that purpose, would be always strong enough to embarrass and paralyse us. Surely the man who sees nothing dangerous in this, because he hides it under the mild phrase, "Home-rule," is much more obviously controlled by phrases than the English people, who see great danger in such a course?

And evidently Mr. Cowen's imagination is one as powerfully moved and as frequently controlled by phrases, as that of any Member of the House of Commons. His eloquent speech in the House, delivered in 1876, against conferring on the Queen the title of "Empress of India," was a speech founded on the assumption that phrases have a vast influence in determining policy, and was a most impressive speech from that point of view. Indeed, no man with an imagination will deny that phrases are often very potent in politics, just as no man with a really strong imagination will hesitate to grapple boldly with misleading phrases, rather than let them triumph over him. Mr. Cowen argued in the famous speech of 1876 that the greater of two names applied to the same thing had a knack of swallowing the smaller; that Charles V. is always spoken of in history as "the Emperor," though in Spain he was only King; that the Duke of Argyll is not even known in this country as Baron Sundridge, though he sits in the House of Lords under that title; and that Englishmen who should be told that in India they were under an Empress, while in England they were under a Queen, would soon come to merge the Queen in the Empress, and probably to merge the constitutional Queen in a very unconstitutional Empress. That is a serious danger, no doubt, which it was a duty to point out; it was a danger to which Lord Lytton fell a victim; but to Mr. Cowen it probably represented a danger even more serious than it really was,—for it is certain that his imagination, which is lively, is far more effectually swayed by phrases than that of the average and stolid Englishman. The very name of Russia, for instance, startles him into a sort of semi-superstitious recoil. "As the sea saps the shore," says Mr. Cowen, in this last speech, "so Russia undermines the surrounding territory, till it trembles under her control." And he is so persuaded of this, that he will not even recognise the progress of Bulgaria and Eastern Roumelia, which have gained their comparative freedom through Russian intervention, but prophesies gloomily that their independence must disappear, either before Russia, or before the power of Austria with Germany behind her, if the mighty conflict with Russia which he predicts should end in her defeat. The name "Home-rule," which so dominates and beguiles his imagination in one context, loses all its charm for him when it comes to be confronted with the more potent name of Russia, and Mr. Cowen has nothing to hope for the States of the Balkans but a ruin even more complete than that inflicted on them by the Turk. So, too, when he comes to discuss the methods of Parliamentary procedure, the phrase "closure" has a more malignant sorcery in it, to his imagination, than even the phrase "Empress" as applied to the ruler of India. He cannot see that the power of closure is nothing in the world but the power which every well-organised public meeting exerts with the utmost coolness and advantage to itself, and he recoils from it as a bird recoils from the glittering eye of the snake. For a protestor against the superstitious belief in phrases, Mr. Cowen certainly shows a strangely keen and sensitive respect for phrases; indeed we doubt whether any man in the House of Commons is more beguiled by phrases than Mr. Cowen.

No doubt, this is not unnatural in an orator of so much fire as Mr. Cowen. Very few Members of the House of Commons are happier in the manner and the mode of their oratory than the Member for Newcastle with that northern burr of his, of which he makes so effective a use, and which he can drop so completely when he will. Such a man is naturally a great inventor of phrases, which, perhaps, accounts for the impression they produce on the fond imagination which invented them. In his skilful phrase-mongering he resembles the late Lord Beaconsfield. The "semi-Mongol Czardom" is his epithet for the Power he most dreads. "It may be next year, or ten years hence, but as sure as death, as steady as time, the hour approaches when the lowering tempest will burst, and the semi-Mongol Czardom be driven to make its last throw for its long-coveted prize. The stake is a heavy one; the struggle will be supreme; the avenging angel will blot from his record the inarticulate wrongs of centuries with something less tender than a tear." That is a passage quite after Mr. Disraeli's own heart, but spoken with more of fanatic conviction than ever Mr. Disraeli could have displayed. Mr. Cowen's ears are charmed by his own sweet music. He is himself misled by the phrases which he has been happy enough to invent. Mr. Disraeli hardly was; he used them as glittering coin to fascinate other men's imagination, but hardly as having really fascinated his own. Mr. Cowen's plea for the House of Lords, as against a real revising Chamber like the Senate of the United States,—the plea that we might set up something much more formidable than the House of Lords: "We have now got an anachronism, we might get a master,"—is an antithesis closely resembling those of Mr. Disraeli; but it means more in Mr. Cowen's mouth than it would have meant in Mr. Disraeli's. Mr. Cowen is as much exalted as Scott's Last Minstrel by the power of his own excellent harping. He at least convinces himself by his speeches,—which Mr. Disraeli probably never did.

Mr. Cowen is often spoken of as a false Liberal, and certainly his political veerings and shiftings have been numerous and perplexing. He came into Parliament as a strong supporter of the policy of non-intervention; but he soon became, and has more or less continued, the apologist of the Afghan War and of the pro-Turkish diplomacy of Lord Beaconsfield. That, however, is fairly accounted for by his dread of Russia, a Power to which he has never seriously applied his doctrine of non-intervention. Even his marked sympathy with the Irish Obstructionists, with the Tory Obstructionists, with almost all the Obstructionists of the Liberal Government, and his dislike and depreciation of Liberal legislation generally, especially of any legislation which seems to him in any sense "grandmotherly," appears to us to arise not in the least from treachery, but from genuine sympathy with laissez-faire in all matters except the evil sorcery wrought by the Russian Spectre. For our own part, we believe that Mr. Cowen has really a much deeper regard than he has ever avowed for the policy of laissez-faire, on condition, of course, that you do not apply that maxim to the evil principle, "the semi-Mongol Czardom." So far as a sensitive and ardent rhetorician can be consistent, Mr. Cowen is fairly consistent in his dislike of strengthening Governments, and his wish to see the individual protected against the aggressiveness of either a philanthropic or a selfish Government. If he favours the Tories more than the Liberals—as he certainly does—it is because the Tories are very apt to oppose most of the philanthropic legislation of the Liberals, and because the Tories are traditionally opposed to the influence of Russia. He never supports the Tories in a policy of coercion; and he would not, we think, support the Tories in a policy of benevolent despotism. He sympathises with Mr. Herbert Spencer's dread of the growing prerogatives of democratic Governments, and as those prerogatives are apt to grow much faster in Liberal hands than in Tory hands, he appears to make much more dangerous war against the Liberals than he makes against the Tories. But if ever a "Tory democracy" initiated a strong home policy in Great Britain, we imagine that Mr. Cowen's geniality towards the Tories would vanish. He distrusts all Government, and Russia chiefly as representing the incarnate principle of absolute Government. His latent sympathy with Turkey is sympathy not with its baseness and predatoriness and corruption, but with its loose rein, its imbecile administration, its helpless diplomacy, its tendency to anarchy. A decent, or rather not indecent, slovenliness and indolence in the governing power, would probably best represent Mr. Cowen's political ideal.

On the whole, we should describe Mr. Cowen as a politician of fervid fancy, hardly rising to strong imagination, whose sympathies have early been excited by the victims of strong Government, and who has never had a sufficiently sound judgment to keep these sympathies within due bounds. A measure of his political judgment may be gathered from his description of Sir Edward Watkin as "one of the most far-seeing men I have met in my journey through life;" and without a political judgment, powers of speech and of fancy so great as Mr. Cowen's are edged tools, with which the politician oftener wounds his own fingers than the hands of his opponents. He is a politician of fervour, and even of passion. He can speak with some of the old dash and dignity, and we believe him to be sincere. But he is not a safe guide. He is betrayed by the Will-of-the-Wisp lights of his own fancy into political bogs and marshes, where no Government dare follow him without bringing on itself a speedy and certain ruin.

MR. BROADHURST'S PROPOSAL.

IT is impossible to predict what the House of Commons will do, but we do not think Mr. Broadhurst will receive the support for his Bill upon urban leaseholds, upon which he evidently calculates. It is true that the Bill is "popular," and that it has received the sanction of a few politicians of standing, but Members have never yet been compelled to think out its provisions. When they do, they will find that the Bill alters the tenure of house property much more radically than may be at first imagined. Mr. Broadhurst, according to his recent speech before the Dialectical Society, proposes, in a regular Bill, that any leaseholder of a house in a great city—or, it may be, in any city—shall have the right to inform his landlord that he wishes to buy the freehold. If the landlord consents, well and good,—the matter will be arranged by agreement; but if he does not, the lessee can summon him into the County Court, where a jury of five will assess the value of the house, and the Judge, upon receiving the money, will order delivery of the building. The amount of the money to be awarded is to be based upon the assumption that "a willing purchaser is dealing with a willing seller," and free competition, we imagine, is excluded.

There is no chance whatever of such a Bill passing the Lords; nor do we think that, upon reflection, it will be esteemed just in the Commons. In the first place, the Bill involves a direct injury to the landlord amounting to confiscation, in a way that Mr. Broadhurst—who intends, we do not doubt, to be quite fair—has not perceived. The freeholder cannot be restrained from using his freehold, and might at once destroy half the neighbouring property of his perfectly innocent landlord. Portland Place, for example, is certainly not a nuisance, nor are its houses unsafe dwellings for their very numerous occupants, the servants there being at least as healthy as any class of the community. Nevertheless, any man who had purchased there the remnant of a lease might secure the freehold, and turn his premises into a gin palace, a hall for the Salvation Army, or a grand butcher's shop. The immediate result would be a downfall of rents or premiums by one-third at least, through the whole length of the street; and the ladies of the Bentinck family, who now own the property—we mention this, because the "Dukes" who own so much of London are growing unpopular—would be fined, in the end, some quarter of a million, for honestly and obediently yielding to the law. Is that fair? Mr. Broadhurst clearly intends to include all kinds of houses, for he mentions fines for renewal amounting to thousands of pounds, as grievances; and, if all kinds of houses are affected, this kind of damage would be universal, and would, indeed, be deliberately organised so as to force reductions of price. Clearly, the owners of Portland Place are entitled either to sell their houses under restrictions as to their use, thus seriously qualifying the freehold; or to be compensated for probable injury to the remainder of their estate, a factor in the calculation which would make the scheme unworkable. Mr. Broadhurst may say that tenants should not be so fastidious, but, as a fact, they are; and he has no more right, except in the national interest, which we will discuss presently, to confiscate the fancy value of houses, than to confiscate diamonds because reasonable people think the market price of the bright stones not a little absurd. Seclusion is as much an element in the value of a house as a southern aspect, as Mr. Broadhurst will discover, if he will just ascertain the comparative value of houses in Wimpole Street and in Cavendish Square. It differs, space for space, by more than seventy per cent. We say nothing as yet of the unfairness of expropriating well-managed property, for if there is a national reason, that must be supreme; but the injustice of the proposed compensation is quite clear.

In the second place, why does Mr. Broadhurst limit his scheme so closely to urban leaseholders? Farm tenants want freeholds at least as much as householders, and have a better claim to them. The householder wears out the property merely by living in it, or if under covenants to repair, leaves it no better than it was when he began to occupy, but the good farmer constantly improves the soil. Why should he not claim to buy it, and then raise money on mortgage, thereby reducing his rent, yet leaving himself still most of the privileges of the freeholder? A case could be made out for Nottingham farmers far stronger than any to be made for the lessees of Portland Place, who are quite rich enough to take care of themselves; yet Mr. Broadhurst does not include them in the benefits of his Bill. Moreover, why does he stop at leaseholders? Tenants-at-will suffer quite as much as they do, and are less inclined to improve; yet he proposes greatly to increase their number. He will say that he does not mention them; but the first incidental effect of his Bill, if it becomes an Act, will be to manufacture tenants-at-will by the thousand. John Smith compels the Portland Estate to sell him No. 300 Portland Place, spends thousands in decorations, and then, his health failing, buys a place in South Devon. What is he to do with his house? If he sells it, he loses his improvements, for the buyer rich enough to buy freeholds wants to decorate for himself; while if he leases it, he may lose his house just when the leaseholder pleases. He will be compelled to find a tenant-at-will, who, being tenant-at-will, will not lay out one shilling he can help. Mr. Broadhurst does not want that, we know; but how can it be helped, when the half of well-to-do mankind want good houses, but are not rich enough to pay for them? They could be mortgaged, of course; but the experience of mankind shows that mortgaged properties are seldom improved, and that the interest on a mortgage is felt as a burden, which a rent is not. So far as the rich are concerned, Mr. Broadhurst would only shake the security of property, without ensuring additional happiness to anybody whatever. He thinks, indeed, he shall prevent the fines on renewals, which no doubt often create annoyance; but how will he do that, when the possibility of such fines must be the first element in his jurymen's calculation? Does he really mean to forbid the intrusion of such an element? If he does not, the price will be raised by the value of the right of fining; and if he does, he is proposing confiscation pure and simple.

Still, confiscation may conceivably be justified by national necessity, but where is the necessity in this case? Mr. Broadhurst contends that two millions of families will be enabled to own their houses, and his figures may possibly be right. But, not to mention that of his two millions a large section will not be able to buy their freeholds, what national good will be the result of their ownership? In the case of peasant-proprietors, we expect the new owners to cultivate much more carefully, and to be released from a control injurious to character; but the urban householder who pays his rent is under no control, and can get no more out of his house for the benefit of the country than he got as tenant. Indeed, he will get less. If there is one fact proved by experience, it is that little and poor landlords are the landlords whom it is most difficult to compel to improve. It is hard enough to ensure good drainage now, but if the Legislature were forced to compel two millions of working-men to rebuild their drains, the work would never be done. They would resist by force, or refuse to pay, and how could payment be insisted on? The wealthy position of London landlords is the national lever for securing improvements. Sir Charles Dilke mentions, as one of the great improvements he hopes for, that rates shall be divided between occupiers and owners; but if Stepney, say, is owned by its people, his improvement will be simply unmeaning. The workmen-owners of a street in Stepney neither could nor would do the great works which are essential, and which an owner of the whole street can and does, as regards internal drainage, do without resistance. Landlords on weekly wages are not the landlords for whom philanthropists are seeking. That properties which might be improved are often unpurchasable, and, therefore, neglected, is true; but then, that is because we impose such absurd limitations on freedom of contract. We prevent sales by our law of settlement. If every freeholder had power to sell, the ground would gradually be sold, if only to avoid proposals like Mr. Broadhurst's; and it is towards this change that our legislation tends, no doubt too slowly. At all events, let us try what freedom of contract, which hardly exists in London, will do for us, before we proceed to abolish it altogether. Does Mr. Broadhurst really not perceive that the day after his Bill passes leasehold tenure will be extinguished, for the landlord's interest will be tenancy-at-will, and the man who cannot afford to buy a freehold, though he could afford to pay a premium for a lease, will be forced to accept the landlord's terms?

THE CITY GUILDS' COMMISSION.

IN spite of the Lord Mayor's assertion that the Standard's article on the "City Guilds' Commission" was "purely imaginary" (by which latter term we may charitably suppose he meant "imaginative"), and that the "Report, when issued, would be much more moderate in tone and in substance than the highly-coloured article to which he had referred would lead one to suppose," we may feel pretty sure that the article in question had a substantial foundation. The Standard is not a Parisian paper. A London newspaper has too much to lose by the publication of inspired articles which turn out to be "wholly unauthentic" (in the ordinary, and not in the Salisbury sense), to care to risk its reputation for fact, for the sake of indulging in flights of fancy. The mind of the Commission may not be finally made up, but we are justified in assuming that our contemporary has given us a fair representation of its present state. Internal evidence seems to support this assumption. The recommendations hinted at are of the very mildest kind that could reasonably have been made. The right to acquire the freedom of the Companies either by patrimony or by purchase is to be put an end to, and the Livery thereby extinguished,—in process of time; but it is obvious that the process will take a very long time. The Halls of the Companies, valued by the Companies at something considerably under £50,000, seeing that £75,000 only "is assumed to represent halls, almshouses, schools, plate, furniture, and the value of a few livings," valued in the rate-books at £57,550, and valued by independent valuers at £150,000, are to be sold, and the whole property of the Companies vested in a Commission. But as, "the private rights of the existing members being admitted, they will have to be treated with that respect which Parliament usually extends to vested interests," it would seem that it will be a very long time before the sale of the Halls could take place, and the usufruct of the property be at the disposal of the proposed Commission.

But what really are the vested rights of the Liverymen in the three-quarters of a million of money which represent the present value of the Companies' property? In £200,000 of this property they have no rights at all, as it is trust property, and has already come under the general supervision of the Charity Commissioners. Of the rest, or what is called the Corporate property, we are told by Lord Selborne that the property of the Companies belongs to the members absolutely, and that they could legally sell it all, and divide it among themselves, if they so pleased. Lord Selborne gave his opinion as a Mercer, and not as Lord Chancellor; but still, it is not much use to struggle against the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, even when he is not speaking ex cathedra. But if such a right does exist, it is one which has only been gained by wrong. By obtaining charters from the Crown, the Companies made two admissions,—first, that the objects for which they were established could not be carried out without that sanction; and secondly, that their objects were public objects, and that they were public bodies. The crafts were incorporated for the purpose of making their position of regulation and guardianship more secure. They were given privileges in consideration of their performing certain duties to their trade and to the public. It is not to be supposed that the grantors of lands would have granted them in perpetuity, if they supposed that the actual members at any given moment could sell them, and divide the proceeds; or that even the testators who left money for the Companies "to make themselves comfortable," intended the individuals to make themselves comfortable by dividing the money amongst themselves. Grants and bequests were made to the Companies, as public bodies connected with the trades whose names they bore, and for public purposes. It can hardly be that their severance from their trades and the cessation of the performance of their duties have rid them of their public capacity, so as to enable them to divide their property amongst their members. But if in point of law that result has come about, then the sooner the law is altered the better, in the interests of public morality. It will never do to perpetuate a standing testimony to the ease with which a long continuance in gross dereliction of duty may confer a right to dispense with all duty, and to commit a legal act of robbery. In other words, the Suspensory Act, proposed by the Commission to prevent the Companies from committing felo de se accompanied by theft is imperatively necessary. The Lord Chancellor's claim of legal right for the Companies must be tempered in accordance with his admission of a moral claim on the part of the public.

But when this right of self-spoliation is gone, very little remains to the individual members of the Companies. If it be admitted that they cannot at one fell swoop plunder the perpetual corporation for the benefit of its individual members, neither can they do so by dribblets. The only sums now spent on the members appear to be £75,000 on entertainments, and a part of the monstrous sum of £100,000, or about one-third of the whole income, which is spent on management. This last item of expenditure is so vast as to constitute fairground for a charge of dereliction of duty upon the part of the Courts of Assistants in managing the Corporate property, quite enough to justify their dismissal. That it is vastly disproportionate, is clear from the fact that the cost of management at the Universities was found to be not 3 per cent. at Oxford, and very little over 2½ per cent. at Cambridge, though the greater part of the revenues of the Universities is derived from agricultural land. It is true that the salaries of some Bursars of Colleges are not included in this estimate, but if they were added on a vastly more liberal scale than is the fact, at the rate of £300 a year in each college, those expenses would not be brought up to 5 per cent. Yet the members of the Courts of Assistants alone, for the attendances they give, receive no less than £40,000, or 5½ per cent. on the total income of the Companies, in addition to the £60,000, or 8 per cent., paid in salaries to those who do the real work of management. There can be no vested right in such mismanagement as this in the members of the Companies, any more than there is any vested right in the paid officers of the Companies, who are, like other servants, from clerk to beadle, liable to dismissal. All, therefore, which needs to be left to the Companies, on the most stringent construction of vested rights is, £75,000 a year for their dinners, gradually decreasing as the members die out, and a small sum by way of compensation for the loss of fees for proper management.

It is urged by the Companies that the rest of their income is spent not only in a highly beneficial manner, but in a better way than it could be spent by any other public body. But, as a matter of fact, many, if not all, Companies spend large sums in extravagant pensions to retired officers and poor members of their bodies who cannot be said to be in want of charity, and they have to seek high and low for objects on which to expend their vast surpluses. Londoners, at least, may reasonably complain that revenues mostly levied from themselves are expended on some such meritorious institutions as the Yorkshire College at Leeds, the Technical School at Bradford, or Lectureships at Glasgow. It is contended with good reason that the City Companies are and have always claimed to be constituent elements of the City Corporation. It is certain that if not essentially part of it, they are very closely connected with it, as is proved by the fact that they still elect the Lord Mayor. The Companies themselves say that it is impossible to bring them again into any useful or living connection with the Trades whose names they bear. No real good is done by frittering away this immense income in doles to a thousand different hospitals and charities. The obvious and historical and most just method of dealing with these now anachronistic bodies is to merge them anew in the Corporation of London. To transfer all their properties and rights to the new Municipality which is about to consolidate the scattered limbs of London, as in old days the scattered local and craft guilds were consolidated in the City Government, would be an act of the highest statesmanship. With the immense sums that might be saved in management, and with the immense increase which may be anticipated in the actual income of the Companies, Greater London would thus be endowed with revenues which would at once obviate the necessity of continuing those taxes on corn and coal which press most heavily on those least able to bear them.

This scheme would involve the least possible interference with present "rights of property," the least possible interference with historical continuity, and the greatest possible amount of immediate and future public advantage. It is the one which, among all the conflicting claims of technical, primary and middle-class, and University education, and multitudinous hospitals and charities, would be the most readily acquiesced in by all the claimants, because it would create no jealousies, and would indirectly or directly benefit all. The citizens of London, as such, have a paramount claim to property which was originally designed to benefit them. As for the cry against interfering with the rights of property, there can be no better way of protecting those rights than to put an end to a gross abuse of them.

THE COMPROMISE ON THE ILBERT BILL.

THE Government of India has shown some wisdom and unusual self-control in agreeing to a compromise upon the Ilbert Bill. It must have been most painful to the Viceroy to yield, more especially as he will not be forgiven for having yielded, the Europeans in India, who are almost all either pronounced Evangelicals, decided Agnostics, or avowed Sadducees, regarding his faith with the absurd but incurable suspicion displayed in the ridiculous telegrams of this week about the "Disestablishment of the Church." It would, however, have been most injurious to India if all Europeans outside the small circle of Civilians—that is, all merchants, planters, captains of labour, artisans, military officers, and soldiers—had distrusted the administration of the Criminal Law, and that they would have distrusted it was proved by the universality of the resistance to Mr. Ilbert's measure. Much of the distrust may have been unfounded, just as much of the distrust felt by Irishmen towards English Courts is unfounded; but that is hardly the question for politicians. Prejudice is often an important factor in governing nations, and if it was possible to conciliate a prejudice so deep as this, it was wise that it should be soothed away. It was especially wise in an Empire in which authority ultimately rests upon an Army, which shares the prejudice so deeply that all cantonments were exempted from the operation of the Bill. The method adopted is a very complete one, and though it surprises and somewhat dissatisfies us, we can, we think, perceive clearly the ideas upon which the Indian Government has acted.

The original idea of the Ilbert Bill was not to abolish a privilege or introduce an equality which is contrary to every principle alike of the Indian Codes and of Indian manners, so much as to relieve the regular Native Civil Service of a slight. It was felt that although untrained deputy magistrates might be restricted in the use of their powers, the trained and picked native civilians ought to be trusted like their European confrères. They are assumed to be equal in all respects, and the special restriction involved in theory a decided slight. The Bill, therefore, as finally settled, gave to Native District Magistrates and Sessions Judges, and to them only, precisely the same universal jurisdiction as was assigned to European Judges of similar grades. They could try all men, without distinction of race, creed, or colour. To this principle, which is sound if an Indian can be quite impartial to a European, but unsound if he cannot, the Government, which has always maintained that he can, has resolutely adhered. Upon this point, which it probably regards as cardinal, and essential to the honour of its native servants, it has not given way one step. On the contrary, it has expressed still more confidence in them than before, by doubling their powers, which are increased under the "concordat" from the right of inflicting six months' imprisonment—the limit of the powers of London Stipendiary Magistrates—up to that of decreeing imprisonment for twelve months. In order, however, to restore the impaired confidence of Europeans, they, when brought before District Magistrates or Sessions Judges, who alone are mentioned in the Bill—the position of lower Magistrates remaining as before—are authorised to claim trial before a Jury, upon which seven in twelve must be their countrymen. The privilege is granted without reference to the Judge, who may be a European or a Native, a Christian or a Mussulman, a white man or a brown one, indifferently, the right being conceded to special accused persons, but not against special Judges. By this arrangement, the honour of the Native Service, for which the Government was primarily solicitous, is saved; while the European distrust, or prejudice, or unreasonableness is completely pacified. The Europeans know perfectly well both that a Jury of their countrymen will not return unjust verdicts against them, and that the Native Judge will not venture, in the presence of the leading Europeans in the station, to pass vindictive sentences. They are quite content to be tried by Juries, and have no objection to Native Judges, so long as they are not Judges also of the facts. Their fear is not of oppressive sentences, but of manufactured evidence; and they know that, as against false witness, the European Jurymen will defend them as carefully as the European Judge.

So far the arrangement is satisfactory, but it will be observed that it has been arrived at by granting the Europeans a privilege which, as against the tribunals, English as well as Native, is ten times as conspicuous as the old one. They are all, in fact, made peers, and can claim in serious cases a different mode of trial from the immense majority of the community. They are more separated as a caste than they ever were before, at all events since their exemption from every tribunal but the Supreme Court was taken away by statute. This does not, it is true, matter in India so much as it would in Europe. The natives of the interior have never asked for trial by jury, and aware as they are of the Judges' impartiality, would by no means regard that method of investigation as a boon. They know quite well that the chasms in native society are too deep, and that while the Brahmin would never be punished, the ryot would very seldom escape. The privilege, therefore, is not a privilege in their eyes, but only a mark of separateness, one of the thousand such marks which split native society into fragments. On the other hand, the European Juries will virtually be Special Juries, composed of educated men not at all likely to do wilful injustices. They are not inclined to tolerate violence, and are more bitter against crimes against property—which, however, Europeans seldom commit—than petty juries are in England. Still, the privilege granted is a great one, the jurors will be penetrated with ideas on the subject of self-defence which are not exactly legal, and in times of local rioting the system may involve a partial refusal of justice. The scheme would not work for a moment, if the number of uneducated Europeans increased rapidly, and it will increase greatly the tendency to grant Juries in all cases, which is not, in the existing condition of India, desirable or safe. Still, these dangers can be dealt with when they arrive; and meanwhile, the greatest danger of all, the growth of a bitter dislike in Europeans for Natives, and a reluctance to see office thrown open to them, has been most adroitly obviated. We should have greatly preferred a postponement of the Bill until it could have been brought forward under new circumstances, but the compromise at present will do little harm, and realises the wish of the Government to treat all its own servants alike.

The intensity and absurdity of the local prejudice against Lord Ripon is well illustrated in the telegram to the Times reporting a coming Disestablishment of the Church. That, it is said, being carried out by a Roman Catholic Viceroy, will create as much irritation as the Ilbert Bill. That is nonsense. Even if there were an Established Church in India, and it were proposed to abolish it, the Europeans would not care a straw; and there is no such institution, nor is its abolition proposed. The Anglican Church in India consists of the Regimental Chaplains, who are assisted both by Catholic priests and Presbyterian ministers, a few other Chaplains borne on the military estimates, but attached to the larger stations and Presidency towns, four or five Archdeacons, whose work man has never discovered, unless they are regarded as Bishops' secretaries, and four or five Bishops, who look after the chaplains' morals, exercise a very limited control over the Anglican Missionaries, ordain Anglican converts, and confirm the children of the Anglican community. The military chaplains cannot be touched, as they are indispensable; but it has long been argued that the civil community ought to pay for their own religious instruction and their own confirmations. We presume, therefore, if the question, a very old one, is to be settled, the chaplains will be withdrawn from civil stations, and some of the Missionary Societies asked to appoint and pay the majority of the Bishops. There is little sound objection in practice to the present system, which benefits the Natives by helping to keep the Europeans within certain bounds of opinion, and does not cost any great sum in addition to the unavoidable payments for military purposes, but it is, no doubt, indefensible in theory. The payment of civil chaplains as military officers is an abuse, and the Presidency towns can pay for Bishops, if they want them; and the Bishops so paid will do all necessary work in partibus infidelium,—that is, in the stations of the interior. The whole matter is, however, very trifling, and we can only wonder why Lord Ripon, knowing the special suspicions to which he would be subjected, did not ask Lord Kimberley, with whom the question rests, to let it sleep for a year or two longer. We suppose he thought that his faith had nothing to do with his duties, and that such a course would be a little weak.

THE ATTITUDE OF FRANCE.

THE inner feelings of the French peasantry have again become matters of serious importance to all Europe. It is evident that the upper classes and the Parisians, excited by the success before Sontay, are rapidly giving themselves up to chauvinism, and are urging, rather than checking, the "forward" policy of the Premier. Exasperated by the failures of the last few years, and distrustful of all leaders, those Frenchmen who are audible are childishly elated with their first gleam of success in the field. One writer declares that "Sontay has avenged Sedan," and although he was doubtless betrayed into that absurdity by the wish to make an alliterative mot, the tone of all his confrères has perceptibly altered for the worse. No pretence is now made of willingness to be contented with less than all Tonquin. The idea of English mediation, which has in the course of these negotiations been welcomed, rejected, and welcomed again, is now scouted, with irritating expressions of disdain for this country and its "commercial preoccupations." We are told that we only want Hainan, which most Englishmen never heard of, and that Lord Granville must not mediate until he is asked by France. The possibility of Chinese interference is scoffed at, and the Marquis Tseng is henceforward, it is said, to be treated "as if China did not exist." What is more serious still, the Government is as elate as its adulators. The Havas Agency is the most strictly controlled undertaking in France, and it is very difficult to believe that the astounding telegram published on Thursday, and nominally sent from London, was not drawn up in Paris, and at least sanctioned by the Foreign Office. If that is the case, M. Ferry, so far from avoiding war with China, is ready to pick a new quarrel, and intends—as, indeed, the République Française admits—to demand a "pecuniary indemnity" for the "aggressive attitude" assumed by China in Tonquin. Such a demand would be worthy only of Mr. Layard's Pasha, who first requisitioned fowls for his suite from the unhappy villagers near Bagdad, and then charged them for "the wear-and-tear of his teeth" because the fowls were tough, but we are by no means certain that an idea of the kind is not afloat in official circles. There are ominous references to "material guarantees," and in the present temper of the Ministry, the Island of Hainan, which dominates the Gulf of Tonquin and would support itself, may seem a most desirable acquisition. This can be obtained only from China; and a quarrel, in which the French would occupy the island, and defend it with their Fleet alone, may seem the readiest method of acquiring it. There are very dreamy projects floating before some French minds. If China does not fight, or England interpose, everything, it is said, is possible; and men are already found to declare that all Madagascar should be at once annexed, "because the Hovas, if they sign the treaty ceding the country of the Sakalaves, will not observe it"; and that a true Indo-Chinese Empire should be founded by France, an empire which should realise M. Dupuis's project of absorbing Siam, and running the boundary of French possessions up to British Burmah.

Much of all this, of course, is "gas," generated by victory; but as we pointed out last week, the Clericals refuse to resist Asiatic conquest, and the Respectables of the Senate voted for it, while the Army is betraying unexpected enthusiasm. The Ministry, like every Ministry, is much affected by the tone of the upper classes, M. Ferry is convinced that the forward policy is wise, the permanent chiefs of Departments think, it is said, that France must accumulate "estates" now or never, and an uneasy spirit of "enterprise" is manifesting itself among men hitherto deemed serious. The extraordinary project brought forward by the Government on Thursday of expending £2,000,000 sterling in evicting Arab cultivators in Algeria, in order to bestow their possessions on 25,000 French colonists, shows that some men at least who are ruling the State have temporarily lost their heads, and are forgetting not only political economy and common justice, but the whole position of France in North Africa. Under these circumstances, the feeling of the French peasantry becomes of the last importance, and is most difficult to ascertain. That they are disposed for peace, we do not doubt. Indeed, we agree with those who believe that they always have been disposed for peace, and that, except for a moment during the Revolution, the aggressive wars of France have been made by her rulers and her upper classes. The peasantry desire quiet, moderate demands on their children's lives, and high quotations for their Bonds, and, unless they can recover lost provinces, regard war with aversion. But then, though this is undoubtedly their permanent sentiment, and so strong that if China declares war they may at any moment upset the Ministry, and turn the vessel's head sharp round—as they compelled M. de Freycinet to do in Egypt—is it permanent enough and strong enough to induce them to put a stop to apparently successful expeditions? We confess to some doubt about this. The Deputies should know France, and they are evidently doubtful. The Church should know France, and it is going the other way. The soldiers should share peasants' feelings, and they are volunteering in thousands for Tonquin. We confess we doubt whether the peasants may not look on, and unless awakened by some shock, like a Chinese declaration of war or a great demand for money, may abstain from interference. Neither of these events is at all certain. We ourselves believe that the great Council which meets next week in Peking will decide to defend Tonquin, but it would not be unlike Chinese statesmen to defend it silently, by filling up the Tonquinese ranks, a process no French peasant would perceive. He does not, it must be remembered, object to use the Fleet or the "Colonial Army"—i.e., Marines and Volunteers—but only to waste soldiers who are his children, and are wanted to carry on life at home. As to finance, money must, of course, be spent in quantities; but the Government is going to reduce the Floating Debt by a loan, voted long since, though not emitted, and will then possess the full power, just accorded by both Chambers to M. Tirard, of borrowing up to a limit of £25,000,000 from the Bank of France. No doubt, the Senate cautioned M. Tirard that if he used this power recklessly, a European war might find France unable to collect money suddenly; but still M. Tirard insisted, and the power was granted without a division. It is almost too disheartening to believe that the Republic can enter on such a career—clearly opposed to the wishes of the majority of her people—and the peasantry still sit quiet; but the French Ministry evidently think she can, and we do not like the signs. If the power of action temporarily belongs to the politicians, and the journalists, and the Parisian upper classes, they are in a most dangerous mood,—“freezing for a fight,” as the Americans say, with somebody not too big. They may be restored to their usual senses by events, by a message from Peking, by a rising in North Africa, or even by a check in Tonquin; but at present they are burning with a passion for territories, provinces, islands, anything that is to be had. Reproof does not lie in our mouths perhaps, while we are always acquiring; but remembering that France cannot colonise, and has never adhered to any consistent policy about dependencies, having acquired South India, Louisiana, Haiti, and Egypt, only to lose them, we watch this outburst of old passions under a new régime with pained regret.

MR. HOLLOWAY.

THERE is always a profound interest felt by Englishmen in men who accumulate great fortunes, whether they spend them well or ill, or do not spend them at all, but save them for others to spend; and it is obvious that Mr. Holloway, who had one of those knacks of making money which almost suggest the possibility of a new and very artificial instinct, has excited this interest in England—more, we think, by the fortune that he made, than by the generosity towards the public with which he expended it. We heartily recognise the generosity of those plans for healing curable mental disease, and for giving girls a solid intellectual training, on which Mr. Holloway lavished a considerable part of his colossal wealth. But we must say that there seems to us to be too much disposition to make light of the great variety of polyglot fibs by which the original basis of that colossal fortune was laid. From all we have ever heard,—of course, we have no knowledge on the subject ourselves,—Mr. Holloway's ointment has really been found a most useful remedy for sores, especially the sores of horses, by those who have tried it; and Mr. Holloway's pills are probably useful pills of a common-place kind. But there is no manner of doubt that they would never have earned the sums they did earn, if the advertisements had kept within the truth in speaking of their curative effects; there is no manner of doubt that their popularity has sprung from that gross exaggeration of the excellences of their own wares which tradesmen indulge in all over the world,—and which they no doubt excuse, by saying to themselves that as everybody is disposed to be incredulous of the praises lavished by men on their own goods, you must extremely over-rate the utility of what you offer, if you expect it to be rated by others even at its actual value. We dare say that Mr. Holloway would have argued that the net result of all his advertising eulogies on the virtues of the pills was, that people thought they might just as well try them when they felt unwell, and that that result was not only harmless, but often very useful. But a much greater and much worse result than this is produced by all such exaggerations of language. We do not mean merely that the ignorant are led to rely on these much-puffed medicines, when they really need the best medical aid that they can get, and that they too often put off till too late the application for that aid, in their credulous reliance on the patent medicine. We mean much more than this, though this, too, is a very mischievous result of advertising fibs. We mean that every fortune made by using language unscrupulously, is a bounty on the use of unscrupulous language for the future, and that the successful figments concerning Holloway's Pills or Old Parr's Life Pills, which get so much provisional and tentative credence, lead to the multiplication of other figments of the same class, till English Trade is honeycombed by the false eulogies on common-place articles, and the suspicions which these false eulogies excite. We do not suppose that Mr. Holloway thought it wrong to over-praise his own medicines. He probably thought that "Caveat emptor" was a very good motto, and that the credulous who really accepted all his advertisements literally, were very few indeed;—nay, that even they accepted them rather as sanguine people catch at straws, when they see nothing better to catch at, than as absolutely relying on what they read. But what we maintain is that it is a great misfortune that colossal wealth can be earned by inspiring deliberately a great deal of false hope; that the habit of trying to inspire hope which must in a vast number of cases be disappointed, is a demoralising habit; and that we would far rather have seen Mr. Holloway advertising far and wide his regret that he had overpraised his Pills, and had induced ignorant persons to hope that by their help they might find cures for diseases which the Pills were entirely unfitted even to ameliorate, than have seen him acting the Good Samaritan to the insane, and providing munificently for the education of girls. The fibs of such advertisers may be more or less venial fibs,—we do not for an instant compare them to deliberate attempts to cheat the widows and orphans out of their savings, such as the false prospectuses of so many bubble companies make; but we do say that they are part of a bad and demoralising Trade system, which tends to bring the great prizes to the least scrupulous of the self-eulogists, and so puts a premium on commercial insincerities which exert the worst possible influence in the community. If it is right to say to all the world that a pill will cure diseases which it will not affect in the smallest degree, it is equally right to call a poor claret "La Rose," or a miserable tea the finest souchong, or the worst shoddy the best broadcloth; and this is precisely what English tradesmen do—not always with the same worldly wisdom, for patent medicines are not tried by quite the same standards as food and clothing, and are much seldomer bought by those who have already tried their virtues by any reasonable and sufficient tests. We deliberately think that if the late Mr. Holloway had honestly retracted the exaggerated descriptions of the virtues of his Pills, in all the papers in which he had published these descriptions, he would have done more good to England, than by founding a dozen excellent and splendid lunatic asylums, and a dozen excellent and splendid colleges for young women. The example of a successful tradesman regretting his too-successful puffs of his own wares, would have been a better example for Englishmen, than the example of genuine and splendid generosity which Mr. Holloway undoubtedly set.

PRESENT-MAKING.

THE Derby Porcelain-makers' present to Mr. Gladstone almost fulfils the ideal of a present. It was something which the receiver was known to value. It was something on which the givers had so impressed their own skill and energy, that there could never be any mistake as to the donor. And it embodied, as every gift ought more or less to embody, the idea of sacrifice,—that is, of the intention to hand over to the receiver something by which the givers might themselves have profited greatly, had they chosen to devote the same time, skill, and energy to a work for which they would have been remunerated in the ordinary way. That seems to us to be the ideal of a present, an ideal rarely fulfilled. How few, comparatively, are the gifts which really fill a distinct place of their own in the mind and imagination of the receiver! How few even of the gifts which do fill such a place, are those which leave on them the impress of the mind and character of the giver! And even when a gift fulfils both conditions, how often it fails to represent anything like a real sacrifice made by the giver on behalf of the receiver,—how often it is a mere equivalent for money spent, without an appreciable sacrifice of any kind in the spending! The truth is that in these days of lavish present-giving, present-giving too often becomes a mere form, with all the heart left out of it. Indeed, where there are so many presents given, it cannot well be anything else, for a present should represent care, thought, effort, a real wish, in short, to show that the circumstances of the receiver have been carefully taken into the mind of the giver, and that a serious endeavour has been made to adapt the gift to the tastes or wants of the person for whom it is intended;—and this is hardly possible, where everybody gives to almost everybody of his acquaintance, as too often happens now at the seasons of Present-giving. Probably one reason of the increasing multiplication of Christmas cards is that these make the very easiest conceivable presents,—presents that can be selected in a moment, with hardly any trouble, and hardly the least adaptation to the special tastes of either giver or receiver. The nearer a present comes to representing that minimum of effort, that minimum of individual character, that minimum of special adaptation to the wants of the person for whom they are designed, the nearer they come to being mere burdens,—which had better, indeed, be treated as burdens, and dispensed with altogether. For in this, as in other matters, the least hearty, least generous, least conscientious efforts are always the most fatiguing, just because they are mere punctiliousnesses, into which no life is poured, and in which no deep interest centres. Nothing is less tedious than giving a true sign of personal regard, in the only way in which true regard can be expressed,—that is, with plenty of evidence of the real existence of that regard. Nothing is more tedious than going through a ceremony intended to express regard, without taking the pains necessary to express it, and probably without feeling the regard which you nevertheless try to express. The French New Year's presents have, we are told, very nearly reached this climax of representing nothing more than such a conventional sense of duty as the leaving of a card betokens in England. If we are rightly informed, the French étrennes are constantly transferred from one hand to another,—since they do not represent any intrinsic value at all as the special gift of the special giver,—till at last they circulate back into the hands of the original donors, having performed precisely the same formal office in discharging the debts of social convention which a five-franc piece performs when it likewise, after passing through a number of different hands, returns to the coffers of the Bank which issued it. But whether it be true or not that the French étrennes have really reached this climax of conventionality, it is certain that the exchange of Christmas and New Year's cards in England is fast approaching to this climax of conventionality, and is beginning to represent little but a dim sense of social obligation, and a keen sense of social burden. It seems to us a bad social sign, when present-giving becomes so universal and so much a matter of routine, that no one takes any special thought of the kind of gift wanted, no one endeavours to give any individual significance of his own to the gift, while every one husbands as much as possible the expenditure of thought and taste on the selection of the present. What that really implies is a widely diffused sense of general social pressure, and a rapidly diminishing sense of individual tie and friendship, a keen feeling of the many points in which social ties press on one, and a blunt feeling of the personal obligations under which we live to those who really do us almost all the good that we get from society at all. It is a bad thing when people begin to think so much of what they owe to comparative strangers, that they have hardly time to think specially of what they owe to those who are nearest and dearest to them, and try to express their sense of the deeper, just as they express their sense of the slighter obligations, by the issue of a sort of paper currency of general and superficial gratitude.

For our parts, we hold that present-making, to be worth anything, should be as individual as possible, should be studied, and not slurred over, should represent a genuine effort to appreciate the wants or tastes of the receiver, and an effort only less earnest to express the sympathetic taste of the giver. The gift which represents a mere purchase, even if it be carefully and wisely selected, is always inferior to an equally welcome gift which represents the skill and art of the giver. Not, of course, that we approve the detestable egotism of giving, as some people give, just to glorify their own skill; but that where the tastes of the receiver can be fully gratified by the skill of the giver, the present is twice as much a true present for being produced by the giver, and not merely purchased by him. Where it is possible, the gift should really represent the sympathy existing between the giver and the receiver; and, of course, nothing can represent this as well as a first-rate work executed by the giver, which the receiver both admires and needs. But as the object of a gift is to confer pleasure, it is obvious that the tastes and wants of the receiver should be the first thing to consider, and that even a purchase which better satisfies them, is a truer gift than a production of the giver's own which is not precisely what the former wants. On the whole, however, the real object of a present,—the drawing together of giver and receiver by the act of the former,—is better obtained by a gift which represents the taste and time and skill of the former, with equal benefit to the latter, than by any merely purchased gift. But when, as often happens, the giver has no talent which enables him to produce for himself what will please his friend, then care, time, and taste should be expended on discovering what will really best satisfy the taste of the person for whom the present is designed; and an attempt should be made not only to secure this, but also to secure that in effecting this it should also not offend the taste of the giver. It is a very bad present which, though it pleases the receiver, does so at the cost of dissatisfying the giver. A man who despises "Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy," should hardly give it even to a person who really admires that work. A man who knows a picture to be bad, should hardly give it even to a friend who indulges the unfortunate illusion that it is good. A gift should represent common ground. It should represent what the giver thinks well of, as well as the receiver; indeed, if it does not, there is a sort of mild treachery in giving it, and so encouraging the bad-taste which the giver regrets. True, you should never give a pearl, however fine, to one who could not appreciate the beauty of a pearl; you should never cast your pearls before creatures who do not even regard pearls as precious. But a man who thought garnets ugly and vulgar, should never give them even to one who thought them rich and splendid.

But after all, the great reform would be to give much fewer presents, and give them seldomer, but to let them represent a great deal more of real character in the giver than they do now. Life without presents would be a great deal more tolerable than life inundated with presents that mean little or nothing. If democracy is to prevail in all our social ways, let it prevail rather by putting a stop to all periodic occasions of present-giving, by extinguishing the custom, except on the rare occasions where there is a special need to show individual love and regard, than by diminishing the significance and the personal thought represented by those presents which are given. It is impossible to shower down presents in all directions, and yet not diminish their value as denoting personal affection or reverence. And unless they do represent personal affection or reverence, they are dim, unmeaning, imbecile things. Present-giving will cease to be significant, and therefore will become a dreary and tedious routine, unless it is strictly limited to the expression of real, natural, and hearty feelings which can find no other equally adequate utterance.

MR. GLADSTONE ON ENGLISH CHINA.

THE present which the Liberal working-men of Derby have made to Mr. Gladstone is in every way appropriate. The particular form which the gift took was calculated to give Mr. Gladstone special pleasure. "I have," he told the deputation, "for very many years had a great love for porcelain." Some of the scanty leisure of a public man with an extraordinary capacity for work, and with a corresponding amount of work thrown upon him, has often been given to the great King Street auction rooms. Amidst all the excitement and all the labour of politics, he has found a moment's relaxation in the texture of Wedgwood pottery or the colour of Oriental china. The choice of porcelain thus showed that acquaintance with and appreciation of his tastes which make a gift additionally attractive. And, even amongst the various kinds of china and the various types of decoration which might have been chosen, this particular service stands out distinctly. It has strong local interests of its own. It has been made in the town by whose workmen it is presented, and at works which represent and continue one of the most famous English factories. Every one who knows anything of the history of English porcelain has heard of "Crown Derby," and knows the combination of gold and dark blue which has always been its characteristic mark; and it is at the "Derby Crown Porcelain Works" that this service has been made. The link with the past is not merely one of name and style. The flowers which make part of the ornamentation are painted by a man who worked in the old Derby factory, and who now at eighty-two still lives, to unite the reviving industry with the earlier triumphs of the same art. Further, the landscapes which form the centre of each piece are described as forming in themselves a gallery of Derbyshire scenes. Thus the association of the service, alike with those who give and with him to whom it is given, is complete.

Mr. Gladstone gives the manufacture of porcelain its true place, when he says that it is more than a branch of industry,—more even than a branch of skilled industry. There must be some cause to account for the estimation in which it is held in every nation. Its uses are so obvious and so many, that it is no wonder that it has always been valued for the service it renders. But in every instance, it has been valued for something more than its service. It has been valued not merely for its use, but for its beauty; not merely for what it does, but for what it is. Now, this just marks the dividing-line between industry and Art. The making of china is a branch of industry, but it is also a branch of Art. Everything about it combines to give it this distinction. There is the beauty of the material; there is the plastic quality which enables it to be thrown into so many different forms; there is the eminent suitability of its surface for decoration. Consequently, porcelain has some of the merits of a precious stone, together with some which belong to sculpture and some which belong to painting; and all these in a material which lends itself in a thousand different ways to the supply of human wants. Do what we will, we must eat off china and drink out of china, and see china of one kind or another around us wherever we turn. And in each one of these capacities it may do its work so as to please the eye or to offend it, and it is its power of doing one or the other that makes it a work of art,—of good art, if the workman uses his opportunities well; of bad art, if he uses them ill. There are other pursuits in which art is applied to industry, and in their degree the results are always works of art. But in porcelain it is applied more directly, and with a certain predominance of the artistic element which makes it unlike all other industries which hold a similar place in the debateable land which separates the neighbours from each other.

Yet something is still wanting to invest the making of porcelain with the dignity which properly belongs to it. Mere utility is constantly treading on the heels of beauty, and what is intended to be beautiful constantly falls short of what it was meant to be, by reason of some fault in the taste of the producer. Much as English porcelain has improved during the last ten years, there is still a lamentable vagueness in the mind of the buyer as to what it is that he ought to look for in the thing he buys. In too many instances he has not risen above the bondage of "new patterns." Though he is going to buy what, if he is fairly fortunate, will last his lifetime and that of his children, he is careful to ask whether a pattern is this year's or last year's. He assumes that what was made yesterday must be essentially better than what was made a twelvemonth ago. Nor is he any more free from that other slavery of liking to see porcelain made to do the very things which it is least fitted to do. In his eyes, the highest triumph of the potter's art is to imitate some material with which it has nothing in common, or to exhibit an incongruous decoration. It does not do to trust wholly to the producer to find a cure for this state of things. Competition is so fierce in modern trade, that what one man does all his rivals must do the next moment. The very shop-windows which a little time back rejected every stuff that was not dyed with the faintest and most subdued colours now exhibit, side by side with the hues to which they owe their success, the coarse blues and reds which a wayward taste has decreed shall this year displace all that has been thought beautiful, because fashionable for some years past. If the taste of the buyer goes wrong, the taste of the manufacturer will go wrong too. The public need educating as well as the workman. Yet though it is the public that needs educating, it is the workman that must play the teacher. The trained judgment of experts has an important part to play in raising the taste of those who are not experts. Though the function of academies may easily be overrated, they still have their function. In painting, for example, it can hardly be doubted that individual buyers would go more wrong than they do, if there were no conclave sitting at Burlington House to decide what pictures are worthy of exhibition and what are not. The exhibitions always going on in London at least weed out a great deal of rubbish. More than this, they show to one artist what other artists are capable of; and though this very often generates nothing but imitation, it sometimes puts a man on his mettle, and makes him try to do the best that he himself can conceive, not merely to copy the best that another has conceived. The general level of painting is raised, and from time to time individuals are stimulated to show that they, too, can rise above the general level. We should like to see an exhibition of pottery every year in London, not merely a collection of anything that a potter chooses to send, but one in which the things shown have been carefully picked out by a committee of really qualified judges, partly professionals and partly amateurs.—Mr. Gladstone himself, for example, being one of them, if he could possibly find the time. To have been admitted to the annual exhibition would then mark out a piece of china as being, at all events, up to a certain mark; and as pottery is, more than most others, an imitative art, the improvement thus effected would slowly, but surely, filter down to many an article which the maker had never dreamed of exhibiting.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF MELODRAMA.

IT is now twenty years since the present writer, at a time when the theatres of London were comparatively deserted, predicted that the first man who placed good English operabouffe upon the Stage would make a fortune. It was so placed at last, and all the world knows how H.M.S. Pinafore, Patience, and the like have succeeded financially. We venture now to say that any playwright who can impart to Melodrama any new interest, whether it be poetry or pathos, or really fine scenic effect, will draw paying crowds to the house in which his play is performed. There are vast numbers of people, as we have always maintained, whose view of the Drama is not lofty and not low, who do not expect it to instruct them, and who find the "mirror held up to nature" rather in the novel and the newspaper, than on the Stage, but who still desire theatrical entertainment, and who can be provided with it, if writers so will, without recourse to any objectionable means. In the absence of first-rate tragedy—which is unprocurable, except when a wealthy lessee will risk the expense and trouble of a Shakespearean revival—and the dearth of good new comedy, they will be heartily content with melodrama, provided only it is not mere situation. They rather like melodrama, in fact, just as habitual novel-readers, satiated with character-painting, will read a romance with gusto, if only there is anything in it besides improbability, surprise, and violent situation. We all know how the Colleen Bawn drew; and it drew not only because of Mrs. Boucicault's admirable acting, but because there was a pathos in the story which made it, by itself a romance worth a certain amount of trouble to see realised. The same cause, aided by the unequalled acting of Mr. Jefferson, made a permanent success of Rip van Winkle. A few nights ago we entered the Princess's Theatre, and found a house literally crammed, more especially the stalls and boxes, with an audience who heartily enjoyed and applauded a "mere melodrama," often an absurd melodrama, with some genuine poetry and thought in it. There was nothing in the acted romance to explain its success, but just that. No playgoer cares particularly about the fourth century,—or is it the fifth?—or the state of things in Bithynia under Byzantine rule; nor, if such a person existed, would he have been much delighted with the performance. The costumes may be fairly correct, for what we know, though those of the actresses seemed to us full of anachronisms; but that semi-comic Tetrarch is an absurd impossibility, nor could he, as the writers seem to imagine, have murdered free citizens at discretion. Claudian, too, the hero of the piece, who is one minute a Pre-consul and another a Prefect, could not have inflicted all that summary justice, being bound by very rigid laws as to previous trial, nor would he have stalked about without lictors at the mercy of a mob. A Roman soldier, drunk on duty, like Belus, would have been beaten with a vine-stock till he fainted; and free citizens were not sentenced for no fault to work in chains. All the comic scenes are poor, and only one of the actors could, in any way or degree, hold the house. Mr. Wilson Barrett, as Claudian, recites well, looks his part to perfection, poses like a fine picture, and expresses better almost than any actor we have seen on the stage, that most difficult quality to act,—profound calm. He would act a king in a great part delightfully, and impart to him precisely that sentiment of sufficiency in himself which Napoleon complained that Talma would never realise. The remaining actors, however, have not much to do, and do it in a very ordinary way. Agazil, the blacksmith, in particular, distinctly fails to express that he is checked in his assault on Claudian by supernatural influence; and Miss Eastlake, who, in Almida, has a part which might be made a splendid one—that of a girl, afterwards blind, constrained by an overmastering, and, as it were, supernatural, yet illusory, love—is overweighted by it. She is most creditably painstaking, does her very best, and never offends by stage tricks; but the part would have taxed Rachel, and is so completely over Miss Eastlake's head, as to produce a certain impatience in the spectator. Nor are many of the incidental situations impressive. Most of them are of the old "Unhand me, villain!" order, which is not a bit the less repulsive because the costumes are unusual; while the earthquake, despite the marvellous get-up, leaves little impress of reality. The audience is not agast, but only curious as to the way in which it has been done.

Nevertheless, the play is a success, and deserves to be one. Right through it, never forgotten for a moment, runs a poetic thought, to which every detail is made subordinate. Claudian, a profligate Byzantine noble, has in sheer wilfulness purchased a beautiful slave girl in the market, for whom her husband was bidding, and she flies from him to the protection of a Christian hermit. Claudian pursues, blasphemes the creed of the hermit, in sentences of some force and well adapted to his time, and finally stabs him. The hermit dying, pronounces a curse, which grants the Pagan noble the gift of everlasting youth, to be enjoyed till he chooses death; but loads it with this condition,—that though his heart shall be filled with benevolence, no love, or kindness, or pity of his shall bring its object aught but misery; while for all who love him, there is the same doom. Rich, powerful, good, Claudian shall stand alone, isolated from the affections of mankind. Of course, the curse is fulfilled. Claudian enfranchises the slave he has pursued, and she falls dead of joy. He bestows alms on a beggar-woman, and her child dies. He liberates an artisan unjustly condemned, and the artisan leads a life of misery. Through a century he passes on, striving to bless, yet always cursing, till the very populace recognise in his benevolence something hostile to Heaven's will. Almida, a Bithynian girl, falls madly in love with him, forsakes her betrothed for him, and is struck blind. Claudian, responding to her love, would express his devotion to the full, but for the dread lest it should destroy her. At last he is about to yield to his passion—the more entrancing, because he has not known love through his century of joyless youth—when the Hermit, appearing from his grave, warns him that again he is warring against a woman's happiness; and Claudian electing death, in order to bless Almida, in whom her old fidelity revives, the curse is lifted. That is a most poetic conception, and an original one—for Eugene Sue's Wandering Jew carries with him only an epidemic—clearly if imperfectly, worked out, and it draws the audience along, till all defects are forgotten, and the curtain comes down upon a true outburst of enthusiasm. Not a point that bore upon the central idea was missed, more especially Claudian's useless effort to prove to himself that in liberating the captive he was but doing justice, and could, therefore, evade the curse; and his just remark that heaven still left him the right to punish. Throughout, even in the poorest scenes, the audience was conscious of the fine vein of poetry running through the piece, and welcomed every incident and every thought which bore upon it with hearty cordiality and warmth. The thought, if often subtle and always far removed from actual life, was never above their heads, and there was no trace of the bewilderment which so often mars the success of a piece which aspires to arouse the loftier emotions. The audience was entirely content, and that with a lesson of the highest morality, which many critics, reasoning à priori, would have fancied might prove as dull as a sermon upon benevolence.

We are not questioning, of course, that Mr. Barrett's fine representation of the melancholy Roman magnate, with his grandly calm authority, and the strange new groups presented on the stage, and the frequently exquisite scenery, contribute to make such a play as Claudian succeed. Of course they do, and should. What we contend is, that neither want of knowledge of the time, nor unexpectedness, and, so to speak, unreasonableness, in the action, nor loftiness in the motive, in the least repel an English audience, if only in addition to these things there is something more, something poetic, or pathetic, or human; that they will release a playwright from the obligation to obey any rules, or to be bound by any probabilities, if only he will interest either their minds, or hearts, or eyes. They can enjoy, and will pay for, a pure romance, if only it is genuinely romantic,—a story which, though improbable, has a human charm in it, a thought large enough or strong enough to attract, of whatever kind. In this instance, the charm is of the strangest kind, the agony of a good man at finding that he possesses the evil-eye, that all blessings received from him become curses,—a thought, one would have said, hardly conceivable to Englishmen, who have lost even the memory of the superstition, once so universal, that there are men whose kindness attracts to its objects the anger of the Gods; yet it proves sufficient to attract. That should be an encouragement to those who are striving to "elevate the Drama," for it releases them from fetters, and shows them that poetry, and pathos, and nobleness are not necessarily "destructive to the Treasury;" and that a theatre can be filled by a play which is neither a great tragedy nor a fine comedy of Society, nor an exhibition of painted girls in tights, but only a romance, with an idea in it admitting of spectacle, yet dominating, and not dominated by it. To produce such a play and to succeed with it, is a lower ideal than to produce a great work of art; but, then, it is an attainable ideal, which, till the great artist comes, the work of art is not. Claudian is not Coriolanus, but it is something to please those who only seek entertainment by a play which is so lofty in its essential motive; and, that preposterous Tetrarch being forgotten, so entirely without vice in it as Claudian is. We cannot have a series of Shakespeares; but of thoroughly good melodramas there ought to be no end, any more than there is of novels, if only the public would go to see them,—and we maintain they will.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

RELIGIOUS TEACHING AT OXFORD.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Your Oxford correspondents have not, as it seems to me, fully stated their own arguments. The province of the University, they say, is only to consider the sufficiency of a candidate's intellectual knowledge. Even this assertion requires limitation, for the appointment of an examiner notorious for his immoral life would be almost universally disapproved. Nor, on the other hand, would a candidate, however brilliant his intellect, obtain high honours in moral philosophy and other schools, if he were to argue against the views held to be orthodox by the examiners. This, however, is not the point to which I ask your readers' attention.

We have now among our Graduates and Professors some Jews, whose intellectual position no one calls in question. They have a right, then, it would seem, to be examiners in the New Testament, being intellectually competent. But the appointment of a Jew to such a post would be a reductio ad absurdum, which would at once bring about the abolition of all religious examinations,—the end which one, at least, of your correspondents evidently desires. The abolition of all instruction in religion must follow, for no one now lectures on any subject which has not a quotable price in the Schools. If divinity lectures are to cease, why not sermons? If sermons, why not chapel services? In short, to be consistent, the University must have nothing to do with religion in any form. This is the conclusion at which one party aims, as some of its members candidly avow. The recent contest has been a great help to them. To be able to put forward an estimable, cultivated, religious Nonconformist as the object of their sympathy, was a piece of good-luck hardly to be hoped for. In general, Nonconformists may be relied upon to help non-Christians; but it is very seldom that they have so irreproachable a leader. Churchmen should have seen this, and have declined the challenge so cleverly thrown down to them. Their want of liberality and of political insight has in this, as in many other instances, led them to a serious mistake, and has given the University Secularists an un hoped-for gain.

Let me not be mistaken. I have no fear for religion in Oxford. Its parish churches, of more than one school, have a more numerous attendance of Undergraduates than was ever known before. Sunday evening sermons for Undergraduates last year were listened to by audiences which filled the spacious church; meetings in behalf of Missions, or the cause of Temperance, purity, and the like, seldom fail to attract. I have no fear for religion, yet I do not wish to see the University secularised. These old chapels, some of them of rare architectural beauty, their religious associations blended with art, music, and all the poetry of rich historic interest, are a main feature of that inexpressible charm which Oxford has for her best sons. When they are left to the excursionist, who has duly subsidised the porter at the gate, Oxford will be, to many of us, another place.

But there is another point not to be overlooked. If the University is only a place for testing intellectual knowledge, what possible excuse can there be for requiring the costly and burdensome condition of three or four years' residence as a preliminary to a Degree? The London B.A. Degree is probably a better test of intellectual knowledge than the same degree at Oxford. Why should the latter be denied to thousands who could pass the intellectual test with the preparation they can more economically, and perhaps more safely, obtain at home? The interests of the married tutors and lecturers in Park Town ought, no doubt, to be tenderly dealt with; but the University is rich enough to provide for them. I, for one, if it is settled that the University has no other province but the testing of intellectual knowledge, am ready to agitate for the admission, without residence or residential expenses, of the body of the people to its membership and its Degrees.—I am, Sir, &c., OXONIENSIS.

P.S.—I may just observe that the question of the fitness of the Thirty-nine Articles to form part of the religious subject of examination did not fall within the scope of this letter.

THE NEW PEERAGE.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Are you not somewhat hard upon the Poet-Laureate for accepting the peerage which the Queen has offered him, and is he not likely to be suffering unnecessary pain in consequence of the tone taken on the subject by a portion of the Press? That your Radical contemporary, which published its clever, but cruel parody, "Baron Alfred Vere de Vere" should dislike the new peerage does not surprise me, for it has always a sneer ready for the House of Lords. But whatever your view may be as to the desirability of retaining that House as a political power, you always show great appreciation of the graciousness and refinement which are the good side of an aristocracy.

You say most happily that the influence of a great poet is akin to a great spiritual influence, and if so, we should surely (while the House of Lords exists) hail its being recruited from the noblest minds of the country, and not alone from the strong, and often hard, who come to the front as great lawyers or millionaires, or even as great soldiers and politicians.

In modern days, the influence of the House of Lords is far more social than political, and in an age which has seen a great vulgarisation of society—through the enormous increase in the plutocracy among other causes—would it not be a happy thing if the leaders of all branches of intellectual life, with its refining influence, could be incorporated in the Upper House? I believe that the advocates of life-peerages hold that view, and it is acted on to a far greater extent in most foreign countries than with us, although our aristocracy is not a caste, as it is, more or less, abroad.

Alfred Tennyson may be a greater power to many minds than Lord Tennyson, but the House of Lords might have a healthier influence on English life if it contained more great poet-peers. You think a saint would be out of place in the gorgeous palace in which the Lords sit. Perhaps so, and yet one is loth to think that although it is true that the able Church administrator most often reaches the Bench of Bishops, men of saint-like mind are never to be found there, or that they do not exercise an ennobling influence on their place and generation.—I am, Sir, &c., E. B.

[Political serviceableness is of the essence of fitness for either House of Parliament. A saint, as such, would not be out of place in the House of Lords, if he added to the political capacity of that assembly; but he would refuse, by very virtue of his being a saint, to increase the number of political do-nothings in the House of Lords. So should a poet with no political gifts or experience.—Ed. Spectator.]

INSTINCT.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR"]

SIR,—Mr. Darwin's "Notes on Instinct," recently published by my friend, Mr. Romanes, have again called attention to the interesting subject of instinct in animals.

Miss Martineau once remarked that, considering how long we have lived in close association with animals, it is astonishing how little we know about them, and especially about their mental condition. This applies with especial force to our domestic animals, and above all, of course, to dogs. I believe that it arises very much from the fact that hitherto we have tried to teach animals, rather than to learn from them,—to convey our ideas to them, rather than to devise any language, or code of signals, by means of which they might communicate theirs to us. No doubt, the former process is interesting and instructive, but it does not carry us very far.

Under these circumstances, it has occurred to me whether some such system as that followed with deaf mutes, and especially by Dr. Howe with Laura Bridgman, might not prove very instructive, if adapted to the case of dogs. Accordingly, I prepared some pieces of stout cardboard, and printed on each in legible letters a word, such as "food," "bone," "out," &c. I then began training a black poodle, "Van" by name, kindly given me by my friend, Mr. Nickalls.

I commenced by giving the dog food in a saucer, over which I laid the card on which was the word "food," placing also by the side an empty saucer, covered by a plain card. "Van" soon learnt to distinguish between the two, and the next stage was to teach him to bring me the card; this he now does, and hands it to me quite prettily, and I then give him a bone, or a little food, or take him out, according to the card brought. He still brings sometimes a plain card, in which case I point out his error, and he then takes it back and changes it. This, however, does not often happen. Yesterday morning, for instance, he brought me the card with "food" on it nine times in succession, selecting it from among other plain cards, though I changed the relative position every time. No one who sees him can doubt that he understands the act of bringing the card with the word "food" on it, as a request for something to eat, and that he distinguishes between it and a plain card. I also believe that he distinguishes, for instance, between the card with the word "food" on it and the card with "out" on it.

This, then, seems to open up a method which may be carried much further, for it is obvious that the cards may be multiplied, and the dog thus enabled to communicate freely with us. I have as yet, I know, made only a very small beginning, and hope to carry the experiment much further, but my object in troubling you with this letter is twofold. In the first place, I trust that some of your readers may be able and willing to suggest extensions or improvements of the idea. Secondly, my spare time is small, and liable to many interruptions; and animals also, we know, differ greatly from one another. Now, many of your readers have favourite dogs, and I would express a hope that some of them may be disposed to study them in the manner indicated. The observations, even though negative, would be interesting; but I confess I hope that some positive results might follow, which would enable us to obtain a more correct insight into the minds of animals than we have yet acquired.—I am, Sir, &c., JOHN LUBBOCK.

THE LONG VACATION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—In considering the question of the Long Vacation, it should be borne in mind that there are other vacations when there is a total cessation of the sittings of the Courts, namely, twenty days at Christmas, twelve days at Easter, and ten days at Whitsuntide. In all cases, I have taken clear days, not including the last day of the sittings preceding, or the first day of the sittings following, each vacation; six weeks in all; add on the ten weeks of the reduced Long Vacation, making a total holiday of sixteen weeks in the year. Few Ten-to-Fours—or rather, in the case of her Majesty's Judges, 10.30 to 4—get such an amount of holiday.—I am, Sir, &c., A JUNIOR BARRISTER.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—Permit me to say that you are hardly correct in stating that your correspondent "Judex" is inaccurate in his statement as to the work of County-Court Judges, and that those "in great centres" do not pass such an "intermittent existence as he suggests." Mr. J. A. Russell, Q.C., the Judge at Manchester and Salford, whom all practitioners regard as a most satisfactory and able Judge, invariably sits for a fortnight, and then rests for a fortnight. You instance Liverpool, but you seem to forget that there are two County Court Judges at Liverpool, and that therefore they relieve each other, and that both take a holiday in September.—I am, Sir, &c.,

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.

THE IPSWICH ELECTION.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I have read with interest the letter of Mr. Guthrie, which appeared in your last issue. While I admit the truth of the majority of his assertions, I would point out the well-known fact that in Ipswich, Mr. West received the whole weight of the High-Church vote, both Liberal and Tory. The reason for this is that Sir Thomas Charley is a very prominent member of the Church Association, a society whose proceedings and persecutions are most hateful to all Catholic Churchmen. The same remark applies to Liverpool, where Mr. Samuel Smith, by his unmeasured bounties to all denominations, secured the votes of Catholic Churchmen in preference to Alderman Forwood, who did not hesitate to proclaim himself a pronounced anti-ritualist.—I am, Sir, &c., A CATHOLIC TORY.

MR. PALMER'S "ECLOGUES OF VIRGIL."

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE "SPECTATOR."]

SIR,—I read the review of Samuel Palmer's "Eclogues of Virgil" which appeared in the Spectator. I read it with regret, but without surprise, being but too well aware that Art critics generally look upon technical knowledge as quite beneath their attention, and fall into all sorts of errors in consequence.

The line taken by your reviewer was:—1. To assume that because Samuel Palmer was an old man, he must have been in a state of decadence when he illustrated the "Eclogues." 2. To affirm that Mr. A. H. Palmer was so far beneath even the decadent Samuel Palmer as an executant, that he spoiled every plate he worked upon.

As I have had something to do with the work in question from the beginning, perhaps I may be allowed to say a word in defence of both artists. The one etching completed by Samuel Palmer, "The Opening of the Fold," an illustration of the eighth eclogue, was exhibited some time since at the rooms of the Fine-Art Society, and I remember that my own first impression on seeing it there was wonder that a man of Palmer's age should have been able to execute such a piece of work. To say that there is no trace of decadence in that plate would be true, but not enough. That plate is the perfect consummation of Palmer's experience, knowledge, and manual power. A fine proof of it is the high-water mark of that particular kind of etching. Much more might be said about it, if I went into detail, but I shall do that in another periodical. Your reviewer seems to have thought that because Palmer was an old man, it was safe to say that he was in a state of decadence. He was not in a state of decadence, nor am I blinded whilst saying this by my deep respect for the man, or alone in this opinion. Skilful artists acknowledged his greater skill, and if critics had possessed even a very little of his knowledge, they would have been better able to distinguish between one kind of art and another.

With regard to the work done by Mr. A. H. Palmer, let me say, as one writing with a clear knowledge of the technical difficulties he had to contend against, that I have been surprised not by the loving care and the inexhaustible patience that his filial duty lavished on what he knew to be thankless and unappreciated toil, but by the success that rewarded it. His share in the work is, at the same time, absolutely subordinated in method and successful in result. As an example of this careful subordination in method, I have only to mention the second illustration in which your reviewer is unable to trace Mr. A. H. Palmer's hand, yet he worked three weeks upon that héliogravure. I remember being delighted with what he had done when the proof was sent me, and it seemed to the publishers and myself that his success opened a new field in book illustration, since what was objectionable in héliogravure could be so completely corrected, whilst at the same time it afforded a most useful basis to work upon.

That plate more nearly resembles a mezzotint than an etching, but in the pure etchings which Mr. A. H. Palmer has completed, his work is so good, that it is impossible to say for certain exactly what has been done by him to each plate. I have a thorough knowledge of the technical peculiarities of Samuel Palmer's work, and yet it would be mere guessing if I tried to point out what the son has added. If the reader will look at "The Opening of the Fold" (eighth eclogue), which was untouched by the son, and afterwards at such plates as those illustrating the lines,—

"Ripe apples are our supper, cream unstirred," and,—

"Untimely lost, and by a cruel death," he will find it impossible to separate the son's work from the father's, so completely has Mr. A. H. Palmer assimilated not only his father's feeling and spirit, but even the quality of his handicraft. Indeed, your reviewer himself is in this position also, for he attributed the cross-hatching in the sky of "The Opening of the Fold" to Mr. A. H. Palmer, whereas it was the work of his father, and some of his best work.

Your reviewer complains that "there are so many different kinds of photographic processes which superficially resemble woodcuts and etchings." They cannot resemble woodcuts and etchings at the same time, but perhaps that is not what the writer intended to say. As for those processes that may really resemble etchings, there are, in principle, only two,—one in which the copper-plate is grown by electrotyping with all the depressions in it, and the other in which the depressions are bitten in a plate already provided. Both allow of subsequent work on the plate, and the best result is obtained by the alliance of photographic reproduction with artistic skill and knowledge. This occurs when the plate, after being carried as far as mechanical processes will go, is taken in hand for correction by so intelligent an artist as Mr. A. H. Palmer.—I am, Sir, &c.,

POETRY.

PROGRESS, OR RETROGRESSION?

WHAT Progress in the sum of human years?
I asked of Truth, whose wan and weary eyes,
Fixed on the strife of hosts contending,
The strife of Good and Evil never-ending,
Were clouded oft with tears.
Sad as the strain of saddest symphonies,

The sorrow of her answer filled my ears :—
'Daily men know me more, and love me less.
Time was, I flashed upon the young world's sigh
And drew all hearts with wonder and delight,
In my first loveliness.
Then a great promise o'er the distance hung
That would make all things happy, all things young Redeem the curse, relieve the pain,
The great world's misery heal again.
So was it echoed on from tongue to tongue.'
'And then?' I asked. She answered, 'as a star
Glad seers saw and hailed me from afar.
And suddenly a glory was revealed
To simple shepherds in the field,
Who saw a light in Heaven, and lo!
With angel-forms the dark was all aglow,
While through the spheres a sacred music rung :—
"Peace and goodwill!" O blessed word!
"To you is born a Saviour, Christ the Lord."
More strong than blood,
That tie of brotherhood!
"Goodwill and peace!" To all the promise sung
"And now?" I asked. No answer! "Now?" She
And all her cheek one fire of anger burned.
"Listen," she cried. I heard a distant roar,
Like starving outcasts on a hungry shore,
Rise from a mighty city evermore.
And then anon, piercing that outer din,
Rose up the shriek of women mad with gin,
And hollow laugh of girls who sold their sin.
And as with age, gaunt on its mother's knee,
The babe cried out for bread, no bread had she.
"Listen again!" she cried; and then, hard by,
The rich man's music drowned that "bitter cry,"
And harp and viol charmed the wintry sky.

O Christ, eternal Brother,
Once more this day is thine;
Once more to one another
Our stony hearts incline.
Peace and goodwill! And can it be
That this is all we learnt of Thee,—
This splendour to despair allied,—
A palace here, there, at its side,
Those dens of misery?
Oh! rather come the shocks that nations feel!
Come, Revolution, with the armed heel!
Come, Attila, with all thy Vandal crew,
Tread into dust our gold!
Respect not aught that's old!
Cast in a nobler mould,
Our State renew!
I turned, and looked to Truth, but Truth had fled
Only there lingered on a voice, that said,
Sad-echoing still:
How little yet ye know the word
On that first dawn of Christmas heard,
The only power to right the wrong,
To fire the cold, and tame the strong,
The grand, old, glorious angel-song,
"Peace and goodwill."

ART.

THE INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN OIL CO

[SECOND NOTICE.]

IN our first article upon this Gallery, we only spoke of the character of the exhibition; in this, we propose to detail a few of the principal pictures.

On the first wall of the West Gallery hang two small pictures which are, upon the whole, the most satisfactory in the collection—the "Black Diamonds," by Mr. W. L. Wyllie, and "Waves Breaking by Moonlight," by Mr. Arthur Severn. These two works form a curious contrast in nearly every respect of merit. Mr. Severn's is refined, dignified, and almost perfect in its general effect; abstracted from all trace of human emotion, and simply literally reproductive of beautiful natural effect. Mr. Wyllie's, on the other hand, is a picture of a string of dirty coal barges, seen on a crowded part of "the River," under a bright light, and with all the bustle and toil of the Thames surrounding them. All honour to him, that he has found beauty as intense as that of the soft moonlight, and the "broken spirit of the wave," in the rough unwieldy bows of his coal barges, and the muddy water of his river. If we go to Mr. Severn, as we may go with all confidence in this picture, to learn how the water has tumbled upon the shore since the first moonlight fell upon the waves, so we may go to Mr. Wyllie to learn how, in the year of grace 1883, the barges and the bargees looked upon our national river. The life of nature and the life of man are represented in these pictures, and represented truly. One remark we must make here, in justice to Mr. Severn. He has been accused (we happened by chance to see the statement) in one of our most well-known evening contemporaries of having "too evidently painted this picture from a photograph." Nothing, we will venture to say, could be more unjust than such an accusation. The chief beauties of the work depend entirely upon subtleties of colour, as seen under moonlight, for which a photograph would be absolutely useless, and it is excessively doubtful whether a photograph could have helped the artist in any portion of the picture. The truth does not lie in this direction. Mr. Severn, greatly influenced as his work has been by Mr. Ruskin's teaching, is an unwearied student of Nature; and he has studied breaking waves especially, so fully and so sympathetically, that he knows their features as a youngster knows the face of his sweetheart, truly and minutely, and yet through a veil of fancy and a glow of feeling. As a little bit of technical criticism, perhaps we shall be pardoned for drawing attention to the magnificent artistic dexterity with which Mr. Wyllie has treated the "black diamonds" of his barges. To paint a long string of laden coal barges, showing the contents plainly, without making the picture dull in effect, false in colour, or exaggerated in light and shade, is a real artistic triumph. Mr. Wyllie has done it with an amount of brilliant ease such as perhaps can only be fully appreciated by a painter, but the truth of the work and the interest of the picture lie open to every one who knows the scene, and feels a little interest in this side of English life.

Close to these there are two pictures, of "Roses" and "Poppies," by Mr. Fantin, of which we said incidentally in our last article a harsh, though, we fully believe, a true word. We would add here that they are, in everything but the inner feeling of the painting, most splendid pieces of work. In artistic skill they leave nothing to be desired, and are to any other life in this exhibition as wine to water. The artist has not quite got at the quietness of the life of flowers, and has endued them a little with what we hold to be alien to their nature; but if he does not see them fully, he does see them strongly and truly, and what he sees, he can paint to an extent which comes very near to perfection.

We have now spoken of three fine pieces of artists' work. Let us say a few words upon a kind of work which is opposed in character to these, and which, by its prevalence in this exhibition (and in nearly all English exhibitions) goes far towards swamping the better style. "Wanting! a name for this holiday number of the Graphic style of art," which gives us dressed-up children and dressed-up sentiment, from the intellectual point of view of a young ladies' school, the social and emotional stand-point of an Oxford-Street dressmaker,—pictures in which a dog or a cat is introduced, and combined with silk stockings and dress-improvers, till the poor beast loses all its beasthood, and with it all its beauty, and becomes a mere toy-thing of fur or hide, playing a sham human part in a sham human comedy. One instance of this is, perhaps, as good as a hundred, and no instance could be better than Mr. Burton Barber's "Coaxing is Better than Scratching." A table-cloth and a wicker-work chair, partly seen, form the surroundings of this precious work, wherein a child of nine or ten, dressed up to the nines in white frock and blue sash, and silk stockings, and shoes with rosettes, is poised against the edge of a table, at an angle of about forty-five, whilst a cat rubs its head against her arm. The whole picture is painted with great clearness and dexterity, and will undoubtedly be bought, if it is not bought already, by one of the illustrated papers, to reproduce as a "coloured plate;" and there are scores, if not hundreds, in this gallery, of a similar nature. It is, perhaps, worth noting by any reader who cares for pictures, that in work of this kind the public not only get bad art and sham feeling, but they get, almost inevitably, a vulgarity of treatment which is beyond description. In the opinion of the writer of this article, nothing could be more alien to the spirit of childhood, nothing more intrinsically and detestably vulgar, than these combinations of canine and feline life, with millinery and childhood. And it must be remembered that the wide-spread painting of these pictures, which have increased in number enormously during the last ten years, is due in no small measure to the encouragement which is afforded to the artists by the proprietors, or rather, the managers, of the illustrated papers. It is sad to see that one of the greatest living English animal painters has been of late seduced into prostituting his art to this purpose; and who can wonder that lesser men follow,—

"When Astur clears the way."

Let us talk of pleasanter things. If Mr. Wyllie's and Mr. Severn's pictures are, on the whole, the most interesting in the exhibition, there can be no doubt that the pleasantest is Mr. F. D. Millet's picture, called simply, "The Window Seat." This is a woman in a white gown, sitting sewing, against a white-curtained window. The picture is absolutely perfect in its quiet refinement of feeling, its sense of placid, decent life, its atmosphere of home and peace. It has, too, another quality, slightly more subtle, which grows slowly into distinctness. This is a certain quaint grace and refinement of its own, something which separates it from the slightly heavy, prosaic goodness of the English character, and imparts a touch of gaiety to its virtue, and liveliness to its repose. The woman is sewing, but we feel that she has not sewn for ever, that it is not impossible she will leave off, and with her work put away her cares of the household. A delightful picture, thoroughly well painted, unaffected, and graceful. We heartily congratulate the young American artist upon a genuine success, none the less real because its subject is so comparatively trivial.

It is unpleasant to have to say hard words of a man who has done good work, and who still possesses great ability; but in truth there is no more irritating sight in this exhibition than the two figure subjects which Mr. E. J. Gregory sends. One is a little girl picking caterpillars off some rhubarb-leaves; the other, a little girl resting in a chair with a palette in her hand. Both are trivial, uninteresting, and vulgar, of no conceivable interest to any one, except what must come from the spectacle of an artist of great power lowering his abilities to the level of vulgar common-place. Here and there, as, for instance, in the colour of "Caterpillars," the old, artistic power of the painter shines out; but it only makes more dreary in its light, the lack of meaning, the lack of beauty, the lack of feeling, grace, gentleness, and gentillesse which accompanies it. As the present writer was, perhaps, the first in England to appreciate Mr. Gregory's great powers, we do not scruple to say that he is at the present time wilfully and doing work of which he ought to be ashamed.

"Spoiling the heritage in his gift,"

Mr. George Clausen has a large and successful picture in this Gallery, called "Day-Dreams," an old and a young peasant-woman sitting under a tree in a hay-field. The old woman is sleeping, the young one dreaming. The picture is full of artistic ability,—it is delicate in its grey colouring, true in its out-of-door effect, and the subject is skilfully treated. But we cannot notice this work on its merits without saying that it is, in colour and manner, a most manifest and unmistakeable copy of the painting of M. Bastien Lepage. It is so like indeed, that were it not a little less delicate in colour and vigorous in conception, it might pass as one of the last-mentioned artist's works. This is not a trivial or an accidental resemblance, which might be unconscious or accidental, but it is a deliberate adoption by Mr. Clausen of the style of the young French painter, and we regret to say that so clever an artist should be willing to sink his own individuality so completely.

We have had occasion to speak several times of Mr. Henry Woods' work, and to remark upon its rather trivial interpretations of Venice and Venetian life, but we must say that his small work in this exhibition (about a third of his usual size), entitled, "The Market of the Rialto," is one of the most fresh and spirited bits of street painting which we have ever seen. It possesses all the good qualities of his larger pictures, and the slight element of coarseness which is to be found in them is absent from the smaller work. A very good piece of work this, as good of its kind as anything in the exhibition.

and especially to be noticed for its brilliance of colour, and what we may, perhaps, call the free minuteness of its painting.

There are two large landscapes which must be mentioned, though we have little space to do much more than mention them. Mr. Keeley Halswelle's river scene, entitled, "Opening Day," and Mr. Alfred Parsons', "The Daylight Dies." The first is fine in its rendering of the reeds and river; but the sky is coarsely painted, and lacks all tenderness and beauty of colour. The second is a far finer piece of work, but is not quite free from that suspicion of heaviness and that lack of interest which are apt to attach to Mr. Parsons' work. This is a picture which is the work of a thorough artist and a thorough painter, but it is a little heavy, and more than a little unsympathetic. But the manner is fine, and it is notable that it is almost the only picture in the Gallery which aims at reproducing a landscape with any grandeur of composition. Those who care to see the difference between really fine painting and work of lesser quality, should look at the painting of the grass and reeds and brambles in Mr. Parsons' foreground, and then at the brush work of Mr. Halswelle's large picture.

Mr. Caton Woodville has a clever, Oriental, sketchy picture of a fight at a ford (in Egypt), full of his spirited drawing and vigour, and a pleasant contrast to the milk-and-water subjects of the surrounding pictures. Mr. Dampier May, a young artist, has a rather good picture of a girl in brown, walking along the Chelsea Embankment, quiet and unaffected. There is a good Tadema, an indifferent Long, and a fair Riviere.

BOOKS.

THESE two goodly octavo volumes bring the late Lord Lytton's life down to the age of twenty-eight. At this rate, the work can hardly be completed in less space than some half-dozen more volumes. Surely this is a mistake, not less in the interest of the subject than from a literary point of view. "The unpublished manuscripts bequeathed to me by my father," says the biographer "(in addition to his private correspondence and note-books), consist of several dramas, completely finished; an entire volume of his History of Athens, never published; a few sketches, made for some other historical works; and an immense number of unfinished novels, plays, poems, and essays." These, or a selection from them, the biographer intends, as we gather from his title-page and preface, to weave into the record of his father's life, as he has done in the volumes before us, a considerable part of which is filled with some of the late Lord Lytton's unfinished novels. The effect on the ordinary reader is to distract his attention, and leave him, at the conclusion of the biography, with a confused impression of the subject of it. Would it not be much better to separate the "Life" from the "Remains"? We trust that it is not yet too late for Lord Lytton to adopt the plan we recommend. It is probable that he would thereby diminish the number of those who would read the "Remains,"—and so much the better, for the publication of unfinished "Remains" by so prolific a writer as Lord Lytton is a mistake,—but he would find his compensation in the largely increased number of the readers of the "Life."

Barring the plan of his work, we have but little fault to find with Lord Lytton's execution of it, so far. Contrary to what might be inferred from some public notices of the book, his treatment of the delicate question of his parents' married life is in excellent taste. Not equally in good-taste, let alone prudence, are political innuendos like the following (of which, however, there are but few). During his undergraduate career at Cambridge the late Lord Lytton drew up a scheme for a History of the British Public, which, for a youth of twenty-one, is certainly remarkable for the breadth and liberality of its views, and the extent of Bulwer's reading. In this scheme Ireland has a place, and young Bulwer's panacea was, in brief, to leave the relations of landlord and tenant alone; "put political questions at rest for a while;" "let the Church sleep;" but "provide employment that brings profitable returns." Let the Government "purchase lands," "or encourage companies for that purpose on a large scale and in every district." In short, make Ireland a garden of Eden, by covering its soil with prosperous industries, green fields, golden harvests, and smiling orchards; and then "you can tax the Irish people for the maintenance of their own ecclesiastical establishments. Be firm in putting down crime. Go back to analogous states of society. Divide into districts. Make each district responsible for the crimes committed in it." Such is Bulwer's synopsis of the Irish question and its solution; and his son's comment is:—"Perhaps some readers may find in these suggestions of a youth of twenty-one more indication of political wisdom than is yet generally perceptible in the latest experiments of septuagenarian statesmanship upon the government of Ireland." So far as the undergraduate's crude and amiable dream was feasible, it had ample trial. "Put political questions at rest for a while. Let the Church sleep." This was written in 1824, and the remedy was tried. But political and ecclesiastical questions have an inconvenient habit of awaking out of sleep; and so Tory Governments have found when they have attempted to govern Ireland by the method of coercion, tempered only by lollipops and slumber. Lord Lytton does not explain where the money was to come from that was to do such wonders for Ireland while the Church was to remain established and the relations of landlords and tenants unredressed. Nor does he see that no amount of pecuniary bribes can ever turn injustice into justice. We require no further proof of the present Lord Lytton's incapacity for serious statesmanship than his approval of a policy for Ireland which, to say nothing else, would still exclude Roman Catholics from the House of Commons. It was under a Tory Government that the questions of Catholic Emancipation, of Disestablishment, of the Land League, came to the front and refused to sleep any longer. And as to "the latest experiments of septuagenarian statesmanship," it certainly has had as large a measure of success as could reasonably have been expected under the circumstances. There can, of course, be no objection to Lord Lytton's expressing his opinion on any political question that comes naturally into his way in his account of his father's life, provided he does it in a becoming manner. But to make the life of his father a vehicle for irrelevant sneers against living statesmen is a blunder not only in taste but in tactics.

The perusal of Lord Lytton's Life, a considerable and by far the most interesting part of which is autobiographical, to the point at which these volumes have left it gives us a far higher opinion of him as a man than we had before. His son seems to us to have faithfully fulfilled his promise neither "to reduce a single feature nor suppress a single incident that seems to me less admirable than the rest." The biography strikes us as an exceedingly fair one, and it says much for the character of Bulwer (as he was called till he succeeded to his mother's property), that it gains more than it loses by the frankness of the biographer. The circumstances connected with his marriage and with the first years of his married life do him the highest honour, and show him to have been, then at least, a man of rare independence and generosity of character. At the age of seventeen he had a romantic attachment, which he cherished for life. While at school at Ealing he met and fell in love with a young lady somewhat his senior. The feeling was mutual. But the young lovers knew nothing of each other's families, nor, indeed, of each other, beyond love-rambles in the fields. The young lady suddenly ceased to meet her lover, and he found out that she had been forced by her father into an uncongenial marriage, from which death, after a few years, released her,—a victim, as Bulwer believed, of disappointed love. To the last day of his life he glorified this girl as a kind of Beatrice, whose image haunted him perpetually, and whom he loved with a devotion which could never be given to another. Yet, in spite of this life-long attachment, Bulwer had several other love-affairs before he married. The heroine of one of these love-affairs was a beautiful young gipsy, who so captivated the forlorn lover at first sight that he there and then went off with her to the gipsy camp, where he lived for some days, till he was expelled, much against his will, through the jealousy of some of the gipsy beaux. It may be difficult to reconcile these transient amours with the "early sorrow" at the loss of his first love, a sorrow so acute and enduring "that the traces of it were never wholly effaced." But Bulwer himself, in an essay on Constancy (to which his son does not refer), written in after-years, maintains the thesis that a man may have one overmastering, life-long attachment, yet be capable at the same time of subordinate attachments, without detriment to the purity and depth of the first love. The truth probably is that "his nature," as his son has said, "was so constituted that affection, in some shape or other, was the paramount condition of its happiness." Accordingly, he flitted about from one object of affection to another till he was finally caught, at the age of twenty-four, by the beautiful Irish girl who became his wife. Nothing can come out in the further development of Bulwer's character that can efface the true generosity of his conduct in the very trying circumstances connected with that marriage. His mother, who had an austere standard of parental obedience, and acted it out in her own life, doated on him. Somewhat unhappily married herself, she had but little to do with the bringing-up of her two eldest sons. So that her love was concentrated on her youngest, the subject of this biography. To him she intended to leave her own ancestral property of Knebworth, and she made him meanwhile a handsome allowance. She resented therefore his falling in love without consulting her with the beautiful Miss Wheeler, and imperatively forbade the further prosecution of a suit to which she could never give her consent. Bulwer's devotion to his mother is very beautiful. He gave her a solemn promise that he would never marry Miss Wheeler without his mother's consent, and went abroad in the hope of conquering his passion. But various circumstances kept it alive, not the least influential being his mother's harsh and unjust treatment of Miss Wheeler, whose home was an unhappy one. The end of it was that Bulwer engaged himself to Miss Wheeler, and had consequently to bear the full brunt of his mother's bitter anger. She held him to his promise; and the series of letters in which he endeavoured to obtain her consent to his marriage are models of filial devotion, dignity, and chivalrous honour. He broke his promise at last, married without his mother's consent, resigned the allowance which he had hitherto enjoyed from her bounty, and betook himself with his beautiful bride to a house in the country, where he slaved with his pen to provide an income for his household suitable to the position which he was ambitious to occupy. He wrote not only novels, but worked hard as a writer on the Press, turning even his experiences in the difficulties of making both ends meet into pecuniary profit. His son says that he made at this time an income of about £3,000 a year. He made various efforts to be reconciled to his mother, but without success; and the estrangement lasted for some years. A reconciliation at last took place between son and mother; but Bulwer's wife was not included in the amnesty. This consummation, however, was at last achieved, but only to be interrupted almost immediately. Mrs. Bulwer-Lytton fancied that her daughter-in-law had not met her first advance with a sufficient demonstration of grateful affection, and she wrote to Bulwer to complain that his wife, whom she "maintained," had not shown herself sufficiently dutiful. Bulwer resented keenly the taunt of his wife being "maintained" by his mother, and replied in a letter full of pathetic pride and wounded affection. He returned to his mother the first instalment of the renewed allowance, and declined to receive any more favours of the kind from her. His son says, probably with truth, that to Mrs. Bulwer-Lytton's injudicious treatment of him was probably due, in no small degree, the eventual wreck of Bulwer's domestic happiness. It is clear that for the first few years of his married life the relations between himself and his wife were of the most affectionate character. But the incessant drudgery of daily work both kept him away from the society of his wife, and affected him with "an irritability which sometimes made him absolutely unapproachable." "I fear there is no chance of Edward getting better," said his wife, in a letter to her mother-in-law, "for he undertakes a degree of labour that positively, without exaggeration, no three persons could have the health and time to achieve. So incessantly is he occupied, that I seldom or never see him till about two or three in the morning, for five minutes. And it is no use for me to tell him that he will only defeat all the objects of his life, by attempting more than he can compass. Poor fellow! my remonstrances only irritate him." Mrs. Bulwer, we learn on the authority of her son, endured those outbursts of temper with a silent gentleness which filled her husband with remorse when the fit was over; and he tried to make up for his violence by costly presents, which he could ill afford. An extract from one of Mrs. Bulwer's own letters corroborates this. "The little rift within the lute" gradually widened, till the music became wholly and for ever mute, though we see only the premonitory symptoms of the catastrophe in these volumes. It is sad to think that if his mother's harsh and unwise conduct had not compelled Bulwer to shatter his nerves by too hard work, he and his wife might have lived together in tolerable happiness to the end of the chapter.

It is always interesting to learn the methods of work adopted by successful literary men. Mr. Anthony Trollope has let us into the secret of his method. He got through so much work by composing regularly three hours every day before breakfast. Bulwer appears to have set himself a somewhat similar rule. In addressing a boys' school in the year 1854, he said:—

"A man, to get through work well, must not overwork himself; or if he do too much to-day, the reaction of fatigue will come, and he will be obliged to do too little to-morrow. Now, since I began really and earnestly to study, which was not till after I had left college, and was actually in the world, I may, perhaps, say that I have gone through as large a course of general reading as most men of my time. I have travelled much, I have mixed up in politics and in the various business of life, and in addition to this, I have published somewhere about sixty volumes, some upon subjects requiring much special research. And what time do you think, as a general rule, I have devoted to study,—to reading and writing? Not more than three hours a day, and when Parliament is sitting not always that. But then, during those hours, I have given my whole attention to what I was about. Thus, you see, it does not require so very much time at a stretch to get through a considerable amount of brain-work; but it requires application regularly and daily continued."

His son, however, tells us that "this account demands copious qualification. The historical romance of Harold was completed in less than a month, and it is no exaggeration to say that my father was engaged upon it nearly day and night for more than three weeks. His work was no less continuous during the composition of Lucretia and the Oaxtons, Kenelm Chillingly and the Parisians." We have already quoted Mrs. Bulwer's account of her husband's incessant toil. These, however, were "spurts" in a more equable routine of literary work. Bulwer probably meant that the whole of his composition and special preparation would, if spread over his literary life, occupy about three hours a day.

Bulwer gives a vivid account of his school life and of his life at Cambridge, where he had Macaulay, Praed, and other brilliant men for contemporaries. He was successful in competition for a prize poem, and was among the leading speakers at the Union, but did not otherwise distinguish himself at the University.

Lord Lytton has given us some interesting letters between his father and Mr. Disraeli when they were both young authors, and Bulwer's share of the correspondence is certainly the more creditable. His literary standing was at that time, and indeed always, higher than Disraeli's; and he gives some excellent advice, with great kindness and tact, to his more youthful aspirant to fame. "I would have you write a book," he says, "not only to succeed, but to have that form of success which will hereafter be agreeable to yourself." "You do not seem to me to do justice to your own powers, when you are so indulgent to flippancies! Put yourself some morning in a bad humour with antithesis and Voltaire." "The flippancies I allude to are an ornate and showy effeminacy." And he gives as examples,—"He looked like a Messiah, and took wine," "He looked up, not to the sky, but the ceiling." There is a characteristic letter from Mr. Disraeli, dated from Constantinople, in December, 1830, from which it appears that his Turkish sympathies originated in his boyhood, and really belonged to the Oriental cast of his imagination and character:—

"I confess to you," he says, "that my Turkish prejudices are very much confirmed by my residence in Turkey. The life of this people greatly accords with my taste, which is naturally somewhat indolent and melancholy. . . . To repose on voluptuous ottomans, and smoke superb pipes, daily to indulge in the luxuries of a bath which requires half-a-dozen attendants for its perfection; to court the air in a carved caique, by shores which are a perpetual scene; and to find no exertion greater than a canter on a barb; this is, I think, a far more sensible life than all the bustle of clubs, all the boring of drawing-rooms, and all the coarse vulgarity of our political controversies. And this, I assure you, is, without colouring or exaggeration, the life which may be here commanded. A life accompanied by a thousand sources of calm enjoyment, and a thousand modes of mellowed pleasure, which it would weary you to relate, and which I leave to your own lively imagination."

Circumstances and the promptings of his own ambition made Mr. Disraeli's own life a very different one from his ideal; but it was to the ideal that he clung to the very last as the most desirable mode of existence,—a life of calm, indolent sybaritism, environed by pomp and glitter. For him, the Turkish tobacco would have lost half its aroma, had its smoke been inhaled from other than "superb pipes," and the bath would have been robbed of its chief luxury, but for the showy crowd of attendants. That this genuine Oriental should have become the leader of the aristocracy and squirearchy of England is one of the marvels of history. A leader of the English democracy he never was, and never could become; and the Tories have never made a greater tactical blunder than in imagining that Lord Beaconsfield's is a name to conjure with under a household franchise. Bulwer's mind was of a much manlier type, and his generosity towards assailants presents a further striking contrast to Mr. Disraeli's character. With true Oriental implacability, Mr. Disraeli treasured and nursed his wrongs till he found an opportunity of revenging himself on his assailant. And his revenge often took a form in which it was impossible to confront it. Witness his virulent attack on Mr. Goldwin Smith, in Lothair, and on Thackeray (long after his death), in Endymion. Bulwer was assailed by Thackeray and others somewhat bitterly. He winced with keen sensitiveness under the infliction, and retaliated occasionally, in a manly way, with his face to his foes. But he never made his novels the vehicles of his revenge; and in later life he relieved the distress of several of his assailants, both out of his private purse and by his patronage as a Minister of the Crown. It is due to his memory also to say that larger experience of life convinced him that the tendency of his earlier works of fiction was unwholesome. He suppressed one of them; and his later novels, with all their faults and low standard of morals, diffuse a much healthier atmosphere.

"THICKER THAN WATER."*

MR. PAYN strikes us, in his character of novelist, as a cross between Wilkie Collins and Walter Besant. He has the love of the former for dark and grand mysteries and for persons of preternatural cleverness, and the love of the latter for large-hearted generosity on a great scale. But then he has none of Wilkie Collins's marvellous—we might almost say mathematical—power of constructing the intricate portions of his tale, and calculating their dimensions; and none of his skill in fitting and piecing them together so as to make a symmetrical whole, of wonderful unity and completeness. Nor do we detect, on the other hand, the ulterior motive of genuine patriotism and philanthropy, which turns the smile of amusement at the generous quixotism of Besant into a feeling of warm admiration. Mr. Payn's mysteries have nothing to excite the imagination or to defy the inquisitiveness of the reader, as Wilkie Collins's have; and his millions are not so spent as to leave the world brighter, and happier, and purer, as Mr. Besant's are. For these very reasons, however, Mr. Payn's stories more nearly approach tales of real life than those of the purveyors of fiction to whom we have been comparing him. But though Mr. Payn, especially in his humorous tales, often gives a great charm to the real side of life, he has not succeeded, in the novel before us, in reaching the usual standard of his literary work.

Mr. Beryl Peyton is the hero of this novel—though younger men do the duty for him of falling in love and getting into and out of trouble—and we cannot at all echo the encomium upon him with which the author winds up his third volume:—"Of all the persons described in this little life-drama, Beryl Peyton will live longest in human remembrance, and, in my poor judgment, with all his faults, will deserve to live." In our poor judgment, his only claim to have lived at all was that, doubtless, like most men not utterly bad, he often wished to do right. But few men, we should say, were ever painted who spent enormous wealth so extremely injudiciously, with so little regard to any one's judgment except his own, such profound indifference to the wishes and pleadings of those nearest to him, such violent prejudices, obstinate self-will, or vindictive and revengeful passions. His only redeeming point is a blind and most hasty and foolish impulse of generosity; a generosity which is purely selfish, as it costs him only money, of which he has infinitely more than he knows what to do with, and which is not accompanied by any denial of personal comfort, or any attempt to add that kindness of manner to his gift of money which is the soul of all true charity. Very luckily, the reader's feelings are not outraged by this brutal style of patronage, since the recipients of it are, almost without exception—thanks to Mr. Beryl Peyton's self-will and want of judgment—undeserving of any kindness whatever, and we can only rejoice in their successive downfalls. But first let us dispose of Mr. Peyton. At any rate, he is a wonderful man. He is old, and yet his strength is immense; he is the sort of man we meet with, not unfrequently, in romance, who with a touch of his thumb rolls strong fellows in the gutter; he has been all over the world and is master of everybody's secret, and recognises devoted admirers and deadly enemies in the most unexpected places and with the same unmoved self-possession. He is followed by an assassin whose wicked schemes he has frustrated, but a dumb friend is behind the assassin; and the latter finds himself first in a deep dock, whence there is no escape, and next lying huddled, a filthy mass, on the top of the dock wall, saved by the clemency of the grand old man. Mr. Beryl Peyton is eccentric, as well as strong and merciful. He dines alone at the annual dinner of his club, where the rule is that covers shall be laid for all the original members, whether alive or dead. Mr. Beryl Peyton takes the chair, proposes the toasts with solemn ceremony, and sees the festive mummery to the end in a ghastly silence and solitude. He fills his Hall in Devonshire with needy adventurers, who have flattered some or other of his weaknesses. He is courteous but terrible to his wife, and finally allows a vindictive hatred to the dead to lead him to do gross and most unnatural injustice to the innocent living. We cannot, therefore, endorse the author's estimate of his principal character. That he is often generous and sometimes tender, is true, but these qualities are called out by impulse only, and exercised without principle.

Of the other characters in this story,—which may be said to have inaugurated Longman's new magazine,—none are favourites with us, and there is a want of the element of domestic interest, which we have so often enjoyed in Mr. Payn's stories. Here is no home,—neither in the Great Devonshire Hall, crowded with adventurous sycophants, nor in the rich, three-times-married Mrs. Beckett's Park-Lane reception-rooms, nor in Mrs. Tidman's boarding establishment, nor in the Widow Sotheran's melancholy cottage. There is much able and amusing caricature, but little nature; Charlie Sotheran alone strikes us as at once pleasant and natural, and he does not play a very conspicuous part. Mrs. Beryl and Mrs. Sotheran are too feebly amiable to gain our interest or respect; Mrs. Beckett too vulgar—not to say worse—though her passion for young Dornay, and her schemes for gratifying it, are sketched with force and some humour; and of the Dornays, the elder is too thoroughly, and the younger too feebly, bad. There remain Mr. and Mrs. Tidman and the occupants of their boarding-house, and, if we did not know our Dickens so well, we should be even more amused than we are with Mrs. Tidman's reminiscences of the higher life from which she has sunk, of the customs of Slopton Manor-house, and especially of the gloves which her aunt, Lady Theresa Blenkinshouse, always wore, even at breakfast and in hot weather—and of the five hundred slaves which her grandfather had owned—"not in livery, it is true, far from it—but all devoted to his sovereign will." Her airs and graces, her snubbings of any guests who contradict her, and the very cheerful and contented but abject bondage in which she keeps her useful husband, remind us very pleasantly of many of Dickens's very silly but very amusing women. Miss Julia—one of her lodgers—is even more than amusing,—pathetic in her feebleness and in her fear of her elder sister, who sternly represses her aspiration to be a poet. But our heroine is the lodger of most interest, and we wish we could feel as deep a devotion to her as we like to do to heroines of fiction. Unfortunately, the passion of her heart does not at all approve itself either to our taste or judgment, and perhaps prejudices us against her; and her vigorous independence of action and introduction of the type-writing machine, by which she is to earn a livelihood, quench the little remnant of chivalric interest which, in the outset, we are inclined to feel in her fate. We see that she is more able to take care of herself than she is to fascinate and subdue us. As in all Mr. Payn's books, there is humour, and power, and some originality, in Thicker than Water; but its plot is far-fetched, its dramatis personæ unusually wanting in individual interest and in some instances sketched with grotesque extravagance, and its dénouement only saved by an accident from shocking deeply our sense of justice.

THE BLACK PRINCE.*

CONSIDERING the eager interest with which contemporary records of English history have been searched of late, it is strange that the task of translating Chandos Herald's metrical chronicle of The Life and Feats of Arms of the Black Prince should have been left to the skill of a foreign writer. That it has been so is probably to our advantage, for M. Francisque Michel's scholarship and mastery of both the English and French language enables him to give us a well-nigh faultless edition of the fourteenth-century text, and a rendering in modern English that only an adept in mediæval literature could have produced. Just as no student of Chaucer should be ignorant of Anglo-Norman French, so the annotator of Chandos Herald cannot do his work without familiar knowledge of the tongue used in Aquitaine and Gascony, where Edward and his Court were more at home than in England. The greater part of the preface to this beautiful book is reprinted from a previous edition of the manuscript by the late Rev. H. O. Coxe, librarian of the Bodleian Library, for the Roxburghe Club, but M. Michel takes credit for a complete rehabilitation of the text, unattempted before; for what was unintelligible in French, and therefore, of course, untranslatable, he has substituted locutions current at the probable date of the chronicle. None but a finished scholar, such as is M. Michel, would have had the courage to do this, and perhaps from no one else should we have readily accepted such emendations. As it is, he has given us a most interesting and characteristic fragment of history, enriched with notes that ought to have rare value for those who claim descent from the governing class of the time, and which also interest the student who would try to comprehend the temper and the social ties of the men who still so largely influence us, and remain like basaltic reefs in the flux and reflux of revolution. The ideas which still give a sub-sacred flavour to the pages of Burke and Debrett were in full force when the Black Prince and his fellow-knights of the Garter rivalled those of the Round Table, and in Roncesvalles itself revived the fame of Roland and Oliver. No doubt, by his profession, Chandos Herald was inclined to dwell on the heroic aspect of the warfare in which he played himself so constant a part. Yet, though attached to the accomplished Sir John Chandos, he is so austere reticent in style, and so resolved to resemble in nothing the minstrels and jongleurs of camp and court, that we must needs accept his relation as accurate, though maintained at a hyperchivalrous level. Two-thirds of it are devoted to Edward's Spanish campaign, of which Chandos was an eye-witness; and that Froissart esteemed him perfectly authentic we know by his occasional reference to Chandos le Héraut, from whom, it would seem, the great chronicler obtained much of his minute information concerning the Black Prince's affairs. All the more perplexity do we feel as we enter this atmosphere of rarified Quixotism. We touch real history, we know too much of Edward's environment to relegate him to mythic regions. Sir John Chandos, "the most illustrious knight in the world," according to his contemporary, the great Duguesclin, Sir James Audley, even Sir William Felton, might have ridden in Chaucer's company with the shrewd host of the Tabard; in these pages they stand out without a hint, even such as Froissart gives, of the earth on which they rode. But though at some cost of imagination, it is not amiss to link together with what sympathy we can these strong men intoxicated by the feudal idea and the Jacques Bonhommes, the rank and file of the European struggle towards its national crystallisation. Dry and severe as is this poem, it tells a part of the truth, and has nothing in common with the "rimes et livres rimés," which "n'ataignent en riens la vraie matière," and which did so much to corrupt the knightly idea. Except on what may be called official occasions, Chandos tells of no emotions softer than those of the battlefield. He is silent about the Dulcineas of his heroes, as is the Song of Roland. He denies us the gossip which makes Froissart still amusing, while wives of Bath, millers, and reeves were sternly excluded from his mirror, where "chivalers" are glassed, and of which the Black Prince is ever the centre,—

The Life and Feats of Arms of Edward the Black Prince. By Chandos Herald. A Metrical Chronicle, with an English Translation and Notes, by Francisque Michel, F.A.S., London, Scotland, &c.

"La parfite racine
De tout honneur et nobleté,
De sens, valour et largité."

He lays great stress on individual action, and mentions the rescue of Edward III. at Crecy by his valiant son, then only sixteen years old, of which Froissart says nothing. He gives a busier part to Cardinal Jalletrand, who tried to avert the battle of Poitiers. He relates the proposal of the French knight, Geoffroy de Chagny, that a hundred men from either army should there decide the French and English quarrel by combat. The domestic and even the political details of his hero's career are indifferent to the Herald, who cares little for local colour, and never suffers his Prince to come down from the somewhat arid heights of exalted chivalry. The beautiful Countess of

Kent, whom Edward married without his father's consent, is but the conventional consort, who enhances by her grief the reader's sense of her lord's danger when he starts for his knight-errantry in behalf of King Pedro the Cruel, though the simple narrative remains touching almost in spite of the austere chronicler:—

"Very kindly, then, did they embrace, and took leave with kisses. Then might you see dames in tears and damsels to grieve; the one wept for her lover, and the other also for her husband. The Princess suffered such grief, being then great with child, that from sorrow she was delivered, and brought forth a lovely son, who was named Richard, at which all were much rejoiced; and the Prince, so God help me, was also right glad at heart; and it was commonly said, 'See here a right good beginning.'"

The Herald devotes two-thirds of his poem to the third and least admirable of the Black Prince's military expeditions, partly, as it would seem, because in the defiles of Navarre and in the twilight land of Spain, the home of Moors and magicians, war assumed its most romantic shape. We marvel at the conception of loyal duty and fidelity which brought the noble Prince to side with the Nero of Castille, a King deposed by his people, and as mean and false as his illegitimate brother, Don Henry, who was chosen in his place, was generous and beloved. Scarcely a word escapes Chandos of the sufferings he must have endured, in common with his lord, during the Pyrenean marches, though he breaks forth once in remembrance of one fourteenth day of February when the vanguard struggled, "oultre les portz, a la noumbre de x. mille chivalx, oue graund peyne et dureté, et les gentz se logerent dedeinz Navarre." Chandos allows no complaint of the free companies who ravaged Europe, whenever they were not absorbed by king or prince in legitimate war, nor does he hint at the cruelties of Limoges. To men who were prus and hardi, and who kept their obligations as knights, all was forgiven. But to keep his obligations means much for a man, and doubtless from these founder Knights of the Garter and their French and Spanish peers have come the high estimate of personal honour and responsibility which have given European leaders their place in the world's progress. The personal prowess of Edward and his associates, attempted to the finest grain by the laws of chivalry, surpassed that of the Homeric and Virgilian heroes, though in one or two incidents it overleaped itself, and, as in Sir William Felton's case, who rushed among the Spaniards to certain death, it becomes mere Malayan running amuck. A pleasanter glimpse of one of these men of leading, and, in his case, of light, is when Sir John Chandos was created a banneret, an incident related by Froissart, probably from the Herald's report. Both the armies of Don Henry and the Prince being drawn up, and eager to fight at Najera:—

"Sir John Chandos came forthwith to the Prince, and there brought his banner, that was of silk, rich and costly, and said right gently, 'Sire,' says he, 'so God have mercy, I have served you in time past; and all the good that God has given me has reached me through you; and you well know that I am entirely yours, and always shall be; and if the place and time suit you, that I might be a banneret, I have enough of my own to serve the master that God has given me; now do your pleasure, see, I present it to you.' Then the Prince directly, and the King Pedro, with the Duke of Lancaster also, unfurled the banner, and presented it to him by the top, and said without more ado, 'God enable you to profit by it,' and Chandos took his banner, placed it among his companions, and said to them, with a glad countenance, 'Good sirs, here is my banner, defend it as your own, for it is as well yours as mine.'"

The great battle of Najera was, in the Herald's eyes, of more importance than those, better known to Englishmen, of Crecy and Poitiers; but the faithlessness of Pedro and the sufferings of Edward and his army, who had fought gallantly for an "idea" which failed them in its realisation, lost England what the Prince had gained for her. Seven years he had reigned in Guienne, and "all the lords and barons of the neighbouring country came to him to render homage; they looked upon him with one feeling as a good lord, loyal and wise," and, continues the Herald:—

"I may truly say that, since the birth of Christ, never was such good entertainment nor more honourable than these, for every day at his table he had more than eighty knights, and four times as many esquires. There made they jousts and revels in Angoulême and Bordeaux. There was found all nobleness, all joy and merriment, bounty, freedom, and honour. And all his lieges and his people loved him passionately, for he did them much good. Those who were about his person valued and loved him much, for liberality was his staff and nobleness his director; judgment had he, temperance and uprightness, reason, equity, and moderation. Rightly might men say that search the whole world, as it turns round, you could find no such Prince."

It is, indeed, not clear that Edward did not rank his principality of Aquitaine as a nobler title than his English one of Wales, and though he earned before his death the love of the English people by his opposition to his brother, John of Gaunt's, high-handed pretensions, we think of him rather as the aspirant to the French crown than as successor to Edward III. But Castille was fatal to his health, and once the strong hand could no longer enforce the strong will of the hero, the Gascon barons fell away, the French King assumed a sovereignty that had been in abeyance, and nine years of decaying power would have been but a cloudy ending to the story, but for his Christian and princely death, to which the Herald devotes nearly a hundred lines. It is difficult for us, who have somewhat decomposed our religious feeling into a respectable amiability, to understand the earnestness with which the fighting men of the fourteenth century heard mass before a battle, and invoked the most sacred sanctions in their worst cruelties of warfare. To fight in a just cause was more excellent than to maintain peace. No doubt, more care was taken to assure themselves of the justice of the cause; and while the obligations of chivalry were imperative, the personal responsibility even of the private soldier was secured by his thoroughly understanding in what quarrel his leader was engaged. From Chandos Herald we get even a vivid idea of the courage and skill of the English archers than from Froissart. Opposed to their rivals, the Spanish slingers, their "arrows flew thicker than rain in winter-time," at Najera; and at Poitiers, "thicker than ever feather flew before." Every soldier knew why he shouted his war-cry, and the letters of Don Henry and Edward quoted by the Herald were doubtless canvassed as no modern officer would question Foreign-Office notes.

There is much to learn in this interesting book. It throws a side-light on the rival policies of the French and English Kings. The courts of Paris and Avignon, undermining the feudal hierarchy, while those of Bordeaux and Westminster, with singular short-sightedness, called to the aid of their extreme doctrines of feudal obligation the influence of Wicliffe and the power of Parliaments. We have not even mentioned the controversies touching metre and style which are treated in an appendix. The notes give much information about personages mentioned in the poem which would be unattainable elsewhere without difficult research, and in them the reader frequently comes across names which have been made household words by Chaucer and Shakespeare. Until the world as it is has perished, and another has struggled from its fragments, we cannot expect a Black Prince or a Chandos Herald, but men such as they were in deed and belief have left behind them ineradicable traditions. It is well to examine the influence which binds us still, and respect the men who have left a deeper impression on their descendants than any existing class is likely now to do. Their power is to this day active and undeniable. Whence had they it?

COLERIDGE AS THINKER AND CRITIC.*

THAT Mr. Ashe has collected in this volume for the first time all the extant criticism of Coleridge on the English Dramatists, entitles him as editor to the thanks of the reading public. Notwithstanding the fact that this book is made up of lectures which are necessarily marred by countless repetitions, inasmuch as they date from different periods and handle the same subject; yet the thoughts here presented are of such value that we gladly overlook all shortcomings in the manner of treatment. These thoughts, too, are of no narrow range. From the drama, as from a point of vantage, Coleridge looks out over the whole expanse of life, and accordingly this book is sufficient to mark his place as a thinker and critic. Hitherto, he has been, in our opinion, decidedly underrated. Every one knows how Mr. Arnold compares him with Joubert,—how, both being men "of extraordinary ardour in the search for truth, and of extraordinary fineness in the perception of it," the critic yet gives to Joubert the palm for "delicacy and penetration," while admitting Coleridge's pre-eminence in "richness and power." Now, at first sight, such a comparison must seem unfair to Coleridge, for it leaves his exquisite lyrical talent and his high imaginative power out of the reckoning. Such a line as "The fair humanities of old religions," has another and a higher value than a mere bald statement of the same truth could have. Yet, as insight into truth is the very essence of genius, Coleridge must abide the comparison according to this test. Nor need he fear it; the supremacy would still be his, even were the contest decided in a still narrower field, even were it in Joubert's special domain of moral truth. Here are two of Joubert's most characteristic sayings, both of them hall-marked by Mr. Arnold,— "Piety is not a religion, though it is the soul of all religions, just as philanthropy is not patriotism," and, "If a truth is nude and crude, that is a proof it has not been steeped long enough in the soul;" and over against them we place this one line of Coleridge, "Religion is the will in the reason, and love in the will." By the "will in the reason" Coleridge understands the practice of goodness, as well as the knowledge of truth; and these, with love added, he tells us, constitute religion. But if in this instance Coleridge's insight be ascribed, as it may well be, to his Puritan training, here is a thought which for "delicacy and penetration" cannot be matched in Joubert, or even in Pascal,— "As the power of seeing is to light, so is an idea in mind to a law in nature; they are correlatives which suppose each other." Nor is Joubert the only thinker whom Coleridge has anticipated:—

"In older times, writers were looked up to as intermediate beings between angels and men; afterwards, they were regarded as venerable and, perhaps, inspired teachers; subsequently, they descended to the level of learned and instructive friends; but in modern days, they are deemed culprits more than benefactors."

This thought is surely the one which came, some twenty years later, to light in Carlyle's Heroes and Hero-worship. And do we not seem to hear Mr. Arnold himself speaking, when we read such sentences as these?—

"I never have discovered the wrong use of a thing, without having previously discovered the right use of it. . . . It is always unwise to judge of anything by its defects. . . . If a man show me beauties, I thank him for his information. . . . The great end of the body politic appears to be to humanise, and assist in the progressiveness of, the animal man."

Evidently, we must go to a far greater critic than Joubert, in order to find Coleridge a peer. Here is a passage which may be compared to the famous one in the Wanderjahre, where Goethe speaks of the poet:—

"O, few have there been among critics who have followed with the eye of the imagination the imperishable yet ever wandering spirit of poetry through its various metempsychoses, and consequent metamorphoses; or who have rejoiced in the light of clear perception at beholding with each new birth, with each rare avatar, the human race frame to itself a new body, by assimilating materials of nourishment out of its new circumstances, and work for itself new organs of power appropriate to the new sphere of its motion and activity."

Indeed, Coleridge may most fitly be compared to Goethe, especially in the exact prevision of truths afterwards established by science. Clearly, too, the very principle which led Goethe to his famous discoveries in botany and biology is the one here divined and applied by Coleridge to literature and art. And Coleridge grasps the workings of the principle as completely as ever Goethe did; he makes use of the very words which Darwin and Spencer adopted and popularised forty years later. Noting that language, the body of thought, must develop as does the spirit, he compares the Romance tongue with the Latin, as being,—

"Less perfect in simplicity and relation,—the privileges of a language formed by the mere attraction of homogeneous parts; but yet more rich, more expressive and various, as one formed by more obscure affinities out of a chaos of apparently heterogeneous atoms. As more than a metaphor, as an analogy of this, I have named the true, genuine, modern poetry the Romantic; and the works of Shakespeare are romantic poetry, revealing itself in the drama."

If the words we have italicised are carefully considered, the reader will acknowledge that intuition has here forestalled scientific induction. From this passage, too, it is easy to see how Coleridge came to the true explanation of the differences which sunder the Greek from the modern drama. Although Lessing and Goethe had here forestalled him in part, yet Coleridge was the first to demonstrate conclusively that the unities of place and time ought to be regarded partly as limitations born of the conditions of the Sophoclean stage, partly as mere consequences of the greater simplicity of the Greek mind. How far Coleridge, in this, outran the men of his time may be seen from the fact that still later Hazlitt speaks of Shakespeare's violations of these rules as "blemishes." Finally, Coleridge goes on to notice,—

"The fundamental characteristics which contra-distinguish the ancient literature from the modern generally, but which more especially appear in the tragic drama. The ancient was allied to statuary, the modern refers to painting. In the first, there is a predominance of rhythm and melody; in the second, of harmony and counterpoint."

Now, this analogy is as a steady light thrown from above which illumines the whole subject. The arts themselves stand in hierarchical order; in them, too, an advance can be seen from the simple to the complex, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. From the sculpture of the Greeks, through Italian painting and German music, to the poetry of England, there is a continuous progression. Coleridge did not apply the principle to its full extent, yet it is surely enough for one man's measure merely to have understood and followed it forty years before it was formulated. Because of this, Coleridge must share with Goethe the honour of having founded our modern literary criticism. Nor is Goethe, as a critic, always and altogether the superior of Coleridge. Even Goethe could scarcely have written this:—

"In Shakspeare all the elements of womanhood are holy, and there is the sweet, yet dignified, feeling of all that continuates society, as sense of ancestry, and of sex, with a purity unassailable by sophistry, because it rests, not in the analytic processes, but in that sane equipoise of the faculties, during which the feelings are representative of all past experience, not of the individual only, but of all those by whom she has been educated, and their predecessors, even up to the first mother that lived."

Nor, in truth, could Coleridge have written it without Shakspeare, for much of the beauty of the passage is derived directly from the creator of Imogen. Still, as this source was as free to Goethe as to Coleridge, it must be acknowledged that a certain coarseness of nature fatally barred the great German from ever realising the emotion, the purity of which lifts this thought as with wings.

As might then be anticipated, Coleridge stands as an interpreter of Shakspeare without a rival; whatever he says about him is weighty, even after the lapse of three-quarters of a century. For instance, can anything be truer than this?—

"The styles of Massinger's plays, and the 'Samson Agonistes,' are the two extremes of the arc within which the diction of dramatic poetry may oscillate. Shakspeare in his great plays is the mid-point. In the 'Samson Agonistes,' colloquial language is left at the greatest distance; in Massinger the style is differenced, but differenced in the smallest degree possible, from animated conversation by the vein of poetry."

Coleridge was the first to show that Shakspeare's puns and conceits are often not only justifiable, but admirable, and here he quotes Shakspeare with effect in his own defence. When old Gaunt speaks of himself as "gaunt in being old," "gaunt for the grave," &c., and Richard asks,—

"Can sick men play so nicely with their names?"

Gaunt answers,—

"No, misery makes sport to mock itself."

Coleridge's comments upon the plays themselves are of similar value; a few extracts better commend his wisdom than can much praise. He speaks of Romeo and Juliet as the tragedy wherein are to be found "all the crude materials of future excellence," that is, "in Romeo and Juliet the passion of love is drawn truly, as well as beautifully, but the persons are not individualised." "Capulet and Montague talk a language only belonging to the poet," for they speak as if they were in the first blush of youth. And Coleridge deduces from this a truth of widest application. "True genius begins by generalising and condensing; it ends in realising and expanding."

Coleridge speaks of The Tempest as "an almost miraculous drama." "Caliban is a sort of creature of the earth, as Ariel is a sort of creature of the air." Yet even Caliban "is raised far above contempt; he uses highly poetical images, displays no mean passion, beyond animal passion, and repugnance to command." In Lear, Coleridge notes that "old age is itself a character; any addition of individuality would have been unnecessary and painful," for "thus Lear becomes the open and ample playground of Nature's passions." The italics are ours.

We must confess that of all Coleridge's expositions, we like that one the least which has met with the most general commendation. We refer to his reading of the character of Hamlet. It is so unworthy of his genius that the present writer could find it in his heart to wish that Coleridge had in reality borrowed or stolen it from Schlegel, as has been falsely asserted, anything rather than have originated it. According to Coleridge, "Hamlet vacillates from sensibility and procrastinates from thought, and loses the power of action in the energy of resolve." Now, in the first two acts of the play, Hamlet's inactivity is due to the fact that he does not fully trust the Ghost, witness his question (Act i., scene v.), "And shall I couple Hell?" In the last scene of the second act he again expresses the suspicion that the spirit that he has seen "may be the Devil," which abuses him to damn him, and decides,

"I'll have grounds

"More relative than this,—the play's the thing," &c.

Further, Hamlet does not know whether his mother was privy to the murder or no, and this question affects the King's guilt, and consequently his punishment. Coleridge professes himself unable to determine this, and accuses Shakspeare of leaving us in "unpleasant perplexity." Yet no one can read Act iii., Scene 4, where the Queen meets the charge of murder first with blank amazement and then with utter indignation, without seeing (as Hamlet shows he does by changing the accusation) that the Queen is free of all blood-guiltiness. That is, throughout three acts Hamlet's inactivity is motivated by the circumstances in which he is placed, and these circumstances are so complex, so calculated to suggest anxious doubts, that they might well give the most hasty temper pause. In fine, Hamlet's character is so subtly compounded (for no one can ascribe the rash murder of Polonius to "an overbalance of the contemplative faculty") that we cannot accept Coleridge's exposition of it as sufficient. We think that in Hamlet, Shakspeare has given us more of himself than in any other of his characters, and we do not believe that Hamlet can be read in the light of any one infirmity.

It may be asked how Shakspeare comes out of this criticism. Coleridge accuses him of only two faults: the passage of the Porter in Macbeth (Act ii., scene 2) he says is "disgusting" and "low," and the blinding of Gloucester in Lear (Act iii., scene 7) cannot but be wrong. Now, that the pain and horror in Lear pass the bounds of art, Shakspeare himself seems to admit:—

"The weight of this sad time we must obey;

Speak what we feel, not what we ought to say."

And this explanation goes far to excuse the fault, if it cannot entirely justify it. The passage of the Porter, however, was doubtless written for the gallery, and for the gallery of a time coarser and more brutal than our own. Shakspeare's words, nevertheless, about himself are found true after nearly three centuries, and because they are true they constitute at once the best description of him and the highest eulogy of his genius that has ever been penned. Has he not himself said:—

"I am that I am, and they that level

At my abuses, reckon up their own."

THE GERMAN TEACHER IN ENGLAND.*

It is computed that there are at present in England eight thousand German teachers, all of them men of education and character, and possessed of certificates of proficiency in the branches of knowledge which they profess to impart. A limited number hold good appointments in public schools, others earn fair incomes as private tutors, very many are ushers in boarding-schools, and not a few are walking about the streets of London wretched and hungry, wearily waiting until it shall please a school agent to find them employment. Some, reduced by want to the last extremity, are compelled to betake themselves to manual labour; and German University graduates and doctors of philosophy are just now working as common hands in sugar refineries, and earning their daily bread as barbers, cab-drivers, and menials. For this information, and for much further enlightenment on the status of German teachers in this country, we are indebted to the remarkable pamphlet mentioned below, by a gentleman whose knowledge of the subject has been gained by actual experience as a teacher in English schools.

Almost as much to be pitied as the homeless and the starving are the greater part of the German teachers who have obtained situations in private boarding-schools through the intermediary of advertising school agents. The schoolmaster and the school agent are the upper and nether millstones between whom the unhappy Lehrer is ground to powder, and, unless he has private introductions (which rarely happens), the agent is a necessity. The German teacher knows no schoolmaster even by name, and private schoolmasters prefer to engage their tutors through agents. Herr Reichardt gives a graphic description of a London school agent's office. A large, well-furnished room, near the door of which stand and lounge a crowd of candidates, attracted by the agent's tempting advertisements. In one corner sits an elderly gentleman, with the important mien of a partner in the firm, in converse with a tutor who has just received an appointment, and is signing a promissory note for the commission, which he has not money enough to pay. In another part of the room are five or six clerks, in the midst of whom, at a large table, sits a man of some fifty years old, whose sharp glance, self-possessed manner, and air of command proclaim him the head of the concern. Everything passes through his hands. As he reads the firm's letters, they are handed to a clerk for registration; then he beckons to the waiting candidates in the order of their arrival, asks their requirements and makes notes of their qualifications, an occupation which is occasionally varied by an interview with a schoolmaster in a private room. Most of the candidates have been there many times before, and are on the books. Those who have not are asked to fill up a form and answer sundry searching questions touching their age, requirements, experience, and references. Then they receive a paper, wherein are set forth the agents' rules and terms,—as to which we shall have more to say presently. A few days after his first visit, the neophyte probably receives a businesslike note from the agent requesting him to write at once ("mentioning our firm") to the principal of — School, who requires a resident foreign master. He writes accordingly, but as the agent has written fifty similar letters to fifty other candidates, the applicant's chances of obtaining the appointment are exceedingly remote, and when he does get a place his troubles are far from over. The salary may be very low—in no case is it likely to be high—or the terms may be "mutual," which means free board and no pay,—but anything is better than starvation, and he takes the best he can get. Herr Reichardt quotes from the Scholastic Guide of October 1st, 1881, a list of seventy vacant resident-masterships in private schools; and the condition of each. In twenty cases the terms offered are "mutual," in six the salary is defined as "small," in nine the pay proposed is from £15 to £20 a year; in eleven, from £25 to £30; in nine, from £35 to £40; in five, from £40 to £50; in two, £60; and in eight, from £70 to £120. The best paid are English University graduates; the worst, foreign masters; the average pay offered to the latter was at the rate of £15 a year, with board and lodging,—less than the wage of a "plain cook" or "an experienced housemaid." Before the teacher takes up his appointment, he has to reckon with the agent, to whom he must pay a guinea fee, even if he accepts a place on "mutual terms." If the appointment be a salaried one, the commission is 5 per cent. on the first year's salary, and on whatever sum he may earn by giving private lessons, either in the school or out of it. Commission on the salary is payable in advance; should the teacher not be able to comply with this condition, he gives the agent a promissory note, and authorises the schoolmaster to deduct the amount from his salary. The promissory note generally bears interest, says Herr Reichardt, at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum. Nor is this all. It sometimes happens that an agent receives from a schoolmaster who cannot come up to town, or does not like to be bothered with much correspondence, carte blanche to engage him a teacher, in which event the agent, unless he is an exception to his kind, engages the man from whom he can exact the highest commission. He demands, and almost invariably obtains, at least 10 per cent. If a teacher does not keep his appointment a twelvemonth, and has to seek a second, or even a third, he pays a year's commission on each. Herr Reichardt mentions the case of a friend of his who paid in one year £16 3s. commission on an income of £53 3s. 8d. One firm, whose conditions the author prints in the original, makes an extra charge of £2 2s. when a client through their intermediary obtains a situation which enables him to qualify for Holy Orders.

Herr Reichardt has a very low opinion of English private schools; with a few notable exceptions, he says, the teaching and the discipline are equally bad; their efficiency is greatly impaired by frequent changes of masters, and the masters are so badly paid and ill-treated that they become the merest drudges, and can take no personal interest in their work. He compares them, greatly to their disadvantage, with private schools in Germany, where no one whose qualifications have not been tested by stringent examination is allowed to engage in the pedagogic profession. Not only are teachers in England made to accept humiliating conditions—as, for instance, that they shall not, "during any school term, enter any hotel, tavern, or public-house in the neighbourhood, nor smoke in the grounds belonging to the school premises, nor in any public thoroughfare in and around"—they are often compelled to put up with quarters which the lowest domestic servants would disdain. This generally arises from the fact that many boarding-school houses have not been designed for the end they are made to serve, and from the reluctance of a master, however crowded he may be, to refuse "a new boy." Herr Reichardt tells of a boarding-school in Kent where three teachers were assigned quarters in an out-house, formerly used as a stable. There were a double and a single bed, and the three drew lots once a week which of them for that period should enjoy the luxury of sleeping alone. Private-school masters live by their pupils, and there are few principals who can afford to offend their boys, or run the risk of offending parents, by a strenuous discipline, or a too frank disclosure of the truth. If a father were told that his son was deficient in ability, he might think the deficiency lay somewhere else, and try the experiment of another school. On one occasion, Herr Reichardt marked a boy's French, in his monthly report, as "bad." "You must modify this," observed the principal; "the parents will be dissatisfied if they think their son is making no progress, and lay the blame on us, rather than on him." A still better story Herr Reichardt tells of a principal, "in Holy Orders," who, when one of his assistants asked why he did not send out monthly reports, answered tartly,—“I do not send out monthly reports, because we lie enough at the end of the term.”

Another complaint alleged by the author against private schools is that the teaching staff is woefully deficient, and that the assistant-masters are unconscionably overworked. He gives two "study plans," handed to him, he says, by the principals of the schools in question, from which it appears that in summer the assistants were occupied with their duties fifty-five hours a week, and twelve hours every other Sunday; and in winter, sixty-six and a half hours a week, and thirteen hours every other Sunday. "All your time is mine," said a principal to a German teacher, who refused to give music lessons after eight o'clock p.m. The long holidays are also a sore grievance, especially for foreign teachers who cannot afford to go home, and whose meagre salaries hardly suffice, at the best, to keep them in clothes and pocket-money. For the old-fashioned division of the year into two halves has been substituted the system of three terms. What with holidays, the time spent in examinations and lost at the beginning and end of the terms, Herr Reichardt reckons that the actual working-days in a year are reduced, in most middle-class schools, to 135. But as the system makes for the advantage of school proprietors, it will endure until parents insist on a radical reform. The upper classes have public schools and the Universities, the lower classes Board Schools, but the children of the middle-classes are as yet educated mostly at private schools, and, in the opinion of Herr Reichardt, English private schools are the most inefficient educational institutions in Europe. He writes bitterly, perhaps unjustly, and we must not forget that to this question, as to every other, there are two sides; but the indictment he brings against school agents and schoolmasters is so serious, so circumstantial, and so precise, that it calls for an equally circumstantial answer from those whom it affects. The pamphlet, moreover, cannot fail to be widely read in Germany, and its revelations will not tend to raise the character of our country either for intelligence or fair-play.

To protect German teachers from the exactions of agents, provide new comers with quarters in London, and place them in communication with schoolmasters wanting assistants, Herr Reichardt proposes the organisation of a union analogous to the "Société des Professeurs Français," established two or three years ago, under the patronage of Gambetta, Victor Hugo, and Alexandre Dumas. In these days of union and co-operation, it is surprising that this project should be still in embryo, but we understand that measures are being taken to carry it into effect. One of the advantages of such a society would be that young teachers might ascertain before leaving their native country what were the chances of finding employment in this. As matters are at present, school agents and schoolmasters have a common interest in letting all come who will.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Bride Picotée. By the Author of "Mademoiselle Mori." (Bemrose.)—This is a charming little French story, the point of which consists in the self-denial of a little worker in lace, who, though she has rediscovered for herself the particular stitch which constitutes the secret of the lace called Point d'Argentan, yet conceals her discovery, in order not to disappoint the one remaining lacemaker who has inherited the secret and who, after a long struggle, has made up her mind to reveal it to the crippled girl with such a genius for lace-making. That is a kind of self-denial which is probably even rarer in the world than martyrdom itself, and very delicately has the accomplished authoress of "Mademoiselle Mori" worked out the character and the story of La Brisarde, and of Lise, the heroine of this delightful tale. We have not read for many years a tale of greater beauty and simplicity than Bride Picotée.

Greater London. By Edward Walford, M.A. (Cassell and Co.)—By "Greater London" is meant, as Mr. Walford explains in his introductory chapter, the district included in the Metropolitan Police jurisdiction, a tolerably regular circle, with a diameter of about twenty-eight miles, of which Charing Cross is the centre. No one is better qualified to deal with the subject thus proposed than Mr. Walford, whose able continuation of Mr. Walter Thornbury's "Old and New London" marked him out as the very man for the task. That he has executed it well, no one who examines this, the first volume, with any care can doubt,—how well, it is probably beyond the power of any but one or two people to judge. A good many people, indeed are judges, more or less competent, in the matter of their own neighbourhood. These, if really well informed, will certainly find that they can supplement the information given in these chapters. But they must not, therefore, conclude that Mr. Walford is in fault. There are limits of space which authors and publishers understand, if amateurs critics and amateur writers do not. There is not a parish in this circle about which a whole volume, full of interesting matter, might not be written. Mr. Walford's skill has been shown in choosing out of a mass of material of which it is difficult to estimate the bulk. As far as we can judge, he has chosen well. That these chapters are eminently readable, there can be no doubt; that they are substantially correct, we feel tolerably sure, because, where we have been able to test them, we have found omissions, indeed, to be accounted for as explained above, but no, or only quite insignificant errors.

Only an Actress. By Edith Stewart Drewry. 3 vols. (F. V. White and Co.)—We cannot compliment Miss Drewry on this book. It is the story of a girl who was, by turns, a street arab, a police spy, and a very wonderful actress, and who is supposed to go unharmed through her very strange experiences. Among these is her connection with a gang of thieves, whom she betrays to the police. In reward for this service, she is made a police spy in London and Paris. After various adventures in both cities, and having in addition to her other accomplishments become the "decoy" of a gambling saloon, she returns to England, and at the early age of sixteen bursts upon the London world as an accomplished, high-class actress. Her "Juliet" takes the town by storm, and she succeeds in every character she essays. We have not patience to follow her through the vicissitudes of her life; but the crisis of her fate is, that being made the subject of a gambling quarrel between two of her admirers, she is stabbed in defending one of them, marries him, and "lives happily ever after." We should like to know by what process the author evolves these wonders.

The Foreigners. By Eleanor C. Price. 3 vols. (Chatto and Windus.)—Miss Price has made here a skilful use of a subject which, indeed, adapts itself readily to the necessities of a novel,—the contrast between English and French ways of thinking in the matter of marriage-making. The young Marquis de Maulévrier has a match arranged for him by his mother, which will preserve and even increase the possessions of his somewhat decayed family. Then, in an unlucky hour, there comes to the town nearest to his ancestral chateau an English family, a father, a mother, and a daughter, who is at once acknowledged as la belle Anglaise. The young man at once loses his heart to her; she, too, unknowing of the arrangement which had already ordered his fate, loves him. Then follow the complications, which Miss Price weaves with much skill into a most interesting plot. We can hardly help despising the Marquis, so wanting is he in what we think self-assertion, so incapable of even conceiving the idea that a maiden without a dot, of whom his mother disapproves, might yet possibly be his wife, and so generally helpless is he; still, we recognise his tenderness and truth, and his humble, loyal submission to duty, as he conceives of it. There is a freshness as well as a grace about this novel which make it very pleasant reading.

Examples of Carved-Oak Woodwork of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, by William Bliss Sanders (Bernard Quaritch), is a handsome volume, containing descriptive letterpress, with twenty-five illustrations, which have been photographed from sketches by the author. It will have for many persons, who have not given up for "Chippendale" their first love, a great interest, and will furnish with models, some of which at least are not beyond imitation, those who like to employ their leisure with wood-carving.

Alison. By the Author of "Miss Molly," &c. 3 vols. (Blackwood and Sons.)—Never did a clever writer build an edifice of the orthodox, three-storied height upon a smaller foundation, or out of a more slender stock of material. We read through these volumes, and do it, it is only fairly to say, without difficulty, so fine and polished is the style, so easy the dialogue, so natural the pictures of life and manners. But when we come to review the contents of the story, it is quite amazing to find how slight they are. Alison, a young girl left in the world without any near kin, is asked in marriage by a widower of middle age. It is a marriage of convenience. She is no longer wanted in the cousin's house where she had lived, and where the daughters are now growing up to fill her place, and she is wanted to secure to Mr. Yorke the calm and repose which his own troublesome children are beginning to disturb. Then come the inevitable misunderstandings. The eldest daughter does not accept the step-mother. Mr. Yorke cannot be troubled to act the judge in domestic disagreements. The lover, or he who might have been the lover, had circumstances favoured—for there is not the faintest suspicion of impropriety—appears on the scene. However, there is that which makes all right in the end. Mr. Yorke really loves his wife, though he takes all possible pains not to show it; and, what one cannot help thinking a little strange, Alison loves her husband. The very clever author of "Miss Molly" must really give us something more of a tale, if she is to keep the good place among novelists which we are all willing to give her.

Hints on Sickness: Where to Go, and What to Do. By Henry C. Burdett. (Kegan Paul and Co.)—Who has not felt, in some sudden emergency from accident or sickness, the importance of knowing "where to go and what to do" on the spur of the moment, without hesitation or delay? Even where life and death may not be the issue of doing the right thing, or sending to the right place for help, and doing it at once, the loss of an eye or a limb may follow as a consequence of the want of such knowledge. From this point of view, we do not know any more valuable or desirable Christmas gift than this little book of Mr. Henry Burdett's. He is a veteran writer on all subjects connected with medical relief and the construction and management of hospitals, and he has done much good service by his labours in this wide field. We doubt, however, if any one of his numerous publications of larger volume is calculated to be so generally useful as the present very small and unpretentious book. It professes by "Hints on Sickness" to give precisely the information most required in any emergency, and to tell us where to go and what to do in all the variety of accidents and sickness coming unawares upon us, like a thief in the night, in the streets or in our own homes, when we are least prepared. Its publishing price (only 1s. 6d.) and the smallness of its bulk are both great recommendations to a book intended to be largely circulated for daily use or ready reference. To those who have occasion to seek relief, or to send others to seek it, at our public hospitals, the first part of this work cannot fail to be most useful, giving, as it does, full particulars of the address of each institution, the terms of admission, and hours of attendance "of all the institutions in England and Wales founded for the relief of diseases or bodily infirmity," including hospitals for infectious cases, convalescent homes, mineral-water establishments, and others. The second part will be found more especially useful perhaps, as it gives instructions "What to do" in all the more common accidents and emergencies of life, where sickness or sudden seizures are apt to paralyse not the patient only, but all who surround him. There are short and practical hints on matters well known to the medical man, but, for the most part, quite unfamiliar to the unprofessional of both sexes. We can heartily commend this little epitome of useful information to all who desire to have at hand, in the most accessible form, a ready guide to tell them where to go and what to do, without a moment's doubt or loss of time, where time is so valuable that a few minutes or an hour lost may be irreparable in the mischief resulting.

Bygone Beauties. From Paintings by John Hoppner, R.A. Engraved by Charles Wilkin. Annotated by Andrew W. Tuer. (Field and Tuer.)—"When Hoppner died," Mr. Tuer tells us, "Lawrence immediately raised his prices from eighty to one hundred guineas for heads, and from three hundred and twenty to four hundred guineas for full lengths." Hoppner had, indeed, divided the world of fashion with Lawrence, and was, perhaps, but little inferior to him as an artist. In this volume we have a reproduction of a "Select Series of Ten Portraits of Ladies of Rank and Fashion." There is not much individuality about them, but they form a pretty series of pictures. The finest of the ten, perhaps, is "Lady Catharine Howard, only daughter of the fifteenth Earl of Suffolk." She was afterwards the wife of the Rev. George Bisset, vicar of Westport St. Mary, Malmesbury. Of the others may be mentioned, "The Duchess of Rutland," the mother of the present Duke; and "Viscountess Andover," afterwards Lady Digby, who died as recently as 1863. (The portrait was painted in 1799.) Her father was the famous "Coke of Holkham" (born in 1754), father of the present Earl of Leicester.

In the West Country. By Mary Crommelin. 3 vols. (Hurst and Blackett.)—This story is in the shape of an autobiography, and an autobiography is not an easy form of narrative to manage.

Heroines who describe themselves are very apt to fall into a self-depreciation which covers but very thinly a great deal of self-assertion. They tell us they are plain, for instance, "ugly ducklings," and so forth; but let us understand that they turn, sooner or later, into great beauties. Pleasance Brown is not wholly free from these faults; but she does not show them in any offensive way, and in describing others she is often very happy. Alice, the beauty, is perhaps a little too bad. A married woman who bitterly reproaches her sister for taking away her admirers from her, and this in more than one case, is, perhaps, a possibility; but it would have been better for the sister to have left her as much as possible out of her story. The other sister, Rose, is a pleasanter sketch; indeed, we have the bad-taste to prefer her to the somewhat sentimental young lady who tells the story of her family. The widow Jessopp could hardly have been as rude as she is represented. Mrs. Gladman and "Aunt Bess," on the other hand, are excellent sketches. For the male characters we have not much praise, excepting the "March Hare," who, we venture to say, has his prototype somewhere in life, and who is certainly worth a regiment of Clair St. Legers and Fulke Bracys. On the whole, the story, though wanting the distinctness and force of "The Orange Lily," a work where Miss Crommelin seems more at home than she does in the volumes before us, has considerable merit. One question we would respectfully ask,—Is it true that among the wonders of the "West Country" is to be found a "Saxon Hall." It would be news to most of us that we have a specimen of domestic architecture dating so far back. The "Saxon" hall is still habitable when we part with our heroine.

Italian Rambles. By James Jackson Jarves. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Mr. Jarves loves the old world, especially so old a part of it as Italy, with a fervour which Americans are particularly apt to feel, and describes it with a corresponding sympathy. He has made himself acquainted with regions that the ordinary traveller, even of the more careful sort, does not visit,—with nooks in the Apennines, for instance, and cities decaying or decayed in Tuscany. And he has learnt something not only of the country, but of what takes far more time and trouble to know, the people. He has other chapters, too, of special interest,—that on ancient and modern glass of Venice, for instance. On the "Pursuit of Brio-à-brao" he has some shrewd advice to give and instructive experiences to record. His "Lessons for Merchant Princes" are as much needed on our side of the Atlantic as on his, and there are some of us, certainly, who may take to heart something, at least, of what he says in "New and Old-World Manners." Here are some sentences about the Italians which it is the more pleasure to quote because all observers are not so well disposed:—

"The Italian populations remain kindly dispositioned and sagaciously conservative, modest, cautious, rather self-depreciating than self-laudatory, yet not without enterprise, but with abundant tact in all things, qualities which may yet give them the leadership of the Latin races in their struggle for regeneration. The 'rough' is still an unknown quantity in Italian progress. A people which 'goes ahead' without him, entertains its masses without intoxicating them, with no restrictions on the sale of liquors, which keeps out of sight the most disreputable features of civic life, and is so well behaved in its festivals that little children and maidens may safely participate in them; always clean, sober, polite, pleasant-tempered, helpful in its aims; a people of this stamp is worthy of imitation by races of coarser instincts and habits."

A Bushel of Corn. By A. Stephen Wilson. (David Douglas, Edinburgh.)—Mr. Wilson has here carefully collected a vast mass of facts relating to the weight of wheat, barley, and oats, as it varies in different seasons and in different kinds. Much, indeed most, of the volume, is occupied by details of a highly technical character, but there are some things in it that stand so prominently forward that the uninitiated reader can lay hold of and appreciate them. One is that corn is much more accurately appreciated by weight than by measure, and, as an inference, that our own statistics of the corn market are misleading. One quarter of wheat may differ from another by as much as 88 lb.; in barley this difference rises to as much as a hundredweight, and in oats eight pounds still higher. These, as Mr. Wilson says, are of course extreme instances, but the commonly occurring difference is very great. A curious instance of the practical bearing of this difference is given in a note at the end of the volume, explanatory of a photographic illustration which exhibits two kinds of oats (the Canadian and the Tartarian), lying in their ordinary state of compactness in boxes with glass fronts. The two kinds have a specific gravity about equal, but, from the fact that the shape of the Canadian oats favours compact lying, while that of Tartarian as distinctly disfavours it, the weight of a bushel of the former is 50 lb., of a bushel of the latter 88 lb. It is not every one that keeps horses who knows this.

Selections from Cowper's Poems. With Introduction. By Mrs. Oliphant. (Macmillan and Co.)—It is apparently the destiny of every poet to be exhibited in a "selection." Criticism in the present age takes charge of poetry, and decides how much or how little is good for the digestion of the public. The general reader likes to have the finest literary food prepared in homoeopathic doses, and is glad to find that the only taste is of sugar. A selection from the poems of Cowper cannot fail to be welcome, and may prove of service to his fame. "Wordsworth's ship," said Landor, "would sail better for casting many loose things overboard;" and the saying applies with equal, if not greater truth, to Cowper. Like Wordsworth, he is the sincerest of poets. There is no artifice about him, although he is far from being without art, and every line he utters expresses genuine feeling. Unfortunately, this feeling is too often that of the city missionary rather than of the poet, for Cowper failed to see, what his readers have painfully discovered, that dogmatism has no place in verse. When he preaches he prosed, and a sermon delivered in rhyme is not attractive. But Cowper's poetry has another aspect, or rather several aspects, which are delightful. He is true, if ever poet was, "to the kindred points of heaven and home." He loves Nature as a child loves its mother, and it may be questioned whether, in his pictures of her, there is a single false stroke. What he sees he makes us all see, not as something new, which Wordsworth often does, but with the accuracy and loving care of the artist who gives to familiar objects permanence and beauty. Then Cowper, one of the saddest of men "when his fits were on him," is as humorous as he is pathetic, and several of his occasional verses are models of ease and grace. A poet with such gifts, and more might be mentioned, can never fall into neglect, though the time may come, we believe has come, when it is necessary to separate the gold from the dross. This is what Mrs. Oliphant has endeavoured to do in the little volume before us. The attempt is not altogether successful. To one phase of Cowper's genius she fails to do justice, having a strangely inadequate conception of his power as a satirist. We think, too, that the autobiographical arrangement of the poems is a blunder. What we want in a selection is a poet's best work; Mrs. Oliphant's plan compels her to insert some of his worst. This defect, however, is not prominent in the volume. The larger number of the extracts are of the finest order, and the book forms a most welcome addition to the "Golden Treasury Series."

British Honduras. By Archibald Robertson Gibbs. (Sampson Low and Co.)—Whatever public interest this book may command will be due not to its style, but to its contents. As a writer, Mr Gibbs is sometimes pretentious, oftener dull, and occasionally even ludicrously matter-of-fact, after the manner of the old almanack, as in such statements as this, à propos of the history of British Honduras from 1826 to 1828:—"In this year, Canning uttered his celebrated boast, 'I called into existence the kingdoms (sic) of the New World to redress the balance of the Old!' . . . Great Britain recognised the Republics of Central and South America. St. George's Caye submerged by a tidal wave during a hurricane. The Rev. Mr. Newport arrived as settlement chaplain." As a historian, Mr. Gibbs is frequently vague and unsatisfactory. He may be excused for telling us that, "in 1638, a few British sailors were wrecked on the coast of Yucatan, and would appear to have settled;" but what can any one make of this, which seems to have some bearing on the fortunes of the colony in 1850?—"An insurrection in Guatemala gained some advantage over Carrera's forces." Mr. Gibbs has a provoking habit of sandwiching his statistics between his chapters of history. The statistics are, however, the best part of the book; it is difficult to take a deep interest in the trifling squabbles which seem to constitute at least the later history of British Honduras. Adventurous whites of all types and ambitions seem to regard this dependency as a stepping-stone to something larger and better; the "Baymen" do not appear to be a high class morally, or in any respect. But the country consists to the extent of four-fifths of "rich, arable lands, laid down in virgin alluvial soil;" the climate is not bad; and as there is at present only one inhabitant to 145 acres, there ought to be a future before the colony. Had Mr. Gibbs's style been equal to his enthusiasm, his book might have furnished it with a good and legitimate advertisement.

From the Pyrenees to the Pillars of Hercules. By Henry Day. (New York, Putnam's Sons.)—Mr. Day does not pretend to have made any discoveries in the course of his scamper through Spain, or to be anything more than one of those open-eyed, much-travelled, and thoroughly candid Americans whom one is perpetually jostling against on the Continent. He merely gives his own impressions of everything he saw and everybody he came across, from the Alhambra to the Rock of Gibraltar, and from the grave of Philip to the living politician whom he styles "Mr." Castelar. "'Mr.' Castelar," says Mr. Day, "is a short, thick-set, florid man; a very genial face, but not strong; no marked characteristics about him; a man no one would remark in the street. He is an orator, but no debater. He has no repartee, no ability to turn the thrust. He gets confused, and perhaps confounded. . . . He is a bachelor, and lives in a pleasant part of Madrid, in a most unpretending way, on the third story of a flat, with his sister." Mr. Day's book is full of chat of this kind, and is on that account enjoyable reading. His historical narratives are, however, rather scrappy.

The Story of Siegfried. By James Baldwin. (Sampson Low and Co.)—We can cordially recommend this version of the legends of the Nibelungen Lied and the two Eddas, which, though written for children, is worthy of perusal by those of older years. The stories are told in a simple, picturesque way, and the character of Siegfried is well maintained throughout the series of adventures into which the book is divided. It is not satisfactorily explained why Siegfried, after surmounting all the difficulties and perils of Isenland, in the midst of which, surrounded by a moat of fire, the fair Brunhild lay sleeping, should have gone away and left her. We think that Mr. Baldwin, who claims for himself the right of modifying and even adding to the ancient legends from the stores of his own imagination, should have told us the reason of this desertion, for Siegfried never returns to Isenland until he comes in the company of Gunther, who accepts the help of Siegfried in winning the hand of Brunhild. We consider that Brunhild is badly treated, for she is so confident that no one can overcome her in feats of skill but her own husband, that she challenges any who like to come and try their strength against her, promising her hand should they win, and claiming the forfeit of their life in case of defeat. Gunther only succeeds in conquering Brunhild by the aid of Siegfried, who has the power of making himself invisible. Meanwhile, Siegfried himself has married Kriemhild, between whom and Brunhild a furious quarrel arises. How this quarrel ultimately led to the murder of Siegfried, we would leave the readers of this attractive little volume to find out. We congratulate Mr. Baldwin on having extracted so much good metal from the somewhat mixed ore of these old northern legends.

INDIGESTION.

The popularity Pepsine has acquired as almost a specific for chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, &c., is due to the fact that it is the nearest possible production of the active principle of the gastric juice of the stomach. Unfortunately, like all other inventions of a like nature, Pepsine has been not slightly discredited by the spurious manufactures that have been issued from time to time; it is therefore necessary as a guarantee of its efficacy to see that each bottle bears the maker's name.

SPECTACLES v. BLINDNESS.

IMPERFECTLY ADAPTED SPECTACLES are the cause of most cases of blindness and defective vision. Mr. H. LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, 1A OLD BOND STREET, has made the Adaptation of Spectacles his special and sole study for upwards of 30 years. Sir JULIUS RENZIOT writes:—"I have tried the principal Opticians in London without success, but the spectacles you have adapted suit admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Similar testimonials from Earl Lindsay, F. D. Dixon Hartland, Esq., M.P., Thomas Cook, Esq., the well-known Tourist Agent, &c.—Pamphlet containing valuable suggestions, post free. City Branches—6 POULTRY, and 23 FENCHURCH STREET.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.—TEACHINGS OF EXPERIENCE.

The united testimony of thousands, extending over more than forty years, most strongly recommends these Pills as the best purifiers, the mildest aperients, and the surest restoratives. They never prove delusive, or give merely temporary relief, but attack all ailments of the stomach, lungs, heart, head, and bowels, in the only safe and legitimate way, by depurating the blood, and so eradicating those impurities which are the source and constituent of almost every disease. Their medicinal efficacy is wonderful in renovating enfeebled constitutions. Their action embraces all that is desirable in a household medicine. They expel every noxious and effete matter; and thus the strength is nurtured and the energies stimulated.
